this is agreed by generall confent, that in the beginning of that Summer, in which Tros was taken, great booties were brought into the Campe, and a great petilence arole among the Greekes: which Homer faith that Apollo fent in reuenge of his Priefts daughter, whom Agamemnon had refused to let goe, for any ransome : but Heraeli-10 des interpreting the place, saith that by Apollo was meant the Sunne: who raised petilent fogges, by which the armie was infected, being lodged in a moorish piece ofground. And it might well bee that the campe was over-petered with those, who hadbeene abroad, and now were lodged all close together: having also grounded their ships within the fortifications.

CHAP.14. S.4.

About the same time arose much contention betweene Agamemnon and Achilles about the bootie, whereof Agamemnon, as Generall, having first chosen for his part a captine woman, and Achilles in the second place chosen for himselfe another. then Aiax, Vlyffes, and fo the rest of the Chieftaines in order: When the Soothsayer Calchas had willed that Agamemions woman thould be restored to her father, Apollo's 20 Priest, that so the Pestilence might cease, then did Agamemnon greatly rage and say, that hee alone would not lofe his part of the spoile, but would either take that which had beene given to Achilles, or that which had fallen to Aux, or to Virifes. Hereupon Achilles defied him, but was faine to suffer all patiently, as not abic to hold his Concubine by strong hand, nor to reuenge her losse, otherwise than by refuling to fight, or to fend forth his Companies. But the Greekes incouraged by their Captaines, presented themselves before the Citie without him and his

The Troians were now relieued with great succours, all the neighbour Countries having fent them ayd: partly drawne to that warre by their Commaunders. 30 who affifted Priamus for money, wherewith hee abounded when the warre began (as appeares by his words in Homer) or for loue of himselfe and his sonnes, or hope of marriage with some of his many and faire daughters; partly also (as we may well guesse) incited by the wrongs received of the Greekes, when they wasted the Countryes adiouning unto Troy. So that when Hellor islued out of the towne, hee was little inferiour to his enemies in numbers of men, or qualitic of their Leaders. The principall Captaines in the Troian armie, were Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus and the other sonnes of Priamus : Aneas, Antener, and his sonnes, Polydimas, Sarpedon, Glaucus, Asius, and the sonnes of Panthus, besides Rhesus, who was flaine the first night of his arrivall, Memnon, Queene Penthesilea, and others who came towards 40 the end of the warre. Betweene these and the Greekes were many battels fought: the greatest of which were, that at the tombe of King Ilus vpon the plaine; and another at the very trenches of the Campe, wherein Hellor brake through the fortifications of the Greekes, and began to fire their ships; at which time Jiax, the fonne of Telamon with his brother Teucer, were in a manner the onely men of note that remaining vnwounded, made head against Hector, when the state of the Greekes was almost desperate.

Another battell (for so antiquitie calls it) or rather the same renewed, was sought by Patroclus, who having obtained leave, drew forth Achilles troopes, relieving the wearie Greekes with a fresh supply. Agamemnon, Diomedes, Vlyffes, and the rest of 50 the Princes, though fore wounded, yet were driven to put on armour, and with help of Patroclus, repelled the Troians very hardly. For in that fight Patroclus was loft, and his body, with much contention recovered by his friends, was brought backe into the Campe: the armour of Achilles which he had put on, being torne from him by Hector. It was the manner of those warres, having flaine a man, to firip him and hale away his bodie, not restoring it without ransome, if he were one of marke. Of the vulgar little reckoning was made: for they fought all on foote, flightly armed, and commonly followed the successe of their Captaines; who rode not voon horses, but in Chariots, drawne by two or three horses, which were guided by some truftie followers of theirs, which draue vp and downe the field, as they were directed by the Captaines, who by the swiftnesse of their horses presenting themselves where neede required, threw first their lauelins, and then alighting fought on foote, with swords and battel-axes, retiring into the rankes of the footmen, or else much subject, because of their armour, which the strongest and soutch ware heaniest: also that from them they might throw their Iauelins downewards, with the

Of the taking of Troy, the woodden Horfe, the Booke of DARES and DYCTIS, the Colonies of the reliques of Troy.

Inally after the death of many worthy persons, on each side, the Citie was taken by night, as all writers agree: but whether by the treafon of Eneas and Antenor; or by a woodden Horse, as the Poets, and common fame (which followed the Poets) haue deliuered, it is vncertaine. Some write that vpon one of the gates of Troy called Seaa, was the image of a horse, and that the Greekes entring by that gate, gaue occasion to the report, that the Citie was taken by an artificiall horse. It may well bee that with some woodden engine, which they called an Horse, they either did batter the walls, as the Romans in after-times vsed to doe with the Ramme: or scaled the walls vpon the sudden, and so tooke the Citic. As for the hiding of men in the hollow bodie of a woodden horse, it had beene a desperate adventure, and serving to no purpole. For either the Troians might have perceived the deceit, and slaine all those Princes of Greece, that were inclosed in it (which also by such as maintaine this re-20 port they are said to have thought vpon) or they might have left it a fewe daves without the Citic (for it was vnlikely, that they should the very first day both conclude vpon the bringing it into the towne, and break downe their walles vpon the suddaine to doe it ) by which meanes they who were shut into it, must have perished for hunger, if they had not by iffuing foorth vnseasonably discouered the inuention. Whereas further it is faid, that this horse was built so high and great, that it could not bee brought into the towne through any of the gates, and that thereforethe Troians were faine to pull downe a part of their wall to make way for it, through which breach the Greekes did afterwards enter: it is heereby manifest that the inclosing of so many principall men was altogether needelesse, considering that 30 without their helpe there was way sufficient for the armie, so that the surprising of any gate by them was now to no purpose. John Baptifta Gramay in his Historie of Asia, discoursing of this warre, faith that the Greekes did both batter the wall with a woodden engine, and were also let into the Citic by Antenor, at the Seean gate: the townesmen sleeping and drinking without feare or care, because the fleete of the Gracians had hoisted faile, and was gone the day before to the Ile of Tenedos, thereby to bring the Trosans into securitie. That the Citie was betrayed, the bookes of Dares and Dietys must proue, which whether we now have the same that were by them written, it may bee suspected; for surely they who have made mention of these writers in ancient times, would not, as they 40 did, haue followed the reports of Homer and others quite contradictorie in most points to these two authors, without once taking notice of the opposition, which they having served in that warre made against the Common report : had it not been that either those bookes were euen in those times thought friuolous; or else contained no such repugnancie to the other authours as now is found in them.

Also concerning the number of men slaine in this warre, which Dares and Dyctis fay to have beene aboue 600000. on the Troian fide, and more than 800000. of the Greekes, it is a report meerely fabulous; for a fmuch as the whole fleete of the Greekes was reckoned by Homer, who extolled their armie and deedes as much as bee could, to bee somewhat lesse than 1200. faile, and the armie therein transpor-50 ted ouer the Greeke feas, not much aboue 100000. men according to the rate formerly mentioned. But it is the common falhion of men to extoll the deeds of their Auncients: for which cause both Homer magnified the Captaines of the Greekes, that serued in the warre, and virgil with others were as diligent in commending & extolling the Trosans and their Citie, from which the Romans descended. Yea the Atherians body of Patroclus, he was faine to await the making of new, ere he could enter the fight: whereof he became very desirous, that he might revenge the death of Patroclus his deare friend. At this time Agamemnen reconciled himselfevnto Achilles, not onely restoring his concubine Brifeis, but giving him very great gifts, and excusing former matters as well as he might. In the next battell Achilles did so behaue himselfe, that he did 20 not onely put the Troians to the worst, but also slew the valiant Hector, whom (if Homer may herein be beleeved) hee chaced three times about the walles of Troy. But great question may bee made of Homers truth in this narration. For it is not likely that Heltor would flay alone without the Citie (as Homer doth report of him) when all the Trojans were fled into it: nor that he could leape ouer the rivers of Xanthus and Simous, as he must have done in that flight: nor that the Treians perceiving Heller in such an extremitie, would have forborne to open some of their gates and let him in. But this is reported onely to grace Achilles, who having (by what meanes focuer) flaine the noble Heller, did not onely carry away his dead bodie, as the customethen was, but boring holes in his feet, and thrusting leatherne thongs into 40 them, tyed him to his Chariot, and dragged him shamefully about the field, selling the dead bodie to his father Priamus for a very great ransome. But his crueltie and conetousnesse were not long unreuenged; for he was shortly after slaine with an arrow by Paris, as Homer fayes, in the Scangate, or as others in the Temple of Apollo, whither he came to have married Polyxena the daughter of Priamus, with whom he was too farre in love, having flaine so many of her brethren, and his body was ranfomed (as Lycophron faith) at the felfe-same rate that Heltors was by him fold for.

Not long after this, Penthesilea Queene of the Amazons arrived at Troy; who after

long after in the warre which Xerxes the Persian King made against all Greece, did not forbeare to vaunt of the great cunning which Mnefleus the fon of Peteus had shewed. in marshalling the Gracian army before Troy: whereupon, as if it had beene a matter of much confequence, they were fo proud, that they refused to yeeld vnto Gelon King of almost all Sicily, the Admiraltie of their Seas, notwithstanding that he promised to bring 200.good fighting ships, and 20000.men for their defence.

The like vanitie possessed many other Cities of Greece, and many Nations in these parts of the world, which have ftriuen to bring their descent from some of the Princes, that warred at Troy: all difficulties or vnlikelihoods in fuch their Pedigree notwithstanding. But those Nations which indeed, or in most probabilitie came of 10 the Troians, were the Albanes in Italy; and from them the Romans, brought into that Countrey by Eneas : the Venetians first scated in Padua, and the Countrie adjoyning by Antenor: the Chaonians planted in Epirus by Helenus, the sonne of King Priamus. To which Hellanieus addeth that the posteritie of Hector did resemble fuch of the Trojans as were left, and raigned ouer them about Troy.

δ. V I.

Of the distresses and dispersions of the Greekes returning from Troy.

Oncerning the Greekes, they tasted as much miserie as they had brought voon the Troians. For Thuesdides notes, that by realon of their long abode at the liege, they found many alterations when they returned: fo that many were driven by their borderers from their ancient feats: many were expelled their Countries by faction: fome were flaine anon after their arrinall: others were debarred from the Soucraigntie among their people, by such as had stayed at home. The cause of all which may seeme to have beene the dispersion of the armie, which weakened much by the calamities of that long warre, was of little force to repell injuries, being divided into 20 fo many pieces under seuerall Commaunders, not very well agreeing. For (besides other quarrels arising upon the division of the bootie, and the like occasions) at the time when they should have set saile, Agamemnon and his brother fellout, the one being desirous to depart immediatly, the other to stay and performe some sacrifices to Minerua. Hercuponthey fell to hot wordes, halfe the fleet remaining with Agamemnon, the rest of them sailing to the Ile of Tenedos; where when they arrived. they could not agree among themselves, but some returned backe to Agamemnon; others were dispersed, each holding his owne course. But the whole Fleet was fore vexed with tempests: for Pallas (as Homer saith) would not bee perswaded in

They who returned fafe were Neftor, and Pyrrhus, whom Orestes afterward flew: alfo Idomeneus, and Philocetes, who nevertheleffe, as Virgilltels, were drinen foone after to feeke new feats : Idemeneus among the Salentines , and Philostetes at Petilia in Italie. Agamemnon likewise returned home, but was foorthwith flaine by his wife and by the adulterer Agysthus, who for a while after vsurped his Kingdome. Memelaus wandring long vpon the Seas, came into Egypt, either with Helen, or (as may rather seeme) to fetch her. Viisses, after ten yeeres, having lost all his company, got home in poore cleate, with much adoe recourring the mastership of his owne house. All the rest either perished by the way, or were driven into exile, and faine to fecke out new habitations.

Aiax the sonne Oileus was drowned; Teucer fled into Cyprus; Diemedes to King Dannus, who was Lord of the lapyges in Apulia; some of the Locrians were driven into Africke, others into Halie, all the East part whereof was called Magna Gracia, by reason of so many townes which the Greekes were driven to erect vponthat coast. Finally, it appeares in Homer, that the Gracian Ladies, whose husbands had beene at the warre of Troy, were wont to callit; The place where the Greekes suffered miserie, and the vuluckie Citie not to be mentioned. And thus much for Troy and those that warred there : the ouerthrow of which Citie, as hath beene said, happened in the time of Habdon ladge of Ifrael, whom Samfon after a variance or Interregrum for certaine yeeres succeeded.

OFSAMSON, ELL, and SAMVEL.

HE birth and actes of Samson are written at large in 2970. the 13.14.15. and 16. of ludges; and therefore I thall not need to make a repetition thereof. But these things Igather out of that Storie. First, that the Angell of God forbad the wife of Manoah the mother of Samfon, to drinke wine or flrong drinke, or to cate any vncleane meate, after she was conceived with childe, because those strong liquors hinder the strength, and as it were wither and shrinke the childe in the mothers wombe. Though this were even the counsell of God himselfe, and delinered by his Angell, yet it feemeth that many women of this age have not read, or at least will not believe this precept: the most 30 part forbearing nor drinkes, nor meats, how strong or vucleane socuer, filling themsclues with all sorts of wines, and with artificiall drinkes farre more sorcible: by reafon whereof, so many wretched seeble bodies are borne into the world, and the races of the able and strong men in effect decayed.

Secondly, it is to be noted, that the Angell of God refused the facrifice which Manosh would have offered him, commanding him to prefent it vnto the Lord; and therefore those that professe divination by the helpe of Angels, to whom also they facrifice, may affuredly know that they are Deuils who accept thereof, and not good

Angels, who receive no worthip that is proper to God. Thirdly, this Samson was twice betrayed by his wines, to wit, by their impor-40 tunitie and deceitful teares: by the first he lost but a part of his goods: by the fecond his life. Quem nulla vis superare posuit, volugtas cuertit; Whom no force couldonermaster, Voluptuon [neffe onerturned. Fourthly, we may note, that he did not in all deliuer Israel from the oppression of the Philistims; though in some fort heereuenged, and defended them; for notwithstanding that he had slaine 30. of them in his sir stattempt, burnt their Corne in haruestime, and given them a great overthrow instantly vpon it: yet so much did Ifrael feare the Philistims, as they affembled 3000. men out of Iuda, to beliege Samfon in the rocke or mountaine of Etam, ving these wordes: Knowest not thou that the Philistims are Rulers ouer vs? &c. After which they bound him, and deliue-50 red him vnto the Philistums, for feare of their reuenge; though he was no sooner loofened, but hee gaue them another ouerthrow, and flew 1000, with the lawbone of pillars of the house at the feast whereto they sent for Samson, to deride him, till which time he bare his affliction with patience : but it was truely faid of Seneca; Patientia sapelasa vertitur in surorem, Patience often wounded, is connerted into furie: neither is it at any time so much wounded by paine and losse, as by derision and contumelie.

Q. II.
Of Eli and of the Arke taken, and of Dagons fall, and the fending backe of the Arke.

He Storic of Elithe Priest, who succeeded Samson, is written in the beginning of Samuel; who foretolde him of the destruction of beginning of Samuel; who foretolde him of the destruction of his house, for the wickednesse of his sonnes, which he supports not, neither did hee punish them according to their deserts: whose not, neither did nee punint them according to phaning and polluting the holy places: though Leui Ben Gerson, to extenuate this filthie offence of forcing the women by the sonnes of Eli, hath a contrarie opinion. In this time therfore it pleased God to cast the Israelites vnder the swords of the Philistims; of whom there perished in the first incounter 4000. and in the second battell 20000. footmen; among whom the fonnes of Eli being flaine, their 20 father (hearing the lamentable successe) by falling from his chaire, brake his necke. Hee was the first that obtained the High-Priesshood of the stocke of Ithamar the fonne of Aaron, before whole time it continued successively in the race of Eleazar the eldest brother of Ithamar: for Aaron was the first, Eleazar the second, Phinees the sonne of Eleazar the third, Abisue the sonne of Phinees the fourth, his sonne Bocei the fift, Ozithe sonne of Boccithe fixt, and then Eli, as Iosephus and Lyranus out of divers 1. Kinge. 2.27. Hebrew authours have conceived. In the race of Ithamar the Priesthood continuedafter Elito the time of Salemon who cast out Abiathar, and established Sadock and Achimaas and their successors. The Arke of God which Israel brought into the field, was in this battell taken by the Philistims. For as Dauid witnesseth, God 20 greatly abhorred Ifrael, fo that hee for sooke the habitation of Shilo: even the Tabernacle where he dwelt among men, and delivered his rower into captivitie. erc.

Now as it pleased God at this time, that the Arke whereby himselse was reprefented, should fall into the hands of the Heathen, for the offences of the Priests and people: so did hee permit the Chaldeans to destroy the Temple built by Salomon; the Romans to overthrow the second Temple; and the Turkes to overthrow the Christian Churches in Asia and Europe. And had not the Israelites put more confidence in the sacrament, or representation which was the Arke, then in God himselfe, they would have observed his Lawes, and served him onely: which when souer they did, they were then victorious. For after the captivitie they had no Arke 40 at all, nor in the times of the Macchabees : and yet for their pictie it pleased God to make that familie as victorious, as any that garded themselves by the signe in stead of the substance. And that the Arke was not made to the end to be carried into the field as an ensigne; David witnessed when he fled from Absalon. For when the Priests would have carried the Arke with him; he forbad it, and caused it to be returned into the Citic. vling these words: If I shall finde favour in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me againe : if not, let him doe to me as feemeth good in his eyes.

The Troians beleeved that while their Palladium or the image of Minerua was kept in Troy, the Citie should never bee overturned: so did the Christians in the last fatall battell against Saladine carrie into the field, as they were made beleeue, 50 the very Crosse whereon Christ died, and yet they lost the battell, their bodies and the wood. But Chryfoltome vpon Saint Matthew (if that bee his worke) giueth a good judgement, speaking of those that ware a part of Saint Johns Gospell about their neckes, for an amulet or preservative : Si tibi ea non prosunt in auribus quemodo proderunt in Collo? If those words doe not profit men in their cares, ( to wit, the hearing of the Golpell preached) how should it profit them by hanging it about their neckes? For it was neither the wood of the Arke, nor the wood of the Croffe, but the reverence of the Father that gaue the one for a memorie of his Couenant: and the Faith in his Sonne, which shed his bloud on the other for redemption, that could or can profit them and vs, either in this life or after it.

The Philistims returning with the greatest victorie and glorie which ever they obtained, carried the Arke of God with them to Azotus, and let it vp in the house of Dagon their Idoll: but that night the Idoll fell out of his place, from aboue to the to ground, and lay under the Arke. The morning following they tooke it up, and let it vp, and fee it againe in his place. And it fell the fecond time, and the head brake from the bodie, and the hands from the armes, shewing that it had nor power, nor vnderstanding in the presence of God; for the head fell off, which is the seat of reason, and knowledge, and the hands (by which wee execute strength) were fundred from the armes. For God and the Deuill inhabit not in one house, nor in one heart. And if this Idoll could not indure the representation of the true God, it is not to bee maruailed, that at such time as it pleased him to couer his onely begotten with flesh, and fent him into the world, that all the Oracles, wherein the Deuill derided and betrayedmortall men, lost power, speech, and operation at the instant. For when that 20 true light which had neuer beginning of brightnesse, brake through the clouds of a virgins bodie, shining vpon the earth which had beene long obscured by Idolatrie. all those foule and stinking vapours vanished. Plutarch rehearseth a memorable accident in that age concerning the death of the great god Pan, as hee stileth him; where (asignorant of the true cause) hee searcheth his braines for many reasons of fo great an alteration: yet finds he none out but friuolous. For not onely this olde Deuill did then die as he supposed, but all the rest, as Apollo, Iupiter, Diana, and the whole rabble became speechlesse.

Now while the Philistims triumphed after this victorie, God strooke them with the grieuous disease of the Hamorrhoides of which they perished in great numbers. For 20 it is written that the Lord destroyed them. It was therefore by generall consent ordered, that the Arke should be remoued from Azotus to Gath or Geth another of the five great Cities of the Philistims; to prooue, as it seemeth, whether this disease were fallen on them by accident, or by the hand of God immediatly: but when it was brought to Gath and received by them, the plague was yet more grieuous and mortall. For the hand of the Lord was against this Citie with a very great destruction, and hee I. Sam. 4. v. 9 fmote the men of the Citie both small and great, &c. And being not yet satisfied, they of Gath sent the Arke to Ekron or Accaron, a third Citic of the Philistims: but they also felt the same smart, and cryed out that themselves and their people should be slaine thereby; For there was a destruction and death throughout all the Citie. In the end, by 40 the aduice of their Priests, the Prince of the Philishims did not onely resolute to returne the Arke, but to offer gifts vnto the God of Ifrael, remembring the plague which had fallen on the Agyptians, when their hearts were hardened to hold the people of God from their inheritance, and from his service by strong hand. Wherefore confeshing the power of the God of Ifrael to be almightie, and that their owne Idols were subject thereunto, they agreed to offer a sinne offering, vling these words; So c.s. v.s. yee shall give glorie to the God of Ifrael, that hee may take his hand from you, and from your gods and from your land. And what can be a more excellent witnessing, than where an enemie doth approue our cause? according to Aristotle; Pulchrum est testimonium, quo nostra probantur ab hostibus. So did Pharao confesse the living God, when he was 50 plagued in Agypt: and Nabuchodonofor, and Darius, when they had seene his mira-

This counsell therefore of the Priests being imbraced, and the golden Hamorhoides, and the golden Mice prepared, they caused two milch kine to bee chosen, fuch as had not beene yoked, and a new Cart or carriage to bee framed: but they

durft not driue or direct it to any place certaine, thereby to make tryall whether in were indeed the hand of God that had strucken them. For if the Arke of God were carryed towards Beth/hemesh and into the territorie of I/rael: then they should refolue that from God onely came their late destruction. For the Philistims knew that the milch Kine which drew the Arke, could not bee forced from their Calues, but that they would have followed them wherefoeuer; much leffe when they were left to themselves would they travell a contrary way. For in the darkest night in the world if calues be removed from their dammes, the kine will follow them through woods, and defarts by the foote, till they finde them. But the kine travailed directly towards Bethfhemelh : and when they came into the fields thereof, to wit, of one lofus 10 of the same Citic, they stood still there; which when the Princes of the Philistims perceiued, they returned to Ekron: After which, God spared not his owne people the Bethfhemites, in that they prefumed to looke into the Arke. And because they knew God and his commandements and had beene taught accordingly : hee ftrooke them more grieuously than he did the Heathen, for there perished of them fifty thousand and seventic. From hence the Arke was carried to Kirriath-iearim and placed in the house of Abinadab; where it is written that it remained twentie yeere in the charge of Eleazar his sonne, untill Dauid brought it to Hierusalem.

The Lord thy God will raise up unto thee a Prophet like unto mee, &c. But he is distinguished from those that preceded him, who were called Seers; as, Beforetime in I frael, when a man went to seeke an answere of God, thus hee spake; Come and let us goe to the Seer:

Ethratei å Bethleehemo Iebude, the towne Esbratha which is Bethleregion of Eobratha, which is in Mount Ephraim, whence Ephratba is put for Silo, which was in the tribe of Eobraim.

for her that is now called a Prophet, was in old time called a Seer. And although it pleased God to appeare by his Angels to Moses, as before to Abraham, Isaas, and Iacob; yet in the time of Eli, there was no manifest vision; not that God had altogether with-drawne his grace from Ifracl: but as the Chaldean Paraphrast hath it, those Sam.13. reuelations before Samuels time, were more clouded and obscure. The places where- See in this in Samuel judged were Malpha or Mit/ha, leated on a hill in Beniamin neere Inda: also

The Philistims taking knowledge of the assembly and preparation for Warre at Milpa in the beginning of Samuels government, gathered their Armie and marched to towards the Citie: at whose approch the Ifraelites Arucken with feare, and with the memorie of their former flaughters and scruitude, besought Samuel to pray to God for them; who was * then performing his facrifice when the Philsslims were in view. * Plutarch re-But God being moued with Samuels prayers (as he was by those of Moses, when if the second King rael fought against the Amalekites at their first entrance into Arabia) It pleased him of Rome, that with thurder and tempest to disperse and beate downe the Armie of the Philistims, was facificing according to the prophecie of Hanna, Samuels Mother. The Lords aduer faries shall be it was told him destroyed, and out of heaven shall be thunder apon them dec. losephus affirmes, that a part that the enedestroyed, and out of heaven shall be thunder von them Gre. tolephus affirmes, that a part mics approchains were swallowed with an earth-quake: and that Samuel himselfeled ed, henothing the Ifraelites in the profequation of their victory. And the better to attend ther purposes, and to withfland any of their attempts: the I/raelites made peace with the Amorites, or Canaanites, which lay on their backes, and to the North of them, that they might not be affaulted from divers parts at once; hauing the Philistims towards the West and Sca-coast, the Canaanite toward the North and East, and the Idumite on the South. The estate beeing thus settled, Samuel 30 for the ease of the people gaue audience and judgement in divers places by turnes, as hath been elsewhere said.

φ. I. Of the deliberation to change the government into a Kingdome.

V т when age now beganne to ouer-take Samuel, and that hee was not able to under-goe the burthen of fo carefull a gouernement, hee put off from himselfe the waight of the affaires on his Sonnes, Ioel and Abijah, who indged the people at Beer/heba, a Citie, the very vemoft towards the South of Indea. And as the place was inconvenient and farre away, fo were themselues no lesse removed from the justice and vertue of their Father: For the thirst of couctousnesse, the more it swalloweth, the more it drieth, and desireth, finding taste in nothing but gaine; to recouer which, they fet the Law at a price, and fold Iustice and judgement to the best Chapmen. Which when the Elders of Ifrael observed, and saw that Samuel as a natural man (though a Prophet ) could not so well discerne the errours of his owne, they prayed him to consent to their change of government, and to make them a King, by whom they might bejudged as other Nations were; who might also leade them to the Warre and defend them against their enemies. For after the ill and lamentable successe which followed the rule of Eli his sonnes, when those of Samuel by their first blossomes promised to yeeld fruit no lesse bitter, they saw no way to put the gouernement from out his race, whom they so much reverenced, but by the choice of a

In a cause of so great consequence and alteration, Samuel sought counsaile from 10 God: which furely hedid not for the establishing of his owne Sonnes; who being as they were, God would not have approoued his election. Now as it appeares by the Text, this speach or motion displeasing him, hee vsed his best arguments to dehort them : which when hee perceived to bee over-feeble, hee delivered vnto them from Gods reuclation, the inconveniences and miseries which should befall them. And yet, all which hee fore-shewed was not intolerable, but such as hath beene borne, and is so still by free consent of the Subjects towards their Princes. For first he makes them know that the King will vse their sonnes in his owne service to make them his Horse-men, Chariotters, and Foot-men; which is not onely not gricuous, but by the Vassals of all Kings according to their birth and condition desired: it be- 20 ing very agreeable to subjects of the best qualitie to command for the King in his Warres, and to till the ground no lesse proper and appertaining to those that are thereto bred and brought vp: so are likewise the offices of women-servants to dresse meate, to bake bread, and the like. But whereas immediatly it is threatned; Hee will take up your Fields, and your Vineyards, and your best Oline trees, and give them to his serwants; with other oppressions; this hath given, and gives dayly occasion to such as would be ruled by their owne discretion, to affirme that Samuel describeth here vnto them the power of a King, gouerned by his owne affections, and not a King that feareth God. But others vpon further examination construe this Text farre otherwife, as teaching vs what Subjects ought with patience to beare at their Soueraignes 20 hand. The former opinion is grounded first vpon that place of Deuteronomie, where God fore-sheweth this change of gouernment from Iudges to Kings, and after he had forbidden many things vnto the Kings, as many wines, conetousnesse, and the like: he commandeth that the Kings which were to reigne ouer Ifrael, should write the Law of Deuteronomie, or cause it to be written: and to shew how greatly the King should honour the Law, he addeth, It shall be with him, and he shall reade therein all the dayes of his life: that hee may learne to feare the Lord his God, and to keepe all the words of this Law, and these ordinances for to doe them: that hee may prolong his daies in bis Kingdome, he and his Sonnes. But to take away any other mans field, fay they, is contrarie to the lawes of God : in the same booke written. For it is said, That which 40 is sust and right shalt thou follow, that thou mayest line. Now if it bee not permitted to carrie away grapes more than thou canst eate out of another mans vineyard, but forbidden by God: it is much leffe lawfull to take the vineyard it selfe from the ow-Deut.23.2.24. ner, and giue it to another. Neither are the wordes of the Text (fay they) fuch as doe warrant the Kings of Ifrael, or make it proper vnto them, to take at will any thing from their vassalls. For it is not said that it shall be lawfull for the King, or the King may doe this or that: but it is written, that the King will take your Sonnes: and againe, This shall beethe manner of the King that shall reigne ouer you. God thereby fore-shewing what power seuered from pietie, (because it is accountable to God onely) will doe in the future. And hercof we finde the first example in Achab, 50 who tooke from Naboth both his Vineyard and his life, contrary to the trust which God had put in him, of gouerning well his people. For God commanded, That his people should beeindged with righteous indgement. Wherefore, though the King had offered vnto Naboth composition, as a Vineyard of better value, or the worthin money which he refused: yet because hee was falsty accused, and vniustly condemned (though by colour of law) how grieuously Achab was punished by God, the Scriptures tell vs. Neither wasit a plea sufficient for Achab against the all-righteous God, to say that it was done without his consent, and by the Elders of Ifrael. For God had not then left his people to the Elders, but to the King, who is called a liuing Law, euen as Dauid testifieth of himselfe: Posuisti me in caput gentium : For this of S. Augustine is very true: Simulata innocentia, non est innocentia: simulata aquitas non eft aquitas: fed duplicatur peccatum in quo est iniquitas & simulatio; Fained innocence, and fained equitie, are neither the one nor the other: but the fault or offence is there doubled, 10 in which there is both iniquitie and dissimulation. Such in effect is their disputation, who thinkethis place to containe the description of a Tyrant. But the arguments on the contrary fide, as they are many and forcible, fo are they well knowne to all; being excellently handled in that Princely discourse of The true Law of free Monarchies, which Treatife I may not presume to abridge, much lesse here to insert. Only thus much I will say, that if practice doe thew the greatnesse of authoritie, even the best Kings of Inda and Ifrael were not fortied by any lawes, but that they did what soeuer they pleased in the greatest things; and commanded some of their owne Princes, and of their owne brethren to be flaine without any triall of law, being fometime by Prophets reprehended, sometime not. For though David confessed his 30 offence for the death of Friah, yet Salemon killing his elder brother and others, the same was not imputed vnto him as any offence. That the state of Ifrael should receive this change of government, it was not only fore-told by Moles in Deuteronomie, but prophecied of by Iacob in this Scripture: The Gen.49. Scepter shall not depart from suda, &c. It was also promised by God to Abraham for a Gen. 15. bleffing: For it was not onely affured that his iffues should in number equal the Gen.17. Starres in heauen, but that Kings should proceede of him: Which state seeing it is framed from the patterne of his solerule, who is Lord of the Vniuersall; and the excellencie thereof in respect of all other gouernments, hath been by many judicious men handled and proued, I shall not neede to ouer-paint that which is gar-

20 nished with better colours already, that I can lay on. In the time of the Judges every man hath observed what civill Warre Ifrael had: what outragious slaughters they committed upon each other: in what miscrable feruitude they lived for many yeeres: and when it fared best with them, they did but defend their owne Territories, or recouer some parts thereof formerly lost. The Canaanites dwelt in the best vallies of the Countrie. The Ammonites held much of Gilead over Iordan; the Philistims the Sea-coasts; and the Iebusites Hierusalem it selfe, till Dauids time: all which that King did not onely conquer and establish, but hee mastered and subjected all the neighbour Nations, and Kings, and made them his tributaries and vassals. But whether it were for that the Ifraelites were moued by 40 those reasons, which allure the mon of all Nations to liue vinder a Monarch, or whether by this meanes they fought to bee elected from the fonnes of Samuel, they be- 1. Sam. 8. came deafe to all the perswasions and threats which Samuel vsed, insisting upon this point that they would have a King, both to judge them and defend them: whereunto when Samuel had warrant from God to confent, he sent enery man to his owne Citie and abiding.

Of the election of SAVL.

Fter that Samuel had dismissed the assembly at Mizpah, hee forbare the election of a King, till such time as he was therein directed by God: who fore-told him the day before, that hee would present unto him a man of the Land of Beniamin, whom hee commanded Samuel to anoint. So

Samuel went vnto Ramath Sophim, to make a feast for the entertainement of Saul (whom yet hee knew not, but knew the truth of Gods promises) and Saulalso hauing wandred divers dayes to feeke his Fathers Affes, at length by the advice of his servant travailed towards Ramath, to finde out a Seer or Prophet, hoping from him to be told what way to take, to finde his beafts. In which journey it pleafed God (who doth many times order the greatest things by the simplest passages and perfons ) to elect Saul, who fought an affe, and not a Kingdome: like as formerly it had pleased him to call Moses, while he fed the sheepe of lethro; and after to make choice of David the yongest of eight sonnes, and by the Scriptures called a little one who was then keeping of beafts, and changed his sheep-hooke into a Scepter, making to him of all other the most victorious King of Iuda and Ifrael. So Iuhn and Iacob were taken from casting their nets, to become fishers of men, and honoured with the titles of Apostles, a dignitic that died not in the grave, as all worldly Honours doe: but permanent and euerlasting in Gods endlesse Kingdome.

When Samuel was entred into Ramath, he prepared a banquet for the King, whom he expected and staied his arrivall at the gate. Not long after came Saul, whom God shewed to Samuel, and made him know that it was the same whom hee had foretold him of that he should rule the people of God. Saul finding Samuel in the gate, but knowing him not, though a Prophet and Judge of Ifrael, much leffe knowing the Honour which attended him, asked Samuel in what part of the Citie the Seer dwelt. 20 Samuel answered that himselfe was the man he sought, and prayed Saul to goe before him to the high place, where Samuel fetting him according to his degree, about all that were inuited, conferred with him afterwards of the affaires of the Kingdome. and of Godsgraces to bee bestowed on him, and the morning following anointed him King of Ifrael.

After this he told him all that should happen him in the way homeward; that two men should incounter him by Rabels Sepulchre, who should tell him that his Asses were found, and that his Fathers cares were changed from the feare of losing his beafts, to doubt the losse of his Sonne; that he should then meete three other men in the plaine of Tabor; then a company of Prophets: and that he should be partaker 30 of Gods spirit, and prophecie with them: and that thereby his condition and dispofition should be changed from the vulgar, into that which became a King elected and fauoured by God.

But the Prophets here spoken of, men indued with spirituall gifts, were not of the first and most reuerenced number, who by divine revelation fore-told things to come, reprehended without feare the errours of their Kings, and wrought mirachryf. inpfal.43 cles; of which number were Moses, Iosua, Samuel, and after them Gad, Nathan, Abias, and Thumim in Elias, Elifaus, Isay, Ieremie, and the rest; for these Prophets, saith S. Chrysostome, the ornanceus Omnia tempora percurrant, praterita, presentia, of suura: but they were of those of the stight or the High Prict were in- whom S. Paul speaketh of, 1. Cor. 1. 14. who inriched with spiritual gifts, expounded 40

At Miffeth Samuel affembled the people, that hee might present Saul to them, was ductication, who as yet knew nothing of his election: neither did Saul acquaint his owne Vncle they were plat therewith, when he asked him what had past betweene him and Samuel: for either gainst the hart to reueale it, till he were confirmed by generall confent. When the Tribes were assembled at Mizpeth, the generall opinion is, that hee was chosen by lot. Chimbi plain that they thinkes by the answere of *Vrim and Thumim: that is, by the answere of the Priest, werenotthe wearing that mysterie vpon his brest when he asked counsaile of the Lord. But the Precious tones calting of lots was not only much vied among the Iewes, but by many others, if not 50 nor any thing made by the by all nations. The Land of promise was divided by lot: God commanded lots to Artificers. See be cast on the two Goates, which should be sacrificed, and which turned off: a figure of Christs suffering, and our deliuerance, for whose garments the Iewes also cast lots. Cicero, Plautus, Paulanias, and others have remembred divers forts of lots, yfed by the Romanes, Gracians, and other Nations: as in the division of grounds or honours; and in things to bee under-taken: the two first kindes were called diniforiesthe third, divinatory; and into one of these three all may be reduced: all which kindes how soeuer they may seeme chancefull, are yet ordered and directed by God: as in the Prouerbs: The lot is cast into the lap, But the whole disposition is of the Lord. And in like fort fell the Kingdome of Ifrael on Saul, not by chance, but by Gods ordinance, who gaue Samuel former knowledge of his election: from which election Saul with-drew himseise in modestie, as both Tosephus constersit, and as it may bee gathered by his former answers to Samuel, when he acknowledged himselfe the least 10 of the least Tribe. But Samuel inlightened by God, found where Saul was hidden. and brought him among the people, and he was taller than all the rest by the shoulders. And Samuel made them know that he was the chosen King of Ifrael, whereupon all the multitude faluted him King, and prayed for him; yet some there were that enuicd his glory (as in all effates there are fuch) who did not acknowledge him by offering him presents, as the manner was: of whom Saul, to avoide sedition, tooke no 1. of the establishing of SAVL by his first victories.

932 O fooner was Saul placed in the Kingdome, but that hee received knowledge that Nahus King of the Ammonites prepared to beliege Rhowledge that it all the state of the great ouerthrow given them by labes Gilead: which Nation lince the great ouerthrow given them by Iephta, neuer durst attempt any thing vpon the Israelites, till the beginning of Saul his rule. And although the Ammonites did alwayes attend vpon the aduantage of time, to recouer those Territories which first the Amorite, and then I/rael disposses them of; which they made the ground of their inuation in Jephrastime; yet they neuer perswaded themselues of more aduantage 30 than atthis present. For first they knew that there were many of the Ifraelites that did not willingly submitthemselucs to this new King: secondly, they were remembred that the Philistims had not long before slaine 34000. of their men of Warre: and besides had vsed great care and policie that they should have no Smithes to make them swords or speares: neither was it long before that of the Bethshemesites and places adioyning, there perified by the hand of God more then 50000, and therefore in these respects, euen occasion it selfe inuited them to inlarge their Dominions vpon their borderers : labes Gilead being one of the neerest. Besides it may further be coniccured, that the Ammonites were imboldened against labes Gilead, in respectos their weaknesse: since the Israelites destroyed a great part of them, for not 111d.21. 40 ioyning with them against the Beniamites: at which time they did not onely slaughter the men and male-children, but tooke from them their yong women, and gaue them to the Beniamites: and therefore they were not likely to have been eincreased to any great numbers: and if they had recoursed them school of this great calamitie, yet the Ammonite might flatter himselfe with the opinion, that I fract having for long time been disarmed by the Philistims, was not apt to succour those whom they had so deepely wounded and destroyed. But contrariwise, when the tidings came to Saul of their danger, and that the Ammonites would give them no other condition to ransome themselves, but by pulling out their right eies, by which they should be vtterly disabled for the Warre, as elsewhere hath been spoken: Saul, both to value 50 himselfe in his first yeeres raigne, and because perchance hee was descended of one of those 400. Maides taken from the Gileadites, and given to the Beniamites, gave order to assemble the forces of Israel, he wing a yoke of Oxen into pieces, and sending them by messengers ouerall the coasts, protesting thus: That who seeme not forth after SAVL and after SAM VEL, fo should his Oxen bee ferued: threatning the people by their goods, and not by their lives at the first. Seven dayes had Saulto affemble an Armie, by reason that the Gileadites had obtained the respite of these seven dayes to give Nahas the Ammonite an answere : who, could they have obtained any reasonable condition, were contented to have severed themselves from Israel, and to become Vassals and Tributaries to the Heathen. In the meane while Saulassembled the forces which repaired vnto him at Bezec, neere Iordan, that he might readily passe the River; which done, he might in one day with a speedy march arrive at Tabes, under the Hills of Gilead.

The Armie by Saul led, confifting of three hundred and thirty thousand, hereturned an answere to those of labes, that they should assure themselves of succour 10 by the next day at noone. For, as it feemeth, Saul marched away in the latter part of the day, and went on all night; for in the morning watch he surprized the Armie of Nahas the Ammonite. And to the end that he might fet on them on all sides, he diuided his force in three parts, putting them to the fword vntill the heate of the day, and the wearinesse of Sauls troupe inforst them to give over the pursuit. Now the Ammonites were become the more carelesse and secure, in that those of labes promifed the next morning to render themselues and their Citie to their mercie. After this happie successe the people were so farre in lone with their new King, that they would have flaine all those Ifraelites that murmured against his election, had not himselfe forbidden and resisted their resolutions. Such is the condition of worldly 20 men, as they are violent louers of the prosperous, and base Vassals of the time that flourisheth: and as despightfull and cruell without cause against those, whom any misaduenture, or other worldly accident hath throwne downe.

After the Armie remoued, Samuel summoned the people to meete at Gilgal, where Saul was now a third time acknowledged, and as some Commenters affirme, anointed King: and here Samuel vsed an exhortation to all the assembly, containing precents, and a rehearfall of his owne Iustice, during the beginning of his government to that day. After Saul had now raigned one yeere before hee was established in Gilgal or Galgala, he strengthened himselfe with a good guard of 2000, chosen men, of which he affigned 1000, to attend on Ionathan his sonne at Gibeah, the Citic of his 20 nativitie: the rest hee kept about his owne person in Micmas; and in the Hill of ONATHAN with his small Armie or Regiment that attended him, 40 taking a time of advantage, surprized a Garrison of Philistims: the fame, as some thinke, which Saul past by, when hee came from Rama, where hee was first anointed by Samuel, which they thinke to have beene Cariath-iearim: because a place where the Philistims had a Garrison, I. Sam· Ic. is called the Hill of God, which they understand of Cariath-iearim: but Iunius understands this Garrison to have been at Gebab in Beniamin neere Gibha, where Ionathan abode with his thousand followers. Howsoeuer by this it appeareth that the Philistims held some strong places, both in the times of Samuel, and of Saul, within the Territory of Israel : and now being greatly inraged by this surprize, they affembled 30000. armed Chariots, and 6000. Horse, where with they invaded Iu- 50 des and incamped at Machmas, or Michmas, a Citic of Beniamin, in the direct way from Samaria to Hierusalem, and in the midft of the Land betweene the Sea and Iordan. With this sudden invasion the Ifraelites were strucken in so great a feare, as some of them hid themselves in the caues of the mountaines, other fled over Iordan into Gad and Gilead: Saul him!elfe with fome 2000, men of ordinarie, and many other people, staid at Galgala in Beniamin, not sarre from the passage of sofua when he led Ifrael ouer Iordan. Heere Saul by Samuels appointment was to attend the comming of Samuel leven daies: but when the lait day was in part spent, and that Saul perceived his forces to diminish greatly, he presumed (as some expound the place I.Sam.13.9.) to exercise the office which appertained not vnto him, and to offer a burnt offering and a peace offering vuto God, contrarie to the Ecclefiastical lawes of the Hebrewes, and Gods Commaundements: others expound the word, obtalit, in this place, by obtaint per Sacerdotem, and so make the sinne of Saul not to have beene any 10 intrulion into the Priests office, but first a disobedience to Gods Commaundement, in not flaying according to the appointment 1. Sam. 10.8. fecondly a diffidence or mistrust in Gods helpe, and too great relying vpon the strength of the people, whose departing from him he could not beare patiently; and lastly a Contempt of the holy Prophet Samuel, and of the helpe which the prayers of fo godly a man 1.Sam.e.13 might procure him. But what soener was his sinne, not with standing his excuses, he was by Samuel reprehended most sharply, in termes vnsitting his estate, had not extraordinarie warrant beene ginen to Samuel so to doe, from God himselfe, at which time also Samuel feared not to let him know, that the Kingdome should be conferred to another (a man after Gods owne heart) both from Saul and his posteritie. 20 After this Samuel and Saul returned to Gibeah, where Saul, when he had taken view of his armie, found it to confift of 600. men : for the most were fled from him and scattered, yea and among those that staid, there was not any that had either sword or speare, but Saul and his sonne Ionathan only. For the Philistims had not left them any Smythin all Israel, that made weapons; besides, they that came to Saul came hafilly, and left such weapons and armour as they had, behind them in the garrisons: for if they had had none at all, it might be much doubted how Saul (hould be able the yeere before, or in some part of this very yeere, to succour labes Gilead with 300. and thirtie thousand men, if there had not now beene any yron weapon to defend themselues withall, sauc onely in the hand of Saul and Ionathan his sonne. But how-30 focuer, all the rest of the people were formerly disarmed by the Philistims, and all those craftesmen carried out of the land that made weapons: there being left vnto the Israelites onely files to sharpen and amend such stuffe as serued for the Plough, and for nought else: yet that they had some kinde of armes it is manifest, or els they durit not have attempted upon the Philishims as they did. And it is not said in the Text that there was not any fword in all Ifrael, but onely that there was not any found amongst those 600. Souldiers which stayed with Saul after Samuels departure: 1. Sam. 13. 22. and it seemeth that when Samuel had publiquely reprehended Saul, that his owne guards for fooke him, having but 600, remaining of his 3000, ordinarie fouldiers, and of all the rest that repaired vnto him, of which many were sled from him before

With this small troupe he held himselfe to his owne Citic of Gibeah, as a place 40 Samuel arrived. of more firength and better affured vnto him, then Gilgal was. Neither is it obscure how it thould come to passe that the Philislims (hould thus disarme the most part of the Israeities, howsocuer in the time of Samuel much had bin done against them. For the victories of Samuel were not got by fword or speare, but by thunder from heauen : and when these craftsmen were once rooted out of the Cities of Ifrael, no maruaile if they could not in a short peace under Samuel bee replanted againe. For this tiranny of the Philissims is to be understood, rather of the precedent times, than vnder Samuel: and yet vnder him it is to bee thought that by their crafts they

50 proceeded in the policie, not suffering their artificers to teach the Israelites, and so even to the times of Saul kept them from having any store of armour. The same policie did Nabuchodonosor vse after his Conquest in Indea : Dionysius in Sicilie; and many other Princes else-where in all ages. But these lost weapons in part the Ifraelites might repaire in Gilead, for ouer Iordan the Philistims had not inuaded. The rest of their desences were such as antiquitie vsed, and their present necessitie ministred vnto them; to wit, clubs, bowes, and slings. For the Beniamites exceeded in casting stones in slings: and that these were the naturall weapons, and the first of all nations, it is manifest; and so in the first of Chronicles the twessest the state of those that came to succour Danid against Saul, while he lurked at Siklag, That they were weaponed with bowes, and could we the right and the left hand with stones; and with a sling it was, that Danid himselfe slew the Gyant Goliab.

While the State of Ifrael stood in these hard termes, the Philistims having parted their armie into three troupes, that they might spoile and destroy many parts at once; Ionathan strengthened by God, and followed with his Esquire onely, scaled 10 a mountaine, whereon a companie of Philistims were lodged: the rest of their armie (as may bee gathered by the successe) beeing incamped in the plaine adiovning. And though hee were discourred before he came to the hill top, and in a kinde of derifion called up by his enemics: yet hee so behaued himselfe, as with the affistance of God hee flew twentie of the first Philistims that hee incountred. Whereupon the next companies taking the alarme, and being ignorant of the cause, fled away amazed altogether. In which confusion, feare, and icalousie, they flaughtered one another in flead of enemies: whereupon those Hebrewes which became of their partie, because they feared to be spoiled by them, tooke the advantage of their destruction, and slew of them in great numbers. And lastly, Saul himselfe taking know-20 ledge of the rout and disorder, together with those Ifraelites that shrouded themfelues in mount Ephraim, fet vpon them and obtained (contrary to all hope and expectation) a most happie and glorious victorie ouer them. Heere was that prophecie in Deuteronomie fulfilled by Ionathan, That one of those which feared God, Should kill a thousand, and two of them ten thousand.

This done, the small armie of Israel made retrait from the pursuit. And though Saul had bound the people by an oath not to take soode till the cuening, yet his sonne Ionathan being inscebled with extreme labour and emptinesse, tasted a drop of hony in his passage: for which Saul his sather would have put him to death, had not the people delivered him from his crueltie.

The late miraculous victorie of Saul and Ionathan, seemes to have reduced vnto the Philifiams remembrance their former ouerthrow likewise miraculous in the daies of Samuel; fo that for some space of time they held themselves quiet. In the meane while Saul being now greatly encouraged, undertooke by turnes all his bordering enemies; namely, the Moabits, Ammonits, Edomits, and the arabians of Zobah, against all which he prevailed. Hee then affembled all the forces hee could make, to wit, 210000. men, and receiving the commaundement of God by Samuel, hee invaded Amales, wasting and destroying all that part of Arabia Petras, and the defart, belonging to the Amalekits, from Hauilah towards Tieris vnto Shur, which bordereth Agypt; in which warre he tooke Agag their King prisoner. But whereas he 40 was instructed by Samuel to follow this Nation without compassion, because they first of all other attempted Ifrael, when they left Agypt in Moses time : he not withstanding did not onely spare the life of Agag, but reserved the best of the beasts and spoile of the Countrie, with pretence to offer them in sacrifice to the living God. Therefore did Samuel now a second time make him know, that God would cast him from his roiall effate to which he was raifed, when he was of base condition, and as the Text hath it, little in his owne eyes. And though the offence was great in Saul for not obeying the voice of God by Samuel, had there bin no former precent to that effect: yet seeing Saul could not be ignorant how severely it pleased God to injoyne the Ifraelites to revenge themselves vpo that Nation, he was in all vnexcusable. For 50 God had commanded that the Israelites should put out the remembrance of AMALEC from under heaven. For the crueltie which the predecessors of this Agag vsed against the Ifraelites, especially on those which were our wearied, faint, licke, and aged people, was now to be reuenged on him, & his Nation about 400, yeeres afterward; and now hee was to pay the debt of bloud, which his forefathers borrowed from the innocent: himselse having also sinned in the same kind, as these words of Samuel witnesse: As thy swordhath made other women childlesse, so shall thy mother be child-i-sam.15.33. lesse among other women; at which time Samuel himselse (after he had bin by many bootlesse intreaties perswaded to stay awhile with Saul) did cut Agag in pieces before the Lord in Gilgal, and soone after he departed to Ramath, and came no more to see Says, untill the day of his death.

Of the occurrents betweene the rejection of SAVL and his death.

Ow while Samuel mourned for Saul, God commanded him to choose a King for Ifrael, among the sonnes of Islai: which Samuel (doubting the violent hand of Saul) seared in a sort to performe, till it pleased God to direct him, how hee might avoid both the suspition, and the danger. And if Samuel knew that it was no way derogating from the prouidence of God, that by his cautious care and wisedome he sought to anoid the inconvenience or dangers of this life, then doe those men missake the nature of his divine ordinance, who neglecting the reason that God hath given them, doe no otherwise avoid the perills and dangers thereof, than as men stupisted in the opinion of fate, or destine, neglecting either to beg counsaile at Gods hand by prayer, or to exercise that wisedome or fore-sight, where-with God hath inriched the mind of man, for his prescruation. Neither did the all-powerfull God (who made and could destroy the world in an instant) dissaine here to instruct Samuel, to avoid the surie of Saul, by the accustomed cautious waies of the world.

Of the fonnes of Islai, Samuei by God directed, made choise of Dauid, the yongest, having refused Eliab, the first borne: who though he were a man of a comely person and great strength; yet vnto such outward appearance the Lord had no respect. For as it is written, God seeth not as man seeth, &c. but the Lord beholdeth the heart. Hee also resusting the other sixe brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had alloresting the other sixe brethren, made choise of one whom his Father had allower neglected, and lest in the field to attend his slock; for of him the Lord said to SAMVEL, Arise and anoint him, for this is he: which done, Samuel departed & went to Ramath. Neither was it long after this that Saul began to seek the life of Dauidsin which bloudy mind he continued til he died, ouercome in battaile by the Philistims. The Philistims having well considered (as it seemes) the increase of Saul his power through many victories by him obtained, whilest they had sitten still and forborne to giue impediment vnto his prosperous courses, thought it good to make new trial of their fortune, as inftly fearing that the wrongs which they had done to Ifrael might be repaied with advantage, it ever opportunitie should serve their often iniu-40 red neighbours against them, as lately it had done against Moab, Ammon, and the rest of their ancient enemies. Now for the qualitie of their Souldiers, and all Warlike provisions, the Philistims had reason to think themselves equall, if not superiours to Ifrael. The successe of their former wars had for the most part bin agreeable to their owne wishes; as for late disasters, they might, according to humane wisedome, impute them to second causes, as to a tempest happening by chance, and to a mistaken alarme, whereby their Armie possessed with a needlesse feare had fallen to rout. Hauing therefore mustered their forces and taken the field, encamping so neere to the Armie which King Saul drew forth against them, that they could not easily depart without the triall of a battaile, each part kept their ground of aduantage for a while, 50 not ioyning in groffe, but maintaining some skirmishos, as refusing both of them to passe the valley that lay between their Camps. Iust causes of seare they had on both fides; especially the Philistims, whose late attempts had beene confounded by the angrie hand of God. Vpon this occasion perhaps it was, that they fought to decide the matter by fingle combat, as willing to try in one mans person, whether any ftroake from heaven were to be feared. Goliah of Gath a strong Giant, fearing neither

God nor man, undertooke to defie the whole hofte of Ifrael, prouoking them with despightfull words, to appoint a Champion that might fight with him hand to hand, offering condition, that the partie vanquished in Champion, should hold in selfe as overcome in grosse, and become vassall to the other. This gave occasion to young David, whom Samuel by Gods appointment had anointed, to make a famous entrance into publike notice of the people. For no man durst expose himfelfe to encounter the great Brength of Goliah, vntill Dauid (sent by his father of an errand to the campe) accepted the combat, and obtained the victorie, without other armes offensive or defensive than a sling, wherewith hee overthrewe that to haughtie Gyant, and after with his owne fword strooke off his head. Hereupon the Philistims, who should have yeelded themselves as subjects to the Conquerour according to the couenant on their owne fide propounded, fled without flav:

and were pursued and slaughtered even to their owne gates. By this victorie the Philistims were not so broken, that either any of their townes were lost, or their people discouraged from infesting the Territories of Israel. But David, by whom

God had wrought this victorie, fell into the gricuous indignation of his mafter

Saul, through the honour purchased by his well descruing. For after such time as the spirit of God departed from Saul and came vpon Dauid, he then became a uid in his necessitie with hallowed bread, and armed him with the sword of his own conquest taken from Goliab; Saul not only by his wicked Edomite Doeg murthered and Beepe. And he that had compassion on Agag the Amalekite, who was an enemy to God and his people, and also spared and preserved the best of his Cattell, contra-rie to the Commaundement and ordinance of God, both by Moses and Samuel, had not now any mercie in store, for the innocent, for the Lords servants the Priests of Israel. Yea he would have flaine his owne sonne Ionathan, for pitying and pleading hunger made him forget his fathers vnreasonable commination. The companions of crueltie are breach of faith towards men, and impietie towards God. The former he shewed in denying David his daughter, whom he had promised him; and againe in taking her away from him, to whom he had given her; also in that when as

Dauid had twice spared his life in the Territory of Ziph, and Saul twice sworne to do him no hurt, and confessed his errours, yet he sought still to destroy him, by all the meanes he could. His impictie towards God he shewed, in that he sought counsell of the witch of Ender, which was the last preparative for his destruction. For wher-as when he fought counsel from God he had beene alwaies victorious : from the O-his necrest and faithfullest scruants, were all slaughtered by the Philistims: his bodic with the bodies of his fonnes (as a spectacle of shame and dishonour) were hung ouer the walls of Bethfan : and there had remained till they had found buriall in the bowels of rauenous birds, had not the gratefull Gileadites of labes stolne their carcales thence and interred them. This was the end of Saul, after he had governed Ifrael, together with Samuel 40. yeres, and by himselfe after Samuel 20. yeeres, according to Cedrenus, Theophilus, and Iofephus. But yet it seemeth to mee, that after the death of

An exceeding valiant man he was, and gave a faire entrance to all those victories which David afterward obtained, for he had beaten the Ammonites with their neighbouring Nations; crusht the Syrians, and their adhærents; broken the strength of the ten of David, Nabal, and Abigail, after which the death of Saul quickly enfued.

N the second yeere of Samuel, according to Eusebius, was Dauid borne: after Codoman later, and in the ninth yeere : after Bunting in the tenth. after Codoman later, and in the ninth yeere ratter Bunting in the tenth.

For Danid, faith he, was thirtie yeeres old when he began to reigne:

The was borne in the tenth of the force whence it followeth, that he was borne in the tenth of the fortie yeeres, which are given to Samuel and Saul. About the eleventh of Samuel, Aneas Silvius the sonne of Posthumus began his raigne over the Latines in Alba, who gouerned that State 31. yeeres. There are who place before him Latinus Siluius, as brother to Posthumus, calling him the fifth from Anens, and fourth King of Alba, whereof I will not fland to dispute. In the eleventh of Samuel, Dercilus fate in the Throne of Afgria, being the one and thirtieth King; he ruled that Empire 40. yeeres. In this age of Samuel the Dores Obtained Peloponnesus, and at once with the Heraslide, who then led and commanded the Nation, possess a great part thereof 328. yeeres before the first Olympiad, according to Diodorus and Eratosthenes. For all Greece was anciently possessed by three Tribes or Kindreds, viz. the Ionians, Do-20 rians, and Lolians: at length it was called Helles, and the people Hellenes, of Hellen, the sonne of Deusalion, Lord of the Countrie of Pthiotis in Thessalie. But before the time of this Hellen, yea and long after, Greece had no name common to all the inhabitants, neither were the people called Hellenes, till such time as partly by trading in all parts of the Land, partly by the plantation of many Colonies, and fundric great victories obtained, theissues of Hellen had reduced much of the Countrie vinder their obedience, calling themselues generally by one name, and yet every severall Nation after some one of the posteritie of Hellen, who had raigned ouer it. And because this is the furthest antiquitie of Greece, it will not be amisse to recount the Pedigree of her first planters.

30 Japetus (as the Poetsfable) was the sonne of Heauen and Earth, so accounted, either because the names of his Parents, had in the Greeke tongue such signification:

or perhaps for his knowledge in Astronomie and Philosophic.

Ispetus begat Prometheus, and Epimetheus: of whom all men haue read that haue read Poets. Prometheus begat Deucalion: and Epimetheus, Pyrrha. Deucalion and his wife Pyrrharaigned in Theffalie, which then was called Pyrrha (as Cretensis Rhianus affirmeth) of Pyrrhathe Queene. In Deucalions time was that great floud, of which we have spoken elsewhere. Deutation begat Hellen: whole sonnes were Xuthus, Dorus, and Lolus : of Dorus and Lolus, the Dores and Lolians had name. The Loles inhabited Baotia. The Dores having first inhabited fundrie parts of Thessalie, did af-40 terward scate themselves about Parnassico, and finally became Lords of the Countries about Lacedamon: Xuthus the eldest sonne of Hellen, being banished by his bretheren, for having diverted from them to his owne vie some part of their Fathers goods, came to Athens: where marrying the Daughter of King Erictheus, hee begat on her two sonnes, Acheus and Ion. Of these two, Acheus, for a slaughter by him committed, fled into Peloponnesus : and scating himselse in Laconia, gaue name to that region: from whence (as some write) he afterwards departed; and leuying an Armie, recoucred the Kingdome of his Grand-father in Thessale.

Jon being Generall for the Athenians, when Eumolpus the Thracian invaded Atliea, did obtaine a great victorie, and thereby fuch love and honour of the people, that 50 they committed the ordering of their State into his hands. Hee divided the Citizens into Tribes, appointing euery one to some occupation, or good course of life. When the people multiplied, he planted Colonies in Sycionia, then called Ægialos, or Ægialia: In which Countrie Solinus then raigning, thought it fafer to give his Daughter Helice in marriage to Ion, and make him his Heire, than to contend with Sf3 him. So lon married Helice, and built a Towne called by his wives name in Agizlia, where he and his posteritie raigned long, and (though not obliterating the old name) gaue to that Land the denomination. But in after-times the Dores affilling the Nephewes of Hersules, inuaded Peloponne (u., and ouer-comming the Acheans, possessed Laconia, and all those parts which the Achai had formerly occupied. Hereupon the Achai driven to seeke a new seate, came vnto the Iones, desiring to inhabit Ægialia with them, and alleadging in vaine, that lon and Achaus had beene brethren. When this request could not be obtained, they sought by force to expell the Ionians, which they performed; but they loft their King Tifamenes, the fonne of Orestes, in that Warre.

Thus were the Iones driven out of Peloponnesus, and compelled to remove into Attica, from whence after a while they failed into Asia, and peopled the Westerne coast thereof, on which they built twelue Cities, inhabited by them, even to this day, at the least without any universall or memorable transmigration. This expedition of the Iones into Asia hath been mentioned of all which have written of that Age, and is commonly placed 140. yeeres after the warre of Troy, and 60. yeeres after the descent of the Heraclida into Peloponnesus. These Heraclida were they of whom the Kings of Sparta issued; which race held that Kingdome about 700. yeeres. Of their Father Hercules many strange things are deliuered vnto vs by the Poets, of which some are like to have beene true, others perhaps must be allegori- 20 cally vnderstood. But the most approued Writers thinke that there were many called Hercules, all whose exploits were by the Greekes ascribed to the sonne of Aleme-

na, who is faid to have performed thefe twelve great labours. First, he flew the Nemaan Lyon: secondly, he flew the Serpent Hydra, which had nine heads, whereof one being cut off, two grew in the place: The third was the ouer-taking a very swift Hare: The fourth was the taking of a wild Bore aliue, which hanted mount Erymanthus in Arcadie: The fift was the cleanling of Augias his Oxe-stall in one day, which hee performed by turning the River Alpheus intoit: The list was the chasing away of the Birds from the Lake Stymphalis: The seventh was the fetching a Bull from Crete: The eighth was the taking of the Mares which 30 Diomedes King of Thrace fed with humane flesh: The ninth was to fetch a Girdle of the Queene of the Amazons: The three last were, to fetch Gerions Beeues from Gades; the golden Apples of the Hefperides; and Cerberus from hell. The Mythologicall interpretation of these I purposely omit, as both ouer-long to be here set downe, and no lesse perplexed than the labours themselues. For some by Hercules vnderstand Fortitude, Prudence, and Constancie, interpreting the Monsters, Vices. Others make Hercules the Sunne, and his travailes to be the twelve signes of the Zodiac. There are others who apply his workes historically to their owne conceits; as well affured, that the expolition cannot have more valikelihood, than the fables: That he tooke Elis, Pylus, O Echalia, and other Townes, being affifted by fuch as either ad- 40 mired his vertues, or were beholding vnto him. Also that he slew many Thecues, and Tyrants, I take to be truly written, without addition of Poeticall vanitie. His trauailes through most parts of the world are, or may seeme, borrowed from Hercules Libycus. But fure it is that many Cities in Greece were greatly bound to him: for that he (bending all his indevours to the common good) delivered the Land from much oppression. But after his death no Citie of Greece (Athens excepted) requited the vertue and deserts of Hercules, with constant protection of his children, persequeted by the King Eurystheus. This Eurystheus was sonne of Schenelus; and grand-child of Perfeus; he raigned in Mycena, the mightieft Citie then in Greece. He it was that imposed those hard taskes upon Hercules, who was bound to obay 50 him (as Poets report) for expiation of that Murther, which in his madnesse he had committed vpon his owne Children; but as others say, because hee was his Subiect and Seruant : wherefore there are who commend Eurystheus for imploying the strength of Hercules to so good a purpose. But it is generally agreed by the best writers, that Hercules was also of the stocke of Perseus, and holden in great icalousie by Eurystheus because of his vertue, which appeared more and more in the dangerous services, wherein hee was imployed, so that hee grew great in reputation and power through all Greece; and had by many wines and Concubines aboue threescore children. These children Euryscheus would faine haue got into his power, when Hercules was dead : but they fled vnto Ceyx King of Trachinia, and from him (for he durft not withstand Eurystheus) to Athens. The Athensans not onely gaue them entertainement, but lent them ayd, wherewith they encountred Euryltheus. Iolaus the brothers sonne of Hercules, who had assisted him in many of his trauels, was captaine of the Heraclida. It is faid of him, that being dead, he obtained leave of Pluto to live againe till hee might revenge the injuries done by Euriftheus: whom when hee had flaine in battell, hee died againe. It feemes to mee, that whereas he had led Colonies into Sicilie, and aboade there a long time forgotten: he came againe into Greece to affift his coulins, and afterwards returned back. When the Peloponnesians understood that Eurystheus was flaine, they tooke Atreus the some of Pelops to their King: for hee was rich, mightie, and fauoured of the people. Against him the Heraclida marched under Hyllus the sonne of Hercules. But to avoid effusion of bloud, it was agreed, that Hyllus should fight with Echenus King of the Tegeate a people of Arcadia, who affilted Atreus, with condition, that if Hyllus were victor, hee should peaceably enjoy what hee challenged as his right; otherwise the Herachida should not enter Pelaponnesus in 100. yeeres. In that combat Hyllus was flaine, and the Heraclide compelled to forbeare their Country, till the third generation : at which time they returned under Aristodemus (as the best authoritie shewes, though some have said, that they came vnder the conduct of his children) and brought with them the Dores, whom they planted in that country, as is before shewed, having expelled the Achai, ouer whom the issue of Pelops had raigned after the death of Eurystheus foure generations.

Bout this time that excellent learned Poet Homer lived, as many of the best Chronologers affirme. In his Enangelicall preparation, where out of Tatianus Affrica he citeth fundry opinions touching the time when Homer lived, hee reckoneth many other Greeke writers more ancient than Homer: 20 as Linus, Philammon, Epimenides, Phemius, Aristaus, Orpheus, Musaus, Thamyras, Amphion, and others.

Now whether Homer or Heliodus were the eldere it is also much disputed. Aslus Gellius reports that Philochorus and Xenophanes affirme, that Homen preceded Hefiod: and on the contrarie, that Luc. Accius the Poet, and Ephorus the Historian make He-Farrode imag. fod of an elder time than Homer. Varro leaves it vneercaine which of these learned fablers was first borne: but he finds that they lived together some certaine veeres, wherein he confirmes himselse by an Epigram, written vpon a Treuit, and lest by

For my selfe, I am not much troubled when this Poet liued, neither would I offend the Reader with these opinions, but onely to shew the vncertaintie and disagreement of Historians, aswell in this particular, as in all other questions and dispute of time. For the curiofitic of this mans age is no lesse ridiculous, than the inquisition why he began his Iliades with the word Menin, as perhaps containing some great mysterie. In derision whereof Lucian faining himselfe to have beene in hell, and to have spoken with Homer, there asked him the cause why he began his booke with that word: who answered. That he began in that forr, because 40 it came in his head fo to doe.

It feemeth that Senyes, or after Macrobius Senemires, ruled A 27th at this time: for Tanepher fobris was his successour, who preceded Vaphres, father in law to Salomon.

About the end of Sauls government, or in the beginning of Davids time according to Calliodorus, the Amazones with the Cymmerians inuaded Alia, Latinus Sylnius then ruling in Italie. which Dauid, in a few yeeres, became mafter of all those neighbouring Nations, who by interchange of times had subjected the Iudaans, corrupted their religion, and held them under in a most abiect, and grieuous stauerie; to wit, the Edumeans, Moabites, Ammonites, Midianites, Itureans, and the rest of the Arabians, with the Philistims, Jebusites, Gesburites, Machathites, all which acknowledged David for their Soueraigne Lord, and paid him tribute.

Of DAVID.

è. I.

Of DAVIDS estate in the time of SAVL.

CHAP.17. S.I.

HE hazards which Dauid ran into while he was yet onely defigned King, and living as a private man, expected the Empire, were very many. The first personall act of fame, was his killing of Goliah in the view of both armies, whereby hee became knowne to Saul, and so highly affected of Ionathan the sonne of Saul, that hee loued him as his owne foule: In fo much as when Saul fought to perswade his sonne, that Danid would affuredly be the ruine of his house, and estate, and offered him violence when he pleaded his cause, Ionathan could neuer be perswaded neuer forst, nor 30 ener wearied from the care of Danids life, and well doing. It was not long after this fignall act of Davids, but that Saul became exceeding icalous of him, though he were become as his houshold servant, and his Esquire, or armour-bearer. Saul being vexed with an euill spirit, was aduised to procure some cunning Musician to play before him voon the Harpe; whereby it was thought that hee might finde ease; which came to passeaccordingly. He entertained David for this purpose, and began to fauour him, giuing him a place of Commaund among the men of warre. But the icalous tyrant soone waxed wearie of his good affections, and sought to kill David. being thereunto moued onely through enuic of his vertue. This passion first brake 40 forth in the middest of his raying fit, at which time hee threw a speare at Danid that was then playing on his Harpe to doe him eafe. Censorinus remembreth one Asclepius a Physician, who practised the curing of conferred to the Frenzie, by the like Musick: and tempered thereby those diseases which grew from passion. That Pythagor as did also the like by such a kinde of harmonie, Seneca in his third booke of anger witnesseth. But the madnesse of Saul came from the cause of causes, and was thereby incurable, howsoeuer it sometimes left him, and yeelded vnto that Musicke, which God had ordained to be a meane of more good to the Musician than to the King.

Saul having failed in such open attempts, gaue vnto Dauid the Commaundement 500f 1000. fouldiours, to confront the Philistims withall. For hee durft not trust him as before, about his person, fearing his reuenge. Now the better to couer his hatred towards him, hee promised him his daughter Merab to wife : but having married her to Adriel, hee gaue to David his younger daughter Michel, but with a condition, to present him with an hundred foreskinnes of the Philistims: hoping rather (in respect of the valour of that Nation, that the Philistims would take Davids head, than hee their foreskinnes. This hope failing, when as now Datids victories begat new feares and icalousies in Saul, hee practised with Ionathan, and afterwards with his owne hands attempted his life, but his purposes were still stuftrated. After all this hee fought to murther him in his owne house, but Michol his wife delivered him. So David fought Samuel at Ramah, and being purfued by Saul, fled thence vnto Nob in Beniamin, to Abimelech, then to Ashis the Philistim, Prince of Geth: where to obscure himselfe, he was forc't to counterfeit both simplicitie and distraction. But being ill affured among the Philistims, he couered himselfe in the Cane of Adullam: and after conveying such of his kinsfolks as were not fit to follow him into Moab. 10 he hid himselfe in the defarts of Ziph, Maon, and the hilles of Engaddi, where hee cut off the lap of Sauls garments, and spared his life: as he did a second time in the defart of Ziph, after his passage with Nabal and Abigail. After which he repaired to Achis of Geth the second time, and was kindly entertained in regard of the haired, with which his mafter Saul was knowne to profecute him.

Of Achis David Obtained * Siklag in Simeon, pretending to invade Indea: but hee bent his forces another way and ftrooke the Amalekites, with other enemies of Ifrael, letting none liue to complaine vpon him. Achis supposing that Danid had drawne bloud of his owne Nation, thought himselfe assured of him; and therefore preparing to inuade Israel, summoneth David to affist him, who dissembling his 20 intent, seemeth very willing thereto. But the rest of the Philistim Princes knowing his valour, and doubting his disposition, liked not his company, and therefore hee withdrew himselfe to Siklag. At his returne he found the towne burnt, his two wives with the wives and children of his people taken by the Amalekites: Hereupon his fellowes mutined, but God gaue him comfort, and assurance to recouer all againe: which he did.

This armie of the Philistics commaunded by Achis, encountred Saul at Gilbos, in which hee and his three sonnes were slaine. The newes with Sauls Crowne and bracelets were brought to Danid at Siklag, in his returne from being victorious ouer Amalech, by a man of the same Nation, who answed (though falsily) that himselfe 20 at Sauls request had slaine him. David, because hee had accused himselfe, made no fcruple to cause him to be slaine at the instant : and the sooner because the probabilities gaue strong euidence withall. Otherwise it followeth not that euery man ought to bee beleeved of himselfe to his owne prejudice. For it is held in the lawe; Confessio reorum non habenda est pro explorato crimine, nisi approbatio alia instruit religionem cognoscentis. The prisoners confession must not be taken for an euidence of the crime, unlesse some other proofe informe the conscience of the Judge. For a man may confesse those things of himselfe, that the Judge by examination may know to bee impossible. But because it is otherwise determined in the title de custodia reorum l. si confesfus, et in cap, de pænis l. qui sententiam, therfore doth the Gloffe reconcile these two pla- 40 ces in this fort: Si quis in iudicio sponte de seipso consiteatur, & postea maneat in confessione, idelt (atis. If any man in indepement doe confesse of himselfe, of his owne accord, and after doth perseuere in his confession, it is enough. That David greatly bewailed Saulit is not improbable, for death cutteth asunder all competition: and the lamentable end that befell him, being a King, with whom in effect the strength of Ifrael also fell, could not but stirre vp forrow, and moue compassion in the heart of Danid.

The victoric which the Philistims had gotten was so great, that some townes of the Israelites, cuen beyond the river of Iordan, were abandoned by the inhabitants, and left vnto the enemie, who tooke possession of them without any resistance made. Wherefore it may feeme strange, that a Nation so warlike and ambitious 50 as were the Philistims, did not follow their fortune with all diligence, and feeke to make the Conquest entire. Most like it seemes, that the Civill warre immediatly breaking out betweene David and the house of Saul, wherein Iuda was divided from the rest of Israel, gaue them hope of an easie victorie over both; and thereby caufed them to attempt nothing at the present, lest by so doing they should inforce their disagreeing enemies to a necessarie reconciliation; but rather to permit that the one part should consume the other, by which meanes, both the victors, and the vanguished, would become a prey to the violence of such as had beaten them, when their forces were vnited.

Fter the death of Saul. Abner, who commaunded for Saul in the war, fought to advance Ishofeth (or Iehoftus according to Iofephus) though hee had no right to the Kingdome of Ifrael: for Mephiboleth the first sonne of Ionathanlined. Against this Abner, and Isboseth, David made a desensive warre, till Abner past lordan, and entred the border of Inda; at which time he fent loab with fuch forces as he had, to relift Abner: Isbofeth remaining in Gilead, and Dauid in Hebron. The armies encountred each other necre 30 Gibeon, where it seemeth, that Abner made the offer to trie the quarrell by the hands of a few; like to that Combat betweene the Lacedamonians, and the Argines, remembred by Herodotus, 300. being chosen of each Nation, of which number three persons were onely left vnslaine. The like triall by a farre lesse number was persormed by the Horati and Curiati for the Romanes and Latines. The same challenge Golish the Philistim made, whom David slew: a custome very ancient. Edward the third offered the like triall in his owne person to the French King; and Francis the French King to Charles the Emperour. There were twelve chosen of each part, in this warre of David with the house of Saul, to wit, so many of Beniamin, and as many of Inda: whose force and valour was so equall, as there survived not any one to 30 challenge the victorie. But the quarrell staid not here: for the armie of Iuda prest Abner in groffe, and brake him. Three hundreth and fixtie men of Abners companions were flaine, and but twentie of Iuda; whereof Alabel the brother of Ioab was one: who when he would needs pursue Abner, and by Abners perswasions could not 2. Sam. 2. be moved to quit him, he was forced to turne vpon him, wounding him to death, with the Broake of his speare. For though Afahel were an excellent footman, and as it is written in the Text, as light as a wild Roe, and as losephus reporteth, contended not onely with men, but with horses; and hoped to have gotten great same, if he could have mastered Abner (who as Asahel perswaded himselfe, had by being ouerthrowne and flying away lost his courage) yet here it fell out true; That the race Eccles. 40 is not to the (wift.

That this civill warre lasted two yeeres, wee finde it written in the second of Samuel the second Chapter; though in the beginning of the third it is againe made Versio. probable, that this contention dured longer; and therefore the matter resteth still in dispute, and some of the Rabbines conceine that Isboseth had then reigned two veeres, when this was written, the warre as yet continuing a longer time. For Abner held for the partie of Isbofeth after this, and till such time as there grew icalousie betweene him and Isboseth for Sauls concubine: neither did the death of Isboseth instantly follow; but how long after the murther of Abner it happened, the same

hard for mee. In this fort David complained after Abners death, and to make it cleare 10 that hee hated this fact of loab, hee followed him with this publike imprecation: Let the bloud fall on the head of IOAB, and on all his fathers bouse: and let them be subiect to vicers, to the leprofie, to lameneffe, to the fword, and to poliertie, &c. For could any thing have withstood the ordinance of God, this murther committed by Isab might greatly have indangered Davids estate, Abner being the mouth and trust of all the rest of the Tribes, not yet reconciled. This mischaunce therefore Danielopenly bewailed, so that all Ifrael perceived him to bee innocent of that fact. The place which Abner held, being Generall of the men of warre, was of such importance, that the Kings themselves were faine to give them great respect, as hath bene alreadic shewed more at large. This office Toab held in the armie of Inda, & thought 20 himselfe worthy to hold the place entire, if once his Lord might obtaine the whole Kingdome. For hee was neere to Danied in kinred, and had beene partaker of all his aduersitie, wherefore hee did not thinke it meete, that an old enemie should in reward of new benefits, be made his partner. Indeed he was by nature so icalous of his dignitie and place, that hee afterward flew Amasa his owne kinsman, and the Kings, vpon the fame quarrell, taking it in high disdaine to see him joyned with himfelfe as captaine of the hofte of Inda ; much leffe could bee brooke a superiour, and such a one as had flaine his brother, and beene beaten himselfe in battell. But how soeuer 1920 did hate or despise Abner, David esteemed highly of him as of a Prince, and a great man in Ifrael, excusing the overlight by which he might seeme 20 to have perished, by affirming that hee died not like a foole, nor a man vanquished, But as a man falleth before wicked men, fo (faid hec) diddeft thou fall. And certainly it is no errour of wit, nor want of valour and vertue in him whom a stronger hand destroyeth vnawares, or whom subtiltie in free trust bringeth to confusion. For all under the Sunne are subject to worldly miseries and misaduentures. Howsoeuer Isbefeth meant to have dealt with Abner, yet when he heard of his death, hee despaired greatly of his chate, and with him all Ifrael were possest with great feare; insomuch as two of Isbofeths owne Captaines, Rechab and Baanah, murthered Isbofeth, and presenting his head to David, received the same reward that the Amalekite lately did, for pretending to have flaine Saul. Ishofeth being dead, all the Elders of Ifrael 40 repaired to Danid at Hebron, where he was the third and last time anointed by generall consent.

d. IIII.

Of the flourishing time of DAVIDS Kingdome, the taking of Icrusalem, with two overthrowes given to the Philistims, and the conduction of the Arke to the Citie of DAVID.

Hen Danid was now established in the Kingdome, his first enterprise 50 was vpon the lebulites, who in derilion of his force, and confident in the firength of the place (as is thought) manned their walles with the blinde and lame of their Citie; which David soone after entred : all their other forces notwithstanding. For having mastered the fort of Zion (which was afterward the Citie of David) hee became Lord of Hierusalem, without any great danger, expelling thence the lebusites, who had held it from the foundation, to the times of Moles and Iofue, and after them almost 400. yeeres. There are who expound this place otherwise: Except thou take away the blinde and the lame, thou shalt not come in hither. For some thinke that it was meant by the Idols of the lebusites : others, that it had reference to the Couenant made long before with Isac, and Isacob: the one blinde by nature and age, the other made lame by wreftling with the Angell, and that therefore till those (that is, till that Couenant) be broken, David ought not to molest them. But for my selfe I take it with losephus, that they armed their wals with certaine impotent people at first, in scorne of Danids attempt. For they that had held their Citie about 400. yeeres against all the children of Ilrael, lo (ua, the ludges, and Saul, did not doubt but to defend it also against David. When he had now poffest himselfe of the very heart and Center of the Kingdom, and received congratulatorie Embassadours & presents from Hiram King of Tyre: he entertained divers other concubines & married moe wives, by whom he had ten fons in lerusalem, and by his former wives he had fix in Hebron where he reigned 7. yeeres.

The Philistims hearing that Dauid was now anointed king, as well of Juda as of Israel, they thought to try him in the beginning, before hee was fully warme in his feat. And being encountred by David at two seuerall times in the Valley of Rephaim, or of 2. Sam.s. 20 the Giants, they were at both times overthrowne. After which hee called the place

CHAP.17. S.4. of the Historie of the World.

Then David affembled 30000. choice Israelites to conduct the Arke of God from the house of Abinadabin Gibea, to the Citie of Dauid, which businesse was interrupted by the death of Vzzah the sonne of Aminadah, whom the Lord slewe for prefuming to touch the Arke, though it were with intent to flay it from taking harme, when it was shaken. But after three yeeres it was with great solemnitie brought into the Citie with facrifices, musicke, dances, and all signes of joyfulnesse, in which David himselfe gladly barea part. Heereupon Michel derided him for dancing before the Arke, and afterward told him in scorne , That hee was uncourred as a 30 foole in the eyes of the maidens his feruants; namely that hee forgat his regall dignitie both in apparrell and behauiour; and mixed himfelfe among the base multitude, dancing as fooles doe in the wayes and firectes: not that shee disliked Danids behauiour (as I take it ) though she made it the colour of her derision. But rather the aboundant griese, which this spectacle stirred vp, beholding, the glorie of her husband to whom shee was deliuered lastly by force, and remembring the miserable end of her father and brethren, out of whose ruines she conceived that the sonne of Ishai had built this his greatnesse, together with the many new wines and concubines imbraced fince his possession of Ierusalem, made her breake out inthose despitefull tearmes, for which she remained barren to her death.

This done, David consulted with the Prophet Nathan for the building of the x.chron.e.v.z. Temple or house of God: but was forbidden it, because he was a man of warre, and had shed bloud. So greatly doth the Lord and King of all detest homicide; having threatned, not in vaine, that hee would require the bloud of man, at the hand of man and beaft. The warres which Danidhad made were just, and the bloud therein shed was of the enemies of God, and his Church: yet for this cause it was not permitted that his hands should lay the foundation of that holy Temple. Hereby it appeares how greatly those Princes deceine themselues, who thinke by bloudshed and terrour of their warres, to make themselves in greatnes like to the Almightie, which is a damnable pride; not caring to imitate his mercie and goodnesse, or 50 feeke the bleffednesse promised by our Sautour vnto the peacemakers.

Now although it was not pleasing to the Lord to accept a Temple of Davids founding, yet was his religious intent so well accepted, that hereupon heereceiued both a confirmation of the Kingdom to him and his heirs, and that happie promife of the euerlasting throne, that should be established in his seede.

Oone after this David overthrew the Philistims, which made them altogether powerlesse, and vnable to make any inuasion vpon Israel in halte. For it is written, Accepit franum Amgaris e manu Philifthavorum: which place our English Geneua converts in these words, And DAVID tooke the bridge of bondage out of the hand of the Philistims. The Latine of Junius gineth another and a better sense; for by that bridle of Amear was meant the firong Citic of Gath, or Geth, and so the Geneua hath it in the marginal note. This 10 Citie of Gath was the same which was afterward Dio-Casaria, set on the frontier of Palastina at the entrance into Iudea and Ephraim. From thence they made their incursions, and thereinto their retrait in all their invasions, which being taken by D4mid and demolished, there was lest no such frontier towne of equals strength to the Lunius in 8. c. of Philistims on that part. The hill whereon Geth or Gath flood, the Hebrewes cal Amme, whereof and of the word Gar is made Amgar, of which Plinie in his first booke, and thirteenth Chap. This exposition is made plaine and confirmed in the first of Chro.

There was no nation bordering the Iewes that so greatly afflicted them as the Philistims did, who before the time of Saul, (to the end they might not sharpen any wea- 20 pon against them) did not leave one Smith in al their Cities & villages of that kinde, but inforst them to come downe into their territorie, for all iron worke whatsoener they needed; so as the Ifraelises till this time of David were seldome free from paying tribute to the Philistims.

E.Sam.E3.

After this he gaue them foure other overthrowes: but the war of the Moabites and Arabians came betweene. In the first of which he was indangered by shibi-benob, the head of whose speare weighed 200. shickles of brasse, which make nine pound three quarters of our poizes : at which time Abifhai succoured Danid and flew the Philistim, 2. Sam, 21. v. 17. whereupon the Councellors and Captaines of David (lest the light of Ifrael might by his loffe be quenched) vowed that he should not thencefoorth hazard himself in 30 any battaile. The second and third incounter and overthrow of the Philistims was at Gob a place neere Gefar, and the last at Gath or Geth. And being now better assured of the Philistims by the taking of Geth, hee invaded Month, from whom not withstanding in his adversitie hee sought succour and left his parents with him in trust. But whether it were the same King or no it is not knowne.

The Rabines faine that Moab flew those kinstolkes of David, which lived under his protection in Sauls time, but questionlesse David well knew how that Nation had bin alwayes enemies to Ifrael, and tooke all the occasions to vexe them that were offered. And he also remembred that in the 23, of Deuter. God commaunded Israel not to seeke the peace or prosperitie of the Moabites, which David well observed, for he de- 40 stroyed two parts of all the people, leaving a third to till the ground. This victorie obtained, he led his armic by the border of Ammon towards Syria Zobah, the region of Adadezer the sonne of Rebob King thereof. The place is set downe in the description of the holy Land: to which I referre the Reader.

Q. VI.
The warre which DAVID made vpon the Syrians.

T is written in the Text : DAVID fmote also HADADEZER &c. as hee 50 went to recover his border at the river Euphrates. Now whether the words (as hee went to recouer his border) be referred to David or Hadadezer it is not agreed vpon. Iunius thinkes that the article (he) hath relation to David, who finding Tohu opprest by Hadadezer, ouerthrew the one and fuccoured the other. But the ancient and most received opinion. that this recouerie hath reference to the Syrian, is more probable. For if Danid had intended any such enterprize towards Euphrates, hee was in farre better case to haue proceeded after his victorie than before : seeing that ( Adadezer being taken) he had now left no enemie on his backe, either to pursue him, to take victuals and supplies from him, or to stop the passages of the mountaines vpon him at his returne.

Againe, seeing David was either to passe through a part of Arabia the desart, or by the plains of Palmyrena, his armic confifting of footmen, for the most, if not all: Hee had now both horse and chariots good store to carry his prouisions through those 10 vncultiued places, by which he was to have marched before he could have reached Emphrates or any part thereof. But we find that Danid returned to Hiernfalem, after hee had twice ouerthrowne the Syrian armie, not bending his course towards the river Emphrates, but feeking to establish his purchases alreadie made. Whereby it may appeare, that it was the Syrian, and not King Danid, that was going to inlarge his border, as afore is faid.

The king of Syria Damascena, and of Damascus, wherof that region is so called, hearing that Adadezer was ouerthrowne by the Uraelites, fearing his owne estate, & the loffe of his owne country which adjoyned to Syria Zobah of Hadadezer, fent for an army of Aramites or Syrians to his succour: but these, as it appeareth, came too late for 20 Adadezer, and too soone for themselues: for there perished of those supplies 22000. This king of Damascus, losephus (out of Nicholaus an ancient Historian) calleth Adad, who was also of the same name & family as all those other Adads were : which now began to grow up in greatnesse, and so continued for ten descents, till they were extinguished by the Assyrians, as is shewed heretofore. David having now reduced Damascus vnder his obedience, left a garrison therin, as he did in Edom: having also sackt the adiovning cities of Betah, and Berati, belonging to Adadezer, of which Cities Ptolomy calleth Betah, Tauba: and Berathi he nameth Barathena. Tohu or Thoi whole country of Hamath joyned to Adadezer (as in the description of the Holy land the reader may perceiue) sent his son Ioram to congratulate this successe of David: partly because 30 he had warre with Adadezer, and partly because he seared David now victorious. He also presented David with vessels of gold, silver, and brasse, all which together with the golden shields of the Aramites, and the best of all the spoils of other Nations, Dauid 2, Sam, S. dedicated vnto God at his returne. Junius translated the words (clypeos aureos) by vmbones, as if all the parts of the targets were not of gold but the boffes only. The Septuagint call them bracelets: Aquila, golden chaines. But because Roboam made shields

Temple of Hierusalem, it may be gathered thereby, that those of Adadezer were golden shelds.

This done, Danid fent Embassadours to Hanum King of the Ammonites to con- 2, Sam, t. 40 gratulate his establishment in his fathers Kingdome: for David in the time of his affliction under Saul, had beene relieued by Nahafh, the father of Hanum. But this Ammonite being ill aduised, and ouer-icalous of his estate, vsed Danids messengers fo barbaroully, and contemptuously (by curtailing their beardes, and their garments) as he thereby drew a warre vpon himselse, which neither his owne strength, nor all the aydes purchased could put off, or sustaine. For notwithstanding that bee had waged three and thirtie thousand Souldiers of the Amalekites, and their confederates; to wit, of the vallalles of Adadezer twentie thousand, and of Maa. Maachab the contederates; to wit, of the varialles of Adadezer twentie thouland, and of Crass-Northpart of chab and Ishtob thirteene thouland (for which hee disburfed athouland talents of Traconiti refiluer) yet all these great armies together with the strength of the Ammonites, were membred in 50 by losb and his brother Abishai cassily broken and put to ruine : and that without Ishiob or Thos any great losse or slaughter at that time. And it is written that when the Aramites a country neer of braffe in place of these of Adadezer, at such time as Shicah the Agyptian sackt the fled, the Ammonites also retraited into their Cities, the one holding themselves Gad vader the tied, the Ammonies also retraited into their chies, the one holding their electronic rockes of di-within the walles, the other in their defarts adiopning, till loab was returned to non.

Hadadezer hearing that Ioab had dismissed his armie, assembled his forces againe, and fent for all the companies that he could leuie out of Mesopotamia, who vnder the command of Shobach passed Euphrates, and incamped at Helam, on the South side Helam or the- thereof. David hearing of this new preparation, affembled all the ablest men of I/rael. lam which Pto- and marched towards the Syrian armie in Palmyrena, not yet entred into Arabia: to wit, at Helam, a place no leffe diftant from Damaseus, towards the Northeasi, than Hierulalem was towards the Southwest. Now David (speaking humanely) might with the more confidence goe on towards Euphrates (which was the farthest-off journey that ever he made) because he was now Lord of Damaseus, which lay in the mid-*Secc.18.6.2. way. Healfo poffeth himfelfe of *Thadmor or Palmyrena, which Salomon afterward 10 strongly fortified, and this Citie was but one dayes iourney from Helam, and the riuer Euphrates. So had he two safe retraites, the one to Thadmor, and the next from thence to Damafeus. In this incounter between Dauid and the Syrians, they lost 40000 horsemen, and 700. chariots, together with Shobach Generall of their armie. The Chronicles call these 40000. Souldiers footmen, and so Innius converts it, and so is it very probable. For the armie of Ifrael confishing of footemen, could hardly have flaughtered 40000, horsemen, except they quitted their horse and fought on foote. So are the charjots taken in this battell, numbred at 7000 in the first of Chron, the 9. in which number, as I conceive, all the Souldiers that ferued in them with the conductors are included: fo as there died of the Syrians in this warre against Danid, be- 20 forche forc't them to tribute; 100000, footmen, besides all their horsemen and waggoners, and besides all those that loab slew, when they fled at the first encounter, together with the Ammonites before Rabba. Notwithstanding all which, the Adads in following ages gathered strength againe, and afflicted the Kings of Inda often: but the Kings of Ifrael they impourished even to the last end of that State.

David having now beaten the Arabians and Mesopotamians from the partie and confederacie of Ammon: He fent out loab the Lieutenant of his armies to forradge and destroy their territorie, and to besiege Rabbab, afterward Philadelphia, which after a while the Ifraelites mastered and possest. The Kings crowne which weighed a talent of gold, garnished with precious stones, David set on his ownehead, and carri- 20 ed away with him the rest of the riches and spoile of the Citie. And though David stayed at Hierafalem, following the warre of Friab his wife, till such time as the Citie was brought to extremitic, and readie to be entred: yet Joab in honour of David forbare the last affault, and entrance thereof, till his masters arrivall. To the people he vied extreme rigour (if wee may fo call it being exercifed against heathen Idolaters) for some of them he tare with harrowes, some he sawed asunder, others he cast into burning kils, in which he baked tile and bricke.

ð. VII.,

Of DAVIDS troubles in his reigne, and of his forces.

Vt as victorie begetteth securitie, and our present worldly selicitie a forgetfulnesse of our former miseries, and many times of God himselfe the giver of all goodnesse: so did these changes, in the fortune and state of this good King, change also the zealous care which formerly hee had to please God in the precise observation of his

Lawes and Commandements. For having now no dangerous apparant ene- se mie ( against whom hee was wont to aske counsaile from the Lord ) hee beganne to be aduised by his owne humane affections and vaine desires. For hee was not only satisfied to take Vriahs wife from him, and to vie her by stealth: but hec imbrodered his adultery with Vriahs flaughter, giving order to his truftie fervant

Toub to marshall him in the front or point of those Ifraelites, which gave an assault 2. Sam. 11.15. ypon the suburbes of Rabba, when there was not as yet any possibilitie of prenailing. And, that which could no leffe displease God than the rest, he was content that many others of his best servants and Souldiers should perish together with Vriah, hoping thereby to couer his particular ill intent again i him. After which he began by degrees to fall from the highest of happinesse; and his dayes then to come were filled with ioyes and woes interchangeable, his trodden-downe for rowes began againe to fpring; and those perils which he had pulled up by the rootes (as he hoped) gaue him an after-harvest of many cares and discontentments. And if it had pleased God to take the witnesse of Danids owne mouth against him, as Danid himselve did against the Amalekite, which pretended to have flaine Saul, he had then appeared as worthv of reprehension as the other was of the death he suffered. For when Nathan the Prophet propounded vnto him his owne errour, in the person of another, to wit, of him that tooke the poore mans sheepethat had none else, the bereauer being Lord of many: He then vowed it to the living Lord, that such a one should die the death. And heercof, although it pleafed God to pardon David, for his life, which remiffion the Prophet Nathan pronounced: yet he deliuered him Gods inflice together with his mercie in the tenour following; Now therefore the foord (hall never depart from thy i Samite boule ere. Because thou hast taken his wife to be thy wife, and hast slave VRIAH with the verse and to. 20 [word of the children of Ammon. Soone after this David lot the childe of adulteric which he begot on Bersheba. Secondly, his owne sonne Amnon being in lone with his halfe fifter Thamar, by the aduice of his Coufin german the sonne of Shimeah Dauids brother, possest her by force : which when he had performed, he thrust her from him in a carelesse and despightfull manner. Two yeeres after which foule and incestuous act, Absalom caused him to be murthered, at the feast of his sheep-shearing; not perchance in reuenge of Thamars rauishment alone: but having it in his heart to vsurpe the Kingdome; in which, because he could not in any fort be assured of Amnon, bee thought his affaire greatly advanced by his destruction. So the one brother having ravished his owne lister, and then despiled her; the other after 30 along diffembled malice, first, made his owne brother drunken, and then saughtered him; which done he fled away, and lived under the lavegard of Talmai King of Geffur, neere Damascus, who was his grandfather by the mother, but a heathen King. 2. Sam. 17. Thirdly, when Ablalom by the invention of Ioab, (but chiefly because of the great affection of David towards his sonne) was brought againe: first to the Kings fauour, 2.54% and then to his presence: He began instantly to practife against David his father, secking by the pretence of common inflice, and by lowly and familiar manner to ail men, and by detracting from his fathers equitie, to win vato himselfe a popular reputation. Here beganthe great affliction, threatned by the Lord as a punishment of Dauids sinne.

The company which Absalom gathered at the first were but 200. men : which 2.Sam.15. he carried with him from Hierusalem to Hebron; pretending, though improully, the performance of a vow to God. There when Achitophel repaired vnto him, and many troopes of people from all places, he proclaimed himselfe King, and was by the people (whose hearts God had turned from their lawfull Prince) accepted so readily, that Danid doubting to be set upon on the suddaine, durst not trust himselfe in his owne Citie of Hierusalem, nor in any other walled towne for teare of surprise : but incamped in the fields, & defarts with some 600. of his gards, and few else. loms partie and confederacie, thereby the better to discover vnto him the purposes of Achitophel, a revolted Counsailor, whose practices he greatly doubted. And now when treason was in fashion, Ziba also sought to betray his master Mephiboleth the sonne of Ionathan : And Shimei of the house of Saul ( the fire Tt 3 of whose hatred Davids prosperitie had smothered, but his adversitie illightened) holding himselse upon the advantage of a mountaine side, cast stones at Dauid, and most despightfully cursed him to his face: but Dauid attending no priuate reuenges, forbadde Abishai to pursue him for the present, yet left him among others in the rolle of his reuenge, to his sonne Salomon. Absalom being now posset of Hierusalem, was aduised by Achitophel to vie his fathers concubines in some such publique place, as all Ifrael might affure themselues, that hee was irreconciliable to his father: whereof being perswaded, they would then resolvedly adhere to Absalom and his cause, without seare of being given vp vpon a reconciliation betweene them. This faluage and impious (though craftie counfaile) Achitophel indeed vr. 10 ged for his owne respect, as fearing that this rebellion might take end to his destruction; who most of all other inflamed Absalom against his father. And now was it fulfilled that Nathan had directly foretold Danid : I will raise up euill against thee out of thine owne bouse, and will take thy wines before thine eyes, and give them onto thy neighbour, and hee shall lye with thy wines in the light of the Sunne : for then diddest it secretly, but I will doe this thing before all Ifrael, and before the Sunne. Hee also gave advice to Absalom, that himselfe with an armie of 12000. men might bee imployed at the in-2. Sam. 17. V. 14. partie and the care of Ab/alom, and of his ownelife. David being advertised of this enterprize against him, marched away all night, and past Iordan, possessing himselfe of Mahanaim in the tribe of Gad: the same wherein Isboseth himselfein the warre against David after Sauls death scated himselfe. To which place there repayred vnto him Shobi, the sonne of Nahash the Ammonite, 30 whom Davidioued, the same which Iosephus calleth Shiphar. And though it bee greatly disputed, what this Shobi was, yet the most generall and probable opinion makes him a second brother to Hanum, whom David for his fathers sake established in the Kingdome, after Hanums overthrow. In thankfulnesse whereof hee relieved David in this his extremitie. There came also to Davids affistance Machin of Lodabar, Gardian in former times to Mephiboseth, and among others Barzillai the Gilea-

ding Absalom, that it was fitter and more safe for him with all the strength of Israel, 20 to pursue his father, then by such a troope, which Dauids valour and those of his attendants might either indanger or resist. This delay in Absalom, and advantage of time gained by Danid, was indeed, after God, the loffe of the one and deliuerie of the other. Whereupon Achitephel rightly fearing (by the occasion fore-shewed) the successe which followed, disposed of his owne estate, and then for sooke both the dete, who willingly fed David and all his companie.

In the meane time both the King and Absalem prepared to fight; Absalem made Amasa Commaunder of the armie of Israel, the same place which loab held with Dauid; an office next the King himfelfe, like vnto that of the Maiors of the Palace aun- 40 ciently in Fraunce. David, perswaded by his companie, stayed in Mahanaim, and disposed the forces hee had to Ioab, Abishai, and Ittai, giving them charge in the hearing of all that iffued out of the port of Mahanaim, that they should spare the life of Absalows. But 10ab, besides that he was very cruell by nature, remembred that Absalom had lately disposed of his Gouernement to Amasa, and therefore the victorie being obtained, and newes brought him that Absalom hung by the haire of his head on a tree, when he could not perswade the messenger to returne and kill him, hee himselse with his owne servants dispatcht him. It appeared also by the sequell that Ioab affected Adonyah whom hee afterward acknowledged, Danid yet living; and fearing the disposition of Absalom, he imbraced the present advantage offered. 50

Hereof, together with newes of the victorie, when knowledge was brought to David, he mourned and forrowed, not onely as a man that had loft a fonne, but as one that had outlined all his worldly joyes, and seene enery delight of life interred. For hee so hid himselfe from his people, as those which hoped for honour and reward after so great a victory, couered themselues also in the Citte, as if they had committed the greatest offences, and had rather descrued death than recompence. Whereupon Ioab presenting himselfe before David, perswaded him to diffemble his forrow for the present, and to shew himselfe to the Armie. For first he told him that he had discountenanced his faithfull servants, who had that day preserved his life; inferring that nothing could be more dangerous to a King, than not onely to not acknowledge so great a loue and constancie in his people, who being but tew in number, did yet resoluedly expose themselves to great perils for his sake; but on the contrary gricue and lament at their good successe. For, no doubt, they might all haue bought their peace of Ablalom at an easie rate. Secondly, hee vrged that it was generally beleeued, that he loued his enemies and hated his friends, and that he witneffed by this his mourning, that he had not any respect of his Princes, and others his faithfull servants, but would more have loyed if they had all perished, and Absalom lived. than in the victorie by their faithfulnelle and approved valour gotten.

Lastly, he ysed this prevalent argument, that if the King came not out and shewed himselfe publikely to his men of warre, that they would all that very night abandon him, and returne: concluding with this fearefull threatning : And that will bee worfe 2. Sam. 19. vnto thee than all the euill that fell on thee from thy youlb hitherto. By these over-bold and arrogant speeches (though perchance vttered with a good intent) Ioab raised 20 Danid from his bed of forrow, and brought him to the gates of the Citic among the people, whom he affured of his love and affection, especially Amasa, who commanded the Armie of Absalem, to whom he promised the office of Lieutenantship; the fame which Absalom had given him, and which loab now enjoyed. For David doubted, that if Amasa were not satisfied, hee might draw from him a great part of the strength of Israel, now under his commandement.

This done, the King marched towards lordan homeward, where in his passage he pardoned Shimei, who had lately reuiled him to his face; but this remission was but 2.5am.19.23. externall, as appeared afterward. He also accepted of Mephiboshetb his excuse, whom Ziba had formerly falfly accused and betrayed.

He also intreated Barzillaithe Geleadite, his lateliberall Oast, to follow him to Ieru- 2, Sam, 19.38. (alem, that he might reward his service done him; who excusing himselfe by his age, appointed his sonne Chimham to attend the King.

At Gilgalon this side Iordan, all the Tribes assembled, and after some contention which of them ought to have most interest in David, the Armie brake, and David returned to Ierusalem. But Shebathe sonne of Bichri, a Beniamite, of the faction of the house of Sanl, finding some discontentment among the Israelites, withdrew them from David, as from a stranger in whom they had no interest, and it seemeth that many of the people of the out Tribes, and in effect of all but Inda, bare fill a good affection to the iffues of their first King. David imployed his reconciled Captaine A-40 masa, to give him contentment, and to witnesse his trust, as also because hec conceiued that Amasa had interest in those revolts of Ifrael more than loab had. He receiued commandement from Danid to affemble the Armie within three dayes, which he foreflowed: but being onward on his way, Abifbai, Ioabs brother, was fent after him, with Daniels guard and best Souldiers, whom also loab accompanied : and ouertaking Amasa neere Gibeon, pretending to imbrace him, gaue him a wound, whereof he fell dead, being no leffe icalous of Amalathan hee was of Abner, whom he murdered in the same manner, and out of the same impatient ambition. This done, he 2.5cm 20,700 pursued Sheba, and finding him inclosed in Abel, assaulted the Citie with that furie, that the Citizens by the perswalions of a wise woman there inhabiting, cut off Sheba 50 his head, and flong it to losb ouer the walls: which done, her retraited his Armie to Ierusalem, and commanded, as before, all the hoste of Israel. The next act of Dauids, was the deliverie of Sauls fonnes or kinfemen to the Gibeonites, whom those Citizens hung vp in reuenge of their Fathers crueltie. Danid had knowledge from the Oracle of God, that a famine which had continued on the land three yeeres, came by reason of Saul and his house; to wit, for the slaughter of the Gibeonites: and therefore he willingly yeelded to give them this satisfaction, both because he had warrant from God himselse, as also if wee may judge humanely, to rid himselfe of Sauls line, by whom hee and his might, as well in the present as in the future, be greatly molested and endangered; onely he spared Mephibosheth the fonne of Ionathan, both for the love hee bare to his father, as for his oath and vow

Now where it is written in the Text; The King tooke the two sonnes of R Is PAH. whom she bare unto SAVL, and the fine sonnes of MICHOL the daughter of SAVL, whom 19 Thee bare to A DRIEL and delivered them to the Gibeonites:

Junius calls this Michel the lifter of her that was Davids wife, the whom Saul married to Phalsiel; but Mishoi here named had Adriel to her husband: the same which is named Merab in the first of Samuel the eighteenth, who was first promifed to Dawid, when he flue Goliab in the valley of Raphaim : and because it is written that Michelloued Danid, which perchance Merab did not, whether Danid had any humane respect in the deliverie of her children, it is onely knowne to God.

Now whereas the Geneua nameth Michel for Merab the wife of Adriel: the better translation were out of the Hebrew word here vsed, having an eclipsis or defect, and fignifieth, as I am informed, one of the same kinred, as in the 19. verse of the same 21. 20 Chapter it is said of Goliah whose speare was weighty as a weathers beame, when as by the same Eclipsisit must be vaderstood by the brother of Goliah: Goliah himselfe being formerly flaine.

As by the death of Sauls children God secured the house of Dauid, leaving no head vnto rebellion; so did hee strengthen both the King and Nation against forraine enemies, by the valour of many braue Commaunders, the like of whom . for number and qualitie, that people of Ifraelis not knowne to have had at any time before or after. Thirtie Captaines of thousands there were, all men of marke, and great reputation in warre. Ouer these were sixe Coronels, whose valour was so extraordinary, that it might be well held as miraculous. These Coronels had some 30 difference of place and honour, which feemeth to have been given vpon mecre confideration of their vertue. For Abishai the brother of loab, who in the warre against the Ammonites and Aramites was Lieutenant, and commanded halfe the armie, could not attaine to the honour of the first ranke, but was faine to rest contented with being principall of the three Coronels of the second order, notwith flanding his neercnesse in bloud vnto the King, the flourishing estate of his owne house, and his well approved services. All these Coronels and Captaines, with the Companies belonging to them, may seeme to have been such as were continually retained, or at the least kept in readinesse for any occasion, considering that the numbers which were mustered and drawne out, if need required into the field, very farre exceeded thirtie 40 thousand, yea, or thirtie times as many. They were most of them such as had followed the King in Sauls time, and been hardened with his adversities. Others there were very many, and principall men in their feuerall Tribes, that repaired vnto him after the death of Saul; but these Captaines and Coronels, (who with Ioab, that was Generall of all the Kings forces, make vp the number of 37.) were the especial men of warre, and reckoned as Dauids Worthies. The long reigne of Danid, as it is knowne to have confumed many of these excellent men of warre, so may it probably be geffed to have wasted the most of those whose deaths wee finde no-where mentioned. For the fonnes of Zeruia, who had been too hard for David, were worne away, and onely toab left in the beginning of Salomon, who wanted his brother Abifhai to stand 50 by his side in his last extremitie.

By the actions forepassed in the time of David, it is gathered that hee had reigned now 33. yeeres, or thereabout; when the posteritic of Saul was rooted out, so that hee enloyed about seuen yeeres of entire quiet and securitie, wherein it pleased God to remove all impediments that might have troubled the succession of Salomonin his Fathers throne. In this time also David having established all things in Inda and Ifract, and the borders thereof, hee againe displeased God by numbring the people, as in oftentation of his power: in which he employed losb, with other Captaines of his armie, who after nine moneths and twenty dayes trauell, returned with the account and register of all the people, able and fit to beare Armes, and they amounted to the number of thirteene hundred thousand, besides Leur and Beniamin, 2. 10 hundred thousand. For this, when by the Prophet Gadhee was offered from God the choice of three punishments, whereof he might submit himselfe to which he pleased; to wit, seuen veeres famine; three moneths warre, wherein hee should be vnprosperous in all attempts, and bee chaced by his enemies; or a generall pestilence to last three dayes: David made choice to bow himselfe vnder the hand of God onely, and left himselse subject to that cruell disease, which bath no compassion or respect of persons, of which there perished seventic thousand. And hereby he hath taught all that live, that it is better to fall into the hands of God than of men; whereof he giueth vs this divine reason; For his mercies are great.

Aftly, when hee grew weake and feeble, and past the acts and knowledge of women, hee was yet aduled to lie in the arms of a yong and well complexioned maiden, to keepe him warme. In this his weake effact of bodie, when he was in a manner bed-rid, Adonyah his eldeft fonne (Amnon and Abfalom being now dead) having drawne vnto his partie that innincible, renowmed and feared loab, with Abiathar the Priest, beganne manifeltly to prepare for his chablithment in the Kingdome after his father. For being the eldest now living of Davids sonnes, and a man of a goodly personage, Salomon yet yong, and borne of a mother formerly attainted with adultery, for which her name was omitted by S. Matthew ( as Beda, Hugo, Thomas, and others suppose) hee presumed to carrie the matter without resistance. Hereof when Dauid had knowledge by Bersabe the mother of Salomon, who did put him in minde of his faithfull promile, that Salomon her sonneshould reigneafter him (Nathan the Prophet affirming 40 the same thing vnto the King, and seconding her report of Adonyah his presumption ) the King calling vnto him Zadoc the Priest, Nathan the Prophet, and Benaish the Captaine of his guard, gaue charge and commission to anoint Salomon, and to set him on the Mule whereon himselfe vied to ride in his greatest state: which done, Salomon attended, and firongly guarded by the ordinarie and choice men of warre, the Cherethites and Pelethites, thewed himselfe to the people. Those tidings being reported to Adonyab, he presently abandoned his affistants, and for the safety of his life he held by the hornes of the Altar, whom for the present Salomon pardoned. After this, Dauid had remaining two especiall cares, whereof he was delirous to discharge 1.Kings 1. his thoughts; the one concerning the peace of the land, which might be diffur bed 50 by some rebellion against Salomon; the other concerning the building of the Temple, which he fought by all meanes to advance, and make the businesse publique. To bring these intentions to good effect, he summoned a Parliament, consisting of all the Chronicas, vit. Princes of Ifrael, the Princes of the feuerall Tribes, all the Captaines and Officers, with all the mighty, and men of power; who repaired vnto Ierufalem.

In

2.Sam.c.23: 9.79.

In this affembly the King stood vp, and signified his purpose of building the Temple, shewing how the Lord had approued the motion. Herein he tooke occafion to lay open his owne title to the Crowne, shewing that the Kingdome was by Gods ordinance due to the Tribe of Iuda (as Iascob in his bleffing prophetically bequeathed it ) and that God himselfe was pleased to make choice of him among all his fathers fonnes. In like manner he faid that God him selfe had appointed Salomon by name to be his successor: whereupon he earnestly charged both the people and his sonne, to conforme themselves vnto all that God had commanded, and particularly to goe forward in this worke of the Lords house, which Salomon was chosen to build. Then produced he the patterne of the worke according to the forme which 10 God himselfe had appointed ; and so laying open his owne preparations, he exhorted all others to a voluntary contribution.

The Kings proposition was so well appropued by the Princes and people, that whereas hee himselfe had given three thousand talents of gold, and seven thoufand of filuer, they added vnto it seven thousand of gold, and tenne thousand of filuer, besides brasse, iron and iewels, heartily reioyeing in the advancement of so religious a worke. This businesse being well dispatched, a solemne feast with great facrifice was made, at which time Salomon was againe anointed King, and received fealtie of all the Princes and people of the Land, and of all the Princes his brethren. the formes of King David. Salomon being thus established King, his Father David 20 finding himselfe even in the hands of death, first exhorted his sonne to exercise the same courage and strength of minde, which himselfe had done in all his attempts, and to the end that a happy end might follow the beginning of all his enterprizes, he vetered these mightie wordes; Take heede to the charge of the Lord thy God , to walke in his wayes, and keepe his statutes and his commaundements, and his indgements, and his testimonies, as it is written in the Law of Moses, &c. to the performance of which God fastened the succession, and prosperitie of his issues. For this done (sayth God himsele) Thou Shalt not want one of thy posteritie to sit upon the Throne of

Secondly, hee aduled him concerning loab, who out of doubt had served David 20 from the first assault of terusalem to the last of his warres, with incomparable valour and fidelitie, fauing that hee fastened himselse to Adonyah ( his master yet liuing ) and thereby vexed him in his feeble age. But as God hath neuer left cruelty vnreuenged, fo was it his will that Loab should drinke of the same cuppe, whereof hee had enforced other men to taste, and suffer the same violence which himselse had vniuftly arooken others withall, quigladio percutit, gladio peribit: for he had bereaued Abner and Amasa of their lives, having against the one the pretence onely of his brothers flaughter, whom Abner had flaine in the time of warre, and could not anoid him: against the other but a meere icalousse of his growing great in the fauour of David. And though Toab affured himselse that Abner and Amasa being dead, 40 there was none left either to equall him or supplant him, yet God (deriding the policies of wicked men) raised vp Benhaiah the sonne of Iehoiadah, to pull him from the Sanctuary, and to cut him in pieces. For David giveth this cause to Salomon against Ioab, that he sue the Captaines of the hoste of Ifrael, and shed bloud of battell in peace; and to this apparant and inst cause, it is not improbable but that Danid remembred the ill affection of Ioab towards Salomon, which Ioab made manifest by the vntimely setting vp of Adonyah, David yet living. Some other offence Ioab had committed against David, of which in these words he put his sonne Salomon in mind; Thou knowest also what IOAB the some of SERVIAH did to mee, &c. Now whether this were meant by the killing of Absalom, contrary to the Kings desire, or by the 50 proud words vsed to him when hee mourned in Mahanaim for Absalom; or whether it were the publishing of Davids letter vnto him for the killing of Vriah, thereby to difgrace Salomon as descended of such a mother, the Scriptures are filent. True itis, that those great men of warre doc oftentimes behaue themselues exceeding infolently towards their Princes, both in respect of their service done, as also because they flatter themselves with an opinion, that either their masters cannot misse them, or that they dare not offend them. But this kinde of pride hath ouerthrowne many a worthie man otherwise descruing great honour and respect.

Heealfo gaue order to Salomon, to ridde himselfe of Shimei, who not long before had cast stones at Danid, and cursed him to his face. And albeit by reason of his oath and promise David spared Shimei all the time himselfeliued, yet being dust and in the grave, he flue him by the hand of Salomon his Sonne. Hence it seemeth that King 1.King. Henrie the feuenth of England had his patterne, when he gaue order to Henrie the 10 eight to execute Pool as Ioone as himfelfe was buried, having made promife to the King of Spaine when hee delinered Pool vnto him, that while he lined he would neuer put him to death, nor fuffer violent hands to be laid vpon him. And vet did not the execution of Ioab veeld vnto Salomon any fuch great profite or affurance as hee hoped for. For he found a yong Adad of Idumea, and Rezin of Damascus to vexe him: who, as the Scriptures witnesse, were emboldened to enter- I. King. in Hebron feuen yeeres, and in Ierusalem three and thirtie, he died. For his person, he was of small stature, but exceeding strong. For his internal gifts and graces he fo farre exceeded all other men, as putting his humane frailtic apart, he was faid by God himselfe to be a man according to his owne heart. The Pfalmes which he wrote witnesse his pictic, and his excellent learning: of whom Hierome to Paulinus: DAVID SIMONIDES noster, PINDARVS & ALCEVS, FLACCVS, quoque CATVLL V S, & SERENV S, Christum tyra personat, & in dechacherdo Psalterio ab inferis suscitat resurgentem; DAVID (faith hee) our SIMONIDES, PINDARVS, ALCRVS, HORACE, GATVLLVS and SERENVS, he playet b Christ on his harpe, and on a ten ftringed Pfalter hee raiseth him oprising from the dead. Ver [. 14.

Is treasures were exceeding great. For it is written in the 22.0f the first of Chronicles, that he left Salomon for the building of the Temple a hundred thousand talents of Gold, and a thousand thousand talents of siluer, and of brasse and yron passing all weight, which is more then any King of the world possess bimselse, and his son to whom he left

it. For it amounteth to three thousand three hundred thirtie and three cartload and a third of a cartload of filuer, allowing two thousand weight of filuer or fixe thoufand pound sterling to every cartload, besides threescore and seventeene millions of 20 French Crownes, or of our money twenty three millions and a thousand pound: a matter, but for the testimonic of the Scriptures, exceeding all beleefe. For that any riches were left him it doth not appeare; feeing that the Judges had not any treafure, nor any foueraigne power to make leuies: but when they went to the warres, they were followed by such voluntaries as the seuerall tribes by turnes gaue them: feeing allo that Saul who was of a meane Parentage, and perpetually vexed and inuaded by the Philiflims, could not in all likelihood gather great riches (if any at all) his Territories beeing exceeding narrow, and thereof the better part possest by his

Therefore it were not amisse to consider how David within the space of not very 20 many veeres, might amasse vp such mighty treasures. For though parsimonie bee it selfe a great reuenue, yet needs there must have been some other great meanes. It feernes that hee made the vttermost profit of all that hee had, that was profitable. Eusebius in his ninth booke and last Chapter de praparatione Enangelica, citeth the words of Eupolemus, who reporteth that Danid, among other preparations for the Temple, built a nauie in Melanis (or as Villalpandus corrects it, Achanis) a Citie of Arabia, and from thence fent men to digge for gold in the Iland Vrphe, which Ortelius thinkes, was Ophir, though Eupolemus in his place of Eufebius (crring perhaps in this circumstance) saith that this Iland is in the red Sea; from whence, saith this Eupolemus, they brought gold into Jury. Pineda lib.4. derebus Salomonis c. I. thinkes that 40 Daniel did this way also inrich himselfe, and citeth this tellimony of Eupolemus : and vercertainely David had many other wayes to gather great riches. Much Land doubtleffe hee gained by conquest, from the Canaanites and Philistims . besides those fruitfull valleys necre Iordan in Trachonitis and Basan, and the best of Spria, and other Countries bordering the Ifraelites. These demaines belike he kept in his own hands, and with his infinite number of captives, which he tooke in his warres, which were notable to redeeme themselves, husbanded those grounds for his greatest advantage. For it is written, I Chron. 17 that Ichonathan was ouer his treasures in the field, in the villages, in the Cities, in the townes, that Ezri was over the labourers, that tilled his ground; Simei ouer the vineyards; and Sabdi ouer the store of the wine; Baal 50 Hanan over the olive trees, and Toalh over the store of the oyle, also that hee had herdmen that had charge ouer his cattell, both in the high Lands, and in the plaines, ouer his sheepe, camels, and asses. And this custome of enriching themselves by husbandry and Cattell, the ancient Kings enery where held, both before and after Davids time. For wee reade of Pharao, that hee spake to loseph to appoint Gen.47. fome of his brethren or of their servants, to be Rulers over his cattell. We reade of ...cbron.26. Vzzia, that he loued husbandrie, had much cartell, and plough-men, and drefters of Vines: likewise we reade it in all Greeke Poets, that the wealth of the ancient Kings did especially consist in their Heards and flocks, whereof it were needlesse to cite Augeas and Admetus or any other for examples, the rule holding true in all. Now concerning Dauid it is not vnlikely, but that those captines which were not imploied in husbandric, were many of them vsed by him in all forts of gaincfull protessions, as the ancient Romans in like manner vsed their slaves.

To these profits (besides the tributes and impositions which doubtlesse were great, and besides the innumerable presents which yearely were brought him, or extraordinarily sent him, by Tehu and others) wee may adde the great spoiles which hee found in the Cities and Countries which he conquered: also the head money which was gathered per legem capitationis; By the law of capitation or head money, euery man rich or poore paying halfe a fickle of the Sanctuarie, which is about as much as fourteene pence, and so in all it amounted to a wondrous summe in that Kingdome: wherein one thousand thousand fine hundred and seventic thousand fighting men 1, chrom. 21. were numbred by Ioab. Now although this Law of capitation be thought by some very learned not to haue beene perpetuall (which opinion of theirs neuerthelesse they confesse is against the Hebrew expositions) yet David vpon this occasion is not vnlikely to have put it in practize. And by these meanes might he be able to leave those huge treasures to Salomon. Yet it may seeme that of this great masse of gold and filuer left by Dauid, the least part was his owne in prinate, and so will it appeare the leffe wonderfull that he left so much. Of his owne liberalitie we finde, that he gaue to the building of the Temple three thousand talents of gold, and seuen thoufand talents of filuer, a great summe : but holding a very small proportion to the other. Wherefore we are to consider, that the treasures of the Sanctuarie it selfe were exceeding great, as needs they must have been, having received continual encrease. without any losse or diminution euer fince the time of Moses and Iosuah. The re-30 uennues of the Sanctuarie (besides all manner of tithes and oblations, which defraied the daily expences, and maintayned the Priest and Lenites) were partly raised out of the head money before mentioned; partly out of the spoiles gotten in warre. For all the bootie was divided into two parts, whereof the Souldiers had one, and Numb.31.27. the People which remayned at home, had the other halfe; whereby all the Countric received benefit of the victorie, yet so, that the Souldiers had a farre greater proportion than the rest, as being fewer, and therefore receiving more for every single

Out of this purchase was deducted the Lords tribute, which was one in fiftie, of that which the people received, and one in five hundred, of that which was given 49 to the Souldiers; namely one hundred and one thousand part of the whole bootie. So in the spoile of Midian, thirtie two thousand women being taken, the armie had fixteene thousand of them for flaues, and the Congregation had other fixteene thou- Numb. 31.40. fand; but out of the fixteene thousand given to the Armie, were exempted two and thirtie for the Lordstribute. Out of the peoples number were taken three hundred and twentie. By this meanes, the leffer that the Armie was which had exposed it selseto danger, the greater profit had euery Souldier; but when it confissed of many hands, they who remayning at home were faine to vidergoe more than ordinarie travaile in domesticall affaires, did receive by so much the greater portion. But the Lordstribute was alwaies certaine, yea many times it was increased, either by 50 some especiall commandement, as when all the gold, and silver, and other metalls found in 'ericho, were consecrated vnto God; or by thankfulnesse of the Rulers and 10/6.19. Now

Now how focuer the Israelites were many times oppressed, and troden downe by other Nations, yet were not these treasures robbed or spoiled; for the enemies neuer gat possession of the Tabernacle that was in Shilo. Wherefore it cannot other-was furnamed Edom, and Jacob I/rael. There were of them fine Cities of pettie principalities; namely, Azotus, or Asadod, Gaza or Aczaph, Ascalon, Geth or Gath, and Acca- 1. Sam. 6. ron. It feemeth that Cassoim was the first founder of this nation, because of his kindred on either hand, the Canaanites and the Ægyptians.

The first King of these Philistims, which the Scriptures have named, was that Gen. 20. Abimelech which loudd Sara, Abrahams wife.

The second Abimelech lived at once with Isaac, to whom Isaac repaired in the time offamine, Abimelech then refiding at Gerar in the border of Idum.ea, which Abimelech Gen. 26. 20 fancied Isase his wife: as his father had done Sara.

After Abimelech the second, the Philistims Kings are not remembred in the Scriptures, till Davids time : perhaps the government was turned into Ariftocraticall. For they are afterwards named Princes of the Philistims, howfocuer Achis be named Ind. 16.1. Sam: king of Gath, the same to whom Dauid fled, and who againe gaue him Siklag to inhabit in Sauls time.

After him wee read of another Achis who lived with Salomon, to whom Semei travailed to fetch back his fugitive fervant, what time the feeking of his fervant was the loffe of his life. Ieremie the Prophet speaketh of the Kings of Palestin or Philisim. Amos nameth the King of Ascalon: Zacharias, a King of Gaza. The rest of 30 the warres of the Philistims are remembred in the Catalogue of the Indges, of Sanl and David, and therefore I shall not neede to collect the particulars in this

There lived at once with David, the third of the Silvij King of Alba, called Latinus Silnius, who is faid to have ruled that part of italy fiftic yeeres. And about his fourteenth yeare Codrus the last King of the Athenians died, to whom succeeded the first Prince of those, who being called after Medon, Medontide, without regall name gouerned Athens during their life.

The reasons which moued the Athenians to change their government, were not drawne from any inconucnience found in the rule of Soueraigntie, but in honour 40 of Codrus onely. For when the Gracians of Doris, a region betweene Phocis and the mountaine of Oeta, fought counsaile from the Oracle, for their successe in the warres against the Athenians, it was answered, that then undoubtedly they should preuaile and become Lords of that State, when they could obtaine any victoric against the Nation, and yet preserve the Athenian King living. Codrus by some intelligence being informed of this answere, withdrew himselfe from his owne forces, and putting on the habit of a common fouldier, entred the Campe of the Dorians, and killing the first hee encountred, was himselfe forthwith cut in Neere the same time began Ixion the second King of the Heraelida, the sonne of Eurysthenes in Corinth; and Agis the second of the Heraclide in Lacedemon: in honour of which Agis, his successfours were called Agide, for many yeeres after. > winnings and liberalitie, to the treasures laid vp in many former Ages, than to have beene the meere fruits of his owne industrie. Now concerning the riches of Salomon, it is more manifest how he gathered them. for he received of yeerely revenues with his tributes fixe hundred fixtic fixe Talents of gold, besides the Customes of Spices. He had also fixe rich Returnes from 20 french crowns. the East India, which greatly increased his store. For his ships performed that voyage eucry three yeeres, and he began that trade in the two and twentieth yeere of his raigne, and ruled fortie yeeres. Besides this, all ludga and Israel were now mastered to his hands; all the Arabians his borderers, the Syrians of Zobah, of Damascena, of 1. King c. 9.v. 20 Palmyra, of Iturea; all of Idumea, Moab, and Ammon, paid him tribute; as likewise did the Hittites, who with the Perizzites, Heuites, Iebusites, and other races of the Canaanites, were not as yet extinguished, though subjected.

Into this flourishing estate was the Kingdome of Israel reduced by Danid, who after fortie yeeres raigne, and seuentie yeeres of life, dyed in a good age, full of dayes, 1.6bron. 19.28. riches, and honours and was buried in the Citic of David. It is written by Iosephus 20 that there was hid in Danids Tombe a maruallous quantitic of treasures, in so much 16ft. Amiq.1.7. as Hyrcanus (who first of the Chasmanai, or race of the Maccabees, called himselfe King) one thousand and three hundred yeeres after, drew thence three thousand Talents, to rid himselfe of Antiochus then besieging Ierusalem, and afterward Herod opening another Cell, had also an exceeding masse of gold and silver therein. And it was an ancient custome to burie treasure with the dead. So the Peruvians and other Americans did the like, which being discouered by the Spaniards, they inriched themselves by nothing so much in their first Conquest. That Salomon did burie so much treasure in his fathers graue, it would hardly be beleeved, in regard of the great exactions with which he was faine to burthen the people, notwithstanding all the ri-40 ches which he got otherwife, or which were left vnto him: were it not withall confidered that his want of monie grew from fuch magnificent imployments. Particularly of the Sepulcher of David the Scriptures have no mention, but onely the Sepulchers of the Kings of Iuda, as of an honourable place of buriall. Yet the Monu-Pereginat. Helos in Laconia, who had refused to pay him tribute : hee condemned them and theirs to perpetuall flauerie; wherof it came, that all the Mellenians, whom at length they brought into the like bondage, were after called Helotes.

In like fort from the Selani came the word Slane. For when that Nation iffuing out of Sarmatia, now called Russia, had seised upon the countrie of Illyria and made it their owne by Conquest, their victorie pleased them so highly, that thereupon they called themselues by a new name, Slauos, which is in their language glorious. But in after-times (that warmer Climate having thawed their northerne hardines, and not ripened their wits) when they were troden down, and made servants to their neighbours; the Italians which kept many of them in bondage, began to call all their 10 bondmen Slaves, vling the word as a name of reproch: in which sense it is now currant through many countries.

Other Chronologers make this Agis, the third King of Sparta, and somewhat later, about the 23. yeere of David, and say, that Achestratus was the fourth King of Enseb. in chron. this race, the same whom Eusebien calls Labotes, and sets him in the thirteenth yeere

In the tenth yeere of Achestratus, Androclus the third sonne of Codrus affisted by the lones, built Epbelus in Caria, who after the adioyning of the Ile of Samos to his territorie, was slaine by the Carians whose countrie he vsurped. He was buried (saith The East-gate Paulanias) in one of the gates of Ephesus called Magnetes, his armed Statua being set 20 ouer him. Strabo reports that after Androclus had subdued the Ionians (the next ward orangerija prouince to Ephefus on the sea coast of Asia the lesse) he inlarged his Dominions vpon the Loles, which in yneth to Ionia: and that his posteritie gouerned the Cities Arifiles, pole.6. of Ephefus and Erythra by the name of Bafilida in Strabo his owne time. Of the expedition of the lones how they came hither out of Peloponefus, I have * spoken alreadie voon occasion of the returne of the Heraelide into Peloponesus, wherein with the Dores, they expelled the Achai, and inhabited their places in that land: though this of the lones succeeded that of the Heraclida 100. yeeres.

The Citie of Ephelus became exceeding famous: first, for the temple of Diana therein built: which had in length 425. foote, and 220. in bredth, sustained with 30 127. pillars of marble, of 70, foote high: whereof 27, were most curiously grauen, and all the rest of choice marble polisht, the worke being first set out by Cteliphon of Groffes. Secondly, it became renowned by being one of the first that received the Christian faith, of which Timothie was Bishop; to whom, and to the Ephesians, Saint Paul wrote his Epiftles so intituled. The other Citic possest by Androclus in Aolis was also vniuersally spoken of by reason of Sibylla, surnamed Erythraa: who lived seuen hundred and fourtie yeeres before Christ borne. Saint Augustine auoweth that a Romane Proconful shewed him in an ancient Greeke coppie certaine verses of this Prophetesse: which began (as Saint Augustine changed them into Latine) in these wordes: Iesus Christus Dei filius (aluator. Iesus Christ sonne of God the 40 Sauiour.

About the time that Ioab besieged Rabba in Moab, Vaphres beganne to gouerne in Egypt, the same that was father in Law to Salomon, whose Epistles to Salomon, and his to Vaphres, are remembred by Eulebius out of Polemon. In the 21. of David, was the Citie of Magnesia in Asia the lesse founded, the same which is seated upon the river Maander, where Scipio gave the great overthrow to Antiechus. In this territorie are the best Horses of the lesser Asia bred, whereof

Et Magnetis equis, Minya gens cognita remis. About the same time Cuma in Campania was built by the inhabitants of Chalcu in 50 Euba, according to Servius, with whom Strabo loyneth the Cumeans of Lolis, faying, that to the one of these people the government was given, with condition that the other should give name to the Citic. Of this Cuma was Ephorus the famous scholler of Ifocrates.

Eusebius and Cassiodor finde the building of Carthage at this time, to wit, in the 21. yeere of Dauid, but much mistaken. For the father of Dido was Metinus the sonne of Badezor brother to Iezabel, who married Achab King of Israel; and betweene the death of David, and the first of Achab, there were wasted about 95.

In this time also Acastus lived, the second of the Athenian Princes after Codrus, Euseb.in Chron. of which there were thirteene in descent before the State changed into a Magistra- Herodin vit. cie of tenne yeeres. Some writers make it probable that the Lolians led by Graus, Home Strab. the grand nephew of Orestes, possess the Citic and Island of Lesbos about this time. In Antia S. & cont. to the 32. yeere of David, Hiram began to reigne in Tyre, according to Iosephus, who Ap.l.i. faith, that in his twelfth yeere Salomon began the worke of the Temple. But it is a familiar errour in Iosephus, to misreckon times, which in this point hee doth so strangely, as if hee knew not how at all to cast any accompt. For it is manifest that Hiram fent messengers, and Cedars to Danid, soone after his taking of Ierusalem, which was in the very beginning of Dauids reigne ouer Israel, when as yet hee had reigned onely seuen yeeres in Hebron, ouer the house of Iuda. Wherefore it must needs be that Hiram had reigned aboue 30. yeeres before Salomon; vnlesse more credit should be given to those Tyrian records which are cited by Iosephus, than to the plaine words of Scripture contradicting them. For that it was the same Hiram 20 which lived both with David and with Salomon, the Scriptures make it plainely manifest.

CHAP. XVIII.

Of SALOMON.

ò I.

Of the establishing of SALOMON: of birthright, and of the cause of ADONIAHS death, and of SALOMONS wisedome.

ALOMON, who was brought vp vnder the Prophet Nathan, began to reigne ouer Inda and Ifrael, in the yeere of the world 2991. Hee was called Salomon by the appointment of God: hee was also called Iediddia, or Theophilus, by Nathan, because the Lord loued him.

Hiram King of Tyre, after Salomons anointing, dispatched Embassadours toward him, congratulating His establishment: a custome betweene Princes very ancient. Whence we reade that Dauid did in like fort salute Hanum King of the Ammonites, after 2.Sam.10.

his obtaining the Kingdome. The beginning of Salomon was in bloud, though his reigne were peaceable. For soone after Dauids death, hee caused his brother Adonijah to bee slaine by Benaiah 50 the sonne of Iehoiada, taking occasion from Adonyah his desiring by Bersheba, that the young maid Abishag (which lay in Davids bosome in his latter dayes, to keepe him warme) might be given to him. What soeuer he pretended, it was enough that Adonijah was his elder brother, and fought the kingdome contrary to the will of David, whom God inclined towards Salemon. And yet it is said that a word is Vu 3

enough to the wife, and he that fees but the claw, may know whether it bee a lvon or no: foit may seeme that to the quick-fighted wisdome of Salomon, this motion of Adonyabs, was a demonstration of a new treason. For they which had beene concubines to a King, might not after bee touched but by a King: whence Achitophel wished Absalon to take his Fathers Concubines as a part of the Royaltie. And Danid after that wrong, determining to touch them no more, did not give them to any other, but shut them vp, and they remained widowed untill their death. And this it seems was the depth of Isbosheths quarrell against Abner, for having his Fathers Concubine. And some signification of this custome may seeme too in the words of God by Nathan to David; Ihave given thee thy masters house, and thy masters to wives. And in the words of Saul, vpbraiding Ionathan, that he had chosen Danid to the shame of the nakednesse of his Mother. Hercunto perhaps was some reference in this purpose of Adoniah, to marrie with her that was alwaics present with David in his latter daies, and who belike knew all that was past, for the conveying of the Kingdome to Salomon. There might be divers farther occasions, as either that hee would learne such things by her as might be for the aduantage of his ambition, or that he would perswade her to forge some strange tale about Davids last Testament. or any thing else that might prejudice the title of Salomon.

As for the right of an elder brother which Adonyah pretended, though generally it agreed both with the law of Nations, and with the customes of the lewes: yet the 20 Kings of the lewes were so absolute, as they did therein, and in all else what they pleased. Some examples also they had (though not of Kings) which taught them to vse this paternall authoritie in transferring the birthright to a younger sonne: namely, of Iacobs disheriting Reuben, and giving the birthright (which was twice as much as any portion of the other brethren) to Ioseph: of whom hee made two tribes. And that it was generally acknowledged that this power was in Dauid, it appeares by the words of Bersabe and Nathan to David, and of Ionathan to Adonyah. For as for popular election, that it was necessarie to confirme, or that the refusall of the people had authoritie to frustrate the elder brothers right to the Kingdome, it now here appeares in the flories of the Iemes. It is faid indeed that the people made 30 Saul King at Gilgal: that is, they acknowledged and established him. For that he was King long before no man can doubt. In like manner elswhere the phrase of chusing or making their King, is to bee expounded: as where in the prohibition, that they should not make themselues a King, it is said, Thoushalt make him King whom the Lord (hall chuse.

Butto proceed with the acts of Salomon: at the same time that he put Adonyah to death, he rid himselse also of Ioab, and three yeeres after of Shimei, as David had aduised him: he displaced also the Priest Abiathar, who tooke part with Adonisah against him: but in respect of his office, and that he followed David in all his afflictions, and because hee had borne the Arke of God before his Father, he spared his life. 40 And thus being established in his Kingdome, hee tooke the daughter of Vaphres King of Egypt to Wife: for fo Eusebius out of Eupolemus calls him. Hec offered a thousand Sacrifices at Gibeon, where God appearing vnto him in a dreame, bade him aske what he would at his hands; SALOMON choofeth wifdome, which pleased God. And God faid vnto him, Because thou hast asked this thing, and hast not asked for thy selfe long life, neither hast thou asked riches for thy selfe, nor hast asked the life of thine enemies, behold, I have done according to thy words : by which wee may informe our selucs what defires are most pleasing to God, and what not. For the coueting after long life, in respect of our selves, cannot but proceede of selse-loue, which is the roote of all impietic: the desire of private riches is an affection of covetous nesse which God 50 abhorreth; to affect reuenge, is as much asto take the sword out of Gods hand, & to distrust his Iustice. And in that it pleased God to make Salomon know that it liked him, that he had not asked the life of his enemies, it could not but put him in mind of his brothers flaughter, for which he had not any warrant either from David, or from the Law of God. But because Salomon desired wisedome onely, which taught him both to obey God, and to rule men, it pleased God to give him withall that which he defired not. And I have also given thee (faith God) that which thou hast not asked, both riches and honour. This gift of wiledome our Commentators firetch to almost all kinds of learning: but that it comprehended the knowledge of the nature of plants and living creatures the Scripture testificth, though no doubt the 1.King.4.33. chiefe excellencie of Salomons wisedome, was in the knowledge of gouerning his 1. King 3.9. kingdome: whence, as it were for an example of his wisedome, the Scripture telleth how soone he judged the controuersie betweene the two harlots.

E then entred into league with Hiram King of Trre, from whom hee had much of his materials, for the Kings Palace and the Temple of God : for the building whereof he had received a double charge, one from his father Daurd, and another from God. For like as it is written of David, that He called SALOMON his sonne, and charged him to build a bouse for the Lord God of Israel : so doth Tostatus give the force of a divine precept 1. chron. 22.6. to these words, Behold; a sonne is borne unto thee, Gro. Hee shall build an house for Toff 9.26. in Hee began the worke of the Temple, in the beginning of the fourth yeere of his 1. King. c. 6. reigne, at which time also hee prepared his fleete at Essongaber to trade for gold in the East Indies, that nothing might be wanting to supplie the charge of so great a worke. For that the Temple was in building, while his fleetes were passing to and fro it is manifest. For the pillars of the Temple were made of the Almaggimtrees brought from Ophir. Of this most glorious building, of all the particulars (whereof 1.chron.28.29) the forme and example was given by God himselfe) many learned men have writ-30 ten, as Salmeron, Montanus, Ribera, Barrades, Azorius, Villalpandus, Pineda, and others, to whom I referre the Reader. For the cutting and squaring of the Cedars which served that building, Salomon employed thirtie thousand Carpenters, tenne thousand every moneth by course: he also vsed eightie thousand Masons in the mountaine, and seuentie thousand labourers that bare burdens, which it is conceiued, he selected out of the Profelises, 1. For Hiram caused his servants to bring downe 40 the Cedars and Firres from Libanon to the sea, and thence sent them in raffes to lop- 1.Kings. 49. pe, or the next port to Hierusalem. For in the second of Chronisles the second Chapter, it is plaine that all but the thirtie thousand Carpenters, and the ouer seers, were ftrangers, and as it seemeth the vassals of Hiram, and of Vaphres King of Egypt. Lettis literis gra-10 tias egi Deo, qui tibi regnum patris tradidit: & quoniam feribis fabros ministross, ad condendum Templum effe tibi mittendos, misi ad te millia hominum octoginta, & Architectum Tyrium hominem ex matre Iudea, virum in rebus architectura mirabilem. Curabis igitur ut necessaris non egeant, & Templo Dei condito ad nos redeant.

C VRON of Tyre, Sidon and Phanicia King, to King SALOMON greeting: when 1 Dread your letters, I gave God thankes, who hath installed you in your fathers Kingdome. And because you write, that carpenters and workemen may be sent to build Gods Temple. I have fent unto you foure core thouland men, and a Master-builder a Tyrian, borne of a Jewish woman, a man admirable in building. You will be carefull that all necessaries be pro- 20 10. Anil 8.c. nided for them, and when the Temple of God is built, that they come home to Us.

> The Copies of these letters were extant in losephus time as himselfe affirmeth, and to be seene, saith he, Tam in nostris quam in Tyriorum annalibus, as well in our owne as in the Tyrian annals. But he delivereth them somewhat in different tearmes, as the Reader may finde in his Antiquities. But were this intercourse betweene Salomon and Hiram either by message or by writing, it is somewhat otherwise delivered in the Scriptures, than either Eupolemus or losephus set it downe, but so, that in substance there is little difference betweene the one and the other.

The like letter in effect Salomon is faid to have written to Vaphres King of £gypt, 30 and was answered as from Hiram.

But whereas some Commenters upon Salomon finde that Hiram King of Tyre, and Vapores King of Agypt, gaue Salomon the title of Rex magnus, and cite Eupolemon in Eulebius. I doe not finde any such addition of magnus in Eulebius in the last chapter of that ninth booke; neither is it in Tosephus in the eight booke and second chapter of the lewes antiquities : it being a vaine title vsed by some of the Affirian and Perfian Kings, and vied likewise by the Parthians, and many other after them, insomuch as in latter times it grew common, and was vsurped by meane persons in respect of the great Hermes the first, which was honoured by that name for his noble qualities, as much or more than for his mightinesse.

After the finishing and dedication of the Temple and house of the Lord. Salomon fortified Ierusalem with a treble wall, and repaired Hazor which had beene the ancient Metropolis of the Canaanites, before to fuals time: fo did he Gaza of the Philistims: he built Bethoron, Gerar and the Millo or munition of Hierusalem. For Pharach (as it feemeth in fauour of Salomon) came vp into the edge of Ephraim, and tooke Gerar, which the Canaanites yet held, and put them to the fword, and burnt their Citie. The place and territorie he gaue Salomons wife for a dowrie. And it is probable that because Salomon was then busied in his magnificent buildings, and could not attend the warre, that he entreated his father in law to rid him of those neighbours, which Pharash performed. But he thereby taught the Agyptians to 50 visite those partes againe before they were sent for; and in his sonne Rehobeams time Shelback this mans successor did sacke Ierusalem it selfe.

Salomon also built Megiddo in Manaffe, on this side Iordan; and Balah in Dan: also Thadmor, which may be either Ptolomies Thamoron in the defart of Inda (or as Iofephias thinkes Palmyra in the defart of Syria, which Palmyra because it stood on the vermost border of Salomons dominion to the northeast of Libanus, and was of Dauids conquest when he wan Damaseus; it may seeme that Salomon therefore bestowed thereon the most cost, and fortified it with the best arte that that age had. Iofe- 10feph.18.am. phus calls this place Thadamora, by which name (faith hee) given by Salomon, the Syrians as yet call it. Hierom in his booke of Hebrew places calls it Thermeth. In aftertimes, when it was rebuilt by Adrian the Emperour, it was honoured with his name, and called Adrianopolis. In respect of this great charge of building Salomon raised tribute through all his Dominions, besides an hundred and twentie talents of gold 10 received from Hirams lervants, Salomon offered Hiram twentie towns in or necrethe vpper Galilee, but because they flood in an unfruitfull and marish ground, Hiram refuled them, and thereof was the territorie called Chabul.

These townes, as it is supposed, lay in Galilee of the Gentiles, IN on quod gentes ibi habitarent : sed quia sub ditione regis gentilis crat, Not that it was possess by Gentiles (faith Nauclerus ) but because it was under the rule of a King that was a Gentile. Howsocuer it were, it is true that Salomon in his 21. yeere fortified those places, which Hiram refused. Further, he made a journey into Syrta Zobah, and established his tributes; the first and last warre (if in that expedition be were driven to fight) that hee made in person in all his life. He then visited the border of all his Dominions, passing from 20 Thadmor to the North of Palmyrena, and so to the Defarts of Idumea, from whence hee vilited Eziongaber and Eloth, the vttermost place of the South of all histerritories, bordering to the red sea: which Cities I have described in the Storie of Moses.

d. III.

Of SALOMON'S fending to Ophir, and of some seeming contradictions about SALOMONS riches, and of PINEDAES conscipt of two strange passages about Infricke.

Ere Salomon prepared his Fleet of Ships for India, with whom Hiram ioyned in that voyage, and furnished him with Mariners and Pilots, the Tyrians being of all other the most expert sea-men. From this part of Arabia, which at this time belonged to Edom, and was conquered by David, did the Fleet passe on to the East India, which was not farre off, namely to Ophir, one of the Islands of the Moluccas, a place exceeding rich in gold: witnesse the Spaniards, who notwithstanding all the aboundance which they gather in Peru, doe yet plant in those Islands of the East at Manilia, and recouer 40 a great quantitie from thence, and with lesse labour than they doe in any one part of Peru, or new Spaine.

The returne which was made by these Ships amounted to source hundred and twentie talents, but in the second of Chronicles the eight, it is written foure hundred and fiftie talents: whereof thirtie talents went in expence for the charge of the fleet, and wages of men, and foure hundred and twentic talents, which makes five and twentie hundred and twentie thousand Crownes came cleere. And thus must those two places be reconciled. As for the place 1. Reg. 10. 14. which speaketh of fixe hundred fixtic and fix talents of gold, that fumme, as I take it, is of other receipts of Salomons which were yearely, and which came to him besides these profits from Ophir.

My opinion of the land of Ophir, that it is not Peru in America (as divers have thought) but a countrey in the East Indies; with some reason why at those times they could not make more speedic returne to lerusalem from the East Indies then in c.8.5 9.10. "5. three yeeres; and that Thar sis in Scripture is divers times taken for the Ocean, hath Lib.4.de rebut beene alreadie declared in the first booke. Onely

Onely it remaineth that I should speake somewhat of Pineds his strange conceits. who being a Spaniard of Batica, would faine have Gades or Calis-malis, in old times called Tarteffus, which is the Southwest corner of that Province, to be the Tharsis from whence Salomon fetcht his gold; for no other reason, as it seemes, but for love of his owne countrie, and because of some affinitie of sound betweene Thirsis and Tarteffin. For whereas it may feeme strange that it should be three yeere ere they, that tooke ship in the red sea, should returne from the East Indies to Ierusalem, this hath been in part answered alreadie. And further the intelligent may conceive of fundry lets, in the digging and refining of the metall, and in their other trafficke. and in their land-carriages betweene Ierusalem and the red sea, and perhaps also 10 elswhere: so that wee have no neede to make Salomons men to goe many thousand miles out of their way to Gades, round about all Affrick, that fo they might be long

For the direct way to Gades (which if Salomon and the Ifraclites knew not, the Tyrians which went with them, could not have beene ignorant of) was along the Mediterran (ea, and so (besides many wonderfull inconveniences and terrible navigation in rounding Africa) they should have escaped the troublesome land-carriage betweene Ierusalem and the red sea through drie, desart, and thoeuish Countries: and within 30.mile of Terusalem at Toppe, or some other hauen in Salomens owne

Countrie have laden and valaden their ships. But this direct course they could not hold (faith Pineda) because the huge Island of Atlantis in largenesse greater than all Africk and Asia being swallowed up in the Atlantik Ocean hindred Salomons thips from paffing through the straits of Gibraltar: for this he alleadgeth Plato in Timeo. But that this calamitic happened about Salomons time, or that thereby the Straights of Gades were filled with mud and made vnpassable, that there could be no comming to Gades by the Mediterran lea: or that this indraught where the sea runneth most violently, and most easily scowreth his channell, should be filled with mud, and not also the great Ocean in like manner. where this huge Island is supposed to have stoode: or that Salomons ships being in the red sea, should neglect the golden mines of the East Indies (which were infinitly 30 better and neerer to the red sea, than any in Spain) to seeke gold at Cadyz by the way of compassing Affrica, it is most ridiculous to imagine. For the Spaniard himselfe that hath also the rich Pern in the West, fortifieth in the East Indies, and inhabites some part thereof, as in Manilia, finding in those parts no lesse quantitie of gold

De rebus Sal, 1. 4.6.12.11. As it appeares Ioppe.c.1.0.3.

(the small territorie which he there possesset considered) than in Peru. The same Pineda hath another strange passage round about all Africa, which els where he dreames of : supposing whereas Ionas failing to Tharlis the Citie of Cilicia, was cast out in the Mediterran sea, and taken up there by a Whale, that this Whale in three dayes swimming aboue twelue thousand English miles, along the Mediterran feas, and so through the streights of Gades, and along all the huge seas round about 40 Africa, cast up 10mas upon the shore of the red sea, that so hee might have perhaps fome fixe miles the shorter (though much the worse) way to Niniuie. This conceipt hee grounds onely vpon the ambiguitie of the word Suph, which oftentimes is an Epitheton of the red sea (as if wee should call it mare algosum, the sea full of weeds) for the red sea. But in Ionas 2.5. it is generally taken in the proper fignification for weeds, and not as Pineda would haucit, who in this place against his owne rule (which elsewhere he giveth vs) supposeth strange miracles without any neede. For this long voyage of the Whale finished in three daies, is a greater miracle, than the very preservation of longs in the bellie of the Whale: and therefore seeing there is no necessitie of this miracle, we send it backe vnto him, keeping his owne rule which 50 in this place he forgets; Miracula non funt multiplicanda. And againe, Non funt miracul- gratis danda, nec pro arbitrio nona fingenda, Miracles are not to be multiplied without necessitic, nor delinered without cause, nor fained at pleasure. Therefore to leave this man in his dreames, which (were he not otherwife very learned and judicious) might bee thought vnworthie the mentioning. But to proceede with our Storie of

The Queene of Sabaes comming from farre to Salomon, (asit seemes from Arabis felix, and not as some thinke from Ethiopia) and her rich presents, and Salomons reciprocall magnificence, and his refoluing of her difficult quellions, those are set downe at large in the text. But herein Iolephus is greatly millaken, who calls this Queenc of Saba Nicaules, the successour (faith hee out of Herodotus) of those thirtie and eight Egyptian Kings which succeeded Mineus the founder of Memphis; adding that after this £gyptian, and the father in Law of Salomon, the name of Pharaoh was 10f.ant.8.t.a. 10 left off in Egypt. For as it is elsewhere proved that the Queene was of Arabia, not of Agypt and Athiopia; fo were there other Pharaohs after the father in Law of Salomon. of ludar It is also written of Salomon, that hee kept in garrisons fourteene thousand Chariots, and twelue thousand horsemen, that he spent in Court every day thirtie measures of fine flower, threescore measures of wheat, one hundred sheepe, besides stags and fallow deare, bugles and fowle; foure thousand stals of horses he had for his chariots and other vies, and for the twelve thousand horsemen of his guard. For, the ten thousand stals in the first of Kings the fourth, are to be taken but for so many horses, whence in the second of Chronicles the ninth, it is written but source thousand stals or teemes, and incuery teeme ten horses, as Junius and the Geneua vn- 1.King.4.31. derstandit. He was said to be wifer than any man, yea than were Ethan the Ezrabite, than Heman, Chalcal, or than Darda, to which Iunius addeth a fift, to wit, Ezrak. For the Geneua maketh Ethan an Ezrahite by Nation. Iofephus writes them Athan, Aman, Chalceus and Donan the sonnes of Hemon. Hec spake three thousand Prouerbes, and his fongs were one thousand and fine, whereof either the most part perished in the Captinitic of Babylon, or else because many actes of Salomons were written and kept among the publique Records of Civill causes and not Ecclesia-Ricall, therefore they were not thought necessarie to bee inserted into Gods 30 booke.

Of the fall of SALOMON, and how long he lived.

Ow as hee had plentic of all other things, so had he no scarcitie of women. For besides his seuen hundred Wiues, hee kept three hundred Concubines, and (forgetting that God had commaunded that none of his people should accompanie the daughters of Idolators) hee tooke Wines out of Agypt, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Zidon and Heth: and when hee fell adoting, his Wines turned his heart after other Gods, as Afteroth of the Zidonians, Milcom or Molech of the Ammonites, and Chemoft of These things God punished by Adad of Idum.ca, Rezin of Damaseus, and by Ierobeam his owne servant, and one of the masters of his workes, who by the ordinance of God tare from his sonne Roboam, ten of the twelue parts of all the territorie hee had. Deus dum in peccatores animaduertit, aliorum peccatis vititur, que spfe non fecit. God in punishing finners, vieth the finnes of others, which hee hiroselfe wrought P. Martineg.

In the reigne of Salomon (as in times of long peace) were few memorable actions by him performed, excepting his buildings with other workes of magnificence and that great Indian voyage alreadic mentioned. Fourtie yeeres hee reigned: how many he lived, it is not written, and must therefore bee found onely by coniecture. The most likelie way to guesse at the truth in this case, is by considering the actions of David before and after Salomons birth, whereby wee may best make estimation of the yeeres which they confumed, and confequently learne the true, or most likely yeere of his nativitie. Seven yeeres David reigned in Hebren: in his eighth vecre hee tooke Jerusalem, and warred with the Philistims, who also troubled him the yeere following. The bringing home of the Arke feemes to have beene in the tenth yeere of David, and his intention to build the Temple in the yeere ensuing, at which time he had sufficient leysure, living in rest. After this he had warres with the Philifims, Mozbites, Aramites and Edomites, which must needs have held him five yeeres. considered that the Aramites of Damasco raised warre against him, after such time as he had beaten Hadadezer; and that in every of these warres he had the entire 10

2.Sam.c.11.v.1. victoric. Neither is it likely that these services occupied any longer time, because in those dayes and places there were no wintering campes in vse, but at conuenient feasons of the yeere Kings went forth to warre, dispatching all with violence, rather than with temporizing; as maintaining their armies, partly vpon the spoyle of the enemies countrie, partly upon the private provision which every souldier made for himselfe. The 17. yeere of David, in which he tooke Mephiboseth the sonne of

Ionathan into his Court, appeareth to have passed away in quiet; and the veere following to have begun the warre with Ammon; but somewhat late in the end of Summer perhaps, it came to triall of a battaile (for Ieab after the victorie. returned immediatly to Ierusalem) the causes and preparations for that warre haue taken 20 vp all the Summer. Davids personall expedition against the Aramites wherein hee brought all the tributaries of Hadadezer vinder his owne allegiance, appeares manifestly to have beene the next yeeres worke, wherein he did cut offall meanes of fuccour from the Ammonites; all Syria, Moab and Idumea being now at his owne deuotion. By this reckoning it must have beene the 20. veere of Davids reigne, and about the fiftieth of his life, in which he sent forth Ioab to beliege Rabba, and finished the warre of Ammon: wherein also fell out the matter of Vriahs wife. So one halfe of Dauids reigne was very prosperous: in the other halfe he felt great sorrow by the r.im by God for his foule and bloudie offence. Now very manifest it is, that in the yeere after the death of that childe which was begotten in adulteric, Salomon was borne, who must needs therefore haue beene nincteene veeres old or thereabout, when hee began to reigne at the decease of his father, as being begotten in the 21. yeere of his fathers reigne, who reigned expectation, execution, and fad remembrance of that heavie judgement laid vpon in all fortie.

This account hath also good coherence with the following times of Dauid, as may be collected out of ensuing actions: for two yeeres passed ere Absalom slew his brother Ammon; three yeeres ere his father pardoned him; and two yeeres more ere he came into the Kings presence. After this he prepared horses and men, and laid the foundation of his rebellion, which seemes to have beene one yeeres worke. 40 So the rebellion it selfe with all that happened thereupon, as the Commotion made by Sheba, the death of Amala and the rest, may well seeme to have beene in the 30. yeere of Dauids reigne.

Whether the three yeeres of famine should be reckoned apart from the last veeres of warre with the Philistims, or confounded with them, it were more hard than needfull to conjecture. Plaine enough it is, that in the tenne remaining yeeres of David there was time sufficient, and to spare, both for three yeeres of famine, for foure yeeres of warre, and for numbring the people, with the pestilence ensuing; as also for his owne last infirmitie, and disposing of the Kingdome. Yet indeed it seemes that the warre with the Philistims, was but one yeeres worke, and ended in three or 50 foure fights, of which the two or three former were at Gob or 200b neere vnto Gezer, and the last at Gath. This warre the Philistims undertooke, as it seemeth, upon confidence gathered out of the tumults in Ifrael, and perhaps emboldened by Danids old age, for hee fainted now in the battaile, and was afterwardes hindered by his men from exposing himselse vnto danger any more. So Danid had fixeor feuen yeeres of rest, in which time it is likely, that many of his great men of Warre died (being of his owneage) whereby the stirring spirit of Adonyah found little succour in the broken partie of Ivab the sonne of Zeruta.

At this time it might both truly be faid by David to Salomon, Thou art a wife man, I. King.c. 2. v. 9. and by Salomon to God, I am but a yong child; for nineteene yeeres of age might well & c.3.0.7.

Neuerthelesse there are some that gather out of Salomons professing himselfe 2 child, that he was but eleuen yeeres old when he beganne to raigne. Of these Rabbi Salomon feemes the first Authour, whom other of great learning and judgement haue herein followed: grounding themselues perhaps upon that which is saide of Absolons rebellion, that it was after fortie yeeres, which they understand as yeeres 2. Sam. 15.7. of Davids raigne. But whereas Rehoboson the sonne of Sasomon was 41. yeeres old when hee beganne to raigne, it would follow hereby that his Father had begotten bim, being himselte but a child of nine or ten yeeres old; the difference betweene their ages being no greater, if Salomon (who raigned fortie yeeres) were but eleuen yeeres old when his raigne began. To avoide this inconvenience, losephus allowes 80. yeeres of raigneto Salomon; a report so disagreeing with the Scriptures, that it needes no confutation. Some indeede haue in fauour of this opinion construed the wordes of Inferhus, as if they included all the yeeres of Salomons life. But by such reckoning hee should have beene 40. yeeres old at his Fathers death; and confequently should have beene borne long before his Father had wonne Ierusalem; which is a manifest vntruth. Wherefore the 40. yeares remembred in Absolons rebellion, may either seeme to have reference to the space betweene Davids first anointment, and the trouble which God brought vpon him for his wickednesse, or perhaps be read (according to losephus, Theodoret, and the Latine translation ) foure yeeres; which passed betweene the returne of Absolon to Ierusalem, and his breaking out.

Of Salomons bookes of Inuocations and Inchantments to cure difeases, and expell euill spirits, losephus hath written at large, though as I conceiue, rather out of his owne inuention, or from some vncertaine report, than truely.

Healso speaketh of one Eliazarus, who by the roote in Salomons ring dispossest divers persons of euill spirits in the presence of Vespasian, and many others, which I will not stand to examine.

Certainly fo strange an example of humane frailty hath neuer been read of as this King: who having received wisedome from God himselfe, in honour of whom and for his onely service, hee built the sirst and most glorious Temple of the world: he that was made King of Ifrael and Indea, not by the law of Nature, but by the loue 19 of God, and became the wifest, richest, and happiest of all Kings, did in the end, by the persivasion of a few weake and wretched Idolatrous Women, forget and forfake the Lord of all the world, and the giver of all goodnesse, of which he was more liberall to this King, than to any that ever the world had. Of whom Sirasides writeth in this manner: SALOMON raigned in a peaceable time and was glorious, for God made all quiet round about, that hee might build a house to his name, and prepare the San-Etuarie for euer; How wife wast thou in thy youth, and wast filled with understanding, as with a floud! Thy minde coursed the whole earth, and hath filled it with grave and darke fentences. Thy name went abroad in the Iles , and for thy peace thou wast beloved, &c. but thus he concludeth: Thou didft bowthy loynes to Women , and wast oner-come by thy bo- 20 dy, thou didlt staine thine honour, and hast defiled thy posteritie, and hast brought wrath upon thy children, and felt forrow for thy folly. cap. 27.

Of the great acts and vertues of King Sesostris I have spoken already in the Rorie of the Egyptian Princes: only in this hee was reproued, that hee caused foure of his captine Kings to draw his Caroch, when hee was disposed to bee seene, and toride in trumph: one of which foure, faith Eutropiu, at such time as Sesostru 50 was carried out to take the aire, cast his head continually backe upon the two fore-most wheeles next him, which Selostris perceiuing, asked him what hee found worthy the admiration in that motion? to whom the captine King answer red, that in those hee beheld the instabilitie of all worldly things; for that both the lowest part of the wheele was suddainly carried about, and became the highest, and the vomost part was as suddainly turned downe-ward and under all: which when wish Missell, 17 Sefostris had iudiciously weighed, he dismissed those Princes, and all other from the like seruitude in the future. Of this Sesostris, and that he could not be taken for Sefac, I have spoken at large in that part of the Egyptian Kings preceding.

Of SALOMONS Successors untill the end of IEHOSAPHAT.

EHOBO AM the Sonne of Salomon by Nahama an Ammonitesse, now fortie yeeres olde, succeeded his Father Salomon, and was anointed at Sichem, where the ten Tribes of Israel were affembled: who attended a while the returne of ler oboam as yet in Agypt, fince hee fled thither fearing Salomon. After his arrivall the people presented a Petition to Rehoboam, to bee cased of those great Tributes laid on them by his Father. Sic enim firmius ci fore Imperium, & amari mallet quam Ant.1.8.c.3. metui; So should his Empire (faith Iosephus) be more assured, if hee desired rather to bee beloved than feared:

whereof hee tooke three dayes to deliberate before his answere, of whom therefore it could not be faid as of Dauid, that he was wifer than all his Teachers. For as of himselfe heeknew not how to resolue, so had hee not the judgement to discerne of counfells, which is the very test of wisedome in Princes, and in all men else. But not with standing that he had consulted with those grave and aduised men, that serued his Father, who perswaded him by all meanes to satisfie the multitude: he was transported by his familiars and fauourites, not only to continue on the backs of his 40 subjects those burdens which greatly crusht them; but (vaunting fally of greatnesse exceeding his Fathers) he threatned in sharpe, or rather in terrible termes, to lay yet heavier, and more vnfupportable loades on them. But as it appeared by the fuccesse, those yonger adulfors greatly mistooke the nature of seucritie, which without the temper of clemencie is no other than crueltie it felfe: they also were ignorant that it ought to be vsed for the helpe, and not for the harme of subjects. For, what is the strength of a King left by his people? and what cordes or fetters have ever lasted long, but those which have been twifted and forged by love only? His witlesse parasites could well judge of the Kings disposition: and being well learned therein, though ignorant in all things elfe, it sufficed and inabled them suf-50 ficiently for the places they held. But this answere of Rehoboam did not a little adnance Ieroboams designes. For being fore-told by the Prophet Achiah of his future aduancement, these the Kings threats (changing the peoples loue into furie) confirmed and gaue courage to his hopes. For he was no sooner arrived, than elected King of Ifrael; the people crying out, What portion have wee in Danid? we have no inheritance in the Sonne of that. Now though themselves, even all the Tribes of Israel, had consented to Danids anointing at Hebron the second time, acknowledgeing that they were his bones and his flesh: yet now after the manner of rebells. they forgat both the bonds of nature, and their dutie to God, and, as all alienated resolued hearts doe, they served themselves for the present with impudent excuses. And now ouer-late, and after time, Rehoboam fent Adoram, one of the Taxers of the people, a man most hatefull to all his Subjects, to pacific them: whom they infantly beat to death with stones. Whereupon the King affrighted, got him from Sichem with all speede, and recovered Ierusalem, where preparing to invade Israel, with an hundred and foure-score thousand chosen men, Shemai in the person of 12 God commanding to the contrarie, all was stayed for the present. In the meane time Ierobosm the new King fortified Seekem on this fide, and Pennel on the other fide of Jordan; and fearing that the Vnion and exercise of one Religion would also ioyne the peoples hearts againe to the House of David; and having in all likelihood also promised the Egyptians to follow their Idolatrie : hee set vp two Calues of gold for the Children of Ifrael to worship, impiously perswading them that those were the Gods, or at least by these heerepresented those Gods, which delinered them out of Agypt: and refusing the service of the Leuites, hee made Priests fit for such Gods. It must needes be that by banishing the Leuites which served David and Salomon through all Ifrael, Ieroboam greatly inriched himselfe: as taking into his hands 20 all those Cities which were given them by Mojes and Iofua, for as it is written, The Leuites left their suburbs, and their possession, and came to Iuda, &c. This irreligious policie of Icroboam (which was the foundation of an Idolatrie that neuer could be rooted out, vntill I frael for it was rooted out of the Land) was by prophecie and miracles impugned sufficiently when it first beganne, but the affections maintaining it, were so strong, that neither Prophecie nor Miracle could make them yeeld. Ieroboam could not bee moued now by the authoritie of Ahia, who from the Lord had first promised vnto him the Kingdome; nor by the withering of his owne hand as hee stretched it ouer the Altar, which also claue a-sunder, ac-God, who againe recovered and cured him of that defect; yet hee continued as obstinate an Idolater as before, for hee held it the safest course in policie to proceede as cording to the ligne, which the man of God had given by the commandement of 30 he had begunne. This impious invention of Ieroboam, who for sooke God, and the Religion of his forefathers, by God and his Ministers taught them, was by a moderne Historian compared with the policies of late Ages, obseruing well the practice of his Nation, being an Italian borne. Sie qui hodie (faith hee) politici vocantur, & propria commoda, prasentes que vilitates sibi tanquam ultimum finem constituunt, cansam quam vocant status in capite omnium ponunt : pro ipsatuenda, promonenda, conseruanda, amplianda, nihil non faciendum putant. If they meane to oppresse their neighbour to ouerturne all lawes of instice and honestie, if religion it selfe must goe to wracke, yea if all rights of God and Man must be violated, they will trie all courses, be it right, be it wrong, they will doe any thing; let all goeto ruine, what care they, follong as they may have what they would; as 50 who should say, there were no God that would offer to meddle in such matters, or had power of his end and Contemporaries. Hile Icrobosm was occupied in fetting up his new Religion, Rehobosm on the other fide, having now little hope to recover the Provinces loft, strengthened the principall places remaining with all endenour: for hee fortified and victualled fifteene Cities of Judah and Beniamin: 2. Chron. 21. not that hee feared Ieroboam alone, but the Agyptians, to whom Ieroboam had not onely fastned himselfe, but withall inuited them to inuade Indea: laying perchance before them the incountable riches of Danid and Salomon, which might now easily bee had, seeing ten of the twelve Tribes were revolted, and become enemics to the Indeans. So as by those two wayes (of late yeeres often troden) to wit, change of Religion, and inuitation of forraine force, Ieroboam hoped to settle himselse in the seate of Israel, whom yet the powerfull God for his Idolatrie in a few yeeres after rooted out, with all his. Rehoboam also, having as hee thought, by fortifying divers places, affured his estate, for sooke the Law of the living God, 1.Kings 14.13. and made high Places, and Images, and Groues on euerie high Hill, and vnder eue-

those removed Sauages of the Troglodyta.

And therefore in the fifth yeere of his raigne, Sefae or Shifhae before spoken of, being now King of Egypt, and with whom as well Adad of Idumes, as Ierobosm, were familiar, and his infiruments, entred Indea with twelve thousand Charlots, and 2.chromat.3. three score thousand Horse, besides soote-men, which Iosephus numbers at source 10/1. ARIL 8.2.4. hundred thousand. This Armie was compounded of foure Nations; Agyptians, Lubeans, Succeans, and Custes. The Lubeans were Lybeans, the next bordering Region to Agypt, on the West fide. The Cufites were of Petres, and of the Defart Arabia, which afterward followed Zerah against of King of Inda. The Succeans ac. 2. Chron. 12. cording to lunius his opinion, were of Succeth, which fignifieth Tents: hee doth fup-40 pose that they were the Troglodita, mentioned often in Planie, Ptolomie, and other Chron. Authors. The Troglodites inhabited not farre from the bankes of the red Sea, in 22. Ptol. Affectab. 3. degrees from the line Northward, about fixe hundred English mile from the best and Maritimate part of Agypt: and therefore I doe not thinke that the Succims, or Sucsai were those Troglodita, but rather those Arabians which Ptolomie calles Arabes Agypti, or, Jehthyophagi, which possesse that part of Egypt betweene the mountaines called Alabastrini, and the red Sea farre neerer Agypt, and readier to be leuied then Cap. 47. 0,13.

With this great and powerfull Armie, Sefac invaded Indea, and (belides many other strong Cities ) wanne Ierusalem it selfe; of which, and of the Temple, and 50 Kings house, he tooke the spoile, carrying away ( besides other treasures) the golden shields which Salomon had made, fin imitation of those which David recovered from Adidezer, in the Syrian warre: these Reboboam supplied with Targets of braffe, which were fit enough to guard a King of his qualitie: whom Syracides calleth, The foolishnesse of the people.

Ххз

From this time forward the Kings of Agypt claimed the soueraigntie of Indea. and held the Iewes as their Tributaries: Sefac, as it feemes, rendring vp to Rehoboam his places on that condition. So much may bee gathered out of the wordes of God. where promifing the deliuerance of Juda after their humiliation, hee doth not withstanding leave them under the yoke of Egypt, in these wordes: Neuerthelesse, they (to wit, the Indeans) shall be his servants, that is, the servants of SESAC.

After this overthrow and dilhonour, Reboboam raigned twelve yeeres, and his loffes received by Sefac notwithstanding, hee continued the warre against Ieroboam

all his life time. After his death Ieroboam gouerned Ifrael foure yeeres. Rehoboam lived 58. yeeres, and raigned 17. his storie was written at large by She- 10 meiah and Hiddon the Prophets, but the same perished with that of Wathan & the rest.

With Rehoboam, Archippus, and Tersippus, the third and fourth Archontes or Gouernours for life after Codrus , gouerned in Athens. Abdastrartus, or Abstrartus, in Tyre. Doristhus the fift of the Heraelide in Sparta, according to Eusebius (others make him the fixth) and Priminas the fourth in Corinth. Ouer the Latines reigned Sylvius Alba, and Sylvius Atys, the fourth and fifth of the Sylvij.

About the 12. of Rehoboam, Abdastrartus King of Tyre was murthered by his Nurfes fons, or foster brethren, the elder of which vsurped the Kingdom twelue veeres.

Towards his latter times Periciades, or Pyrithiades, beganne to gouerne Allyria. the 34. King thereof: and not long after Astartus, the sonne of Baleastartus recouered 20 the Kingdome of Tyre from the V (urpers.

Of the great battaile betweene IEROBOAM and ABIA, with a Corolarie of the examples of Gods judgements.

BIJAH the Sonne of Rehoboam, inherited his Fathers Kingdome, and his vices. Hee raised an Armie of soure hundred thousand, with which hee inuaded Ieroboam, who encountred him with a double number of 20 eight hundred thousand, both Armies ioyned neere to the Mount Ephraim, where Ieroboam was vtterly ouerthrowne, and the strength of Ifrael broken; for there fell of that side fine hundred thousand, the greatest ouerthrow that euer was given or received of those Nations. Abijah being now master of the field, recourred Bethel, Ieshanah, and Ephron, soone after which discomfiture, Ieroboam died: who reigned in all 22. yeeres. Abijah, the better to strengthen himselfe, entred into league with Hesion, the third of the Adads of Syria; as may bee s. Coron. 16. 23. gathered out of the 2. of Chron. he reigned but three yeeres, and then died: the particulars of his acts were written by Iddo the Prophet, as some part of his Fathers were.

Heere wee see how it pleased God to punish the sinnes of Salomon in his Sonne 40 Rehoboam: first, by an Idolator and a Traitor: and then by the successor of that Agyptian, whole daughter Salomon had married, thereby the better to affure his chate, which while he ferued God, was by God affured against all and the greatest neighbouring Kings, and when hee for sooke him, it was torne a funder by his meanest Vassals; Not that the Father wanted frength to defend him from the Agyptian Sefac. For the sonne Abijah was able to leuie foure hundred thousand men, and with the same number he overthrew eight hundred thousand Israelites, and slew of them fine hundred thousand, God giving spirit, courage, and invention, when, and where it pleafeth him. And as in those times the causes were exprest, why it pleased God to punish both Kings and their People: the same being both before, 50 and at the instant delivered by Prophets; so the same iust God, who liveth and gouerneth all things for euer, doeth in these our times giue victorie, courage, and discourage, raise, and throw downe Kings, Estates, Cities, and Nations, for the same offences which were committed of old, and are committed in the present: for which reason, in these and other the afflictions of I/rael, alwayes 2, Sam. 27.1. the causes are set downe, that they might bee as precedents to succeeding ages. They were punished with famine in Danids time for three yeeres, For Saul and his bloudic house, &c. And David towards his latter end suffred all forts of afflictions. and forrowes in effect, for Vriah. Salomon had tenne tribes of twelve torne from his fonne for his idolatric. Rehobosm was spoyled of his riches and honour by Sefac of Ægypt, because the people of iuda made images, high places, and groues, &c. And because they suffered Sodomites in the land. Ieroboam was punished in himselfe & his posteritie, for the golden Calues that he erected. Ioram had all his sonnes same by the 10 Philistims, and his very bowels torne out of his bodie by an excoriating flix, for murthering his brethren. Abab and lezebel were flaine, the bloud of the one, the bodie of the other eaten with dogs: for the false acculing and killing of Naboth. So also hath God punished the same and the like sinnes in all after-times, and in these our dayes by the fame famine, plagues, warre, loffe, vexation, death, űckneffe, and calamities, howfocuer the wife men of the world raife these effects no higher than to second causes, and such other accidents; which, as being next their eyes and cares, sceme to them to worke enery alteration that happeneth.

Of As A and his Contemporaries.

O Abijah succeeded Asa, who enioved peace for his first ten yeeres, in which time hee established the Church of God, breaking downe the altars dedicated to strange gods, with their images, cutting downe their groues, and taking away their high places. Hee also spared not his owne mother, who was an Idolatresse, but deposing her 2. Chron. 15.16.

from her regencie, brake her Idoll, stampt it, and burnt it. Hee also fortified many Cities, and other places, prouiding (as prouident Kings doe) for the troubles of war 20 in the leafure of peace. For not long after hee was inuaded by Zerah, who then commanded all the Arabians bordering Inlas, and with such a multitude entred the territorie of Asa, as (for any thing that I have read) were never allembled of that Nation, either before or fince. For it is written, that there came against the Iudeans Zerab of Aethiopia, with an hofte of tenne hundred thousand, and three hun- 2. That this Zerah was not an Ethiopian, I have *proved alreadic, & were it but the mer booke c.4. 40 length betweene Athiopia and Indea, & the strong flourishing Regions of Egypt interiacent (who would not fuffer a million of strangers to passe through them ) it $110, 16. were sufficient to make it appear how foolish the opinion is, that these inuaders were Æthiopians. But in that the Scriptures acknowledge that Gerar was belonging to Zerah, and the Cities thereabouts were spoyled by the Iudeans, in following their victorie, as places belonging to Zerah, and that all menknow that Gerar standeth vpon the torrent of Befor, which David past ouer when he surprized the Amalekites or Arabians; this producth sufficiently, that Zerab was leader of the Arabians, and that Ge- 2. Chron. 14 rar was a frontier towne, flanding on the ottermost South-border of all Iudea, from all parts of Æthiopia fixe hundred miles. Also the spoyles which Astooke, as the 50 cattell, Camels, and sheepe, whereof hee sacrificed fine thousand, shew them to bee Arabians adjoyning, and not far off, and not vnknowne A: hiopians. And if it be obieced that these desart countries can hardly yeeld a million of men fit for the wars, I answere, that it is as like that Arabia Petras, and the Desart which compasse two parts of the holy Land, should yeeld ten hundred thousand, as that two tribes of the twelue, should arme five hundred and foure score thousand. Besides, it answer reth to the promise of God to Abraham, that these nations should exceed in number; for God spake it of Ifrael, that hee would make him fruitfull, and multiply him exceedingly, that he should beget twelue Princes, &c.

Baasha a king of Israel began to reignein the third of Asa, and fearing the greatnesse of A/a after his great victorie, entertained Benhadad King of Syria, of the race of Adadezer, to ioyne with him against A/a; and to the end to blocke him vp, hee fortified Rama, which lieth in the way from Ierusalem towardes Sa-

I.Kings 15.

2.Chrox. 16.

This warre began according to the letter of the scriptures in the 36. yeere of A- 12 fa his reigne: but because in the first of Kings the 16. it is said that Baasha died in the 26. yeere of Asa; therefore could not Bassha begin this warre in the 25. of Asa his reigne, but in the 35. yeere of the division of Iuda and Ifrael: for so many vecres it was from the first of Rehoboam, who reigned 17. yeeres, to the 16. of Afa. It may sceme strange, that Asa being able to bring into the field an Armie of fine hundred and foure score thousand good Souldiers, did not cassly drine away Bassha, and defeat him of his purposes, the victories of Abia against Ieroboam, and of Asa himfelte ag iinst Zerah, being yet fresh in minde, which might well have emboldened the men of Iuda, and asmuch disheartened the enemies. Questionlesse there were some important Circumstances, omitted in the text, which caused Asa to fight at this 20 time with money. It may be that the imployment of fo many hundred thousands of hands, in the late service against Zerah, had caused many mens private businesses to lie vndispatched, whereby the people being now intentine to the culture of their lands and other trades, might be vnwilling to firre against the Ifraelites, choosing rather to winke at apparant inconvenience, which the building of Rama would bring vpon them in after-times. Such backwardnesse of the people might have deterred Ala from aducaturing himselfe with the least part of his forces, and committing the successeinto the hands of God. Howsoeuer it were, hee tooke the treasures remaining in the Temple, with which hee waged Benhadad the Syrian against Baasha, whose imployments Benhadad readily accepted, and brake off confederacie with Baasha. For 20 the Israelites were his borderers, and next neighbours, whom neither himselfe (after his inualion) nor his successors after him euer gaue ouer, till they had made themselues masters of that Kingdome. So Benhadad being now entred into Nephthalim, without relistance, he spoyled divers principall Cities thereof, and inforced Baasha to quit Rama, and to leave the same to Asa, with all the materials which he had brought thither, to fortifie the same : which done, Benhadad, who loued neither partie, being loden with the spoiles of Israel, and the treasures of Inda, returned to Damaseus. After this, when Hananithe Prophet reprehended Asa, in that hee now relyed on the ftrength of Syria, and did not rest himselse on the fauour and affistance of God, hee not onely caused Hanani to bee imprisoned, but hee began to burden and oppresse 40 his people, and was therefore strooken with the grienous paines of the gout in his feete, wherewith after he had beene two yeeres continually tormented, hee gauevp the ghost when he had reigned 41. yeeres.

There lived with Ala, Agesilaus the fixt of the Heraclida, and Bacis the fift King of the same race in Corinth, of whom his successors were afterward called Bacida. A-Euseb, in Chron. flartus, and Marimus were Kings in Tyre. Astarimus tooke reuenge on his brother Phelletes, for the murther of Ithobalus Priest of the goddesse Astarta, whom Salomon in dotage worshipped. Aiys and Capys ruled the Latines. Pirithiades and Ophrateus the Affyrians: Terfippus and Phorbas the Athenians: Chemmis reigned in Agypt, who dying in the 36. yeere of Asa, left Cheops his successor, that reigned fiftie lixe yeeres, e- 50

Of the great alteration falling out in the ten Tribes during the raigne of A s A.

Nthe raigne of Ala, the Kingdome of Ilrael felt great and violent commotions, which might haue reduced the ten Tribes vnto their former allegeance to the house of David, if the wisedome of God had not otherwise determined. The wickednesse of Ieroboam had in his latter dayes, the sentence of heavie vengeance layd vpon it, by the mouth of Ahia, the same Prophet which had foretold the division of Israel, for the finne of Salomon, and his raigne over the ten Tribes. One fonne Ieroboam had among others, in whom onely God found so much pietie, as (though it sufficed not to with-hold his wrath from that Family ) it procured vnto him a peaceable end; an honourable testimony of the peoples loue, by their generall mourning and lamentation at his death, and (wherein he was most happie) the fauourable approbation of

After the loffe of this good fonne, the vngodly father was foone taken away: a miserable creature, so conscious of his vile vinthankefulnesse to God, that hee durst 20 not fuffer his owne name to be vied in confulting with an holy Prophet, affured of the ruine hanging ouer him and his, yea, of Gods extreme hatred; yet for bearing to destroy those accursed Idoles that wrought his confusion. So loth hee was to forfake his worldly wisedome, when the world was ready to forsake him, and all belonging to him, his hatefull memory excepted.

Nadab the sonne of Ieroboam, raigned in the second and third yeeres of As, which are reckoned as two yeeres, though indeede his fathers last yeere of two and twentiedid runne along (how farre is vncertaine) with the second of Asa, whose third yeere was the first of Brasha, so that perhaps this Nadabinioyed not his Kingdome 1.King. 15, 25. one whole yeere. He did not alter his fathers courses, neither did God alter his sen-20 tence. It seemes that he little seared the judgements denounced against his fathers house : for as a Prince that was secure of his owne chate, hee armed all Israel against the Philistims, and besieged one of their Townes. There ( whether it were so, that the people were offended with his ill successe, and recalled to minde their grieuous losse of fine hundred thousand vnder Ieroboam, counting it an vnluckie sumilie to the Nation; or whether by some particular indiscretion, hecexasperated them) flaine hee was by Baasha, whom the Armie did willingly accept for King in his stead. Baalba was no sooner proclaimed King, than he began to take order with the house of lerobosm, that none of them might molest him, putting all of them, without mercie, to the sword. That he did this for private respects, and not in regard of Gods 40 will to haue it fo, it is cuident by his continuing in the same forme of Idolatrie which Ieroboam had begunne. Wherefore hee received the same sentence from God that had been layd vpon Ieroboam; which was executed vpon him also in the same fort. Hec beganne to infelt Asa, by fortifying Ramah; but was diverted from thence by the Syrian Benhadad, who did waste his Countrey, destroying all the Land of Nephthalim. Foure and twentie yeeres hee reigned : and then dying, left the Crowne to Elahis fonne; who enjoyed it, as Nadab the fonne of Ieroboam had done, two yeeres currant, perhaps not one compleat.

Ela was as much an idolater as his father : and withall a riotous person. Hee sent an Armie against Gibbethon, the same Towne of the Philistims, before which Nadab 50 the sonne of Ieroboam perished; but he sate at home the whilest, feasting and drinking with his Minions, whereby hee gaue such advantage against himselfe, as was not neglected. Zimri, an ambitious man, remaining with the King at Tirza, finding his Master so dissolute, and his behaniour so contemptible, conceiued hope of the like fortune as Baesha had found, by doing as Eaasha had done. Wherefore he did set vp-on Elain his drunkennesse, and slue him. Presently vpon which fact, he stiled him. felfe King of Ifrael: and began his raigne with maffacring all the house of Baalba; extending his crueltie not onely to his children, and kinsfolke, but vnto all his friends in Tirza. These newes were quickly blowne to the Campe at Gibbethon, where they were not welcommed according to Zimri his expectation. For the Souldiers in flead of proclaiming him King, proclaimed him Traitour; and being led by Omri, whom they faluted King, they (quitting the fiege of Gibbethon) presented themselves before Tirza; which in thort space they may seeme to have forced. Zimri wanting ftrength to defend the Citie, not courage to keepe himselfe from falling alive into his enemies hands, did fet fire on the Palace, consuming it and himselfe together to 10 ashes. Seven dayes he is said to have raigned: accounting (as is most likely) to the time that Omri was proclaimed in the Campe. For Zimri was also an idolater, walking in the way of IEROBOAM; and therfore is likely to have had more time wherin to declare himselfe, than the raigne of seven dayes, and those consumed partly in murchering the friends of Baafha, partly in seeking to have defended his owne life. After the death of Ela, there arose another King to oppose the faction of Omri, wherby it may seeme, that Zimri had made his party strong, as being able to set vp a new head, who doubtleffe would neuer have appeared, if there had not been ready to his hand, some strength, not vnlikely to resist and vanquish the Armie which maintained Omri. How long this Tibni, the new Competitor of Omri, held out, I doe not 20 finde; onely it appeares that his fide was decayed, and so he died, leaving no other Successor than his concurrent.

٥. VI.

A coniccture of the causes hindering the reunion of I/rael with Iuda, which might have been effected by the le troubles.

Ny man that shall consider the state of Israel in those times, may justly wonder how it came to passe, that either the whole Nation, wea- 20 ried with the calamities already fuffered under these unfortunate Princes, and with the present civil warres, did not returne to their ancient Kings, and reunite themselves with the mighty Tribes of Inda

and Beniamin; or that Zimri and Tibni, with their oppressed factions, did not call in A/4, but rather chese the one to endure a desperate necessitie of yeelding, or burning himselfe, the other to languish away, a man for saken: than to have recourse vnto a remedie, so sure, so ready, and so honourable. To say that God was pleased to haue it so, were atrue, but an idle answere (for his secret will is the cause of all things) vnleffe it could be prooued, that he had forbidden A/a to deale in that businesse, as he forbade Rebobeam to force the rebellious people to obedience. That the 40 restraint laid by God vpon Rehoboam, did only binde his hands from attempting the suppression of that present insurrection, it appeares by the Warre continued betweene Ifrael and Inda, so many yeeres following: wherein Abia so farre prevailed, that he wanne a great battaile, and recovered some Townes belonging to the other Tribes, which he annexed to his owne Dominion. Wherefore we may boldly looke into the second causes, mooning the People and Leaders of theten Tribes, to suffer any thing under new upftarts, rather than to caft their eyes upon that Royall house of David, from which the succession of fine Kings in lineall descent, had taken away all imputation, that might formerly have been layd your the meane beginnings thereof: To thinke that Omri had preuented his Competitors, in making peace 50 with Asa, were a conjecture more bold than probable. For Omri was not onely an Idolater, but did worse than all that were before him, which as it might serve alone to proue, that Asa, being a godly King, would not adhere to him, so the course which hee professed to take at the very first, of reuenging the massacre committed vpon

the familie and friends of Basiba, ( Ma his mortall enemie) gives manifest reason, why Zimri, who had wrought that great execution, should more justly than he, hauc expected the friendship of Juda in that quarrell. Wherefore, in searching out the reason of this backwardnesse in the ten tribes (which was such that they may seeme to have never thought vpon the matter) to submit themselves to their true Princes ? it were not amisse to examine the causes, mouing the people to reuenge the death of Ela, an idle drunkard, rather than of Hadab the some of Ieroboam, who followed the warres in person, as a man of spirit and courage. Surely it is apparant, that the very first defection of the ten Tribes, was (if wee looke vpon humane reason) occa-10 fioned by defire of breaking that heavie yoke of bondage wherewith Salomon had galled their neckes. Their desire was to have a King that ihould not oppresse them; notro haue no King at all. And therefore when the arrogant folly of Rehoboam had caused them to renounce him, they did immediatly choose Ieroboam in his flead, as a man likely to affoord that libertie vnto them, for which hee had contended in their behalfe. Neither were they (as it seemes) herein altogether deceined. For his affectation of popularitie appeares in his building of decayed townes, and in the institution of his new deuised idolatry; where hee tolde the people, that it was too much for them, to trauaile so farre as to Ierusalem. But whether it were so, that his moderation, being voluntarie, began to cease, towards the latter end of his reigne, 20 and in the reigne of his sonne, when long time of possession had confirmed his title, which at the first was onely good by courtese of the people: or whether the people (as often happens in such cases) were more offended by some prerogatives of a King that he fill retained in his owne hands, than pleased with his remission of other burdens: it is cleerely apparant, that the whole armic of all Ifrael iouncd with Basha, taking in good part the death of Nadab, and cradication of Ierobeams

Now the reigne of Baa/ha himselfe, was (for ought that remaineth in writing of it) euery way vnfortunate; his labour and cost at Rama was cast away; the other side of his Kingdome harried by the Syrians; neither did hee winne that one towne 30 of Gibbethon from the Philistims, but left that businesse to his sonne, who likewise appeares an unprofitable fluggard. Wherefore it must needes be, that the fauour of the people toward the house of Baashagrew from his good forme of Civill gouernment, which happily he reduced to a more temperate method than Ieroboam cuer meant to doc. And furely hee that shall take paines to looke into those examples, which are extant of the different courses, held by the Kings of Israel and Iuda. in administration of iustice, will finde it most probable, that vpon this ground it was that the ten Tribes continued so auerse from the line of David; as to thinke all aduersitie more tolerable, than the weightie Scepter of that house. For the death of loab and Shimei was indeed by them deserved; yet in that they suffered it without 40 forme of judgement, they suffered like vnto men innocent. The death of Adonyah was both without judgement, and without any crime obiected, other than the Kingsicalousie: out of which by the same rule of arbitrarie instice (vnder which it may be supposed that many were cast away ) he would have slaine Ieroboam ( if hee could have caught him ) before hee had yet committed any offence, as appeares by his confident returne out of Agypt, like one that was knowne to have endured wrong having not offered any.

The like and much more barbarous execution, to wit, without law, lehor am did vpon his brethren, and vpon fundry of his greatest men; as also loafb did so put to death Zachariah, the sonne of Iehoiada, who had made him King, enen in the court of 50 the house of the Lord: and MANASSES did shedinnocent bloud exceeding much till hereplenished lerufalem from corner to corner; and this was imputed to him as another fault; 2. King. 21.16. besides his sinue, wherewith hee made Iuda to sinne. Contrariwise, among the kings of Israel wee finde no monument of such arbitrarie proceeding, vnlesse perhaps the words of lehoram the sonne of Ahab (which were but words) may bee taken for an instance, when hee said, God doe so to mee, and more also, if the head of Elish the Conne of SHAPHAT shall stand on him this day: whereby it is not plaine whether he meant to kill him without more adoe, or to have him condemned as a false prophet, that had made them hold out against the Aramites, till they were faine to eare their owne children, which he thought a sufficient argument to proue, that it was not Gods purpose to deliver them. The death of Naboth sheweth rather the libertie which the Ifraelites enjoyed, than any peremptorie execution of the Kings will. For Naboth did not seare to stand upon his owne right, though Ahab were even sicke for anger, neither was hee for that cause put to death, as vpon commaundement. but made away by conspiracie, the matter being handled after a indiciall forme, to which might give satisfaction to the people, ignorant of the device, though to God it could not.

The murther of the Prophets is continually ascribed to lezabel, an impudent woman, and not vnto the King her husband. Neither is it certaine, that there was no Law made whereby their lines were taken from them; but certaine it is, that the people, being idolaters were both pleafed with their death, and laboured in the execution. So that the doings of the Kings of Inda (fuch as are registred ) producthem to have yfed a more absolute manner of commaund, than the Kings of the tenne Tribes. Neither doe their lufferings witnesse the contrary. For of those which reigmed ouer Juda, from the division of the Kingdome, to the captuity of the ten tribes, 20 three were flaine by the people, and two were denied a place of buriall amongst their ancestors. Yea, the death of Abazia and his brethren, slaine by Iehu, with the destruction of all the Royall feed by Athalia, did not (for ought that we can reade) ftirre vp in the people any such thirst of revenge, as might by the suddennesse and vniformitie tellifie the affection to be generall, and proceeding from a louing remembrance of their Princes; vnlesse we should thinke that the death of sthalia, after feuen veeres reigne, were occasioned rather by the memory of herill purchasing, than by the present sence of her tyrannicall abusing the government, whereon shee had seised. On the other side, such of the Kings of Ifrael as perished by treason (which were feuen of the twentie) were all flaine by conspiracie of the great men, who af-20 pired by treason to the Crowne: the people beeing so farre from embruing their hands in the bloud of their Soueraignes, that (after 2 adab) they did never forbeare to reuenge the death of their Kings, when it lay in their power; nor approoue the good successe of treason, vnlesse feare compelled them. So that the death of two Kings, being throughly revenged vpon other two, namely the death of Ela and Zacharia, vpon Zimri and Shallum, who traiteroufly got and vfurped, for a little while, their places; onely three of the feuen remaine, whose endeshow the people tooke, it may be doubtfull. Though indeede it is precifely faid of the flaughter, committed on Ababs children by Iehu, that the people durft not fight with him that didit, because they were exceedingly afraid: and the same feare might be in them at the death 40 of Peka, whose history (as others of that time) is cursorily passed ouer. The like may be pronounced, and more absolutely, of the Kings of England, that never any of them perished by suric of the people, but by treason of such as did succeed them. neither was there any motiue vrging so forcibly the death of King Edward and King Richard when they were in prison, as feare lest the people should stirre in their quarrell. And certainely (how soener all that the law cals treason, be interpreted, as tending finally to the Kings defirmation) in those treasonable insurrections of the vulgar, which have here most prevailed, the fury of the multitude hath quenched it felfe with the bloud of some great Officers, no such rebellions, how soener wicked and barbarous otherwise, thirsting after the ruine of their natural! Soucraigne, but rather forbearing the advantages gotten vpon his Royall person: which if any man 50 impute vnto grofe ignorance, another may more charitably, and I thinke, more truely, ascribe to a reverent affection. Wherefore that fable of Briareus, who, becing loofened by Pallas, did with his hundred hands give affiftance to Iupiter, when all the rest of the Gods conspired against him, is very fitly expounded by Sir Francis Bacon, as fignifying, that Monarches neede not to feare any courbing of their abfoluteneffe by mightic subjects, as long as by wisedome they keepe the hearts of the people, who will bee fure to come in on their fide. Though indeede the Storie might very well have borne the same interpretation, as it is rehearsed by Homer, who tels vs that Pallas was one of the conspiracie, and that Thetis alone did marre all their practice, by loofening Briareus. For a good forme of gouernment sufficeth by it selfe to retaine the people, not onely without affishance of a laborious Wit, but even against all devices of the greatest and shrewdest politicians: e-10 pery Sherife and Constable, being sooner able to arme the multitude, in the Kings behalfe, than any ouer-weening Rebell how mightie foeuer, can against

This declaration of the peoples love, being seldome found in Inda, makes it very likely, that the rule it selfe of gouernment there was such, as neither gaue occasion of contentment vnto the subjects, nor of confidence in their good affection, to the Kings. Vpon which reasons it may seeme that the multitude was kept vsually disarmed. For otherwife it would have beene almost in possible, that Athalia the sister of Ahab, a stranger to the royall bloud of Iuda, thould by the onely authoritie of a Queene mother have destroyed all the seede of David, and vsurped the Kingdome very necre seuen yeeres without finding any resistance. Yea when Iehoiada the 20 high Priest had agreed with the Captaines and principall men of the land to set vp Ioall their lawfull King, whereunto the whole nation were generally well affected; hee was faine to give to these Captaines and their men, the (peares and the shields that were King DAVIDS, and were in the house of the Lord. But we neede not enter into such particulars. Questionlesse, the Tribes which thought obedience to their Princes to be a part of their dutie toward God, would endure much more with patience, than they which had Kings of their owne choice or admission, holding the Crowne by a more vncertaine tenure.

And this, in my opinion, was the reason, why the tenne tribes did neuer seeke to 30 returne to their ancient Lords: but after the destruction of their sixe first Kings, which died in the reigne of Aa, admitted a seuenth of a new family, rather than they would consubject themselves, with those of Inda and Beniamis, vnder a more honourable, but more heavie yoke.

180, As having seene the death of seven kings of Ifrael, died himselfe after one and fourtie yeeres reigne, leaning Ichofaphat his sonne to deale with Ahab the son of Omri, who was the eight King ouer the tenne tribes.

Of I EHOSAPHAT and his contem-

EHOSAPHAT, who succeeded Asa, was a Prince religious and happic; hee destroyed all the Groues, Altars, and high places dedicated to idolatrie, and fent fearchers to all places and people wanting instruction; hee recouered the Tribute due vnto him by the Arabians and Philistims: from the one hee had filuer, from the other sheepe and goates to the number of fifteene thousand 50 and foure hundred. The numbers of his men of warre were more than admirable: for it is written that Adnah had the commaund of three hun- 2.cbron.17. dred thousand, lehohanam of two hundred and fourescore thousand, and Amasia of two hundred thousand; also that hee had, besides these, in Beniamin of those that bare shields, which wee call Targetiers, and of Archers under Eliada

two hundred thousand, and under the commaundement of Ichozabad a hundred and fourescore thousand: which numbred together, make cleuen hundred and fixtie thousand, all which are saide to have waited vpon the King, besides his

That Iuda and Beniamin, a territoric not much exceeding the Countie of Kent. should muster eleuen hundred and tixtie thousand fighting men, it is very strange, and the number farre greater than it was found vpon any other view. Ioab in Dawids time found fine hundred thousand : Rehoboam found but an hundred and fourescore thousand: Abia source hundred and eight thousand: As fine hundred and foure-score thousand: Amaziab involled all that could beare armes, and they a- 10 mounted to three hundred thousand: Vzziab three hundred and seuen thousand and fine hundred. Surely, whereas it is written that when newes was brought to leho aphat that Moab and Ammon were entred his territorie to the West of lordan, and that their numbers were many, hee feared (to wit) the multitude, it is not likely that hee would have feared even the armie of Xerxes, if hee could have brought into the field cleuen hundred and three-score thousand fighting men, leaning all his strong Cities manned. I am therefore of opinion (referring my selfe to better judgement) that these numbers specified in the second of Chronicles the feuenteenth, distributed to seuerall leaders, were not all at one time, but that the three hundred thousand under Adnah, and the two hundred and soure-score 20 thousand under Iehohanam, were afterward commaunded and mustered by Amasiah, Eliada, and Ieholabad: for the groffe and totall is not in that place fet downe. as it was under the other Kings formerly named. Againe as the aydes which leholaphas brought to Abab did not shew that he was a Prince of extraordinarie power, so the Moabites and Ammonites which hee feared could neuer make the one halfe of those numbers, which hee that commaunded least among Iehoshaphats leaders had vnder him.

This mightie Prince notwith standing his greatnesse, yet he loyned in friendship with Abab King of Ifrael, who had married that wicked woman Iezabel. Him Iofa- . phat visited at Samaria, and caused his sonne Ioram to matrie Athalia, this Achabs 20

Abab perswaded losaphat to assist him in the warre against the Syrians, who held the Citic of Ramoth Gilead from him, and called together foure hundred of his Prophets, or Baalites to foretell the successe: who promised him victorie. But lehofaphat beleeved nothing at all in those diviners, but resolved first of all to conferre with some one Prophet of the Lord God of Israel. Heercupon Achab made answere that hee had one called Michaiah, but hee hated that Prophet, because hee alwayes foretolde of cuill, and neuer of any good towards him. Yet fent for Michaiah was to the King but by the way the messenger prayed him to consent with the rest of the Prophets : and so promise victorie unto them as they did. But 40 Michaigh spakethetruth, and repeated his vision to both Kings, which was that God asked who shall perswade AHAB, that hee may goe up and fall at Ramoth Gilead? to whom a spirit that stood before the Lord answered, that hee would enter into his prophets, and bee in them a false spirit to delude. For asit is said by Christ: Non enim vos estis qui loquimini , sed firitus patris vestri loquitur in vobis: It is not you that speake, but the spirit of your father speakes in you: so in a contrarickinde did the deuill in the prophets of Baal, or Satan, incourage Achab to his deftruction. And as P. Martir vpon this place well obserueth, these cuill spirits are the ministers of Gods vengeance, and are vied as the hangmen and tormentors, which Princes sometime imploy. For asit pleaseth God by his good Angels, to saue and deliuer from destruction, of which the Scriptures have many examples: so on the 50 contrarie, it is by the euill that he punisheth and destroyeth, both which are said to performe the will of their Creator licet non codem animo. Ecclesiasticus remembretha fecond fort of malignant natures, but they are cuery-where vifible. There are spirits, faith he, created for vengeance, which in their rigourlay on fure strokes. In the time of destruction they shew foorth their power, and accomplish the wrath of him that made them.

Now Michaias hauing by this his reuclation greatly displeased the King, and the Prophets whose spirit hee discouered, was strooken by Ziakiah one of Baals prophets, and by Achab himselfe committed to prison: where he appointed him to be referued and fed with bread of affliction till he returned in peace. But Michaiab, not fearing to reply, answered, If thou returns in peace, the Lord hathnot spoken by me. Neuerthelesse Achab went on in that warre, and was wounded to death. Icho-10 Saphat returned to Ierusalem, where he was reprehended by Iehu the Prophet for affifting an idolatrous Prince, and one that hated God.

CHAP.19. S.5.

After this the Aramites or Damascens, joyned with the Mosbites, Ammonites and Idumaans to inuade Iudea: who passe Iordan and encampe at Engaddi, and when Iehosaphat gathered his armie, the Prophet Ithaziel foretolde him of the victorie. which should bee obtained without any bloud shed of his part : and so when leholaphat approached, this affembly of nations, the Ammonites and Moabites, disagreeing with the Idumaans, and quarrelling for some causes among themselues, those of Ammon and Moab fet vpon the Idumeans, and brake them vtterly: which done they also inuaded each other; in which broile Iehosaphat arriving tooke the spoile of 2.chron.10. 30 them all without any losse of his part, as it was foretold and promised by God. Notwithstanding this victorie, Ichofaphat forgetting that hee was formerly reprehended for affifting an Idolatrous King, did not with standing ioyne with Ochazias, the some of Achab, in preparing a Fleet to send to Ophir, hoping of the like returne which Salemon had : but as Eliezor the Prophet foretold him, his shippes perished and were broken in the port of Ezion Giber, and so that enterprize was over- 2, Chron, 20.

Yet hee taketh part with Ichoram the brother of Ochazias, against the Moabites, with which Kings of Inda and Ifrael the Edomites joyne their forces, not forgetting, it feemes, that the Moabites, affilted by the Ammonites, had not long before destroyed 30 their armie.

The Moabites, subjects to David and Salomon, for saking the Kings of Inda, gave themselues for vassals to Ieroboam, and so they continued to his successors till the death of Achab: but Iehofaphat, notwithstanding the Idolatric of his Colleague, vet asit feemeth, he was drawne into this warre both to bee auenged of the Mabites for their defection from Inda to Ifrael, as also because they had lately toyned themselves with the Syrians against Iofaphat, and thirdly, to punish their double rebellion who first forfooke Iuda and now Ifrael.

Both Kingsresolued to passe by the way of Idumea, thereby the better to assure that nation, for wee finde that both Mond, Ammon and Edom were all in the field 40 together at Engaddi against Iehosaphat: But whether they had then declared themsclues against lehosaphat, it is not certaine, for in the 2.0f Chronicles. 11. verf. 8. it is written that in the time of Iehoram, the sonne of Iehosaphat, Edom rebeiled, and therefore it seemeth to mee that the Edomstes, when they were slaine by Moab and Ammon, not finding themselves satisfied in such conditions as they required, offered to turne from them, and to joyne themselves with the armie of Inda. For that they were numbred among the enemies of Iosaphat, it is plaine in the 2. of Chron. the 20. and as plaine 6. 2. v. 8. that they were not declared, nor had made them a King, till Icholaphats death. Now in the passage of these Kings towards Moab, whether it were by the extraordinarie heat of the yeere, or whether the Idumeans ha-50 uing a purpole to rebell, missed the armic of Inda and Israel with intent to infeeble them for want of water; true it is, that they suffered the same, if not a greater thirst than the armies of Crassus and M. Antonius did in their Parthian expeditions; and had, in all likelihood, veterly perished, had not Elishataught them to the trenches whereinto the water fprang, by which not onely Ichosaphat and his arme, bur Y y 2

EHORAM the sonne of Ichosaphat King of Iuda began to reigne at thirtie two yeares of age, and lived vntill hee was fourtie veeres olde, being eight veeres a King: but of these eight veeres, which lehoram is saide to have reigned, foure are to bee reckoned in the life of his father, who going to the Syrian warre with Ahab, left this leboram King in his stead, as Abab did his sonne Abazia. This appeares by the seuerall beginnings, which are given in Scripture to the two tehorams kings 40 of Ifrael and Inda, and to Abazia the eldest sonne of A-

hab. For Abazia is saide to have begun his reigne, in the seuenteenth yeare of Iehosaphat. Iehoram the brother of Ahazia succeeded him in the second vecre of IEHORAM the some of IEHOSAPHAT King of Inda, that is, in the next veere after that lehoram of Iuda was deligned king by his father; it being (as wee finde elsewhere) the eighteenth yeere of IEHOSAPHAT himselfe, who went with the Israelite against Moab. Hecreby it appeares that the full power and execution of the royall office was retained fill by Iehofaphat, who governed absolutely by himselfe, not communicating the rule with his sonne. But in the fift yeare of I E-HORAM King of Ifrael, which was the two and twentieth of Iehefsphat, the olde to King tooke vnto him, as partner in the Gouernement, this his eldeft lonne, who was at that time thirtie two yeeres olde, his Father being fiftie feuen. Now forasmuch as I EHOSAPHAT reigned twentie fine yeeres, it is cuident that his sonne did not reigne alone till the eighth of Isram King of Israel. The like regard is to bee had in accounting the times of other Kings of Iuda and Israel, who did not alwayes reigne precifely folong as the bare letter of the text may feeme at first to affirme: but their vecres were fometimes compleat, fometimes onely current, fometimes confounded with the yeares of their fuccessors or foregoers, and must therefore be found by comparing their times with the yeeres of those others, with whom they did be-

It were perhaps a thing leffe needfull than curious, to enquire into the reasons mooning lehofaphat either to assume vnto him his some as partner in the Kingdome. whilest he was able himselfe to command both in peace and in warre, the like hauing neuer beene done by any of his progenitors, or having once (in the seventeenth of his reigne) vouchfated vnto him that honour, to refume it vnto himfelte, or at leaftwife to deferre the confirmation of it, vntill fourcor fine yeeres were passed. Yet forasmuch as to enter into the examination of these passages, may be a meane to find fome light, whereby we may more cleerely discouer the causes of much extraordinary butinesse ensuing, I hold it not amisse to make such coniecture, as the circumflances of the Storie briefly handled in the Scriptures may seeme to approoue:

Wee are therefore to confider, that this King Ieho (aphat was the first of Rehoboams iffue that ever entred into any fireight league with the Kings of the ten Tribes. All that reigned in Iuda before him, had with much labour and long warre, tired them-10 feliues in vaine, making small profit of the greatest advantages that could be wished. Wherefore Ieho (aphas thought it the wifest way, to make a league offensive and defenfiue betweene Ifrael and Iuda, whereby each might enion their owne in quiet.

This confederacie made by a religious King, with one that did hate the Lord, action 19.0.2. could not long prosper, as not issuing from the true roote and fountaine of all wisedome: yet as a piece of found policie, doubtlesse it wanted not faire pretences of much common good thereby likely to arife, with mutuall fortification of both those kingdomes, against the uncircumcifed nations their ancient enemies. This apparant benefit, being fo inestimable a iewell, that it might not easily be lost, but continue as hereditarie from father to sonne, it was thought a very good course to haue it confirmed 30 by some sure bond of affinitie, and thereupon was Athatia the daughter of Omriand fifter of Abab King of Ifrael, given in marriage to Iehoram, who was sonne and heire apparant to the King of Iudi. This Ladie was of a masculine spirit, and had learned so much of Queene lezabel her brothers wife, that she durst vndertake, and could throughly perform a great deale more in Ierusalem, than the other knew how to compasse in Samaria. Shee was indeede a fire-brand, ordained by God to consume a great part of the noblest houses in Iuda, and perhaps of those men or their children. whose worldly wisedome, regardlesse of Gods pleasure, had brought her in.

The first fruits of this great league, was the Syrian warre at Ramoth Gilead, wherein Iuda and Israel did aduenture equally, but the profit of the victorie should have 40 redounded wholly to Abab: as godly Princes very seldome thriue by matching with Idolators, but rather serue the turnes of those false friends, who being ill affected to God himselfe, cannot be well affected to his servants. Before their setting foorth Ahab defigned, as King, his fonne Ahazia; not fo much perhaps in regard of the vicertaine cuents of warre ( for none of his predecessors had cuer done the like vpon the like occasions) nor as fearing the threatnings of the Prophet Micaia (for he despised them) as inuiting Iehosaphat by his owne example, to take the same course, wherein he preuailed.

ø. II.

Probable contectures of the motiues inducing the old King I E H O-SAPHAT to change his purpose often, in making his Conne I EHORAM King.

Any arguments doe very strongly prooue Tehoram to have beene wholy ouer-ruled by his wife; especially for his for faking the religion of his godly Ancestors, and following the abominable superstitions of the godly Ancestors house of Achab.

That she was a woman of intolerable pride, and abhorring to line a private life, the whole course of her actions witnesseth at large. Much vaine matter shee was able to produce, whereby to make her husband thinke that his brethren and kindred were but meane and vnworthy persons in comparison of him, and of his children, which were begotten vpon the daughter and fifter of two great Kings, not vpon base women and meere subjects. The Court of Ahab, and his famous victories obtained against the Syrian Benhadad, were matter sufficient to make an infolent man thinke highly of himselfe, as being allied so honorably; who could otherwise haue found in his heart well enough, to despise all his brethren, as being the eldeft, and heire apparent to the Crowne, whereof alreadie he had, in a man- 20 ner, the possession.

How soone his vices brake out, or how long hee dissembled them and his idolatrous religion, it cannot certainely be knowne. Like enough it is, that some smoke, out of the hidden fire, did very soone make his fathers eyes to water ; who thereupon caused the young man to know himselfe better, by making him fall backe into ranke among his yonger brethren. And furely the doings of teholaphat about the same time, argue no small distemper of the whole country, through the misgouernment of his vigodly sonne. For the good old King was faine to make his progresse round about the land, reclaiming the people vnto the service of God, and appointing 2. cbron. 19. 2.4. Indges throughout all the firong Cities of Inda Citie by Citie. This had beene a needleffe 20 labour, if the religion taught and strongly maintained by Asa, and by himselfe, had not suffered alteration, and the course of Iuslice beene peruerted, by the power of fuch as had borne authoritie. But the necessitie that then was of reformation, ap-Beares by the charge which the King did giue to the Indges; and by his commission giuen to one of the priestes in spirituall causes, and to the steward of his house in temporall matters, to be generall ouerfeers.

This was not till after the death of Abazia the sonne of Abab; but how long afterit is vncertaine. For lehoram the brother of Ahazia beganne his reigne (as hath beene alreadie noted) in the eighteenth of lebolaphat, which was then accounted the second of lehoram, lehofaphats sonne, though afterward this lehoram 40 of Inda had another first and second yeere, even in his fathers time, before hee reigned alone; as the best Chronologers and expositors of the holy text agree. So hee continued in private estate, vntill the two and twentieth of his fathers reigne, at which time, though the occasions inducing his restitution to former dignitie are not set downe, yet wee may not thinke, that motives thereto, appearing substantiall, were wanting. Tehoram of Ifrael held the same correspondencie with Iehofaphat that his father had done; and made vie of it. Hee drewe the Indean into the watre of Mosb, at which time it might well bee, that the young Prince of Inda was againe ordained King by his father, as in the Syman expedition hee had beene. Or if wee ought rather to thinke, that the preparations for the enterprize against Moab did not occupie so much time, as from the eighteenth of 1e-50 hosaphat, in which yeere that nation rebelled against Israel, vnto his two and twentieth; yet the dailie negotiations betweene the two Kings of Inda and Israel, and the affinitie betweene them contracted in the person of Ichoram,

might offer some good occasions thereunto. Neither is it certaine how the behaniour of the yonger sonnes, in their elder brothers disgrace, might cause their Father to put him in possession for seare of tumult after his death; or the deepe diffimulation of Iehoram himselfe might winne the good opinion both of his Father and Brethren; it being a thing viuall in mischieuous fell natures, to be as abiect and seruile in time of aduersitie, as infolent and bloudy vpon aduantage. This is manifest, that being repossessed of his former estate, hee demeaned himselfe in such wise towards his brethren, as caused their Father to enable them, not onely with store of silver, and of gold, and of precious things, (which kinde of liberality other Kings doubtleffe had 2.chrom. 21.2. 10 vied vato their yonger fonnes) but with the custody of fireng Cities in Iuda, to affure them, if it might have been by vnwonted means, against vnwonted perils.

d. III.

The doings of IEHORAM when he reigned alone; and the rebellion of Edom and Libna.

Vrall this providence availed nothing; for an higher providence had otherwise determined of the sequele. When once the good old man, their Father, was dead, the yonger fonnes of Ichofaphat found frong Cities, a weake defence, against the power of him to whom the Citizens were obedient. If they came in vpon the summons of the King their brother, then had bee them without more adoe; if they flood vpon their guard, then were they Traitors, and so vnable to hold out against him, who besides his owne power, was able to bring the forces of the Ifraelitifh Kingdome against them, so that the apparant likely hood of their finall ouerthrow, sufficed to make all for fake them in the very beginning. How socuer it was, they were all taken and slain, and with them for company many great men of the Land; fuch belike, as either had 30 taken their part, when the Tyrant fought their lines, or had been appointed Rulers of the Countrie, when Ichoram was deposed from his Gouernment; in which Office they, without forbearing to doe inflice, could hardly avoide the doing of many things, derogatory to their yong Matter, which if he would now call treason, saying that he was then King, who durft fay the contrary?

After this, Iehoram tooke vpon him, as being now Lord alone, to make innountions in Religion: wherein he was not contented as other Idolatrous Princes, to give way and fale conduct vnto Superfittion and Idolatric, nor to provoke and encourage the people to that sinne, whereto it is wonderfull that they were so much and eted, having such knowledge of God, and of his detelling that above all other sinnes; but 40 he vied compulsion, and was (if not the very first) the first that is registred, to have fer up Irreligion by force.

Whilest he was thus busied at home, in doing what hee lifted, the Edomites his Tributaries rebelled against him abroad; and having hitherte, fince Danistime, been gouerned by a Viceroy, did now make vnto themselues a King. Against these Leberam in person made an expedition, taking along with him his Princes, and all his Chariots, with which hee obtained victory in the field compelling the Rebels to flie into their places of aduantage, whereof he forced no one, but went away contented with the honourthat hee had gotten in beating and killing some of those whom hee should have subdued, and kept his servants. Now began the prophecie 50 of Isac to take effect, wherein hee fore-told, that Esau in processe of time should breake the yoke of Iacob. For after this the Edomites could never be reclaimed by any of the Kings of Inda, but held their owne fo well, that when, after many civill and forraine warres, the Ienes by fundry Nations had beene brought low; Santipater the Edomite, with Herod his Sonne, and others of that race following them, became Lords of the lewes, in the decrepit age of Ifrael, and raigned as Kings, euen in

Jerufalem it felfe. The freedome of the Edomites, though purchased somewhat dearly, encouraged Libna. a great Citie within Inda, which in the time of Issua had a peculiar King, to rebell against lehoram, and let it selfe at libertic. Libna stood in the confines of Baniamin and of Dan, farre from the affiftance of any bordering enemies to Inda, and therefore so vnlikely it was to have maintained it selfe in libertie, that it may seeme strange how it could escape from vtter destruction, or at the least from some terrible vengeance, most likely to have been taken, by their powerfull, cruell, and throughly incenfed Lord. The Ifraelite held such good intelligence at that time with Inda, 10 that he would not have accepted the Towne, had it offered it selfe vnto him: neither doe we reade that it fought how to cast it selfe into a new subjection, but continued a free chate. The rebellion of it against lehoram, was, Because he had for saken the Lord God of his Fathers; which I take to have not onely beene the first and remote cause, but even the next and immediate reason, mooning the inhabitants to doe as they did : for it was a Towne of the Leuites : who must needs be driven into great extremities, when a religion contrary to Gods Law, had not onely some allowance to countenance it by the King, but compulsive authority to force vnto it all that were vnwilling. As for the vie of the Temple at Ierusalem (which being deuout men they might feare to lose by this rebellion) it was neuer denied to those of the ten renolted 20 Tribes by any of the Religious Kings, who rather inuited the Ifraelites thither, and gaue them kinde entertainement: vnder Idolaters they must have beene without it whether they lived free or in subjection. Yet it seemes that private reasons were not wanting, which might moue them rather to doe than to fuffer that which was vnwarrantable. For in the generall visitation before remembred, wherein kbolaphat reformed his Kingdome, the good old King appointing new Gouernours. and giving them especiall charge to doe instice without respect of persons, ysed these wordes. The Leuites shall bee Officers before you; Bee of good courage, and doest, and the Lord shall be with the good. By these phrases, it seemes, that hee encouraged them against the more powerfull, than iust proceedings of his sonne; whom if the Leuises 20

But it seemes that of these great numbers which his Father could have levied, 40 there were not many whom Ichoram could well truft; and therefore perhaps hec thought it an easier losse, to let one Towne goe, then to put weapons into their handes, who were more likely to follow the example of Libra, than to punish it. So desperate is the condition of Tyrants, who thinking it a greater happinesse to be feared, than to be loued; are faine themselves to stand in feare of those, by whom did (according to the trust reposed in them) neglect in discharging their dueties, likely it is that he meant to be even with them, and make them now to feele, as many Princes of the Land had done, his heavie indignation. How it happened that Libra was not hereupon destroyed, yea, that it was not (for ought that wee can reade) fo much as befreged or molested, may justly seeme very strange. And the more strange it is in regard of the mighty Armies which Iebofaphat was able to raife, being fufficient to have ouer-whelmed any one Towne, and buried it under the earth, which they might in one moneth haue cast into it with shouells, by ordinary they might have been dreadfull vnto others.

of the miseries falling upon IEHORAM, and of his death.

Hele afflictions not sufficing to make any impression of Gods displeafure in the minde of the wicked Prince; a Prophecie in writing was deliuered vnto him, which threatned both his people, his children, his wines, and his owne body. Hereby likewise it appeares that hee was a cruell Perfecutor of Gods feruants; in as much as the Prophets durst not reprouchim to his face, as they had done many of his Predecessors, both good and cuill Kings, but were faine to denounce Gods judgements against him by letters, keeping themselues close and farre from him. This Epistle is saide to haue 2, chron. 21, 12. beene sent unto him from Elias the Prophet. But Elias was translated, and Elizeus prophecied in his stead before this time, even in the dayes of Ieliosaphat. Wherefore 2.Kin.e.2.and it may be that Elias left this prophecie in writing behinde him, or that (as fome conjecture) the errour of one letter in writing, was the occasion that wee reade Elias for Elizew. Indeedcany thing may rather bee beleeved than the Tradition held by some of the lewish Rabbins, that Elias from heaven did send this Epistle; a tale somewhat like to the fable of our Ladies letters, deuised by Erasmus, or of the Verse that 20 was fent from heaven to S. Giles. But who focuer was the Author of this threatning Epifle, the accomplishment of the prophecie was as terrible, as the sentence. For the Philissims and Arabians brake into Iudea, and tooke the Kingshouse, wherein they found all, or many of his children, and wives, all which they flew, or carried away, with great part of his goods. These Philistims had not prefumed fince the time of David, to make any offensiue warre till now; for they were by him almost consumed, and had lost the best of their Townes, maintaining themselues in the rest of their small Territoric, by defensive armes, to which they were constrained at Gibbethon by the Ifraelites. The Arabians were likely to haue beene then as they are now, a naked people, all horse-30 men, and ill appointed; their Countrie affording no other furniture, than fuch as might make them fitter to robbe and spoile in the open fields, than to offend strong Cities such as were thicke set in Inda. True it is that in ages long after following they conquered all the South parts of the world then knowne, in a very short space of time, destroying some, and building other some very stately Cities. But it must be considered; that this was when they had learned of the Romanes the Art of Warre; and that the prouisions which they found, together with the Arts which they learned, in one subdued Prouince, did make them able and skilfull in pursuing their conquest, and going onward into Regions farre removed from them. At this day having lost in effect all that they had gotten, such of them as live in Arabia it selfe 40 are good horsemen, but ill appointed, very dangerous to passengets, but vnable to deale with good Souldiers, as riding flarke naked, and rather trulling in the swiftnes of their horses, than in any other meanes of relittance, where they are well opposed. And fuch, or little better, may they seeme to have beene, that spoiled sudaa in the time of Ieheram. For their Countrie was alwayes barraine and defert, wanting manuall Arts whereby to supply the naturalls with furniture: neither are these bands named as chiefe in that action, but rather adherents of the Philistims. Out of this we may inferre, that one halfe, yea or one quarter of the numbers found in the least muster of Iuda and Beniamin under Iehosaphat (wherein were inrolled three hundred and eightie thousand fighting men ) had beene enough to have driven away farre 50 greater forces than these enemies are likely to have brought into the field, had not the people beene vnable to deale with them, for lacke of weapons, which were now kept from them by their Princes iclousie, as in Sauls time by the policie of the

It may feeme that the house of the King which these inuaders tooke, was not his Palace in Ierusalem, but rather some other house of his abroad in the Countrie. where his wives and children at that time lay for their recreation: because we reade not that they did facke the Citic, or spoyle the Temple, which would have inuited them as a more commodious bootie, had they got possession thereof. Yet perhaps they tooke Terusalem it selfe by surprize, the people being disarmed, and the Kings guards too weake to keepe them out; yet had not the courage to hold it, because it was so large and populous; and therefore having done what spoyle they could, with-drew themselves with such purchase as they were able safely to conucigh

The flaughter committed by Iehu vponthe two and fortic brethren of Ahazia, 10 or (as they are called elfewhere) fo many of his brothers Sonnes, and the cruell massacre wherein all the Royall seede perished (onely loss excepted ) under the tvrannic of Athalia, following within two yeeres after this invalion of the Philistims. and Arabians, make it sceme probable, that the sounces of Ichoram were not all slaine at once, but that rather the first murther begaune in his owne time, and was seconded by many other heavie blowes, wherewith his house was incessantly firiken, vn-tillit was in a manner quite hewed downe.

After these calamities, the hand of God was extended against the bodie of this wicked King, smiting him with a gricuous disease in his bowels, which left him not untill his guts fell out, and his wretched foule departed from his miferable carcaffe. 20 The people of the Land, as they had small cause of comfort in his life, so had they nor the good manners to pretend forrow for his death; wherefore he was denied a place of buriall among his Ancestors the Kings of Inda, though his owne sonne succeeded him in the Kingdome, who was guided by the same spirits that had beene his Fathers euill Angels. Athalia had other matters to trouble her head, than the pompous enterring of a dead husband. Shee was thinking how to provide for the future, to maintaine her owne greatnesse, to retaine her fauourites in their authoritie, and to place about her Sonne such Counsellours, of the house of A H A B, as were fittelt for her turne. Wherefore shee thought it vnscasonable to make much a-doe about a thing of nothing, and offend the peoples eyes, with a flately funerall of a 30 man by them detested: but rather chose to let the blame of things passed bee layd vpon the dead, than to procure an ill opinion of her selfe and hers, which it now did concerne her to avoide. Such is the quality of wicked Infligators, having made greedie vse of bad imployments, to charge, not only with his owne vices, but with their faults also, the man whose euill inclinations their sinister counsailes haue made worse, when once hee is gone, and can profit them no longer. The death of Ichor and fell out indeede in a busie time; when his friend and cousin the Ifraelite, who had the same name, was entangled in a difficult warre against the Aramite; and therefore could have had no better leifure to helpe Athalia, in fetting of things according to her owne minde, than he had (perhaps through the same hinderance) to helpe her huf- 40 band, when he was distressed by the Philistims. Yearather hee needed and craued the affiftance of the men of Iuda, for the taking in of Ramoth Gilead, where they had not feed fo well the last time, that they should willingly runne thither againe, vnlesse they were very fairely intreated.

The acts of this wicked man I have thought good to handle the more particularly (pursuing the examination of all occurrences, as farre as the circumstances remembred in holy Scripture, would guide me by their directions) to the end that it might more plainely appeare, how the corrupted affections of men, impugning the reucaled will of God, accomplish neuerthelesse his hidden purpose, and without miraculous meanes, confound themselves in the seeming wise devices of their owne 50 folly: as likewise to the end that all men might learne, to submit their indgements to the ordinance of God, rather than to thinke, that they may fafely dispense with his commandements, and follow the prudent conceits which worldly wisedome dictateth vnto them. For in such kinde of unhappie subtilties, it is manifest that Athalia was able to furnish both her Husband and her Sonne, but the issue of them partly hath appeared alreadie, and partly will appeare, in that which immediately followeth.

Q. V. Of theraigne of AHAZIA, and his businesse with the King of Israel.

CHAZIAS, Or Abazia, the fonne of Ieheram and Athalia, beganne his raigne ouer Inda in the twelfth yeere of leboram, the lonne of Abab King of Israel, and raigned but that one yeere. Touching his age, it is a point of more difficultie than importance to know it; yet hath it bred much disputation, whereof I see no more probable conclu-fion, than that of Torniellus, alleaging the Edition of the Sevinagint at Rome, Anno Domini 1588. which faith that hee was twentie yeeres old in the beginning of his Kingdome, and the Annotations thereupon, which cite other Copies, that give him two yeeres more. Like enough bee is to have beene yong: for hee was governed by his Mother, and her Ministers, who gaue him counsaile by which hee perished. In matter of Religion he altered none of his Fathers courses. In matter of State, he likewife vp. held the league made with the house of Abab. Hee was much 30 buffed in doing little, and that with ill successe. He accompanied his Coulin the Ifraelite against Ramoth Gilead, which they wanne, but not without blowes; for the Aramites fought so well, that the King of Ifrael was faine to aduenture his owne perfon, which scaped not vinwounded. The Towne being wonne was manned strongly, in expectation of some attempt likely to bee made by Hazael king of Aram: which done, leboram King of I/rael with drew himselse to the Citic of Izreel, where with more quiet hee might attend the curing of his woundes; and Ahazia returned to lerufalem. It seemes that hee was but newly come home (for hee raigned in all scantly one yeere, whereof the former expedition, with the preparations for it, had 30 taken vp a great part ) when bee made anew journey, as it were for good manners sake, to visit the King of Ifrael, who lay forc of his woundes. Belike Athalia was brewing some new plots, which his presence would have hindred, and therefore fought enery occasion to thrust him abroad for otherwise it was but a vaine piece of worke fo to leaue his kingdome, having no other businesse than by way of complement to goe see one whom hee had seene yesterday. Certaine it is that the Lord had resolved at this time to put in execution that heavie judgement, which hee had laid by the mouth of Elias the Prophet vpon the house of Ahib. And heercunto at this time had bee disposed not onely the concurrence of all other things, which in mans eyes might seeme to have beene accidentall; but the very thoughts and affe-40 ctions of fuch persons, as intended nothing lesse than the fulfilling of his high pleasure. Of these Athalia doubtlesse was one; whose mischieuous purposes it will (hortly beeneedfull for explanation of some difficulties arising, that wee diligently consider and examine.

Q. VI.

How AHAZIA perished with the bouse of AHAB: and how that Familie was destroyed by IEHV.

He whole Armie of Ifrael, with all the principall Captaines lying in Ramoth Gilead, a Disciple of Elizem the Prophet came in among the Captaines that were litting together, v ho calling out from among them Ichu, a principall man, tooke him apart, and anointed him King ouer Ifrael, rehearing vnto him the prophecie of Elias against the house of Ahab, and letting him vnderstand that it was the pleasure of God to make him exccutioner of that sentence. The falhion of the Messenger was such as bred in the Captaines a desire to know his errand, which Iehu thought meete to let them know, as doubting whether they had ouer-heardall the talke or no. When hee had acquainted them with the whole matter, they made no delay, but foorth-with proclaimed him King. For the prophecie of Elias was well knowne among them, neither durst any one oppose himselfe against him, that was by God ordained to per-

Ichu, who had voon the fudden this great honour throwne voon him, was nor flow to put himselfe in possession of it, but vied the first heate of their affections who to iouned with him, in fetting on foote the businesse which neerely concerned him. and was not to be fore-flowed, being no more his owne than Gods.

The first care taken was that no newes of the revolt might bee carried to Izreel. whereby the King might have had warning either to fight or flee: this being forcseene, hee marched swiftly away, to take the Court while it was yet secure. King teheram was now to well recovered of his wounds, that he could endure to ride abroad, for which cause it seemes that there was much seasting, and joy made, especially by Queene Iezabel, who kept her flate fo well, that the brethren of Abazia comming thither at this time, did make it as well their errand to falute the Queene, Certaine it is that fince the rebellion of Moab against Ifrael, the house of Abab did neuer so much flourish as at this time. Seventy Princes of the bloud Royall there were that lived in Samaria; Ichoram the sonne of Queene Iezabel had wonne Ramoth Gilead, which his Father had attempted in vaine, with loffe of his life; and he wonne it by valiant fight, wherein he received wounds, of which the danger was now past, but the honour likely to continue. The amitic was so great betweene Ifrael and Inda, that it might suffice to dauntall their common enemies, leaving no hope of successe, to any rebellious enterprizer: so that now the prophecie of Elias might be forgotten; or no otherwise remembred, than as an unlikely tale by them that be cold the maiefticall face of the Court, wherein fo great a friend as the King of 20 Inda was entertained, and fortie Princes of his bloud expected.

In the midft of this securitie, whilest these great Estates were (perhaps) either confulting obout profequition of their intents, first against the Aramites, and then against Meab, Edom, and other rebells and enemies: or else were triumphing in joy of that which was already well atchieued, and the Queene Mother dreffing her felfe in the brauest manner to come downe amongst them; tidings were brought in that the watchman had from a Tower discourred a company comming. These newes were not very troublesome: for the Armie that lay in Ramoth Gilead, to bee readie against all attempts of the Aramites, was likely enough to bee discharged vpon fome notice taken that the enemie would not, or could not stirre. Onely the King 40 fent out an Horse-man to know what the matter was, and to bring him word. The messenger comming to Iehu, and asking whether all were well, was retained by him, who intended to give the King as little warning as might bec. The feeming negligence of this fellow in not returning with an answere, might argue the matter to bee of small importance: yet the King to bee satisfied, sent out another that should bring him word how all went; and he was likewise detained by Jehu. These dumbe showes bred some suspicion in lehoram, whom the watchmen certified of all that happened. And now the company drew for neere, that they might, though not perfectly, be discerned, and notice taken of Jehn himselfe by the furious manner of his marching. Wherefore the King that was loth to discover any weakenesse caufed his Chariot to be made ready, and iffeed forth with Abazra King of Indain his 50 company, whose presence added maiestic to his traine, when strength to result, or expedition to flee had been more needfull. This could not be don't la haffily, but that Jehu was come even to the Townesend, and there they met each other in the field of Naboth. Iehoram beganne to falute Iehu with termes of peace, but receiving a bitter answere, his heart failed him, so that crying out vpon the treason to his fellow King, he turned away to have fled. But Iehu foone overtooke him with an arrow, where-with he strooke him dead, and threw his carkaffe into that field, which, purchased with the bloud of the rightfull owner, was to bee watered with bloud of the vniust possession. Neither did ahazia escape so well, but that he was arrested by a wound, which held him till death did seize voon him.

The Kings Palace was joyning to the wall, by the gate of the Citie, where lezabel might soone be advertised of this calamitie, if thee did not with her owne eyes to behold it. Now it was high time for her to call to God for mercie, whose judgement, pronounced against her long before, had ouer-taken her, when shee least expected it. But thee, full of indignation, and proud thoughts, made her felfe readie in all hafte, and painted her face, hoping with her stately and imperious lookes to daunt the Traitour, or at the least to vtter some Apophihegme, that should expresse her braue spirit, and brand him with such a reproach as might make him odious for cuer. Little did shee thinke vpon the hungric dogs, that were ordained to denoure her, whose paunches the stibium, with which sheep before and her eyes, would more offend than the foolding language where with shee armed her tongue, could trouble the cares of him that had her in his power. As Icha drew necre, the opened her window, and looking out vpon him, beganne to put him in minde of Zimri, that 20 had not long injoyined the fruits of his treason, and murther of the King his Master. This was in meere humane valuation floutly spoken, but was indeede a part of miferable folly, as are all things, how focuer laudable, if they have an ill relation to God the Tord of all. Her owne Eunuches that flood by and heard her, were not affe-Red fo much as with any compassion of her fortune; much lesse was her enemie daunted with her proud spirit. When Ieku saw that shee did vse the little remainder of herlife in feeking to vexe him; hee made her prefently to understand her owne estate, by deedes and not by words. He onely called to her servants to know which of them would be of his side, and soone found them readic to offer their service, be-30 fore the very face of their proud Ladie. Hereupon he commanded them to cast her downe head-long: which immediately they performed without all regard of her greatnesse and estate, wherein shee had a few houres before shined so gloriously in the eyes of men; of men that confidered not the judgements of God that had beene denounced against her.

So perished this accursed woman by the rude hands of her owne servants, at the commandement of her greatest enemie, that was yesterday her subject, but now her Lord : and shee perished miserably struggling in vaine with base groomes, who contumelioully did hale and thrust her whilest her insulting enemic sate on horse-back, adding indignitic to her griefe by scornefull beholding the shamefull manner of 49 her fall, and trampling her bodie under foote. Her dead carcasse that was left without the walls was denoured by dogges, and her very memoric was odious. Thus the vengeance of God rewarded her Idolatrie, murther, and oppression, with slow, but fure paiment, and full interest.

Ahazia King of Juda fleeing a-pace from Jehu, was ouer-taken by the way where he lurked; and receiving his deadly wound in the Kingdome of Samaria, was suffered to get him gone (which he did in all haste) and seeke his buriall in his owne kingdome: and this fauour hee obtained for his grand-fathers fake, not for his fathers, nor his owne. He died at Meeidde, and was thence carried to Ierusalem, where hee was enterred with his Ancestors, having raigned about one yeere.

Of A THALIA, and whose Sonne he was that succeeded vnto her.

Of ATHALIA her vsurping the Kingdome, and what pretences Thee might forge.

2,Chron, 22.9

FTER the death of Abazia, it is saide that his house was not able to retaine the Kingdome: which note, and the proceedings of Athalia vpon the death of her Sonne, haue given occasion to divers opinions concerning the Pedigree of Ioas, who raigned shortly after. For Athalia being thus dispoiled of her Sonne, 20 under whose name shee had ruled at her pleasure, did forth-with lay hold vpon all the Princes of the bloud, and flew them, that so she might occupie the Royall Throne her selfe, and raigne as Queene, rather than liuc a Subiect. Shee had before-hand put into great place, and made Counsailours unto her sonne, such as were fittest for her purpose. and readie at all times to execute her will : that shee kept a strong guard about her itis very likely, and as likely it is that the great execution done by Ichoram, vpon the Princes, and many of the Nobilitie, had made the people tame, and fearefull to

Yet ambition, how violent soeuer it bee, is seldome or neuer so shamelesse as toreflirre, what focuer they faw or heard. fuse the commoditie of goodly pretenses offering themselues; but rather scrapes together all that will any way ferue to colour her proceedings. Wherefore it were not abfurd for vs to thinke, that Athalia, when thee faw the Princes of the Royall bloud, all of them in a manner, slaine by her husband, and afterwards his owne children destroyed by the Philistims, began euen then to play her owne game, reducing by artificiall practice, into faire likelihoods, those possibilities where-with her hulbands bad fortune had presented her. Not without great show of reason, either by her owne mouth, or by some truftic creature of hers, might shee give him to vnderstand, how needfull it were to take the best order whilest as yet kee might, 40 for feare of the worst that might happen. If the issue of Danid, which now remained onely in his Familic, should by any accident faile (as wofull experience had alreadic showed what might after come to passe) the people of Inda were not vnlikely to choose a King of some new stocke, a popular seditious man peraduenture, one that to countenance his owne vnworthinesse, would not care what aspersions hee laide voon that Royall house, which was fallen downe. And who could affure him, that some ambitious spirit, forc-seeing what might be gotten thereby, did not alreadic contrine the destruction of him, and all his seede? Wherefore it were the wiseft way to designe by his authoritic, not onely his Successour, but also the reuersioner, and so to prouide, that the Crowne might neuer be subject to any riseling, but remaine in the disposition of them that loved him best, if the worst that might bee 50 feared comming to passe, his owne posteritie could not retaine it.

Such perswasions being vrged, and earnestly followed, by the importunate sollicitation of her that gouerned his affections, were able to make the icalous Tyrant CHAP.21. S.I. of the Historie of the World.

thinke that the only way to frustrate all devices of such as gaped after a change, was to make her Heire the last and yongest of his house, whom it most concerned, as being the Queene-Mother, to vp-hold the first and eldest. If Athalia tooke no such course as this in her husbands times, yet might shee doe it in her Sonnes. For Ahazia (besides that he was wholly ruled by his Mother) was not likely to take much care for the securitie of his halfe-brethren, or their children; as accounting his Fathers other wives, in respect of his owne high borne-Mother, little better than Concubines, and their children basely begotten. But if this mischieuous woman forgate her selfe so farre in her wicked policie, that shee 10 lost all opportunitie which the weakenesse of her husband and sonne did afford. of procuring to her selfe some seeming Title; yet could shee afterwards faine some fuch matter, as boldly shee might: being sure that none would aske to see her euidence, for feare of being fent to learne the certaintie of her sonne or husband in another world. But Irather thinke that shee tooke order for her affaires beforehand. For though shee had no reason to suspect or seare the suddaine death of her sonne. yet it was the wifest way to provide betimes against all that might happen, whilest her husbands iffue by other women was yong and vnable to resist. We plainly find that the Brethren or Nephewes of Ahazia, to the number of two and fortie, were fent to the Court of Israel, only to falute the children of the King, and the children 20 of the Queenc. The flender occasion of which long journey, considered together with the qualitie of these persons (being in effect all the stocke of Iehoram that could be growne to any strength ) makes it very suspitious that their entertainement in Iezabels house would only have beene more formall, but little differing in substance, from that which they found at the hand of Ichn. Hee that lookes into the courses held both before and after by these two Queenes, will finde cause enough to thinke no leffe. Of fuch as have afpired vnto Lordships not belonging to them, and thrust out the right Heires by pretence of Testaments, that had no other validitie than the sword of such as claimed by them could give, Histories of late, yea of many Ages, afford plentifull examples : and the rule of Salomon is true : Is there any thing Eccles. 10. 30 whereof one may say, Behold, this is new? it hathbeen alreadie in the old time that was before vs. That a King might shead his brothers bloud, was proued by Salomon vpon Adenia; that he might aliene the Crowne from his naturall Heires, Dauid had given proofe: but these had good ground of their doings. They which follow examples that please them, will negled the reasons of those examples, if they please them not, and rest contented with the practice, as more willingly shewing what they may doe, than acknowledging why Salomon flew his brother that had begunne one rebellion. and was entring into another. IEHORAM flew all his brethren, which were better than 2.Chro.21.70.13. hee: DAVID purchased the Kingdome, and might the more freely dispose of it, yet he disposed of it as the Lord appointed; if Iehoram, who had loft much and got-40 ten nothing, thought that hee might aliene the remainder at his pleasure; or if Abazia fought to cut off the succession of his brethren, or of their iffue: cither of these was to be answered with the wordes which Ichoiada the Priest vsed afterwards, in declaring the title of Ioash: Behold, the Kings some must raigne; as the Lord bath

lia did pretend sometitle, whatsoener it might bec, to the Crowne of Iuda; yet is it most certaine that shee had thereunto no right at all, but onely got it by treachery, murder, and open violence; and so shee held it fixe whole yeeres, and apart of the

à. II.

How I EHV fent his time in Ifrael, to that he could not molest

N all this time Iehn did neuer goe about to disturbe her; which in reason hee was likely to desire, being an enemie to her whole House. But hee was occupied at the first in establishing himselfe, rooting out the posteritie of Ahab, and reforming somewhat in Religion: afterwards in warres against the Aramite, wherein hee was so farre ouercharged, that hardly hee could retaine his owne, much lesse attempt vpon others. 10 Of theline of Abab there were seuentie liuing in Samaria, out of which number Jehu by letter aduited the Citizens to fet vp some one as King, and to prepare themselves to fight in his defence. Hereby might they gather how confident hee was, which they well understood to proceede from greater power about him, than they could gather to relist him. Wherefore they tooke example by the two Kings whom hee had flaine, and being exceedingly afraid of him, they offered him their feruice, wherein they fo readily thewed them selues obedient, that in lesse than one dayes warning, they fent him the heads of all those Princes, as they were injoyned by a second letter from him. After this hee surprized all the Priests of Baal by a subtiltie, faining a great facrifice to their god, by which meanes he drew them altogether in-20 to one Temple, where he flew them; and in the same zeale to God veterly demoliflied all the monuments of that impietie.

Concerning the Idolatrie deuised by Ieroboam, no King of Ifrael had oner greater reason than Iehu to destroy it. For he needed not to seare lest the people should be allured vnto the house of David; it was (in appearance) quite rooted vp, and the Crowne of Juda in the possession of a cruell Tyrannesse: he had received his kingdome by the vnexpected grace of God; and further, in regard of his zeale expressed in destroying Baal out of Ifrael, hee was promised, notwithstanding his following the linne of Ierobo.m, that the Kingdome should remaine in his Familic, to the fourth Generation. But all this would not serue; he would needs helpe to piece out Gods 30 prouidence with his owne circumspection; doing therein like a foolish greedie gamefter, who by ftealing a needeleffe Card to affure himfelfe of winning a ftake, forfeits his whole reft. He had questionlesse displeased many, by that which he did against Baal; and many more he should offend by taking from them the vse of a superstition, folong practized as was that Idolatric of Ieroboam. Yet all these, how many soeuer they were, had neuer once thought vpon making him King, if God, whom, to retaine them, hee now for sooke, had not given him the Crowne, when more difficulties appeared in the way of getting it, than could at any time after be found in the meanes

This ingratitude of Iehu drew terrible vengeance of God vpon Ifrael, whereof 40 Hazael King of Damaseus was the Executioner. The cruelcie of this barbarous 2.King. 8. v.12. Prince we may finde in the prophecie of Elizeus, who fore told it, saying : Their frong Cities halt thou fet on fire, and their yong men shalt thou slay with the foord, and Shalt dash their Infants against the stones, and rent in pieces their women with child. So did not onely the wickednesse of Ahab cause the ruine of his whole house, but the obstinate Idolatrie of the people bring a lamentable miserie vpon all the Land. For the furie of Hazaels victorie was not quenched with the destruction of a few Townes, nor wearied with one inuation; but he smote them in all the coasts of Israel, and wasted all the Countrie beyond the River of Iordan. Not withstanding all these calamities, it seemes that the people repented not of their Idolatrie; ( For in those dayes the Lord 50 beganne to loath Ifrael,) but rather it is likely, that they be moaned the noble Houle of Ahab, under which they had beaten those enemies to whom they were now a prey, and had braucly fought for the conquest of Syria, where they had enlarged their border, by winning Ramoth Gilead, and compelled Benhadad to restore the Cities which his Father, had wonne: whereas now they were faine to make wofull thifts, living under a Lord that had better fortune and courage in murdering his Master that had put him in trust, than in defending his people from their cruell enemics. Thus it commonly falls out, that they who can finde all manner of difficulties in feruing him, to whom nothing is difficult, are, in flead of the eafe and pleafire to themselves propounded by contrarie courses, over-whelmed with the troubles which they fought to avoide, and therein by God whom they first forfooke, forfaken, and left vniothe wretched labours of their owne blinde wifedome, wherein they had reposed all their confidence. His year 1116

Q. III.

Hese calamities falling vpon Ifrael, kept Athalia safe on that side, giuing her leifure to looke to things at home; as having little to doe abroad, vnleffe it were fo that flee held fome correspondencie with Hazael, pretending therein to imitate here held. pretending therein to imitate her husbands grand-father King Asa, who had done the like. And some probabilitie that shee did so may be gathered out of that which is recorded of her doings. For wee finde, that this wicked ATHALIA and her children brake up the house of God, and all things that were 2. Chro. 24. 47. dedicate for the house of the Lord did they bestow upon BAALIM. Such a sacriledge, though it proceeded from a desire to set out her owne Idolatrie, with such pompe as might make it the more glorious in the peoples eyes, was not likely to want some faire pretext of necessitie of the State so requiring in which case others before her had made bold with that holy place, and her next successions was faine to doe the like, being thereunto forced by Hazael, who perhaps was delighted with the tafte of that which was formerly thence extracted for his fake.

Under this impious gouernement of Athalia, the denotion of the Priests and Le-30 uites was very notable, and ferued (no doubt) very much to retaine the people in the religion taught by God himselfe, howsoeuer the Queens proceedings advanced the contrarie. For the pouertie of that facred Tribe of Leus must needes have been exceeding great at this time; all their lands and possessions in the ten Tribes being vtterly loft, the oblations and other perquifites, by which they lined, being now very few, and small; and the storelaid vp in better times under godly Kings, being all taken away by shamefull robberie. Yet they vp-held in all this miserie the service of God, and the daily facrifice, keeping duly their courses, and performing obedience to the high Priest, no lesse than in those dayes wherein their entertainement was farre better.

ò. IIII. Of the preservation of IOAs.

EHOIADA then occupied the high Priest-hood, an honourable, wise and religious man. To his careful nesse it may be ascribed, that the state of the Church was in some slender sort vp-held in those vnhappie times. His wise was sehoshabeth, who was daughter of King Jehoram, and sister to Abazia, a godly Ladic and vertuous, whose pietie makes

50 it seeme that Athalia was not her Mother, though her accesse to the Courtargue the contrarie: but her discreet carriage might more casily procure her welcome to her owne Fathers house, than the education under such a Mother could have permitted her to be such as shee was. By her care Ioash the yong Prince that raigned soone aster, was conneighed out of the nourserie, when Athalia destroyed all the Kings children, and was carried secretly into the Temple, whereas secretly hee was brought vp. How it came to passe that this yong child was not hunted out, when his bodie was miffing, nor any great reckoning ( for ought that we finde) made of his escape. I will not fland to examine : for it was not good in policie, that the people should heare fay, that one of the children had avoided that cruell blow, it might have made them hearken after innovations, and so bee the lesse conformable to the present gouernment. So Isas was deliuered out of that slaughter, he and his Nurse being gone no man could tell whither, and might bee thought peraduenture to bee cast away, as having no other guard than a poore woman that gave him sucke, who foolishly doubting that shee her selfe should have beene slaine, was fled away with to him into some desolate places, where it was like enough that shee and hee should perish. In such cases flatterers, or mendesirous of reward, easily coine such tales, and rather sweare them to bee true in their owne knowledge, than they will lose the thankes due to their joyfull tidings.

Whole Sonne IOAs was.

whether IOAs may be thought likely to have beene the Sonne of

2.Kings 11.2. $\display 2. Chron. 22

Ow concerning this Ioash, whose some he was, it is a thing of much Ow concerning this Ioalh, whose some he was, it is a thing or much difficultie to affirme, and hath caused much controuersie among writers. The places of Scripture, which call him the some of A HAZIA, feeme plaine enough. How any figure of the Hebrew language might give that title of Sopneyore him. I neither by my selfe can finde, nor can by any helpe of Authors learne how to an-fwere the difficulties appearing in the contrarie opinions of them, that thinke him 20 to haue beene, or not, the naturall Sonne of Ahazia. For whereas it is faid, that the house of AHAZIA was not able to retaine the Kingdome; some doe inferre that this loafb was not properly called his Sonne, but was the next of his kindred, and therefore succeeded him, as a sonne in the inheritance of his Father. And hereunto the murder committed by Athalia, doth very well agree. For shee perceiuing that the Kingdome was to fall into their hands, in whom shee had no interest, might eafily finde cause to feare, that the tyrannie exercised by her husband, at her instigation vpon so many noble Houses, would now bee reuenged vpon her selfe. The ruine of her Idolatrous religion might in this case terrifie both her and her Minions; the sentence of the Law rewarding that offence with death; and the Tragedie of 40 lezabel teaching her what might happen to another Queene. All this had little concerned her, if her owne grand-child had beene heire to the Crowne; for shee that had power enough to make her selfe Queene, could with more ease, and lesse enuie, haue taken vpon her the office of a Protector, by which authoritie shee might haue done her pleasure, and beene the more both obayed by others, and secure of her owncestate, as not wanting an Heire. Wherefore it was not needefull, that she should be so vnnaturall, as to destroy the child of her owne sonne, of whose life she might have made greater vie, than shee could of his death: whereas indeede, the loue of grand-mothers to their Nephewes, is little leffethan that of Mothers to their children.

This argument is very strong. For it may seeme incredible, that all naturall affe- 50 ction should be can a-side, when as neither necessitie vrgeth, nor any commoditie thereby gotten requireth it, yea when all humane policie doth teach one the same, which nature without reason would have perswaded. t. II.

†. II.

That I O A s did not descend from NATHAN.

B Vt (as it is more easie to finde a difficultie in that which is related, than to shew how it might have otherwise been) the pedegree of this Isas Isas by them which thinke him not the some of Ahazia, set downe in such fort that it may very justly be suspected. They say that he descended from Nathan the sonne of David, and not from Salemen, to which purpose they bring a Historic (I know not whence) of two families of the race of David, saying that the line of Salomon held the kingdome with to this condition, that if at any time it failed, the familie of Nathan should succeede it. Concerning this Nathan the sonne of Dauid there are that would have him to bee Nathan the Prophet, who, as they thinke, was by Danid adopted. And of this opinion was Origen, as also S. Augustine sometime was, but afterward heereuoked it, as was meet; for this Wathan is reckoned among the fonnes of Dauid, by Bathfhua the daugh- 1, Chron. 2.5. ter of Ammes, and therfore could not be the Prophet. Gregory Nazianzen (as I finde him cited by Peter Martyr ) and after him, Erasmus, and Faber Stapulensis, haue likewise held the same of Ioash, deriving him from Nathan. But Nathan, and those other brethren of Salemon by the same mother, are thought, vpon good likelihoods, to have been the children of Vria the Hittite: and so are they accounted by fundry of the fathers, and by Lyra, and Abulensis, who follow the Hebrew expositors of that 20 place in the first of Chronicles. The words of Salomon calling himselfe the onely begotten of his mother, doe approoue this exposition: for wee reade of no more than two sonnes which Bathshua or Bathsheba did beare vnto Dauid, whereof the one, begotten in adultery, died an infant, and Salomon only of her children by the King did line. So that the rest must needshaue been the children of Vria, and are thought to haue been Dauids onely by adoption. Wherefore, if Ioas had not been the sonne of Ahazia, then must that pedegree haue beenfalse, wherein S. Matthew deriueth him lineally from Salomen; yea, then had not our bleffed Sauiour iffued from the loynes of Danid, according to the flesh, but had onely been of his line by courtese of the Na-20 tion, and forme of Law, as any other might have been. As for the authority of Philo, which hath drawne many late writers into the opinion that Ioash was not of the pofleritie of Salomon, it is enough to fay, that this was Frier Annius his Philo: for no other edition of Philo hath any such matter ; but Annius can make Authors to speake what he lift.

t. III.

That IOAs may probably be thought to have beene the sonne

N so doubtfull a case, if it seeme lawfull to hold an opinion that no man hath yet I thought vpon, me thinkes it were not amisse to lay open at once, and peruse together two places of Scripture, whereof the one telling the wickednesse of Ichoram 2 King 3, v. 19. the sonne of Iehosaphat King of Juda, for which hee and his children perished, rehearseth it as one of Gods mercies towards the house of Dauid, that according to his promise he would give him a light, and to his children for ever : the other doth say, that for the offences of the same I E H OR AM, there was not a sonne left him, saue I E-HOAHAS the rongest of his sonnes. Now, if it were in regard of Gods promise to Dauid, that after those massacres of Jehoram, vpon all his brethren, and of the Phi-50 listims, and Arabians upon the children of leboram, one of the seede of Davidescaped; why may it not be thought that hee was faid to have escaped, in whom the line of Danid was preserved? for had all the race of Salomen been rooted up in these wofull Tragedies, and the progenie of Nathan succeeded in place thereof; like enough it is that some romembrance more particular would haue been extant, of an euent fo memorable. That the race of Nathan was not extinguished, it is indeed apparent by the Genealogie of our Lord; as it is recounted by S. Luke : but the preservation of the house of Dauid, mentioned in the bookes of Kings and Chronicles, was performed in the person of Ieboahas, in whom the Royal branch of Salomen, the naturall, and not onely legall iffue remaining of Danid, was kept aliue. Wherefore it may bee thought that this Toelh, who followed Athalia in the Kingdome, was the vongest sonne of leberam, whose life Athalia as a stepdame, was not likely to pursue. For it were not casily understood, why the preservation of Davids line, by Gods especiall mercie, in regard of his promise made, should pertaine rather to that time, when befides Ahazia himselfe, there were two and fortie of his brethren, or (as in another 10 place they are called ) sonnes of his brethren remaining alive, which afterwards lesse than extirpation of that progenie, wherein one onely did escape. Certainely that inhumane murther which Jeheram committed vpon his brethren, if it were (as appeareth in the Historic) revenged vpon his owne children; then was not this vengeance of Godaccomplished by the Philistems and Arabians, but being onely begun by them, was afterwards profecuted by Ichu, and finally tooke effect by the hands of that same wicked woman, at whose instigation hee had committed such barbarous outrage. And from this execution of Gods heavie judgement layd vpon Ichoram fore if I should affirme to bee the same with loas, which is called the sonne of Abazia, I should not want good probabilitie. Some further appearance of necessitie there is, which doth argue that it could no otherwise have beene. For it was the youngest some of leboram in whom the race was preserved; which could not in any likelihood be Ahazia, seeing that he was twenty yeeres old at the least (as is already noted) when hee began to raigne, and consequently, was borne in the eighteenth or twentieth yeere of his Fathers age. Now, I know not whether of the two is more vnlikely, either that lehoram should have begotten many children before be was eightcene yeeres old, or that having (as hee had) many wives and children, hee should voon the sudden, at his eighteenth yeere, become vnfruitfull, and beget no 20 more in twenty yeeres following: each of which must have been true, if this were true that Ahazia was the same lehonhas, which was his yongest sonne. But this inconvenience is taken away, and those other doubts arising from the causelesse cru-eltie of Athalia, in feeking the life of Iow, are casily cleared, if Iow and Ichoahas were one. Neither doth his age with stand this opinion. For he was fewen recres old when hee began to reigne; which if wee vnderstand of yeeres compleat, he might have been a veere old at the death of leheram, being begotten somewhat after the beginning of his sicknesse. Neither is it more absurd to say that he was the natural I sonne of lehoram, though called the sonne of Ahazia, than it were to say, as great Authors have done, this difficultie not with standing, that hee was of the posteritie of Nathan. One 40 thing indeed I know not how to answer, which, had it concurred with the rest, might have served as the very foundation of this opinion. The name of Iehoahas, that soundeth much more necre to Ioas, than to Ahazia, in an English eare, doth in the Hebrew (as I am informed by some, skilfull in that language) through the diversitie of certaine letters, differ much from that which it most resembleth in our Westerne manner of writing, and little from the other. Now, although it be so that Ahazia himselfe be also called Azaria, and must have had three names, if hee were the same with Iebonhas; in which manner Ious might also have had severall names; yet, because I finde no other warrant hercof than a bare possibilitie, I will not presume to build an epinion vpon the weake foundatation of mine owne coniecture, but leave all to the confideration of fuch as have more abilitie to judge, and leifure to confi- 50

CHAP.21. S. 6. 1.4. of the Historie of the World.

Vpon what reasons ATHALLAmight seeke to destroy I o As, if he were her owne grandebilde.

TF therefore we shall follow that which is commonly received, and interpret the L text according to the letter, it may bee faid, that Athalia was not onely blinded by the passions of ambition and zeale to her idolatrous worship of Baalim, but pursued the accomplishment of some natural delires, in seeking the destruction of her grandchilde, and the rest of the bloud Royall. For whether it were so that Athalia (as proud and cruell women are not alwayes chatte) had imitated the libertic of Iezabel 2.Kin. 9.11.22. her fifter in law, whose whoredomes were vpbraided by Iehu to her sonne; or whether the had children by some former husband, before the was married vnto Iehoram (which is not vnlikely in regard of herage, who was daughter of Omri, and lifter to Abab) certaine it is that the had fonnes of her owne, and those old enough to be imployed, as they were, in robbing of the Temple. So it is not greatly to bee wondred at, that to lettle the Crowne vpon her owne children , shee did feeke to cut off, by wicked policie, all other claimes. As for 1000, if the were his grandmother, yet thee might mistrust the interest which his mother would have in him, lest when he came to yeers, it might withdraw him from her denotion. And hereof (besides that women doe commonly better love their daughters husbands, than their sonnes wives ) there is some appearance in the reigne of her sonne: for shee made him spend all his time in idle journeys, to no other apparant end, than that the might rule at bome; and he liuing abroad be estranged from his wife, and enterraine some new fancies, wherein Iezabel had cunning enough to bee his tutoresse. But when the sword of Iehu had rudely cut in funder all these fine deuices, then was Athalia faine to goe roundly to worke, and doe as shee did, whereby she thought to make all sure. Otherwise, if (as I could rather thinke) she were onely stepdame to loss, we neede not seeke into the reasons mooning her to take away his lite; her owne hatred was cause enough to dispatch him among the first.

Adigression, wherein is maintained the liberty of vsing coniecture in Histories.

Hus much concerning the person of loas, from whom, as from a new roote, the tree of Danid was propagated into many branches. In handling of which matter, the more I consider the nature of this Historie, and the diuersitie betweene it and others, the lesse me thinkes I neede to suspect mine owne presumption, as deseruing blame, for curiolitie in matter of doubt, or boidnesse in libertie of coniecture. For all Histories doe giue vs information of humane counsailes and euents, as farre forth as the knowledge and faith of the writers can affoord; but of Gods will, by which all things are ordered, they speake onely at randome, and many times fallly. This we often finde in profane writers, who aferibe the ill successe of great undertakings to the neglect of some impious Rites, whereof indeede Godauhorred the performance as vehemently, as they thought him to be highly offended with the omiffion. Hereat we may the leffe wonder, if we confider the answere made by the Iewes in. Agypt vnto leremie the Prophet reprehending their idolatry. For , howfocuer the 50 written Law of God was knowne vnto the people, and his punishments laid vpon them for contempt thereof were very terrible, and even then but newly executed; yet were they so obstinately bent vnto their owne wills, that they would not by any meanes be drawne to acknowledge the true cause of their affliction. But they told the Prophetroundly, that they would worship the Queene of Heanen, as they and their Fathers, their Kings and their Princes had vsed to do; For then (said they) had we plenty of victuals, and were well, and felt no enill: adding that all manner of miseries were befallen them, fince they left off that service of the Queene of Heaven. So blinde is the wisedome of man, in looking into the counsaile of God, which to finde our there is no better nor other guide than his owne written will not percerted by vaine

But this Historic of the Kings of Israel and Inda hath herein a singular prerogative above all that have been written by the most sufficient of meerely humane authours: it setteth downe expressy the true, and first causes of all that happened; not in imputing the death of Ahab to his over-forwardnesse in battaile; the ruine of his to familie, to the securitie of Ieroboam in Izreel; nor the victories of Hazael, to the great commotions raised in Israel, by the comming of Iehu; but referring all vnto the will of God, I meane, to his renealed will: from which that his hidden purpofes doe not varie, this story, by many great examples, gives most notable proofe. True it is, that the concurrence of fecond causes with their effects, is in these bookes nothing largely described; nor perhaps exactly in any of those Histories that are in these points most copious. For it was well noted by that worthy Gentleman, Sir PHILIP SIDNIE, that Historians doc borrow of Poets, not onely much of their ornament, but somewhat of their substance. Informations are often false, records not alwayes true, and notorious actions commonly infufficient to discover the pal- 20 sions which did set them first on foote. Wherefore they are faine (I speake of the best, and in that which is allowed; for to take out of Linie every one circumstance of Claudius his journey against As druball in Italie, fitting all to another businesse, or any practice of that kinde, is neither Historicall nor Poeticall) to search into the particular humour of Princes, and of those which have governed their affections, or the inftruments by which they wrought, from whence they doe collect the most likely motives, or impediments of every bufinesse; and so figuring as neere to the life as they can imagine, the matter in hand, they iudiciously consider the defects in counfaile, or obliquity in proceeding.

Yet all this, for the most part, is not enough to give assurance, how socuer it may 20 giue satisfaction. For the heart of man is vnscarchable : and Princes, how so euer their intents bee seldome hidden from some of those many eyes which pric both into them, and into fuch as live about them; yet sometimes either by their owne close temper or by some subtill miste, they conceale the trueth from all reports. Yea, many times the affections themselves lie dead, and buried in oblinion, when the preparations which they begate, are converted to another vse. The industrie of an Hiflorian, having fo many things to weary it, may well be excused, when finding apparant cause enough of things done, it for beareth to make further search; though it often fall out, where fundry occasions worke to the same end, that one small matter in a weake minde is more effectuall, than many that seemes farre greater. So comes 40 it many times to passe, that great fires, which consume whole houses or Townes, begin with a few strawes, that are wasted or not scene; when the slame is discourred. having fastened vpon some wood-pile, that catcheth all about it. Questionlesse it is, that the warre commenced by Darius, and purfued by Xerxes against the Greekes. proceeded from defire of the Persians to inlarge their Empire: howsoever the enterprize of the Athenians upon Sardes, was notifed abroad as the ground of that quarrell: yet Herodotus telleth vs , that the wanton defire of Queene Atolla, to have the Greeian dames her bondwomen, did first moue Darius to prepare for this warre before he had received any injury; and when he did not yet fo much defire to get more, as to enjoy what was already gotten.

I will not here stand to argue whether Herodotus bee more justly reprehended by fome, or defended by others, for alleading the vaine appetite, and fecret freech of the Queene in bed with her husband, as the cause of those great enils following; this I may boldly affirme, (having I thinke, in every efface some sufficient witnesses) that matter of much consequence, founded in all seeming vpon subftantial reasons, haue issued indeed from such pettietrifles, as no Historian would either thinke vpon,or could well fearch out.

Therefore it was a good answere that Sixtus Quintus the Pope made to a certaine Frier, comming to visite him in his Popedome, as having long before in his meaner estate, beene his familiar friend. This poore Frier, being emboldened by the Pope to vse his old libertie of speech, aduentured to tell him, that he very much wondred how it was possible for his Holinesse, whom he rather tooke for a direct honest man, than any cunning polititian, to attaine vnto the Papacie; in compaffing of which, all to the subtiltie (sayd hee) of the most crafty braines, finde worke enough: and therefore the more I thinke vpon the Art of the conclaue, and your vnaptnesse thereto, the more I needs must wonder. Pope Sixtus to satisfie the plaine dealing Frier, dealt with him againe as plainly, saying, Hadst thou lived abroad as I have done, and seene by what folly this world is gouerned, thou wouldest wonder at nothing.

Surely, if this be referred vnto those exorbitant engines, by which the course of affaires is mooued; the Pope said true. For the wiseft of men are not without their vanities, which requiring and finding mutuall toleration, worke more closely, and earneflly, than right reason either needes or can. But if we lift vp our thoughts to that supreme Gouernour, of whose Empire all that is true, which by the Poet was faid of Iupiter:

CHAP.21. S.6.

Qui terram inertem, qui mare temperat Ventosum, & vrbes, regnag, triftia Dinofg, mortalefg, turmas, Imperioregit vaus aquo.

Who rules the duller earth, the wind-fwolne streames, The civill Cities, and th'infernall realmes, Who th'host of heaven and the mortall band, Alone doth gouerne by his iust commaund.

Then shall wee finde the quite contrary. In him there is no vncertaintie nor change; he foreseeth all things, and all things disposeth to his owne honour; Hee neither deceiueth nor can be deceiued, but continuing one and the same for euer, doth constantly gouerne all creatures by that law, which hee hath prescribed and will neuer alter. The vanities of men beguile their vaine contriuers, and the profperitie of the wicked, is the way leading to their destruction: yea, this broad and headlong passage to hell, is not so delightfull asit seemeth at the first entrance, but hath growing in it, besides the poisons which infect the soule, many cruell thornes 40 deepely wounding the bodie, all which, if any few escape, they have onely this miferable aduantage of others, that their descent was the more swift and expedite. But the service of God is the path guiding vs to perfect happinesse, and hath in it a true, though not compleat felicitie, yeelding such abundance of ioy to the conscience, as doth easily counteruaile all afflictions whatsoever; though indeed those brambles that fometimes teare the skinne of such as walke in this bleffed way, doecommonly lay hold vpon them at such time as they sit downe to take their ease, and make them wish themselues at their iournies end, in the presence of their Lord whom they faithfully serue, in whose presence is the fulnesse of toy, and at whose right hand are pleasures plained u.z. for enermore.

Wherfore it being the end and scope of all History, to teach by example of times past, such wisdome as may guide our desires and actions, we should not maruaile though the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda and Ifrael, being written by men inspired with the Spirit of God, instruct vs chiefly, in that which is most requisite for vs to know, as the meanes to attaine vnto true felicitie, both here, and hereafter, pro-pounding examples which illustrate this infallible rule, The feare of the Lord is the beginning of Wiledome. Had the expedition of Xerxes (as it was foretold by Daniel) been written by some Prophet after the captivitie: wee may well beleeue that the counfaile of God therein, and the executioners of his righteous will, should have occupied either the whole or the principall roome in that narration. Yet had not the purpose of Darius, the desire of his Wife, and the businesse at Sardes, with other occurrents, been the lesse true, though they might have beene omitted, as the lesse materiall: but these things it had beene lawfull for any man to gather out of profane Histories, or out of circumstances otherwise appearing, wherein hee should not have done injurie to the Sacred Writings, as long as he had forborne to derogate 10 from the first causes, by ascribing to the second more then was due.

Such, or little different, is the businesse that I have now in hand : wherein I cannot beleeue that any man of judgement will taxe mee, as either fabulous or prefumptuous. For he doth not fame, that rehearfeth probabilities as bare coniectures; neither doth he depraue the Text, that seeketh to illustrate and make good in humane reafon, those things, which authority alone, without further circumstance, ought to baue confirmed in every mans beliefe. And this may suffice in defence of the libertie, which I have vied in coniectures, and may hereafter vie when occasion shall require, as neither vnlawfull, nor mif-befeeming an Historian.

è. VII.

The conspiracie against ATHALIA.

Hen Athalia had now fixe yeeres and longer worne the Crowne of Iuda, and had found neither any forraine enemie, nor domesticall aduerfarie to disturbe her possession, suddenly the period of her glory, and reward of her wickednesse meeting together, tooke her away without any warning, by a violent and shamefull death. For the growth of the 20 yong Prince began to be luch, as permitted him no longer to be concealed, and it had been very vnfitting that his education should bee simple, to make him seeme the childe of some poore man (as for his fafetic it was requisite,) when his capacitic required to have beene indued with the stomake and qualities meete for a King. All this Ichoiada the Priest considered, and withall, the great increase of impietic, which taking deeperoote in the Court, was likely to spread it selfe ouer all the Countrie, if care were not vsed to weede it vp very speedily. Wherefore heassociated vnto himselfe five of the Captaines, in whose fidelitie he had best assurance, and having taken an oath of them, and showed them the Kings sonne, he made a Couenant with them, to advance him to the Kingdome. These drew in others of the principall men, to 40 countenance the action, procuring at the first onely that they should repaire to Ieru-Calem, where they were further acquainted with the whole matter. There needed not many perswasions to winne them to the businesse: the promise of the Lord vnto the house of Danid, was enough to assure them, that the action was both lawfull, and likely to succeede as they desired.

But in compassing their intent some difficulties appeared: For it was not to bee hoped, that with open force they should bring their purpose to good iffue : neither were the Captaines, and other affociats of Iehoiada able by close working, to drawe together so many trustie and serviceable hands as would suffice to manage the businesse. To helpe in this case, the Priest gaue order to such of the Lenites, as had finished their courses in waiting on the Dinine service at the Temple, and were now re- 50 lieued by others that succeeded in their turnes, that they should not depart untill they knew his further pleasure. So by admitting the new commers, and not difcharging the old, he had, without any noise, made up such a number, as would bee able to deale with the Queens ordinarie Guard, and that was enough, for if the Tyrannesse did not preuaile against them at the first brunt, the fauour of the People was like to shew it selfe on their side, who made head against her. These Leutes were placed in the inner Court of the Temple, about the person of the King, who as yet was kept close; the followers of the Captaines, and other adherents, were beflowed in the ytter Courts: As for weapons, the Temple it selfe had store enough; King David had left an Armorie to the place, which was now employed in defence of his issue.

All things being in a readinesse, and the day come, wherein this high designe was 10 to be put in execution; Iehoiada deliuered vnto the Captaines, Armour for them and their adherents; appointed a guard vnto the Kings person; produced him openly, and gaue vnto him the Crowne; vling all ceremonies accustomed in such solemnities, with great applause of the people. Of these doings, the Queene was the last that heard any word; which is not so strange as it may seeme: for insolent natures, by dealing outragiously with such as bring them ill tidings, doe commonly loofe the benefit of hearing what is to bee feared, whilest yet it may bee preuented, and have no information of danger, till their owneeyes, amazed with the fuddennesse, behold it in the shape of ineuitable mischiefe.

All Ieru/alem was full of the rumour, and entertayned it with very good liking. 20 Some carried home the newes, others ranne forth to fee, and the common joy was fogreat, that without apprehension of perill, under the windowes of the Court. were the people running and praifing the King. Athalia hearing and beholding the a.chron. 22.12. extraordinarie concourse, and noise, of folkes in thestreets, making towards the Temple, with much vnvfuall paffion in their lookes, did presently conceiue, that fomewhat worthie of her care was happened; though, what it might bee, shee did not apprehend. Howfoeuer it were, thee meant to vie her owne wifedome in looking into the matter, and ordering all as the occasion might happen to require. It may bee, that shee thought it some especials solemnitie vsed in the Divine service, which caused this much adoe; and hereof the vnaccustomed number of Leuites, and 30 of other denout men, about the towne, might give some presumption.

Many things argue that shee little thought vpon her owne Tragedie; although Iolephis would make it feeme otherwise. For we finde in the Text, Shee same to the 2 chron 23-12 people into the house of the Lord (which was neere to her Palace) and that when shee 613.62. looked and faw the King stand by his pillar, as the manner was, with the Princes, or 614. great men of the Land by him, and the Trumpetters proclaiming him, shee rent her clothes, and cryed, Treason, Treason. Hereby it appeares that shee was quietly going, without any mistrust or feare, to take her place, which when shee found occupied by another, then shee begun to afflish her selfe, as one cast away, and cryed out in vaine vpon the Treason, whereby shee saw that shee must perish. But that shee 40 came with a guard of armed men to the Temple, (as 10 fephus reporteth) and that her companie being beaten back, shee entred alone, and commanded the people to kill the yong Tyrant, I finde no where in Scripture, neither doe I hold it credible. For had shee truely knowne how things went, shee would surely have gathered her friends about her, and vsed those forces in defence of her Crowne, by which shee gat it, and hitherto had held it. Certainely, if it were granted, that shee, like a new Semiramis, did march in the head of her troupe, yet it had beene meere madnesse in her, to enter the place alone, when her affiftants were kept out; but if shee perceiuing that neither her authoritie, nor their owne weapons, could preuaile to let in her guard, would neuerthelesse take vpon her to command the death of the new King, calling a child of feuen yeeres old a Conspirator, and bidding them to kill him, whom shee saw to bee armed in his defence, may wee not thinke that shee was mad in the most extreme degree? Certaine it is that the counsaile of God would have taken effect, in her destruction, had shee vsed the most likely meanes to disappoint it: yet wee neede not so cut her throate with any morall impossibilities. It is enough to fay, that the godly zeale of Iehotada found more easie successe, through her indifcretion, than otherwise could have beene expected; so that at his appointment. shee was without more adoe, carried out of the Temple and slaine, yea so, that no bloud, saue her owne, was shed in that quarrell; her small traine, that she brought along with her, not daring to stand in her defence.

ð. VIII.

The death of ATHALIA, with a comparison of her and IEZABEL.

Oft like it is, that Athalia had many times, with great indignation, bewailed the rashnesse of her Nephew Ichoram the Israelite, who did foolishly cast himselfe into the very throat of danger, gaping vpon him, only through his eager desire of quickly knowing what the matter meant : yet, shee her selfe, by the like bait, was taken in the like trap, and having lived fuch a life as Iezabel had done, was rewarded with a futable death. These two Queenes were in many points much alike, each of them was Daughter, Wife, and Mother to a King; each of them ruled her husband; was an Idolatresse, and a Murdresse. The only difference appearing in their conditions, is, that Iezabel is more noted as incontinent of body, Athalia as ambitious: So that each of them 20 furviuing her husband about eight yeeres, did spend the time in satisfying her owne affections: the one vsing tyrannie, as the exercise of her haughtie minde; the other painting her face, for the ornament of her vnchaste body. In the manner of their death little difference there was, or in those things which may seeme in this world to pertaine vnto the dead when they are gone. Each of them was taken on the suddaine by Conspirators, and each of them exclayming vpon the Treason, received fentence from the mouth of one that had lived vnder her subjection; in execution whereof, Iezabel was trampled under the feet of her enemies horses; Athalia slaine at her owne horse-gate; the death of Athalia having (though not much) the more leisure to vexe her proud heart; that of lezabel, the more indignitie, and shame of 30 body. Touching their buriall, lezabel was demoured by Dogges, as the Lord had threatned by the Prophet Elias; what became of Athalia wee doe not finde. Like enough it is, that she was buried, as having not persecuted and slaine the Lords Prophets, but suffered the Priests to exercise their function; yet of her buriall there is no monument; for shee was a Church robber. The service of Baal erected by these two Queenes, was destroyed as soone as they were gone, and their Chaplaines, the Priests of that Religion, slaine. Herein also it came to passe, alike, as touching them both when they were dead; the Kings who flue them, were afterwards afflicted, both of them by the same hand of Hazael the Syrian; in which point Athalia had the greater honour, if the Syrian (who feemes to have beene her good friend) pre- 40 tended her reuenge, as any part of his quarrell to Iuda. Concerning children, all belonging to Iezabel, perished in few dayes after her: whether Athalia left any behinde her, it is vncertaine; shee had sonnes living after shee was Queene, of whom, or of any other, that they were flaine with her, we doe not finde.

This is a matter not vnworthie of confideration, in regard of much that may depend vpon it. For if the children of Athalia had beene in Ierufalem when their Mother fell, their death would furely have followed hers as neerely, and beene registred, as well as the death of Mattan the Priest of Bast. That Law by which God forbade that the children should die for the fathers, could not have faued these vngracious Imps, whom the clause following would have cut off, which commands, that 50 enery man shall die for his owne sinne. Seeing therefore that they had beene professors & advancers of that vile and Idolatrous worship of Baal, yea had robbed the Temple of the Lord, and enriched the house of Baal with the spoile of it; likely it is, that they should not have escaped with life, if Iehoiada the Priest could have gotten them into his hands. As there was lawfull cause enough requiring their death. fo the securitie of the King and his friends, that is, of all the Land, craued as much, and that very earnestly. For these had beene esteemed as heires of their mothers Crowne, and being reckoned as her affiftants in that particular bufineffe of robbing the Temple, may be thought to have carried a great fway in other matters, as Princes and fellowes with their Mother in the Kingdome. Therefore it is euident, that either they were now dead, or (perhaps following Hazael in his warres against lehu) absent from lerusalem; whereby tehoiada might, with the more confidence, aduenture to take Armes against their Mother, that was desolate.

CHAP. XXII.

Of IOAS and AMASIA, with their Contemporaries: where somewhat of the building of Carthage.

ò. I.

Of IOAs his doings, whileft I EHOIADA the Priest lived.

Y the death of Athalia, the whole Countrie of Inda was filled with great joy and quietnesse; wherein loas a childe of seuen yeeres old or there-about, began his raigne, which continued almost fortie yeeres. During his minoritie, hee lined vnder the protection of that honorable man Iehoiada the Priest, who did as faithfully governe the Kingdome, as hee had before carefully preserved the Kings life, and restored him vnto the Throne of his ancestors. When hee came to mans estate, he tooke by appointment of lehoiada two wines, and begat Sonnes and Daughters, repairing the family of David, which was almost worne out. The first Act that hee tooke in hand, when he began to rule without a Protector, was the reparation of the Temple. It was a needfull piece of worke, in regard of the decay wherein that holy Place was fallen, through the wickednesse of vngodly Tyrants; and requisite it was that he should vp-hold the Temple, whom the Temple had vp-held. This businesse hee followed with so earnest a zeale, that not onely the Leustes were more flack than he, but euen Iehoiada was faine to be quickned by his admonition. Monew was gathered for the charges of the worke, partly out of the taxe imposed by Moles, partly out of the liberalitie of the people: who gave fo freely, that the Tem- 2.chron. 14. 14. ple, besides all reparations, was enriched with vessels of gold and filner, and with all other Vtenfiles. The facrifices likewise were offered, as vnder godly Kings they had beene, and the seruice of God was magnificently celebrated.

Aan 2 d. II.

¿. II.
The death of Ieholada, and Apostasie of Ioas.

Vt this endured no longer than the life of Iehoiada the Priest: who hauing liued an hundred and thirtie yeeres, dyed before his Countrie could have spared him. He was buried among the Kings of Iuda, as he well deserved, having preserved the race of them, and restored the true Religion, which the late Princes of that house, by attempting to eradicate, failed but a little, of rooting vp themselues, and all their issue. Yet his 10 honorable Funerall seemes to have been given to him, at the motion of the people; it being faid, They buried him in the Citte of DAVID. As for the King himselfe, who did owe to him no leffe than his Crowne and life, he is not likely to have beene Author of it, seeing that he was as easily comforted after his death, as if hee had thereby beene discharged of some heavie debt.

For after the death of Iehoiada, when the Princes of Iuda beganne to flatter their King, he soone forgate, not onely the benefits, received by this worthic man his old Councellour, but also the good precepts which he had received from him, yea and God himselfe, the Author of all goodnesse. These Princes drew him to the worship of Idols, wherewith Iehoram and Athalia had so infected the Countrie, in 20 fifteene or fixteene yeeres; that thirtie yeeres, or there-about, of the raigne of ioas, wherein the true Religion was exercised, were notable to cleere it from that mischiefe. The King himfelfe, when once hee was entred into these courses, ranne on head-long, as one that thought it a token of his libertie, to despise the service of God; and a manifest proofe of his being now King indeede, that hee regarded no longer the sowre admonitions of deuout Priests. Hereby it appeares, that his former zeale was onely counterfaited, wherein like an actor vpon the stage, he had striuen to expresse much more lively affection, than they could shew, that were indeed religious.

Maa & III.

The causes and time of the Syrians inuading Iuda in the dayes of Io As.

Vt God, from whom hee was broken loofe, gaue him ouer into the hands of men, that would not easily be shaken off. Hazael King of Aram, having taken Gath, a Towne of the Philistims, addressed himselfe towards Ierusalem, whither the little distance of way, and great hope of a rich bootie, did inuite him. He had an Armie heartned by many victories, to hope for more; and for ground of the warre (if his ambition cared for 40 pretences) it was enough, that the Kings of Iuda had affisted the Ifraelites, in their enterprises vpon Aram, at Ramoth Gilead. Yet I thinke he did not want some further instigation. For if the Kingdome of Inda had molested the Aramites, in the time of his predecessiour, this was throughly recompensed, by forbearing to succour I/rael, and leaving the ten Tribes in their extreme miserie, to the furie of Hazael himselfe. Neither is it likely, that Hazael should have gone about to awake a sleeping Dogge, and stirre vp against himselfe a powerfull enemie, before hee had assured the conquest of Ifrael, that lay betweene Ierusalem and his owne Kingdome, if some oportunitie had not promised such easie and good successe, as might rather advance, than any way disturbe, his future proceedings against the ten Tribes. Wherefore I 50 hold it probable, that the sonnes of Athalia, mentioned before, were with him in this action, promising (as men expelled their Countries vsually doe) to draw many partakers of their owne to his side; and not to remaine, as 10 as did, a neutrall in the warre betweene him and Israel, but to ioyne all their forces with his, as they had cause, for the rooting out of 1ehu his posteritie, who, like a bloudie Traytor, had vtterly destroyed all the kindred of the Queenes, their mother, euen the whole house of Abab, to which he was a subject. If this were so, Hazael had the more apparant reason to inuade the Kingdome of Inda. Howsoeuer it were, wee finde it plainely. that Ions was afraid of him, and therefore tooke all the hallowed things, and all the gold 2.King. 12.18. that was found in the treasures of the house of the Lord, or in his owne house, with which present hee redeemed his peace : the Syrian (questionlesse) thinking it a better bargaine, to get so much readily paid into his hand for nothing, than to hazard the asfurance of this, for the possibilitie of not much more. So Hazael departed with a 10 rich bootie of vnhappie treasure, which, belonging to the liuing God, remayned a small while in the possession of this mightie, yet corruptible man, but sent him quickly to the graue. For in the thirtie feuenth of loas, which was the fifteenth of Jehoahaz, he made this purchase; but in the same or the very next yeere he died, leauipe all that he had vnto his Sonne Benbadad, with whom these treasures prospered none otherwise, than ill-gotten goods are wont.

This enterprise of Hazael is, by some, confounded with that warre of the Aramites vpon Iuda, mentioned in the second Booke of Chronicles. But the reasons alleaged by them that hold the contrarie opinion, doe forcibly prooue, that it was not all one warre. For the former was compounded without bloud shed or fight; 20 in the later, low tryed the fortune of a battaile, wherein being put to the worst, hee lost all his Princes, and hardly escaped with life: In the one, Hazael himselfe was prefent; in the other, he was not named but contrariwife, the King of Aram then reigning (who may seeme to have then beene the Sonne of Hazael) is said to have beene at Damaseus. The first Armie came to conquer, and was so great, that it terrified the King of Inda; The second was a small companie of men, which did animate 10,16 (in 2.66108.24.24. vaine, for God was against him) to deale with them, as having a very great Armie.

Now, concerning the time of this former invalion, I cannot perceive that God forsooke him, till he had first forsaken God. There are indeede some, very learned, who thinke that this expedition of Hazael was in the time of Ieboiada the Priest, be-30 cause that storie is ioyned vnto the restauration of the Temple. This had beene probable, if the death of Iehoiada had beene afterwards mentioned in that place of the second Booke of Kings, or if the Apostalie of Ieas or any other matter implying fo much, had followed in the relation. For it is not indeed to be doubted, that the Lord of all may dispose of all things, according to his owne will and pleasure, neither was he more vniust in the afflictions of 10b that righteous man, or the death of loftes that godly King, than in the plagues which he laid vpon Pharaoh, or his judgements vpon the house of Abab. But it appeares plainely, that the rich furniture of the Temple, and the magnificent service of God therewithall, which are joyned together, were vsed in the house of the Lord continually, all the dayes of I EHOIADA; soone 2, cbron. 24. 14. 40 after whose death, if not immediately vpon it, that is (as some very learnedly collect) in the fixe, or thirtie seuenth yeere of this 10.14 his raigne, the King falling away from the God of his Father, became a foule Idolater. And indeede we commonly observe, that the crosses which it hath pleased God fometimes to lay vpon his feruants, without any cause notorious in the eyes of men, haue alwayes tended vnto the bettering of their good. In which respect, euen the sufferings of the blessed Martyrs (the death of bis Saints being precious in the fight pfalistis. of the Lord are to their great advantage. But with cuil and rebellious men, God keepeth a more even, and more first account; permitting vivally their faults to get the flart of their punishment, and either delaying his vengeance (as with the Amo-70 rites) till their wickednesse be full or not working their amendment by his correction on, but fuffering them to runne on in their wicked courses, to their greater milerie. So hath he dealt with many; and fo it appeares that he dealt with low. For this vnhappie man did not onely continue an obstinate Idolater, but grew so forgetfull of God and all goodnesse, as if he had strougn to exceede the wickednesse of all that went before him, and to leaue such a villainous patterne vnto others, as few or none of the most barbarous Tyrants should indure to imitate.

ð. IIII.

How ZACHARIA was murdered by IOAS.

VndryProphets having laboured in vaine to reclaime the people from their superstition, Zacharia the sonne of lehoiadathe Priest, was stirred vp at length by the Spirit of God, to admonish them of their wicked-nesse, and make them vnderstand the punishment due vnto it, whereof they stood in danger. This Zacharia was a man so honourable, and some to a man so exceeding beloned in his life time, and reverenced, that if Ioas had reputed him (as Abab did Elias) his open enemie, yet ought he in common honestie, to have cloaked his ill affection, and have vsed at least some part of the refpect that was due to such a person: On the other side, the singular affection which he and his father had borne vnto the King, and the vnrecountable benefits, which they had done unto him, from his first infancie, were such, as should have placed Zacharia in the most hearty and assured love of Ious, yea though he had beene otherwisea man of very small marke, and not verie good condition. The truth is, that 20 the message of a Prophet sent from God, should bee heard with reverence, how fimple foeuer he appeares that brings it. But this King Ioas, having alreadie scorned the admonitions and protestations of such Prophets as first were sent, did now deale with Zacharia, like as the wicked husbandman in that parable of our Sauiour, dealt with the heire of the Vineyard; who faid, This is the heire, come let vs kill him, that the Inheritance may be ours. By killing Zacharia he thought to become an absolute Commander, supposing belike that hee was no free Prince, as long as any one durst tell him the plaine truth, how great soeuer that mans deseruing were, that did so, yea though Gods commandement required it. So they conspired against this holy Prophet, and stoned him to death at the Kings appointment; but whether by any 30 forme of open Law, as was practifed upon Naboth; or whether surprising him by any close treacherie, I doe neither reade nor can conjecture. The dignitie of his person, considered together with their treacherous conspiracie, makes it probable, that they durst not call him into publique judgement, though the manner of his death, being such as was commonly, by order of Law, inflicted vpon malefactors, may argue the contrarie. Most likely it is, that the Kings commandement, by which he suffered, tooke place in stead of Law: which exercise of meere power (as hath been ealreadie noted) was nothing strange among the Kings of Iuda.

Q. V.

How Ioas was shamefully beaten by the Aramites, and of his death.

His odious murder, committed by an vnthankfull finake vpon the man in whose bosome he had beene fostered, as of it selfe alone it sufficed, to make the wretched Tyrant hatefull to men of his owne time, and his memorie detested in all ages; so had it the well-described curse of the blessed Martyr, to accompanie it vnto the throne of God, and to call for vengeance from thence, which fell downe swiftly; and heavily vpon the head of that vngratefull monster. It was the last yeere of his raigne; the end of his time comming then vpon him, when he thought himselfe beginning to live how he listed without controllement. When that yeere was expired; the dramites came into the Countrie rather as may seeme to get pillage, than to performe any great a-

Etion; for they came with a small companie of men; but God had intended to doe more 2.chron. 24.24. by them, than they themselues did hope for.

That low naturally was a coward, his bloudie malice against his best friend, is, in my judgement proofe sufficient: though otherwise his base composition with Hazael, when hee might have leavied (as his sonne after him did muster) three hundred thousand chosen men for the warre, doth well enough shew his temper. Yet now he would needs bee valiant and make his people know, how frout of disposition their King was, when he might haue his owne will. But his timorous heart was not well cloaked. Forto encounter with a few bands of rouers, hee tooke a verie 10 great Armie, so that wise-men might well perceive, that he knew what he did, making shew as if he would fight for his Countrie, and expose his person to danger of warre, when as indeed all was meere oftentation, and no perill to be feared; he going forth fo ftrongly appointed, against so weake enemies. Thus might wisemen thinke, and laugh at him in secret; considering what adoe he made about that, which in all apparent reason was (as they say) a thing of nothing. But God, before whom the wisedome of this world is foolishnesse, did laugh not onely at this vaine-glorious King, but at them that thought their King secure, by reason of the multitude that he drew along with him.

When the Aramites and King Ioas met, whether it were by some folly of the leaders, or by some amazement happening among the Souldiers, or by whatsoeuer meanes it pleased God to worke, so it was, that that great Armie of Iuda received a notable ouer-throw, and all the Princes were destroyed: the Princes of Iuda, at whose perswassion the King had become a Rebell to the King of Kings. As for 10as himselfe (as _abulensis and others expound the storie) hee was forely beaten and hurt by them, being (as they thinke) taken and shamefully tormented, to wring out of him an excelline ransome. And furely, all circumstances doe greatly strengthen this conjecture. For the text (in the old translation) saith, they exercised upon low ignominious indgements; and that departing from him, they dismissed him in great languor. All, which argues, 30 that they had him in their hands, and handled him ill-fauoncedly. Now at that time Tous the fon of Iehoshaz raigned over Ifrael, and Benhadad the fon of Hazael over the Syrians in Damascus; the one a valiant under-taking Prince, railed up by God to reftore the State of his miserable Countrie; the other inferior enery way to his father, of whose purchases he lost a great part, for want of skill to keepe it. The difference in condition found betweene these two Princes, promising no other euent than such as after followed, might have given to the King of Inda good cause to bee bold, and plucke vp his spirits, which Hazael had beaten downe, if God had not beene against him. But his fearefull heart being likely to quake vpon any apprehenfion of danger, was able to put the Syrian King in hope, that by terrifying him with 40 some shew of warre at his doores, it were easie to make him craue any tolerable conditions of peace. The vnexpected good fuccesse hereof, alreadie related, and the (perhaps as inexpected) ill successe, which the Aramites found in their following warres against the King of Ifrael, sheweth plainely the weaknesse of all earthly might, relifting the power of the Almightie. For by his ordinance, both the Kingdome of Inda, after more than fortie yeeres time of gathering strength, was vnable to driue out a small companie of enemies; and the Kingdome of Israel, hauing so beene trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fiftie Horsemen, ten Chauing so beene trodden downe by Hazael, that onely fiftie Horsemen, ten Chau riots, and ten thouland Foot-men were left, preuailed against his Sonne, and recouered all from the victorious Aramites. But examples hereof are euery-where 50 found, and therefore I will not infift ypon this; though indeed we should not, if we be Gods children, thinke it more tedious to heare long and frequent reports of our heauenly Fathers honour, than of the noble acts performed by our fore father

When the Aramites had what they lifted, and faw that they were not able, being

ing to few, to take any possession of the Countrie, they departed out of Inda loden with spoile, which they sent to Damaseus, themselves belike falling voon theren Tribes, where it is to be thought that they fped not halfe fo well. The King of Inda being in ill case, was killed on his bed when he came home, by the sonnes of an Ammonitesse, and of a Moabitesse, whom some (because onely their Mothers names being ftrangers, are expressed) thinke to have beene bond-men. Whether it were contempt of his fortune, or feare, left (as Tyrant's vse) hee should revenge his difaster vpon them, imputing it to their fault, or whatsoeuer esse it were that animated 2. ckron, 24, 25, them to murder their King; the Scripture tells vs plainly, that, for the bloud of the children of IEHOIADA, this befell him. And the same appeares to have beene 19 vsed as the pretence of their conspiracie, in excuse of the fact when it was done. For Amazia, the sonne and successor of loas, durst not punish them, till his Kingdome was established: but contrariwise, his bodie was judged vnworthie of buriall in the Sepulchres of the Kings: whereby it appeares, that the death of Zecharia caused the treason, wrought against the King, to find more approbation, than was requisite, among the people, though afterwards it was recompensed by his Sonne, vpon the Traytors, with well-deserved death.

δ. V I.

Of the Princes living in the time of IOAS: Of the time when Carthage was built; and of Dipo.

Here lived with Ioas, Mezades and Diognetus in Athens: Eudemus and Ariflomedes in Corinto; about winch thin as off after him Sylvin Alladius, were Kings of the Alban in Italie. Ocrazarei, commonly called Anacyndaraxes, the thirtie seuenth King succeeding vitto Ophratanes, began his raigne ouer the Assyrians, about the eighteenth yeere of loss, which lasted fortie two yeeres. In the sixteenth of 30

Ioas, Cephrenes, the fourth from Sefae, succeeded vnto Cheops in the Kingdome of £gypt, and held it fiftie yeeres:

In this time of loss, was likewise the raigne of Pigmalion in Tyre, and the foundation of Carthage by Dido; the building of which Citie is, by divers Authors, placed in divers ages, some reporting it to be seventie yeeres yonger than Rome, others aboue foure hundred yeeres elder, few or none of them giving any reason of their affertions, but leaning vs vncertaine whom to follow: 10/ephus, who had read the Annalls of Tyre, counting one hundred fortie and three yeeres and eight moneths Infep. Cont. App. from the building of Salomons Temple, in the twelfth yeere of Hyram King of Tyre. to the founding of Carthage by Dido, in the senenth of Pigmalion. The particulars 40 of this accompt (which is not rare in Iofephus) are very perplexed, and serue not verie well to make cleere the totall summe. But whether it were so that tosephus did omit, or else that he did mis-write, some number of the yeeres, which hee reckoneth in Fractions, as they were divided among the Kings of Tyre, from Hyram to Pigmalion; we may well enough beleeue, that the Tyrian writers, out of whole Bookes he giues vs the whole summe, had good meanes to know the truth, and could rightly reckon the difference of time, betweene two workes no longer following one the other, than the memorie of three or foure generations might easily reach. This hundred fortie and foure yeeres current, after the building of Salomous Temple, being the eleuenth yeere of 1000, was a hundred fortie and three yeeres before the birth of 50 Rome and after the destruction of Troy, two hundred eightie and nine: a time so long after the death of Anew, that wee might truely conclude all to bee fabulous which Virgil hath written of Dido, as Ausonius noteth, who doth honor her Statua with this Epigramme.

From the time of Dido vnto the first Punick warre, that Carthage grew and flourished in wealth and conquests, we find in many histories: but in particular we find little of the Carthaginian affaires before that warre, excepting those few things that are recorded of their attempts vpon the Isle of Sicil. Wee will therefore deferre the relation of matters concerning that mightie Citie, vntill such time as they shall encounter with the State of Rome, by which it was finally destroyed; and prosecute in the meane while the Historie that is now in hand.

The beginning of Amazia his reigne. Of Io as King of Israel, and Elisha the Prophet.

MAZIAS, the sonne of Ioash, being twentie fine yeeres old when his father dyed, tooke possession of the Kingdome of Iuda, wherein he laboured so to demeane himselfe, as his new beginning raigne might be least offensive. The Law of Moles he professed to observe; which howsoeuer it had beene secretly despised since the time of lehoram, by 19

many great persons of the Land, yet had it by prouision of good Princes, yea and of bad ones (in their best times) imitating the good, but especially by the care of holy Priests, taken such deepe roote in the peoples hearts, that no King might hope to be very plaulible, who did not conforme himselfe viito it. And at that prefent time, the flaughter, which the Aramites had made of all the Princes, who had with-drawne the late King from the service of God, being seconded by the death of the King himselfe, euen whilest that execrable murther, committed by the King vpon Zechari, was yet fresh in memorie, did serue as a notable example of Gods justice against Idolaters, both to animate the better fort of the people in holding the Religion of their fathers, and to discourage Amazia from following the way, which led 20 to fuch an euill end. He therefore, having learned of his father the arte of diffimulation, did not only forbeare to punish the Traytors that had slaine King lows, but gaue way to the time, and suffered the dead bodie to be interred, as that of lehoram formerly had beene, in the Citie of Dauid, yet not among the Sepulchres of the Kings of Iuda. Neuertheleffe, after this, when (belike) the noise of the people hauing wearied it selfe into silence, it was found that the Conspirators (howsoeuer their deede done, was applauded as the handie-worke of God) had neither any mightie partakers in their fact, nor strong maintayners of their persons, but rested secure, as having done well, seeing it was not ill taken; the King, who perceived his gouernement well established, called them into question, at such a time, as the 30 heate of mens affections, being well allayed, it was easie to distinguish betweene their treasons and Gods judgement, which, by their treasons, had taken plausible effect. So they were put to death without any tumult, and their children (as the Law did require) were suffered to liue; which could not but give contentment to the people, seeing that their King did the office of a just Prince, rather than of a reuenging sonne. This being done, and his owne life the better secured, by such exemplarie iustice, against the like attempts; Amazia carried himselfe outwardly as a Prince well affected to Religion, and so continued in rest, about twelve or thirteene

As Amazia gathered strength in Iuda by the commoditie of a long peace, so Ioas 40 the Ifraelite grew as fast in power, by following the warre horly against the Iramites. He was a valiant and fortunate Prince, yet an Idolater, as his Predecessors had beene, worshipping the Calues of Ieroboam. For this sinne had God so plagued the house of Ichu, that the ten Tribes wanted little of being vtterly consumed, by Hazael and Benhadad, in the time of Iehu and his sonne Iehoahaz. But as Gods benefits to Iehu, sufficed not to with-draw him from this politique Idolatrie; so were the miseries, rewarding that impietie, vnable to reclaime leboahaz from the same impious course: yet the mercy of God beholding the trouble of Israel, condescended vnto the prayers of this vngodly Prince, euen then when hee and his miserable subjects, were obstinate in following their owne abominable wayes. Thereforein 50 temporall matters, the ten Tribes recourred apace, but the fauour of God, which had beene infinitely more worth, I doe not find, nor beleeue, that they fought; that they had it not, I findein the words of the Prophet, saying plainly to AMAZIA, The Lord is not with Ifrael, neither with all the house of EPHRAIM.

Whether it were so, that the great Prophet Elista, who lived in those times, did fore-tell the prosperitie of the Israelites under the Raigne of Ions; or whether Ichoahaz, wearied and broken with long aduerlitie, thought it the wifelt way, to difcharge himselfe in part of the heavie cares attending those vnhappy Syrian warres, by laying the burthen vpon his hopefull sonne; we finde that in the thirtie-feuenth 2.18 mg 13.10. yeere of IOAS, King of Iuda, IOAS the sonne of IEHOAHAZ began to raigne over Israel in Samaria, which was in the fifteenth of his fathers raigne, and some two or three yeeres before his death.

It appeares that this yong Prince, even from the beginning of his Rule, did so 10 well hulband that poore stocke which hee received from his Father, of ten Chariots, fiftie Horse-men, and ten thousand Foot, that he might seeme likely to proue a thriuer. Among other circumstances, the wordes which he spake to Elisha the Prophet, argue no lesse. For loss visiting the Prophet, who lay sicke, spake vnto him thus; O my father, my father, the Chariot of Ifrael, and the horse-men of the same: by 2. Kings 13.14. which manner of speech hee did acknowledge, that the prayers of this holy man had stood his Kingdome in more stead, than all the Horses and Chariots could

This Prophet who succeeded vnto Elias, about the first yeere of Ioram the sonne of Ahab King of Ifrael, dyed (as some have probably collected) about the third or 20 fourth yeere of this low, the Nephew of Jehu. To shew how the Spirit of Elias was doubled, or did rest vpon him; it exceedeth my facultie. This is recorded of him, that hee did not onely raise a dead child vnto life, as Elias had done, but when hee himselse was dead, it pleased God that his dead bones should restore life vnto a carcasse, which touched them in the graue. In fine, hee bestowed, as a legacie, three vi-Etories vpon King Ious, who thereby did let I/rael in a faire way of recouring all that the Aramites had vsurped, and weakning the Kings of Damasco in such fort, that they were neuer after terrible to Samaria.

He happie successe which low had found in his warre against the Aramites, was fuch as might kindle in Amazia a delire of undertaking some expedition, wherein himselfe might purchase the like honour. His kingdome could furnish three hundred thousand serviceable men for the wars; and his treasures were sufficient for the payment of these, and the hire of many more. Cause of warre he had very just against the Edomites, 40 who having rebelled in the time of his grand-father Iehoram, had about fiftic yeeres beene vnreclaymed, partly by meanes of the troubles happening in Iuda, partly through the floth and timorousnesse of his father 10.25. Yet, foralmuch as the men of Iuda had in many yeeres beene without all exercise of warre (excepting that vnhappie fight wherein they were beaten by a few bands of the Aramites) he held it a point of wisedome to increase his forces, with Souldiers waged out of Israel, whence hee hired for an hundred talents of filuer, an hundred thousand valiant 2. cbron. 21.6 men, as the Scripture telleth vs, though lofephus diminish the number, saying that lof. dutiq. Ind. they were but twentie thousand.

This great Armie, which with so much cost Amazia had hired out of Israel, he 50 was faine to dismisse, before he had imployed it, being threatned by a Prophet with ill fuccesse, if hee strengthned himselfe with the helpe of those men, whom God (though in mercy hee gaue them victorie against the cruell Aramites) did not loue, because they were Idolaters. The Israelites therefore departed in great anger, taking in ill part this dismission, as an high disgrace; which to revenge, they fell vpon

a peece of Inda in their returne, and shewed their malice in the slaughter of three thousand men; and some spoile, which they carryed away. But Amazia with his owne forces, knowing that God would be affiftant to their journey, entered couragiously into the Edomites Countrie; ouer whom obtayning victorie, hee slew ten thousand, and tooke other ten thousand prisoners, all which hee threw from an high rocke; holding them, it feemes, rather as Traytors, than as iust enemies. This victorie did not seeme to reduce Edom vnder the subjection of the crowne of Iuda, which might be the cause of that seueritie, which was vsed to the prisoners; the Edomites that had escaped, refusing to buy the lives of their friends and kinsmen at so deare a rate, as the losse of their owne libertie. Some townes in mount Seir, Amazia 10 tooke, as appeares by his carrying away the Idols thence; but it is like they were the places most indefencible, in that he left no garrisons there, whereby he might another yeere the better have pursued the conquest of the whole Countrie. Howsoever it were, he got both honor by the journie, & gaines enough, had he not lost himselfe.

Among other spoiles of the Edomites, were carried away their gods, which being vanquished and taken prisoners, did deserue well to be led in triumph. But they contrariwife, I know not by what strange witchcraft, so besotted this vnworthie 2. Chron. 15. 14. King Amazia, that hee (et them up to bee his gods, and worshipped them, and burned in-

For this when he was rebuked by a Prophet fent from God, hee gaue a churlish 20 and threatning answere; asking the Prophet, who made him a Counseller, and bidding him hold his peace for feare of the worst. If either the costly stuffe, whereof these Idols were made, or the curious workemanship and beautie, with which they were adorned by Artificers, had rauished the Kings fancie; me thinkes, he should haue rather turned them to matter of profit, or kept them as house-hold ornaments and things of pleasure, than thereby have suffered himselfe to be blinded, with such vnreasonable deuotion towards them. If the superstitious account wherein the Edomites had held them, were able to worke much vpon his imagination; much more should the bad service which they had done to their old Clients, have moved him thereupon to laugh, both at the Edomites, and them. Wherefore it seemes to me, 20 that the same affections caried him from God, vnto the service of Idols, which afterwards mooued him to talke so roughly to the Prophet reprehending him. He had alreadie obeyed the warning of God by a Prophet, and sent away such auxiliarie *.cbrom.25.11. forces as he had gathered out of I/rael; which done, it is faid, that he was encouraged, and led forth his people, thinking belike, that God would now rather affift him by miracle, than let him faile of obtayning all his hearts defire. But with better reason he should have limited his desires by the will of God, whose pleasure it was, that Efau, having broken the yoke of Iacob from his necke, accordingly as Isaac had foretold, should no more become his servant. If therefore Amazia did hope to reconquer all the Countrie of Edom, he failed of his expectation; yet so, that he brought home 49 both profit and honor, which might have well contented him.

But there is a foolish and a wretched pride, wher with men being transported, can ill endure to ascribe vnto God the honour of those actions, in which it hath pleased him to vse their owne industrie, courage, or fore-sight. Therefore it is commonly scene, that they, who entring into battaile, are carefull to pray for aide from heaven, with due acknowledgement of his power, who is the giner of victorie; when the field is won, doe vaunt of their owne exploits: one telling how he got such a ground of aduantage; another, how he gaue checketo such a battallion; a third, how hee seized on the enemies Canon; euery one striuing to magnifie himselfe, whilest all forget God, as one that had not beene present in the action. To ascribe to fortune 50 the effects of another mans vertue, is, I confesse, an argument of malice. Yet this is true, that as he which findeth better fuccesse, than he did, or in reason might expect, is deeply bound to acknowledge God the Authour of his happinesse; so hee whose meere wisedome and labour hath brought things to a prosperous issue, is doubly bound to shew himselfe thankefull, both for the victoric, and for those vertues by which the victorie was gotten. And indeed so farre from weakenesse is the nature of fuch thankefgiuing, that it may wel be called the height of magnanimity; no vertue being so truly heroicall, as that by which the spirit of a man advanceth it selse with confidence of acceptation, vnto the loue of God. In which sense it is a braue speech that Euander in Virgil, vseth to Anew, none but a Christian being capable of the admonition, > Aude hospes contemnere opes, & te quoque dignum Finge Deo.

With this Philosophie Amazia (as appeares by his carriage) troubled not his head: he had shewed himselfe a better man of warre than any King of Iuda, since the time of Iehe (aphat, and could be well contented, that his people should thinke him little inferior to David: of which honour hee faw no reason why the Prophets should rob him, who had made him loose a hundred talents, and done him no pieafurc, he having prevailed by plaine force and good conduct, without any miracle at all. That he was diftempered with fuch vaine thoughts as these (besides the witnesse of his impietie following ) Tofephus doth testifie; saying, That hee despised tof. Ant. Leg.

GOP, and that being puft vp with his good successe, of which neuerthelesse hee would not acknowledge God to bee the Authour, hee commanded 1045 King of Ifrael to become his subject, and to let the tenne Tribes acknowledge him their Soueraigne, as they had done his Ancestors King Dauid and King Salomon. Some thinke that his quarrell to Ioas was rather grounded vpon the injurie done to him by the Ifraelites, whom he dismissed in the journey against Mount Seir. And likely it is, that the sense of a late wrong had more power to stirre him vp, than the remembrance of an olde title, forgotten long fince, and by himselfe neglected thirteene or foureteene yeeres. Neuerthelesse it might so be, that when he was thus prouoked, he thought it not enough to require new wrongs, but would also call olde matters into 30 question; that so the Kings of Ifrael might, at the least, learne to keepe their subjects from offending Juda, for feare of endangering their owne Crownes. Had Amazia defired onely recompence for the injurie done to him, it is not improbable that he should have had some reasonable answere from low, who was not desirous to fight with him. But the answere which Ious returned, likening himselfe to a Cedar, and Amazia in respect of him to no better than a thistle, shewes that the challenge was made in insolent tearmes, stuft perhaps with such proud comparison of nobilitie, as might be made (according to that which lofephus hath written) betweene a King of ancient race, and one of leffe nobilitie than vertue. It is by Sophocles reported of Aiax, that when, going to the warre of Troy, his fa- sophocles in Ather did bid him to be valiant, and get victorie by Gods affistance, he made answere, ince Lon. that by Gods affiftance, a coward could get victorie, but he would get it alone without such helpe: after which proud speech, though hee did many valiant acts, hee had small thankes, and finally killing himselse in a madnesse, whereinto he sell vp. on difgrace received, was hardly allowed the honour of buriall. That Amazia did vtter fuch words, I doe not find : but having once entertained the thoughts, which are parents of fuch words, hee was rewarded with successe according. The verie first counsaile wherein this Warre was concluded, serues to proue that hee was a wise Prince indeed at Ierusalem, among his Parasites; but a foole when hee had to deale with his equals abroad. For it was not all one, to fight with the Edomites, a 50 weake people, trusting more in the site of their Countrey than the valour of their Souldiers; and to encounter with 10.55, who from fo poore beginnings had rayled himselfeto such strength, that hee was able to lend his friend a hundred thousand men, and had all his Nation exercised, and trained vp, in a long victorious warre. But as Amazia discouered much want of judgement, invndertaking such a match;

fo in profecuting the bufinesse, when it was set on foot, hee behaued himselfe as a man of little experience, who having once onely tried his fortune, and found it to be good, thought that in warre there was nothing else to doe, than send a defiance.

fight, and winne. Iow on the contrarie fide, having beene accustomed to deale with a stronger enemie than the King of Iuda, vsed that celeritie, which peraduenture had often flood him in good flead against the Aramite. Hee did not sit waiting till the enemies brake in and wasted his Countrie, but presented himselfe with an Ar-mic in Iuda, readic to bid battaile to Amazia, and saue him the labour of along journic. This could not but greatly discourage those of Inda; who (besides the selucs to get as much, and at as easie rate as in the journie of Edom; were so farre disappointed of their expectation, that well they might suspect all new assurance of good lucke, when the olde had thus beguiled them. All this notwithstanding, their King that had stomacke enough to challenge the patrimonie of Salomon, thought like another David, to winne it by the fword. The iffue of which foolehardinesse might casily be forescene in humane reason; comparing together, either the two Kings, or the qualitie of their Armies, or the first and ominous beginning of the Warre. But meere humane wisedome, howsoever it might foresee much, as the two Armies came in fight, God, whose helpe this wretched man had so de-

Iuda, that without one blow given, they fled all away, leaving their King to shift for himselfe, which heedid so ill, that his enemie had soone caught him, and made him change his glorious humour into most abiect basenesse. That the Armie which fled, sustained any other losse than of honour, I neither find in the Scriptures nor in 10(ephus, it being likely that the soone beginning of their flight, which made it the more shamefull, made it also the more safe. But of the mischiefe that followed this ouerthrow, it was Gods will that Amazia himselfe should sustaine the whole disgates might be opened, to let him in and his Armie; threatning him otherwise with present death. So much amazed was the miserable caytine, with these dreadfull wordes, that he durst doe none other, than perswade the Citizens, to yeeld themselves to the mercie of the Conqueror. The Towne, which afterwardes being in weaker flate, held out two yeeres, against Nebuchadnezzar, was vtterly dismayed, when the King, that should have given his life to saucit, vsed all his force of command and intreatic to betray it. So the gates of Icrusalem were opened to Icas, with which honour (greater than any King of Ifrael had ever obtained) hee could not rest contented, but, the more to despight Amazia and his people, he caused source riot through that breach, carrying the King before him, as in triumph. This done, he sackt the Temple, and the Kings Palace, and so, taking hostages of Amazia, hee dismissed the poore creature that was glad of his life, and returned to Samaria.

A discourse of the reasons hindering IOAs from uniting IVDA to the Crowne of Ifrael, when he had wonne Ierusalem, and held AMAZIA prisoner. The end of I O As his Raigne.

E E may justly maruaile how it came to passe, that 10.05, being thus in possession of Ierusalem, having the King in his hands, his enemies forces broken, and his owne entire, could bee so contented to depart quietly, with a little spoyle, when hee might have seized vpon the whole Kingdome. The raigne of Athalia had given him cause to hope, that the issue of David might be dispossessed of that crowne; his owne Nobilitie, being the sonne and grand childe of Kings, together with the samous acts that hee had done, were enough to make the people of Juda thinke highly of him; who might also have preferred his forme of government, before that of their owne Kings, especially at such a time, when a long succession of wicked Princes had smothered the thankes, which were due to the memoric of a few good ones. The commoditie that would have enfued, vpcnthe vnion of all the twelve Tribes, vnder one Prince, 30 is so apparant, that I need not to insist on it. That any message from God forbad the Ifraelites (as afterwards in the victorie which Peka the sonne of Romelia got vpon Abiaz) to turne his present advantage, to the best vie, wee doe not reade. All this makes it the more difficult to resolue the question, why a Prince so well exercised, as Ious had bin, in recoucring his owne, and winning from his enemy, should for fake

the possession of leru/alem, and wilfully neglect the possibilities, or rather cast away

the full affurance of fo faire a conquest, as the Kingdome of Iuda.

But concerning that point, which, of all others, had beene most materiall, I meane the desire of the vanquished people to accept the Ifraelite for their King, it is plainely seene, that entring Ierusalem in triumphant manner, Ions was vnable to concoct 30 his owne prosperitie. For the opening of the gates had beene enough to haue let him not only into the Citie, but into the Royall Throne, and the peoples hearts, whom by faire intreatie (especially having sure meanes of compulsion) hee might have made his owne, when they faw themselves betrayed, and basely given away by him whose they had beene before. The faire marke which this opportunity prefented, he did not ayme at, because his ambition was otherwise and more meanely busied, in levelling at the glorie of a triumphant entrie through a breach. Yet this errour might afterwardes haue beene corrected wellenough, if entring as an enemie, and shewing what he could doe, by spending his anger vpon the walles, he had within the Citie done offices of a friend, and laboured to show good will to the in-40 habitants. But when his pride had done, his couctousnesse beganne, and sought to please it selfe, with that which is commonly most readie to the spoyler, yet should be most forborne. The treasure wherewith Sefac, Hazael, and the Philistims, men ignorant of the true God & his Religion, had quenched their greedy thirst, ought not to have tempted the appetite of loas, who though an Idolatour, yet acknowledged also and worthipped the eternall God, whose Temple was at Ierusalem: Therefore when the people faw him take his way directly to that holy place, and lay his rauenous hands vpon the confectated veffels, calling the family of Obed Edom (whose shil- 1, ehron, 16,15) dren had hereditarie charge of the treasurie) to a strict account, as if they had beene Officers of his owne Exchequer, they considered him rather as an execrable Church-30 robber, than as a Noble Prince, an Ifraelite and their brother, though of another Tribe. Thus following that course, which the most vertuous King of our age (taxing it with the same phrase) hath wisely anoyded; by scaling a few Apples, hee loft the inheritance of the whole Orchard. The people detested him, and after the respite of a sew dayes, might by comparing themselves one to one, perceive his could not have prognosticated all the mischiefe that fell vpon Amazia. For as soone 20 10(An: 1 2.6,10 fpiled, did (as Iofephus reports it) strike such terrour and amazement into the men of

Souldiers to be no better than men of their owne mould, and inferiour in number to the inhabitants of so great a Citie. It is not so easie to hold by force a mightie towne entered by capitulation, as to enter the gates opened by vnaduised feare. For when the Citizens, not being disarmed, recouer their spirits, and begin to vnderstand their first errour; they will thinke vpon euery aduantage, of place, of prouisions, of multitude, yea of women armed with tile-stones, and rather choose by desperate resolution, to correct the euills growne out of their former cowardice, than suffer those mischiefs to poyson the body, which in such halfe-conquests, are easily tasted in the mouth. A more lively example hereof cannot be defired, than the Citie of Florence, which through the weakenesse of Peter de Medices, gouerning therein as a 10 Prince, was reduced into such hard termes, that it opened the gates vnto the French King Charles the Eighth, who not plainely profeffing himselfe either friend or foeto the Estate, entred the Towne, with his Armie, in triumphant manner, himselfe and his horse armed, with his lance vpon his thigh. Many insolencies were therein committed by the French, and much argument of quarrell ministred, betweene them and the Townes-men: so farre forth that the Florentines, to preserue their libertie, were driven to prepare for fight. To conclude the matter, Charles propounds intolerable conditions, demanding huge summes of readie money, and the absolute Signorie of the State, as conquered by him, who entred the Citie in Armes. But Peter Caponi, a principall Citizen, catching these Articles from the Kings Secretarie, 20 and tearing them before his face, bade him found his trumpets, and they would ring their bells: which peremptorie wordes made the French bethinke themselues, and come readily to this agreement, that for fortie thousand pounds, and not halfe of that mony to be paid in hand, Charles should not onely depart in peace, but restore what soeuer he had of their Dominion, and continue their affured friend. So dangerous a matter did it seeme for that braue Armie, which in few moneths after wanne the Kingdome of Naples, to fight in the streets, against the armed multitude of that populous Citie. It is true, that Charles had other businesse (and so perhaps had Ioas, as shall anon be shewed) that called him away: but it was the apprehension of imminent danger that made him come to reason. In such cases the firing of houses, 30 vsually drawes every Citizen to saue his owne, leaving victorie to the Souldier: yet where the people are prepared and resolued, women can quench, as fast as the enemie, hauing other things to looke vnto, can let on fire. And indeed that Commander is more given to anger than regardfull of profit, who vpon the vncertaine hope of destroying a Towne, for sakes the assurance of a good composition. Diversitie of circumstance may alter the case: it is enough to say, that it might be in Ierusalem, as we know it was in Florence.

How strongly soeuer Ious might hold himselfe within Ierusalem, he could not eafily depart from thence, with his bootie safe, if the Armie of Iuda, which had beene more terrified than weakned in the late encounter, should re-enforce it selfe, and 40 give him a checke vpon the way. Wherefore it was wifely done of him, to take hostages for his better securitie, his Armie being vpon returne, and better soden than when it came forth; for which causes it was the more vnapt to fight.

Besides these impediments, within the Citie and without, seruing to coole the ambition of Ious, and keepe it downe from aspiring to the Crowne of Inda; it appeares that somewhat was newly fallen out, which had reference to the anger of Elisha the Prophet; who when this Iom had smitten the ground with his arrowes thrice, told him that he should no oftner smite the Aramites. The three victories which Israel had against Aram, are by some, and with great probabilitie, referred vnto the fifth, fixth and seuenth yeeres of Ioas: after which time, if any losses ensu- 50 ing had blemished the former good successe, ill might the King of Israel haue likened himselfe to a stately Cedar, and worse could hee haue either lent the Indean one hundred thousand men, or meet him in battaile, who was able to bring into the field three hundred thousand of his owne. Seeing therefore it is made plaine by the words of Elisha, that after three victories, Ioas should find some change of tortune, and suffer losse; we must needs conclude, That the Aramite prevailed vpon him this yeere, it being the last of his Raigne. That this was so, and that the Syrians, taking advantage of lows his absence, gaue such a blow to Israel, as the King at his returne was not able to remedie, but rather fell himselse into new missortunes. which increased the calamitie, wee may euidently perceive in that which is spoken of leroboam his sonne. For it is said, That the Lord faw the exceeding bitter afflictions of Ifrael, and that having not decreed to put out the name of Ifrael from under the heaven, he preserved them by the hand of IE ROBOAM, the some of IOAS. This is enough to 10 proue, that the victorious Raigne of loss was concluded with a fad catastrophe; the riches of the Temple hastning his miserie and death, as they had done with Selac. Athalia, and Hazael, and as afterwards they wrought with Antiochus, Crassus, and other facrilegious Potentates.

Thus eyther through indignation conceived against him, by the people of lerufalemand courage which they tooke to fet vpon him within the Walls : or through preparation of the Armiethat lay abroad in the Countrey, to bid him battaile in open field, and recouer by a new charge the honour which was lost at the former encounter; or through the miseries daily brought vpon his owne Countrey, by the Syrian in his absence, if not by all of these; lows was driven to lay aside all thought of winning the Kingdome of Iudz; and taking hostages for his quiet passage, made all haste homewards, where hee found a sad wel-come, and being viterly forsaken of his wonted prosperitie, for sooke also his life in few moneths after, leaving his King-

d. X. The end of AMAZIA his Raigna and Life.

Ny manisable to gheffe how Amazia looked, when the enemy had left him. He that had vaunted so much of his owne great prowesse and skil in armes, threatning to worke wonders, and set vp anew the glorious Empire of Dauid, was now vncased of his Lyons hide, and appeared nothing so terrible a beast as he had beene painted, Much argument of fcoffing at him he had ministred vnto such, as held him in dislike; which at this time, doubtlesse, were very many: for the shame that fals vpon an infolent man, seldome failes of meeting with aboundance of reproch. As for Amazia (belides that the multitude are alwayes prone to lay the blame vpon their Gouernours, euen of those calamities which happened by their owne default) there was no child in all Ierufa-40 lem, but knew him to be the root of all this mischiefe. He had not only challenged a good man of Warre, being himselse a Dastard; but when he was beaten and taken by him, had basely pleaded for the common enemy, to have him let into the Citie, that with his owne eyes hee might see what spoyle there was, and not make a bad bargaine by heare-say. The father of this Amazia, was a beastly man; yet when the Aramites tooke him and tormented him, hee did not offer to buy his owne life at fo dearearate, as the Citic and Temple of Ierusalem. Had he offered, should they have made his promifegood? Surely the halte which they had made in condescending to this hard match, was very vinfortunate: for by keeping out the Ifraelite (which was easic enough) any little while, they should soone have beene rid of him, seeing 50 that the Aramites would have made him runne home, with greater speed than hee came forth. Then also, when having trusted up his baggage, hee was ready to bee gone, a little courage would have served to perswade him to leave his load behind; had not their good King delivered vp Hostages, to secure his returne, as loth to defraud him of the recompence due to his paines taken. Bbb 3

Such exprobrations could not but vexe the heart of this vnhappy King; it had beene well for him, it they had made him acknowledge his faults vnto God, that had punished him by all this dishonour. But we find no mention of his amendment. Rather it appeares, that hee continued an Idolatour to the very last. For it is said of 2. chroni25 27. him, that after his turning away from the Lord, they wrought treason against him in Ierusalem; a manifest proofe that he was not reclaimed, vnto his lines end. And certainely, they which tell a man in his advertitie of his faults palled, thall fooner bee thought to vpbraid him with his fortune, than to feeke his reformation. Wherefore it is no maruaile, that Priests and Prophets were leffe welcome to him, than ever they had beene. On the other fide, flatterers, and fuch as were defirous to put a 10 heart into him, whereof themselves might alwayes be masters, wanted not plausible matter to renine him. For hee was not first, nor second, of the Kings of Inda, that had been ouercome in battaile. David himfelfe had abandoned the Citie leaving it, before the Enemie was in light, vnto Absilom his rebellious sonne. Many befides him had received losses, wherein the Temple bare a part. If Iom might fo cafily have beene kept out; why did their Ancestors let Selac in? As was reputed a vertuous Prince, yet with his owne hands hee emptied the Temple, and was not blamed, but held excufable by necessitie of the State. Belike these traducers would commend no actions but of dead Princes: if so, hee should rather line to punish them, than dye to please them. Though wherein had he given them any cause of 20 displeasure? It was he indeed that commanded to set open the gates to Ioas; but it was the people that did it. Good feruants ought not to have obeyed their Masters Commandements, to his disaduantage, when they saw him not master of his owne Person. As his captiuitie did acquite him from blame, of all things that hee did or fuffered in that condition; so was that misfortune it selfe, in true estimation, as highly to his honour, as deeply to his loffe. For had hee beene as hafty to flye, as others were; hee might have escaped, as well as others did. But seeking to teach the base Multitude courage, by his Royall example, he was shamefully betrayed by those in whom hee trusted. Vn worthie creatures that could readily obey him, when speaking another mans wordes, being prisoner, he commanded them to yeeld; having 30 neglected his charge, when leading them in the field, he bade them stand to it, and fight like men. The best was that they must needs acknowledge his mischance, as the occasion whereby many thousand lines were faued; the Enemie having wifely preferred the surprise of a Lion that was Captaine, before the chase and slaughter of an Armie of Stags that followed him.

These or the like words comforting Amazia, were able to perswade him, that it was even so indeed. And such excuses might have served well enough to please the people, if the King had first studied how to please God. But hee that was vnwilling to ascribe vnto God the good successe foretold by a Prophet; could easily find how to impute this late disaster, vnto fortune, and the fault of others. Now 40 concerning fortune, it feemes that hee meant to keepe himselfe safe from her, by sitting still; for in fifteene yeeres following (folong he out-lived his honour) we find not that he stirred. As for his subjects, though nothing henceforth bee recorded of his government, yet we may see by his end, that the middle time was ill spentamong them, increasing their hatred, to his owne ruine. He that suspecteth his owne worth, or other mens opinions, thinking that leffe regard is had of his person, than he beleeueth to be due to his place, will commonly spend all the force of his authoritie, in purchasing the name of a severeman. For the affected sowrenesse of a vaine fellow, doth many times resemble the granitie of one that is wife: and the feare wherein they liue, which are fubiect vnto oppression, carries a shew of reuerence, to 50 him that does the wrong; at left it fernes to dazle the eyes of underlings, keeping them from prying into the weaknesse of such as have jurisdiction over them. Thus the time, wherein, by well vling it, men might attaine to be such as they ought, they doe viually miffpend, in feeking to appeare fuch as they are not. This is a vaine and deceinable course; procuring instead of the respect that was hoped for, more indignation than was feared. Which is a thing of dangerous confequence; especially when an vnable spirit, being ouerparted with high authoritic, is too passionate in the execution of such an Office, as cannot be checked but by violence. If therefore Amazia thought by extreme rigour to hold up his reputation, what did heeelfe than firiue to make the people thinke he bated them, when of themselves they were aptenough to beleeue, that he did not lone them? The best was that he had, by reuenging his fathers death, prouided well enough for his owne securitie: but who fhould take vengeance; (or vpon whom?) of fuch a murther, wherein enery one had 10 a part? Surely God himselfe, who had not given commandement or leave vnto the people, to take his office out of his hand, in shedding the bloud of his Anounted. Yet as Amazia, carelesse of God, was carried headlong by his owne affections: so his !ubjects, following the fame ill example, without requiring what belonged vnto their duties, role vp against him, with such headlong tury, that being vnable to defend himselfe in Ierusalem, he was driven to forsake the Citic, and five to Lachis, tor fafegard of his life. But so extreme was the hatred conceined against him, and so generall, that neyther his absence could allay the rage of it in the Capitall Citie, nor his presence in the Countrey abroad procure friends, to defend his life. Questionleffe, he chose the Towne of Lachis for his refuge, as a place or all other ben anected to him; yet found he there none other fauour, than that the people did not kill him with their owne hands: for when the Confp. ratours (who troubled not themselves about rayling an Armic for the matter) fent pursuers after him, hee was abandoned to death. Lachie was the vtmost Citic of his Dominion Westward, standing somewhat without the border of Inde; to that he might have made an ealige leape (if hee durst adventure) into the Territorie of the Philistims, or the Kingdome of Ifrael. Therefore it may seeme that hee was detained there, where certaine it is that hee found no kind of fauour: for had not the people of this Towne, added their owne treason to the general linfurrection; the murtherers could not at so good leisure as they did, have carried away his bodie to Ierusalem, where they gaue him buriall 30 with his fathers.

δ. XI.

Of the Interregnum, or vacancie, that was in the Kingdome of I v D A, after the death of AMAZIA.

T hath alreadic beene shewed, that the raignes of the Kings of Iuda Land Ifrael were sometimes to be measured by compleat yeeres; otherwhiles, by yeares current : and that the time of one King is now and then confounded with the last yeeres of his fathers Raigne, or the forethen confounded with the last yeerest at a meere vacation, where-most of his fonnes. But we are now arrived at a meere vacation, wherein the Crowne of Iuda lay voyd elenen whole yeeres: a thing not plainly fet downe in Scriptures, nor yet remembred by Infephus, and therefore hard to bee beleeued, were it not proued by necessary consequence.

Twi-ewe find it written, that A MAZIA. King of Inds, lined ofter the death of IOAs 2. C bron 25.2. King of Ifrael fifteene yeeres; whereupon it followes, that the death of Amazia, was $2 Rm.14.17. about the end of fifteene yeeres compleate, which Ieroboam the second (who in the fifteenth yeere of AMAZIA was made King ouer Ifrael ) had raigned in Samaria. But the fuccession of Vzzia, who is also called Azaria, vnto his father in the Kingdome of 50 Inda; was cleuen yeeres later than the fixteenth of Ieroboam: for it is expressed, that A ZARIA beganne toraigne in the scuen and twentieth veere of IEROBOAM; the fix- 1. Kingats.1. teenth yeere of his life, being joyned with the first of two and fiftie that he raigned. So the Interregnum of cleuen yeeres cannot be divided, without some hard meanes vsed, of interpreting the text otherwise than the letter founds.

Yet fome conjectures there are made, which tend to keepe all euen, without acknowledging any voyde time. For it is thought that in the place last of all cited, by the feuen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam, we should perhaps vnder stand the seuen and twentieth yeere of his life; or elfe (because the like wordes are no where else interpreted in the like sense ) that Azaria was eleauen yeeres under age, that is, fine veeres old, when his father died, and so his fixteenth veere might concurre with the seven and twentieth of Ieroboam; or that the text it selfe may have suffered some wrong, by miswriting twentie seuen for seuentcene veeres, and so, by making the feuenteenth veere of leroboam to be newly begun, all may be falued. These are the conjectures of that worthie man Gerard Mercator : concerning the first of which it to may suffice, that the Author himselfe doth easily let it passe, as improbable; the last is followed by none that I know, neither is it fit, that vpon every doubt, we should call the text in question, which could not be satisfied in all coppies, if perhaps it were in one: as for the second, it may be held with some qualification, that Azaria began his Raigne being five yeeres old; but then must we adde those cleaven yeeres which passed in his minoritie, to the two and fiftie that followed his sixteenth veere, which is all one, in a manner, with allowing an interregnum.

But why should we be so carefull to avoide an interregnum in Iuda, seeing that the like necessitie hath inforced all good Writers, to acknowledge the like vacancy, twice happening within few yeeres, in the Kingdome of Ifrael? The space of time be- 20 tweene Ieroboams death, and the beginning of Zachariahs Reigne, and fuch another gap found betweene the death of Peka, and the beginning of Hofea, have made it eafily to be admitted in Samaria, which the confideration of things as they flood in Iuda, when Amazia was flaine, doth make more probable to haus happened there, yea although the necessitie of computation were not so apparant.

For the publike furie, having so farre extended it selfe, as vnto the destruction of the Kings owne person, was not like to be appealed without order taken for obtaining some redresse of those matters, which had caused it at the first to breake forth into fuch extremity. Weeneed not therefore wonder how it came to passe, that they which already had throwne themselves into such an horrible treason, should 30 afterwards dare to withhold the Crowne from a Prince of that age, which being inuested in all ornaments of Regalitie, is neuerthelesse exposed to many injuries, proceeding from head-strong and forgetfull subjects.

As for their conjecture, who make Azaria to have beene King but one and forty yeeres, after hee came out of his nonage; I dare not allow it, because it agrees too harshly with the text. The best opinion were that, which gives vnto Ieroboam eleauen yeeres of Raigne with his Father, before he beganne to raigne fingle in the fifteenth of Amazia; did it not swallow up almost the whole Raigne of Ioas, and extending the yeeres of those which raigned in Ifrael (by making such of them compleat, as were only current) and take at the shortest the Raignes of Princes ruling in 40 other Nations. But I will not stand to dispute further of this: every man may follow his owne opinion, and see mine more plainly in the Chronologicall Table, drawne for these purposes.

Q. XII. Of Princes Contemporarie with AMIZIA, and more particularly of SARDANAPALYS.

HE Princes living with Amazia, and in the cleaven yeeres that followed his death, were Ioas and Ieroboam in Ifrael; Cephrenes and Myce- 50 rinus in Egypt; Syluius Alladius, and Syluius Auentinus in Alba; Agamemnon in Corinth; Diognetus Pheredus, and Ariphron in Athens; in Lacedamon Thelectus, in whose time the Spartans wan from the Achaians, Gerautha, Amyeba, and some other Townes.

But more notable than all these, was Affyrian Sardanapalue, who in the one and twentieth yeere of Amazia, succeeding his father Ocrazapes or Anacyndaraxes, raigned twentie yeeres, and was flaine the last of the eleuen void yeeres which fore-went the Raigne of Azaria. In him ended (as most agree) the line of Ninus, which had held that Empire one thousand, two hundred and fortie yeeres. A most luxurious and effeminate Palliard he was, passing away his time among strumpets, whom he imitated both in apparell and behauiour.

In these voluptuous courses hee liued an vnhappie life, knowing himselfe to bee so vile, that he durst not let any man have a sight of him; yet seene he was at length, 10 and the fight of him was so odious, that it procured his ruine. For Arbaces, who gouerned Media under him, finding meanes to behold the person of his King, was so incensed with that beastly spectacle, of a man disguised in womans attire, and ftrining to counterfeit an harlot, that hee thought it great shame to line under the command of so vnworthiea creature. Purpoling therefore to free himselfe and others from so base subjection, he was much encouraged by the prediction of Belesis or Belofas a Chaldean, who told him plainely, that the Kingdome of Sardanapalus should fall into his hands. Arbsees well pleased with this prophecie, did promise vnto Belofus himselfe the government of Babylon; and so concluding how to handle the busines, one of them stirred vp the Medes, and allured the Persians into the quar-20 rell, the other perswaded the Babylonians and Arabians to venture themselves in the same cause. These foure Nations armed fortic thousand men against Sardanapalus, who in this danger was not wanting to himselfe, but gathering such forces as hee could, out of other Nations, encountred the rebels, as one that would by deedes refute the tales that they had told of him. Neither did his carriage in the beginning of that warre, answere to the manner of his retirednesse. For in three battailes hee carried away the better, driving Arbaces and his followers into such fearefull termes, that had not Belofus promifed them constantly some vnexpected succours, they would forthwith haue broken vp their Campe. About the same time, an Armie out of Bastria was comming to affilt the King; but A bases encountring it vpon the 3° way, perswaded so strongly by promise of libertie, that those forces joyned themfelues with his. The sodaine departure of the enemie seeming to be a flight, caused Sardanapalus to feast his Armie, triumphing before victorie. But the Rebels being strengthened with this new supply, came vpon him by night, and forced his Camp, which through ouer-great securitie was unprepared for relistance.

This overthrow did so weaken the Kings heart, that leaving his wives brother Salamenus to keepe the field, he withdrew himfelfe into the Citie of Ninine; which, till new aides that he fent for should come, hee thought easily to defend; it having beene prophecied, that Niniue should neuer be taken, till the Riuer were enemie to the Towne. Of the greatnesse and strength of Niniue, enough bath beene spoken in 40 our discourse of Ninus. It was so well victualled, that Arbaces (having in two battailes ouerthrowne the Kings Armie, and slaine Salamenus) was faine to lye two whole yeeres before it, in hope to winne it by famine; whereof yet he faw no appearance. It feemes that he wanted Engines and skill to force those wals, which were a hundred foot high, and thicke enough for three Charriots in front to passe vpon the rampire. But that which he could not doe in two yeeres, the River of Tygris did in the third: for being high fwolne with raines, it not only drowned a part of the Citie through which it ranne, but threw downe twentie furlongs of the wall, and made a faire breach for Arbaces to enter.

Sardanapalus, eyther terrified with the accomplishment of the olde Oracle, or 50 feeing no meanes of resistance left, shutting up himselfeinto his Palace, with his wiues, Eunuches and all his treasures, did set the house on fire, wherewith hee and they were together confumed. Strabo speakes of a monument of his, that was in Strabolig. Anchiale a Citie of Cilicia, whereon was found an inscription, shewing that he built that Citie and Ther fue vpon one day: but the addition hereto, bidding meneate and drinke, and make merry, encouraging other, with verses well knowne, to a voluptuous life, by his owne example, testifie that his nature was more prone to senfuality, than to any vertue beseeming a Prince.

There are some that faintly report otherwise of his end; saying that Arbaces, when hee first found him among his Concubines, was so enraged, that suddenly hee slew him with a dagger. But the more generall consent of Writers agrees with this rela-Died. Sic.las e. 7 tion of Diedorus Siculus, who citeth Ctesias a Greeke Writer, that lived in the Court of Persia, where the truth might best beknowne.

Concerning the Princes which raigned in Affria; from the time of Semiramis, vnto Sardanapalus, though I beleeue that they were sometimes (yet not, as Orosius 10 hath it, incessantly) busied, in offensiue or else defensiue armes, yet for the most part of them I doe better trust Diodorus Siculus, who faith that their names were overpassed by Ctessas, because they did nothing worthie of memory. Whatsoever they did; that which Theophilus Antiochenus hath faid of them is veric true; Silence and obliuion bath oppressed them.

CHAP. XXIII.

Of Vzzi A.

The prosperitie of Vizin, and of Ieroboam the second, who raigned with him in Ifrael. Of the Anarchie that was in the tenne Tribes after the death of IEROBOAM. Of ZACHARIA, SAL-LVM, MENAHEM and PEKAHIA.

Zzi A, who is also called Azaria the sonne of Iotham, was made King of Iuda, when he was sixteene yeeres old, in the seuen and twentieth yeere of Ieroboam the sonne of Ioas King of Israel. Hee served the God of his father Dauid, and had therefore good successe in all his enterprises. Hee built Eloth, a Towne that stood neere to the Red Sea, and restored it to Iuda. 40 Hee ouercame the Philistims, of whose Townes hee dismantled some, and built others in sundrie parts of their Territories. Also hee got the mastrie ouer some parts of Arabia, and brought the Ammonites to pay him tribute. Such were the fruits of his prosperous warres, wherein (as Iofphus rehearleth his acts) he beganne with the Philiftims, and then proceeded vnto the Arabians and Ammonites. His Armie consisted of three hundred and seven thoufand men of warre, ouer which were appointed two thousand fixe hundred Cap-2.6 ron. 26.14. taines. For all this multitude the King prepared shields, and speares, and helmets, and other Armesrequisite; following therein happily a course quite opposite vnto that which some of his late predecessors had held, who thought it better policie to vse the service of the Nobilitie, than of the multitude; carrying forth to warre the Princes and all the Charriots.

As the victories of Vzzia were farre more important, than the atchieuements of all that had raigned in Inda, fince the time of Dauid; so were his riches and magnificent workes, equall, if not superior to any of theirs that had beene Kings betweene him and Salomon. For befides that great conquests are wont to repay the charges of Warre with triple interest, he had the skill to vse, as well as the happinesse to get. Heeturned his Lands to the best vse, keeping Ploughmen and Dressers of Vines, in grounds convenient to such husbandry. In other places hee had Cattell feeding, whereof he might well keepe great store, having wonne so much from the Ammonites and Arabians, that had aboundance of waste ground serving for pasturage. For defence of his Cattell and Heardsmen, hee built Towres in the wilder-10 nesse. He also digged many Cisternes or Ponds. Iosephow cals them Water-courses, but in fuch drie grounds, it was enough that he found water, by digging in the most likely places. If by these Towres hee so commanded the water, that none could without his confent, releeve themselves therewith; questionlesse he tooke the oncly course, by which he might securely hold the Lordship ouer all the Wildernesse; it being hardly passable, by reason of the extreme drought, when the few Springs therein found, are left free to the vse of Trauailers.

Besides all this cost, and the building both of Eloth by the Red Sea, and of sundrie Townes among the Philistims; hee repaired the wall of Ierusalem, which Ions had broken downe, and fortified it with Towres, whereof some were an hundred 20 and fiftie Cubits high.

The State of Ifrael did neuer fo flourish, as at this time, fince the division of the twelve Tribes into two Kingdomes. For as Vzzia prevailed in the South, fo (if not more) Ieroboam the sonne of Iou, King of the tenne Tribes, enlarged his border on the North; where obtaining many victories, against the Syrians, he wanne the Royall Citic of Damasous, and he wanne Hamath, with all the Countrie thereabout from the entring of Hamath, unto the Sea of the Wilderneffe, that is (as the most 2.Reg. 14.25, 28. expound it) vnto the vast deserts of Arabia, the end whereof was vndiscouered. So the bounds of Israel in those parts, were in the time of this Ieroboam, the same (or not much narrower) which they had beene in the Raigne of Dauid.

But it was not for the pietic of Ieroboams, that hee thrived so well; for hee was an Idolater: it was only the compassion which the Lord had on Israel, seeing the exceeding bitteraffliction, whereinto the Aramites had brought his people, which caused him to alter the successe of warre, and to throw the victorious Aramites, vnder the feet of those, whom they had so cruelly oppressed. The line of Iehu, to which God had promifed the Kingdome of Ifrael unto the fourth generation, was a Reg. 10.13. now not farre from the end; and now againe it was inuited vnto repentance, by new benefits, as it had beene at the beginning. But the sinne of Ieroboam the sonne of Nebat, was held so precious, that neither the Kingdome it selfe, given to him by God, was able to draw Iehu from that politike Idolatrie; nor the milery falling vpon 40 him and hisposteritie, to bring them to a better course of Religion; nor yet, at the last, this great prosperitie, of Ierobeam the sonne of Ioas, to make him render the honour that was due, to the onely giver of victorie. Wherefore the promise of God, made vnto lehu, that his sonnes, vnto the fourth generation, should sit on the throne of Israel, was not enlarged; but, being almost expired, gaue warning of the approching end, by an accident (so strange, that wee, who find no particulars recorded, can hardly ghesse at the occasions) forgoing the last acomplishment.

When teroboam the Sonne of Ioas, after a victorious raigne of one and fortie yeeres, had ended his life, it seemes in all reason that Zacharia his Son, should forthwith haue beene admitted, to raigne in his stead; the Nobilitie of that race hauing 30 gotten such a lustre, by the immediate succession of foure Kings, that any Competitor, had the crowne passed by election, must needes have appeared base; and the vertue of the last King, having beene so great, as might well serue to lay the foundation of a new house, much more to establish the alreadie confirmed right of a family so rooted in possession. All this not withstanding, two or three and twentie veeres did passe, before Zacharia the Sonne of Ieroboam was, by vnisorme consent. receiued as King. The true originall causes hereof were to be found at Dan and Bethel. where the golden Calues did stand: yet second instruments of this disturbance. are likely not to have beene wanting, upon which, the wisedome of man was ready to cast an eye. Probable it is, that the Captaines of the Armie ( who afterwardes flew one another, fo fait, that in fourteene yeeres there raigned fine Kings) did now by head-strong violence, rent the Kingdome asunder, holding each what hee could, and cyther despising or hating some qualities in Zacharia; vntill, after many yeeres, wearied with diffention, and the principall of them perhaps, being taken out of the way by death, for want of any other eminent man, they consented to yeeld all quiet- 10 ly to the sonne of Ieroboam. That this Anarchie lasted almost three and twentie yeeres, we find by the difference of time, betweene the fifteenth yeere of Vzzia, which was the last of Ieroboam his one and fortieth (his seuen and twentieth concurring with the first of Vzzia) and the eight and thirtieth of the same Vzzia, in the last fixe moneths whereof, Zacharia raigned in Samaria. There are some indeed that by supposing Ieroboam to have raigned with his father cleuen yeeres, doe cut off the interregnum in Iuda (before mentioned) and by the same reason, abbridge this Anarchie, that was before the Raigne of Zacharia in Ifrael. Yet they leave it twelve yeeres long: which is time sufficient to proue, that the Kingdome of the ten Tribes was no lesse distempered, than as is alreadie noted. But I choose rather to follow the 20 more common opinion, as concurring more exactly with the times of other Princes raigning abroad in the World, than this doubtfull conjecture, that gives to Ieroboam two and fiftie yeeres, by adding three quarters of his fathers Raigne, vnto his own, which was it felfe indeed fo long, that hee may well feeme to have begunne it very yong: for I doe not thinke, that God bleffed this Idolater, both with a longer raigne, and with a longer life, than he did his feruant David.

Thus much being spoken of the time, wherein the throne of Israel was voide, beforethe raigne of Zacharia; little may suffice to be said of his Raigne it selfe, which lasted but a little while. Sixe moneths onely was he King; in which time he declared himselsea worshipper of the golden Calues; which was enough to instifte the 30 judgement of God, whereby he was flaine. He was the last of Iehu's house, being (inclufinely) the first of that line; which may have beene some cause of the troubles impeaching he orderly succession: the prophecie having determined that race in the fourth generation. But (belides that Gods promise was extended vnto the vtmost) there was no warrant given to Sallum or to any other, for the death of Zacharia, as had beene given to Ichu, for the flaughter of Ichoram, and for the eradication of A-

Zacharia having beene fixe moneths a King, was then slaine by Sallum, who raigned after him, the space of a moneth in Samaria. What this Sallum was, I doe not find; fauc onely that he was a Traytour, and the sonne of one sabesh, whereby his 40 father got no honour. It seemes that he was one of those, who in time of faction had laboured for him felfe; and now, when al other Competitors were fitten downe, thought eafily to preuaile against that King, in whose person the race of Jehn was to faile. Manifest it is, that Sallum had a strong partie: for Tiphsah or Thapsa, and the Coast thereof euen from Tirzah, where Menahem, his enemie and supplanter then lay, refused to admit, as King in his stead, the man that murdered him. Yet at the end of one moneth, Sallam received the reward of his treason, and was slaine by Memahem who raigned in his place.

Menahem the sonne of Gadi, raigned after Sallum tenne yeeres. In opposition to Sallum, his hatred was deadly, and inhumane: For hee not onely destroyed Tiphfah, 50 and all that were therein, or thereabouts, but he ript vp all their women with child, because they did not open their gates and let him in. Had this crueltie beene vsed in revenge of Zacharias death, it is like that hee would have beene as earnest, in procuring vnto him his Fathers Crowne when it was first due. But in performing that office, there was vied fuch long deliberation, that wee may plainely discouer Ambition, Disdaine, and other private passions, to have beene the causes of this beastly

In the time of Menahem, and (as it seemes) in the beginning of his Raigne; Pul, King of Assiria, came against the Land of Israel; whom this new King appealed, with a thousand talents of silver, leavied vpon all the substantial men in his Countrey. With this money the Israelite purchased, not only the peace of his Kingdome, but his owne establishment therein: some factious man (belike) having either inuited Pulthither, or (if he came vncalled) fought to vse his helpe, in deposing this ill to beloued King. 10sephus reports of this Menahem, that his Raigne was no milder than his entrance. But after ten yeeres, his tyrannie ended with his life; and Peka-

Of this Pekahia the storie is short: for hee raigned only two yeeres; at the end whereof, he was slaine by Peka, the Sonne of Remalia, whose treason was rewarded with the Crowne of Ifrael, as, in time comming, another mans Treason against himselfe shallbe. There needs no more to be said of Menabem, and his Sonne, sauc that they were, both of them, Idolaters; and the Sonne (as wee finde in Infephus) 10(1011) like to his Father in crueltie. Concerning Pul the Affirm King, who first opened vnto those Northerne Nations the way into Palastina, it will shortly follow in order of the Storie, to deliuer our opinion: whether he were that Belofus (called also Belefes, and by some, Phul Belochus) who joyned with Arbaces the Median, against Sardanapalus, or whether he were some other man. At the present it is more fit that wee relate the end of Vazia's life, who out-lived the happinesse wherein we left him.

Į. II. The end of V z z I A his Raigne and life.

S the zeale of Iehoiada, that godly Priest, was the meane, to preserve the linage of Dauid, in the person of Ions; so it appeares, that the care of holy men was not wanting to Vzzia, to bring him vp, and advance him to the Crowne of Jule, when the hatred borne to his Father A-fought Godin the dayes of ZECHARIA (which under flood the visions of God) and when a chronices.

as he fought the Lord, God made him profper.

But, when he was firong, his heart was lifted up to his destruction: for hee trangressed V, 16. against the Lord his God, and went into the Temple of the Lord to burne incense, upon the Altar of incense. Thus he thought to enlarge his owne authoritie, by medling in the Priests office, whose power had in enery extremitie beene so helpefull to the 42 Kings of Inda, that meere gratitude, and civill policie, should have held backe Vzzia from incroching thereupon; yea, though the Law of God had beene filent in this case, and not forbidden it. Howsoeuer the King forgot his dutie, the Priests remembred theirs, and God forgat not to affift them. Azaria the high Priestinterrupted the Kings purpole, and gaue him to vnderstand, how little to his honour it would proue that he tooke upon him the office of the fonnes of Aaron. There were with Azaria fourescoure other Priests, valiant men, but their valour was shewed only in affifting the high Prieft, when (according to his dutie) hee reprehended the Kings presumption. This was enough, the rest God himselfe performed. Wee find in Iosephus, that the King had apparelled himselfe in Priestly habit, and that hee Iosant lagists 50 threatned Azarias and his Companions, to punish them with death, vnlesse they would be quiet. Infephus, indeed, inlargeth the Storie, by inferting a great Earthquake, which did tearedowne halfean Hill, that rowled toure furlongs, till it refled against another Hill, stopping vp the high-wayes, and spoyling the Kings Garden in the passage. With this Earth quake, he sayth, that the roofe of the Temple did cleave, and that a Sunne-beame did light vpon the Kings face, which was presently infected with leprofic. All this may have beene true; and some there are who thinke that this Earth-quake is the same, which is mentioned by the Prophet Amos; wherein they doe much misse-reckon the times. For the Earth-quakespoken of by Amos, was in the daies of Ieroboam King of Ifrael, who dyed feuen and thirtie yeeres before Vazia; fo that Iotham the Sonne of Vazia, which supplyed his Fathers place in gouernment of the Land, should, by this accompt, have beene then vnborne; for hee was but five and twentic yeeres old, when hee beganne to raigne as King. There-2. Ciron. 26.20. forc, thus farre only wee haucassurance; that while V z z I A was wroth with the Priests, the leprose rose up in his forehead, before the Priests. Hereupon he was caused, 10 in all haste to depart the place, and to live in a house by himselfe, vntill he dyed; the rule ouer the Kings house, and ouer all the Land, being committed to Iotham, his Sonne, and Successor. Iotham tooke not vpon himselfe the stile of King, till his Father was dead; whom they buried in the same field wherein his Ancestors lay interred, yet in a Monument a-part from the rest, because he was a Leper.

d. III.

Of the Prophets which lived in the time of VzziA; and of Princes then ruling in Egypt, and in some other Countries.

N the time of Vzzia were the first of the lesser Prophets, Hosea, Ioel, Amos, Obadia, and Ionas. It is not indeed set downe, when Ioel, or Obadia, dia, did prophecie: but if the Prophets, whose times are not expressed, ought to bee ranged (according to S. Hieromes rule) with the next before them; then must these two be indeed contemporarie with Hosea and Amos, who lived vnder King Vzzia. To enquire which of these five was the most ancient, it may perhaps be thought, at least a superfluous labour; yet if the age wherein Homer lived, hath so painefully beene sought, without reprehension; how 30 can he be taxed, which offers to fearch out the antiquitie of these holy Prophets? It seemes to me, that the first of these, in order of time, was the Prophet Ionas; who foretold the great victories of Ieroboam King of Ifrael; & therefore is like to have prophecied in the dayes of Ioas, whilest the affliction of Ifrael was exceeding kitter, the Text it selfe intimating no lesse: by which consequence, he was elder than the other Prophets, whose workes are now extant. But his prophecies that concerned the Kingdome of Ifrael, are now loft. That which remaineth of him, seemes, not without reason, vnto some very learned, to have belonged vnto the time of Sardanapalus, in whose dayes N inine was first of all destroyed. This Prophet rather taught Christ by his sufferings, than by his writings now extant: in all the rest are found expresse 40 promises of the Messias.

2. Chron.c.14.

In the Raigne of Vzzia likewise it was, that Esai, the first of the foure great Prophets, beganne to see his visions. This difference of greater and leffer Prophets, is Augactini, Dei taken from the Volumes which they have left written (as S. Augustine gives reason his er.) of the diffinction) because the greater haue written larger Bookes. The Prophet Esai was great indeed, not only in regard of his much written; or of his Nobilitie, (for their opinion is rejected, who thinke him to have beene the sonne of Amos the Prophet) and the high account wherein he lived; but for the excellencie, both of his stile, and argument, wherein he so plainly foretelleth the Birth, Miracles, Passion, and whole Historie of our Saujour, with the calling of the Gentiles, that hee might 50 as well be called an Euangelist, as a Prophet; having written in such wise, That (as stier in met su- Hier ome fayth) one would thinke he did not foretell of things to come, but compile an Hiflorie of matters aireadie past.

Boschoris was King of Agypt, and the ninth yeere of his Raigne, by our computation (whereof in due place we will give reason) was current, when Vzzia tooke possession of the Kingdome of Inda.

After the death of Bocchoris, Afrehis followed in the Kingdome of Egypt, vnto him succeeded Anysis; and these two occupied that Growne six yeeres. Then Sabacus, an Athopian, became King of Agypt, and held it fiftie yeeres, whereof the tenne first ranne along with the last of Vezia his Raigne and life. Of these and other A. grptian Kings, more shall be spoken, when their affaires shall come to be intermedled with the bulineffe of Inda.

In Athens, the two last yeeres of Ariphron his twentic, the seuen and twentieth 10 of Thespeius, the twentieth of Agamnestor, and threethe first of Agamnestor and twentic, made even with the two and fiftic of Vzzia: as likewise did in Alba the last seuen of Silvius Aventinus his seven and thirtie, together with the three and twentic of Silvius Procas, and two and twentic the first of Sylvius Amulius. In Media Arbaces beganne his new Kingdome, in the first of Vzzia, wherein, after eight and twentic yeeres, his Sonne Sofarmus succeeded him, and raigned thirtie yeeres. Of this Arbaces, and the division of the Assyrian Empire, betweene him and others. when they had oppressed Sardanapalus, I hold it convenient to vse more particular discourse, that we may not wander in too great vncertaintie in the Storie of the Alfirian Kings, who have alreadic found the way into Palestina, and are not likely to

d. IIII.

Of the Affyrian Kings, descending from PHVL: and whether PHVL and BELOSUS were one person; or beads of sundrie Families, that raigned a-part in Niniue and Babylon.

Y that which hath formerly beene shewed of Sardanapalus his death. it is apparant, that the chiefe therein was Arbaces the Median; to whom the rest of the Consederates did not only submit themselves in that Warre, but were contented afterwards to bee judged by him; receiuing by his authoritie sentence of death, or pardon of their forfeited lines. The first example of this his power, was shown evpon Belosus the Babylonian, by whose especiall advice and helpe, Arbaces himselfe was become so great. Yet was not this power of Arbaces exercised in so tyrannical manner, as might give offence in that great alteration of things, eyther to the Princes that had affifted him, or to the generalitie of the people. For in the condemnation of Belofus, heyled the counfaile of his other Captaines, and then pardoned him of his owne Grace; allow-40 ing him to hold, not only the Citic and Province of Babylon, but also those treasures, for embezeling whereof his life had beene endangered. In like manner, he gaue rewards to the rest of his partakers, and made them Rulers of Prouinces; retayning (as it appeares) only the Soueraignetie to himfelfe, which to vse immoderately hee did naturally abhorre. Hee is said, indeede, to have excited the Medes against Sardanapalus, by propounding vnto them hope of transferring the Empire to their Nation. And to make good this his promise, hee destroyed the Citie of Niniue; permitting the Citizens neuerthelesse to take and carrie away euery one his owne goods. The other Nations that io yned with him, as the Persians and Bactrians, he drew to his side, by the allurement of libertie; which 50 he himselfe so greatly loued, that by flacking too much the reines of his owne Soueraigetic, he did more harme to the generall estate of Media, than the pleasure of the freedome, which it enjoyed, could recompence. For both the Territorie of that Countrey was pared narrower by Salmanaffar (or perhaps by some of his Progenitors) whom wee finde, in the Scriptures, to have held some Townes of the Medes, and the civil administration was so disorderly, that the people themselves were glad to fee that reformation, which Deinees, the fift of Arbaces his Line, did make in that government, by reducing them into stricter termes of obedience.

How the force of the Allyrians grew to be fuch, as might in fourescore yeeres, if not sooner, both extend it selfe vnto the conquest of israel, and teare away some part of Media, it is a question hardly to be answered; not only in regard of the destruction of Niniue, and subuction of the Affrian Kingdome, whereof the Medes. under Arbaces, had the honour, who may feemeat that time to have kept the Affirians under their fubication, when the reli of the Prouinces were fet at libertie; but in confideration of the Kings themselves, who raigning afterwardes in Babylon and 10 Niniue, are confounded by some, and distinguished by others; whereby their Hi-

I will first therefore deliuer the opinion generally received, and the grounds ' whereupon it stands: then, producing the objections made against it; I will compare together the determination of that worthic man lofeph Scaliger, with those learned that subscribe thereunto, and the judgement of others that were more ancient Writers, or have followed the Ancients in this doubtfull case. Neyther shall it be needfull to fet downe a-part the seuerall authorities and arguments of fundrie men adding somewhat of weight or of clearnesse one to another: it will be enough to relate the whole substance of each discourse; which I will doe as briefly as I can, 20 and without feare to be taxed of partialitie, as being no more addicted to the one opinion than to the other, by any fancic of mine owne, but meerely led by thosereafons which vpon examination of each part, feemed to me most forceable, though to others they may perhaps appeare weake.

That which, vntill of late, bath passed as current, is this; That Belofus was the fame King, who, first of the Assyrians, entred Palastina with an Armie; being called Put, or Phul, in the Scriptures, and by Annius his Authours with such as tollow them, Phul Belochus. Of this man it is faid, that he was a skilfull Astrologer, subtile, and ambitious; that he got Bibylon by composition made with Aibaces; and that not therewith content, he got into his hand part of Affgria: finally, that hee raigned 30 eight and fortie yeeres, and then dying, left the Kirgdome to Teglat phala (ar his Sonne, in whose Posteritie it continued some few descents, till the house of Mero. dach premailed. The truth of this, if Annius his Metasthenes were sufficient proofe, could not be gainfaid : for that Authour (fuch as he is) is peremprove herein. But, howfoener sinnius his Authors deserve to be suspected, it stands with no reason that we should conclude all to be false which they affirme. They, who maintaine this Tradition, justifie it by divers good Allegations, as a matter confirmed by circumstances found in all Authours, and repugnant vnto no Historie at all. For it is manifest by the relation of Diodorus ( which is indeed the foundation whereupon all haue built) that Arbaces and Belofus were Partners in the action against Sardan palus; 40 and that the Bactrians, who joyned with them, were thought well rewarded with libertie, as likewise other Captaines were with gouernements; but that any third Person was so eminent, as to haue Assyria it selfe, the chiefe Country of the Empire, bestowed vpon him, it is a thing whereof not the least apparence is found in any Historie. And certainly it stood with little reason, that the Assyrians should bee committed vnto a peculiar King at such time as it was not thought meet to trust them in their owne wals and houses. Rather it is apparent, that the destruction of Niniue by Arbaess, and the transplantation of the Citizens, was held a needfull policie because thereby the people of that Nation might be kept downe, from aspiring to recouer the Soueraigntie, which else they would have thought to belong, as of right, 50 vnto the Seat of the Empire.

Vpon such considerations did the Romans, in ages long after following, destroy Carthage and dissolue the Corporation, or Bodie politike, of the Citizens of Capua; because those two Townes were capable of the Empire: a matter esteemed ouerdangerous even to Rome it selfe, that was Mistresse of them both. This being so, how Tull contra can it be thought that the Affyrians in three or foure yeeres had erected their King- Rullium, or . 2. dome a-new, vnder one Pul? or what must this Pul have beene (of whose desernings, or entermedling, or indeed of whose very name, wee find no mention in the Warre against Sardanapalus) to whom the principall part of the Empire fell, eyther by generall consent in dimfion of the Provinces, or by his owne power and purchase very soone after? Surely he was none other than Belofts; whose neere Neighbourhood gaue him opportunitie (as he was wife enough to play his owne game) both to get Affyria to himselfe, and to empeach any other man, that should have attempted to to seize vpon it. The Province of Babylon, which Belofus held, being (as Herodotus Herodotus Herodotus) reports) in riches; and power, as good as the third part of the Persian Empire, was able to furnish him with all that was requisite for such a businesse: if that were not . enough, he had gotten into his owne bands all the gold and filter that had beene in the Palace of Niniue. And questionlesse to restore such a Citic as Niniue, was an enterprise fit for none to take in hand, except he had such meanes as Belosts had; which

Pal, if he were not Belofus, is likely to have wanted.

CHAP.23. S.4.

Besides all this, had Pul beene a distinct person from Belosus, and Lord of Assiria, which lay beyond the Countries of Babylon and Mesopotamia, it would not have beene an easie matter for him, to passe quite through another mans Kingdome with an Armie, feeking bootie afarre off in ifrael: the only action by which the name of Phul is knowne. But if we grant, that he, whom the Scriptures call Pul or Phul, was he same whom prophane writers have called Belosus, Beleses, and Belestis, (in like manner as Iofephus acknowledgeth, that hee, whom the Scriptures called neuer o- 10fepant, b. 18 therwise than Daries the Mede, was the Sonne of Astrages, and called of the Greekes cap-12. by another name, that is, Cyaxares) then is this scruple veterly remootted. For Ban bylon and Mesopotamia did border upon Syria and Palastina: so that Belosus, having Tettled his affaires in Affricatowards the East and North, might with good leifure encroach vpon the Countries that lay on the other fide of his Kingdome, to the South and West. He that lookes into all particulars, may find enery one circum-30 stance concurring to proue that Phul who invaded I/rael, was none other than Belofus. For the Prince of the Arabians, who joyned with Arbaces, and brought no small part of the forces wherewith Sardanapalus was overthrowne, did enter into that action, meerely for the love of Belofus. The friendship of these Arabians was a thing of maine importance, to those that were to passe ouer Euchrates with an Armic into Syria. Wherefore Belofus, that held good correspondence with them; and whose most fruitfull Province, adjoyning to their barraine quarters, might yearely doe them inclimable pleasures; was not only like to have quiet passage through their borders, but their vemost affistance; yea, it stands with good reason, that they, who loued not Israel, should for their owne behoofe have given him intelligence, of the 40 destruction and civill broyles among the tenne Tribes; whereby, as this Pulgot a thousand falents, so it seemes that the Syrians and Arabians, that had felt an heavie Neighbour of Ieroboam, recovered their owne, fetting vp a new King in Damafeo, and clearing the Coast of Arabia, (from the Sea of the Wildernesse to Hamash) of the Hebrew Garrisons. Neyther was it any new acquaintance, that made the Nations divided by Euphrates hold together in fo good termes of friendship: it was ancient confanguinitie; the memorie whereof was availeable to the Syrians, in the time of David, when the Aramites beyond the Rivercame over willingly, to the succour of Hadadezer, and the Aramites about Damasco. So Belos us had good reason to looke into those parts; what a King raigning so farre off as Niniue, should have to doe in 50 Syria, if the other end of his Kingdome had not reached to Euphrates, it were hard to fhew.

But concerning this last argument of the businesse which might allure the Chaldeans into Palestina, it may be doubted, lest it should seeme to have ill coherence with that which hath beene faid of the long Anarchic that was in the tenne Tribes.

For if the Crowne of Israel were worne by no man in three and twentie yeeres, then is it likely that Belofus was eyther vnwilling to stirre, or vnable to take the aduantage when it was fairest, and first discovered. This might have compelled those, who alone were not strong enough, to seeke after helpe from some Prince that lay further off; and so the opinion of those that distinguish Phul from Belosus, would be somewhat confirmed. On the other side, if we say, that Belosus did passe the Riuer of Euphrates as soone as hee found likelihood of making a prosperous journey. then may it feeme that the inter-regnum in I frael was not fo long as we have made it: for three and twentie yeeres leifure would have afforded better opportunitie, which ought not to have beene loft.

For answere hereunto, we are to consider, what Orosius and Eusebius have written concerning the Chaldees: the one, that after the departure of Arbaces into Media, they laid hold on a part of the Empire: the other, that they preuailed and grew mightie, betweene the times of Arbaces and Deioces the Medes. Now though it be held an errour of Orofius, where he supposeth that the occupying of Babylonia by the Chaldeans, was in manner of a rebellion from the Medes; yet herein hee and Eufebius doc concurre, that the authoritie of Arbaces did restraine the ambition, which by his absence grew bold, and by his death, regardfull only of it selfe. Now, though fome have conjectured that all Affyria was given to Belofus (as an overplus, belides the Province of Babylon, which was his by plaine bargaine made aforehand) in re- 20 gard of his high deseruings, yet the opinion more commonly received is, that hee did only encroch upon that Prouince by little and little, whilest Arbaces lived, and afterwards dealing more openly, got it all himselfe. Seeing therefore, that there pailed but twelve yeeres betweene the death of Arbaces, and the beginning of Memahem his Raigne; manifest it is, that the conquest of Asserting, and settling of that Countrey, was worke enough to hold Belofus occupyed, befides the restauration of Niniue, which alone was able to take vp all the time remaining of his Raigne, if perhaps he lived to see it finished in his owne dayes. So that this argument may rather ferue to prove that Phul and Belofus were one person; for as much as the journey of Phulagainst Ifrael was not made untill Belofus could find leifure; and the time of 20 advantage which Belofus did let slip, argued his businesse in some other quarter, namely in that Province of which Phul is called King. Briefly, it may bee faid, that he who conquered Affria, and performed somewhat vpon a Countrie so farre distant as Palestina, was likely to have beene, at least, named in some Historie, or, if not himselfe, yet his Countrey to have beene spoken of forthose victories: but we neither heare of Phul, in any prophane Authour, neyther doth any Writer, facred or prophane, once mention the victories or acts what some of the Assirans, done in those times; whereas of Belosus, and the power of the Chaldeans, wee find good Re-

Surely, that great flaughter of fo many thousand Assirians, in the quarrell of Sar- 40 danapalus, together with other calamities of that long and vnfortunate warre, which ouerwhelmed the whole Countrey, not ending but with the ruine and vtter defolation of Niniue, must needes have so weakened the state of Assiria, that it could not in thirtie yeeres space be able to inuade Palastina, which the ancient Kings, raigning in Niniue, had, in all their greatnesse, forborne to attempt. Yet these afflictions, disabling that Countrey, did helpe to enable Belofus to Subdue it; who having once extended his Dominion to the borders of Media, and being (especially if he had compounded with the Meds) by the interpolition of that Countrey, scure of the Seythinns, and other warlike Nations on that side, might very well turne Southward, and trie his fortune in those Kingdomes; whereinto civill diffention of the inhabi- 50 tants, and the bordering enuie of the Arabians and Aramites about Damasco, friends and Coulins to the Chal leans and Mesopotamians, did inuite him. For these, and the other before alledged reasons, it may be concluded, That what is said of Pul in the Scriptures, ought to be vnderstood of Belofus; euch as by the names of Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Artashasht, and Abashuerosh, with the like, are thought, or knowne, to be meant the same, whom prophane Historians, by names better knowne in their own Countries, haue called Nabopollassar, Cyaxares, and Artaxerxes: especially considering, that hereby we shall neither contradict any thing that hath beene written of olde, nor neede to trouble our selues and others with framing new conjectures. This in effect is that, which they alledge in maintenance of the opinion commonly received.

Now this being once granted; other things, of more importance, will of themfelues easily follow. For it is a matter of no great consequence to know the truth of 10 this point (confidering it apart from that which depends thereon) Whether Pul were Belofus, or some other man: the whole race of these Affirian and Babylonian Kings, wherin are found those famous Princes, Nabonaffer, Mardocempadus, and Nabopollassar (famous for the Astronomicall observations recorded from their times) is the maine ground of this contention. If therefore Belofus or Belefis were that Phul which inuaded Ifrael; if he and his posteritie raigned both in Niniue and in Babylon; if he were father of Teglat-Phal-Afar, from whom Salmanafar, Senacherib, and Afarhaddon descended: then it is manifest, that we must seeke Nabonassar, the Babylonian King among these Princes; yea, and conclude him to be none other then Salmana. far, who is knowne to have raigned in those yeeres, which Ptolomey the Mathemati-20 cian hath affigned vnto Nabonassar. As for Merodach, who supplanted Asar-haddon, manifest it is, that he and his successors were of another house. This is the scope and end of all his disputation.

But they that maintaine the contrarie part, will not bee satisfied with such conjectures. They lay hold vpon the conclusion, and by shaking that into pieces, hope to ouerthrow all the premisses, upon which it is inferred. For (fay they) if Nabonasfar, that raigned in Babylon, could not be Salmanasfar, or any of those other Assyrian Kings, then is it manifest, that the races were distinct, and that Phul and Belosus were feuerall Kings. This confequence is so plaine, that it needs no confirmation. To proue that Nabonassar was a distinct person from Salmanassar, are brought such argu-

30 ments as would stagger the resolution of him that had sworne to hold the contrarie. For first, Nabonassar was King of Babylon, and not of Assiria. This is proved by his name, which is meerely Chaldean, whereas Salman, the first part of Salmanaffars name, is proper to the Afgrians. It is likewise proued by the Astronomicall obfernations, which proceeding from the Babylonians, not from the Assyrians, doe shew, that Nahonaffar, from whom Ptolomie drawes that Epocha, or account of times, was a Babylonian, and no Affyrian. Thirdly, and more strongly, it is consirmed by the successor of Nabonassar, which was Mardocempadus, called in his owne language Mero-dac-ken-pad, but more briefely in Esay his prophesie, Merodach, by the former Esay 39.1. part of his name; or Merodach Baladan, the sonne of Baladan. Now if Merodach, the 40 Sonne of Baladan, King of Babel, were the sonne of Nabonassar, then was Nabonassar none other then Baladan King of Babel, and not Salmanassar King of Assyria. What can be plainer? As for the cadence of these two names, Nabonassar & Salmanassar, which in Greeke or Latine writing hath no difference, we are taught by Scaliger, that in the Hebrew letters there is found no affinitie therein. So concerning the places of Babylonia, whereinto Salmanaffar carried captive some part of the ten Tribes; it may well be granted, that in the Province of B.b; lon Salmanaffar had gotten somewhat, yet will it not follow that he was King of Babylon it selfe. To conclude, Merodach began his raigne ouer Babylon in the fixt yeere of Hezekia, at which time Salmana sar tooke Samaria; therefore, if Salmana sar were King of Babylon, then 50 must we say that he and Merodach, yea and Nabonassar, were all one man. These are the arguments of that noble and learned Writer Iofeph Scaliger; who not contented to follow the common opinion, founded upon likelihood of coniectures, hath drawne his proofes from matter of more necessarie inference. Touching all that was said before of Phul Belosus, for the prouing that Phul and Belolus were not fundrie Kings; Ioseph Scaliger pitties their ignorance, that have from their labour to so little purpose. Honest and painefull men the confesseth that they were, who by their diligence might have wonne the good liking of their Readers, had they not, by mentioning Annius his Authors, given such offence, that men refused thereupon to reade their Bookes and Chronologies. A short answere.

For mine owne part, howfoeuer I believe nothing that Annius his Berofus, Metalthenes, and others of that stampe affirmes, in respect of their bare authoritie; vet am I not so squeamish, but that I can well enough digest a good Booke, though I finde the names of one or two of these good fellowes alleaged in it: I have (somewhat peraduenture too often) alreadie spoken my minde of Annius his Authors: 10 neverthelesse, I may say here againe, that where other Histories are silent, or speake not enough, there may we without shame borrow of these, as much as agrees with that little which elsewhere we finde, and serueth to explaine or inlarge it without improbabilities.

Neither indeede are those honest and painefull men (as Scaliger termes them, meaning, if I miltake him not; good filly fellowes) who fet downe the Asyrian Kings from Pul forwards, as Lords also of Babylon, taking Pul for Belofin, and Salmanagar for Nabonagar, fuch Writers as a man should be eashamed or vnwilling to read. For (to omit a multitude of others, that herein follow Annies, though difliking him in generall) Gerard Mercator is not so slight a Chronologer, that hee should be 20 laughed out of doores, with the name of an honest meaning fellow.

But I will not make comparisons betweene Scaliger and Mercator, they were both of them men notably learned: let vs examine the arguments of Scaliger, and see whether they be of such force, as cannot either be resisted or avoided. It will easily be granted, that Nabonasar was King of Babylon; that hee was not King of Asyria, fome men doubt whether Scaligers reasons be enough to proue. For though Nabonasar bea Chaldean name, and Salmanasar an Asyrian; yet what hinders vs from beleeuing that one man in two languages might bee called by two feuerall names? That Astronomie flourished among the Chaldees, is not enough to proue Nabonasar scal, canon, i. either an Astrologer, or a Chaldean. So it is, that Scaliger himselfe calls them, Pro- 30 phetas nescio quos, qui NABONAS SARYM Astronomum suisse in somnis viderunt; Prophets I know not who that in their fleepe have dreamt of NABONASSAR, that he was an

Whether Nabonasar were an Astrologer or no, I cannot tell; it is hard to maintaine the negative. But as his being Lord over the Chaldeans, doth not prove him to have been elearned in their sciences; so doth it not prove him, not to have been also King of Asyria. The Emperor Charles the fift, who was borne in Gant, and Philip his Sonne, King of Spaine, and Lords of the Netherlands, had men farre more learned in all Sciences, and particularly in the Mathematicks, among their Subjects of the Low Countries, then were any that I read of then living in Spaine, if Spaine at 40 that time had any; yet I thinke, Posteritie will not vsethis as an argument, to proue that Spaine was none of theirs. It may well be, that Salmana Sar or Nabona Sar, did vie the Allyrian Souldiers, and Babylonian Schollers: but it feemes, that hee and his posteritie, by giving themselves wholly to the more warlike Nation, lost the richer, out of which they first issued; as likewise King Philip lost partly, and partly did put to a dangerous hazard all the Netherlands, by fuch a course. As for the two vnanfwerable arguments, (as Scaliger termes them, being me thinks none other than anfweres to somewhat that is or might be alleaged on the contrarie side) one of them which is drawne from the vnlike found and writing of those names, Salmana far and Nabonaffar in the Hebrew, I hold a point about which no man will dispute; for it is 50 not likenesse of found, but agreement of time, and many circumstances else, that must take away the distinction of persons: the other likewise may be granted; which is, that Salmana Sar might be Lord of some places in the Province of Babylon, yet not King of Babylon it selfe: this indeede might bee so, and it might be otherwise. Hitherto

Hitherto there is nothing faue conjecture against conjecture But in that which is alleaged out of the Prophet Efar, concerning Merodich the Sonne of Baladan; and in that which is faid of this Merodach, or Mardokenpadus, his being the Successor of Nabonassar, and his beginning to raigne in the fixt veere of idezekia, I finde matter of more difficultie, than can be answered in hast. I will therefore deferre the handling of these objections, untill I meete with their subject in his proper place; which will be when we come to the time of Hezekia, wherein Merodach hued & was King. Yet that I may not leaue too great a scruple in the minde of the Reader, thus farre will I herefatisfie him; that how strong soener this argument may seeme, Scalito ger himselfe did live to retract it, ingenvously confetting, that in thinking Merodach to be the Sonne of Nabonassar, he had beene deceined.

Nowtherefore let vs confider, in what for they have fashioned their Storie, who taking Pulto be a diffined person from Belofus or Beleftis, have in like fort, as was necessarie, diffinguished their off-spring, making that of Pul to faile in Alarhaddon, which left all to Merodach the Babylonian. And here I must first confesse mine owne want of Bookes, if perhaps there be many, that have gone about to reduce this narration into some such order, as might present vnto vs the bodie of this Historie, in one view. Divers, indeede, there are, whom I have feene, that fince lofeph Scaliger deliuered his opinion, have written in fauour of some one or other point thereof: 20 but Sethus Calinfins himfelfe, who hath abridged Scaligers learned Worke, Deemendatione Temporum, hath not beene carefull to give vs notice, how long Belefus, Baladan, Pul, or Tiglat Pulaffar, did raigne, (perhaps because he found it not expressed in Soiliger) but is content to let downe Baladam, for the same person with Nabonassar, which Scalig r himselfe renoked. In this case therefore I must lay downe the plot of these deuided Kingdomes, in such fort as I finde it contriued by Augustinus Torniellus; who onely of all that I have seene, sets downe the succession, continuance, and acts, of those that raigned in Asyria after Sardanapalus, distinguishing them from Belofin, and his Posteritie, of whom he hath the like remembrance. This Torniellus is a Regular Clarke of the congregation of S. Paul, whose Annales were printed the 3º last yeere; he appeares to me a man of curious industrie, found judgement, and free Spirit; yet many times (and I take it, wilfully) forgetfull of thanking, or mentioning those Protestant Writers, by whose Bookes hee hath received good information, and enriched his workes by inferting somewhat of theirs. But in this businesse he hath openly professed to follow Scaliger, whose helpe, without wrong or dishonour to him life, hee hath both vied and acknowledged. For mine owne part, I will not spare to doe right vnto Torniellus; but confesse my selfe to have received benefit by his writing; and wish that his Annales had sooner come to light; for that as hee hard much confirmed mee in some things, so would hee have instructed and emboldened mee, to write more fully and leffe timorously in other things 40 which now I have not leifure to renife. Particularly in that coniecture (which I had faintly deliuered, and yet feared left it had ouer-haftily passed out of my hand, and beene exposed to other mens constructions) of the foure Kings that inuaded the Vallie of S.dam, and were flaine by Abraham, I finde him aduenturing as I have C.1, 0.13. done, to fay, that they may probably be thought to have been some pettic Lords; the contrarie opinion of all Writers not with standing. But now let vs consider how he hath ordered these last Asyrian and Babylonian Kings.

After the destruction of Sardanapalus, Arbaces being the most mightie, sought to get all to himselfe, but was opposed by Belosus; in which contention, one Phul, a powerfull man in Asyria, fided with Belofus, and they two prevailed so farre, that fi-

50 nally Arbaces was content to share the Empire with them, making such a division thereof, as was long after made of the Roman Empire, betweene Octavian, Anthonie.

Another conjecture is (for Torniellus offers not this, or the rest, as matter of certainetie) that Arbaces made himselfe Soueraigne Lord of all, and placed the seate of his Empire in Media, appointing Belofus his Lieutenant in Babylonia, and Phal in Assiria. But in short space, that is, in source yeeres, it came to passe, by the just judgement of God, that Phul and Belofus rebelled against Arbaces, like as Arbaces had done against Sardanapalus, and in stead of being his Viceroyes, made themselves absolute Kings. And to this later opinion Torniellus himselfe leanes, holding it much the more probable, as being more agreeable to that which is found in prophane Histories. Why he did make and publish the former supposition, resoluing to hold the later, I shall anon, without any wrong to him, make bold to guesse. Hauing thus deuised, how Phul and Relosus might, at the first, attaine to be Kings, hee orders their time, and their fuccessors, in this manner.

Foure yeeres after Arbaces, Phul beginnes to raigne, and continues eight and fortie yeeres. Theglatphalafar (whose name, and the names of other Princes. I write diverfly, according as the Authors whom I have in hand are pleafed to diverfifie them) succeeding vnto Phul, raigned three and twentie. Salmanassar followed him, and raigned tenne. After him Senacharib raigned feuen: and when hee was flaine. Afarhaddon his sonne tenne veeres; in whom that Line failed.

The same time that Phul tooke vpon him as King of Assiria, or not long after, (why not rather afore? for so it had beene more likely) Belosus vsurped the Kingdome of Babylon, and held it threescore and eight yeeres; at the least threescore and eight yeeres did passe, before N abonassar followed him in the possession.

To Nabonassar, whom (with Scaliger) hee thinkes to be Baladan, are affigued fixe and twentie yeeres: then, two and fiftie to Merodach, or Mardocempadus: foure and twentie to Ben Merodach: and lastly, one and twenty to Nabolassar, the father of Nabuchodonofor, who is like to offer matter of further disputation.

Concerning the original of these Assyrian and Babylonian Kingdomes, I may truly fay, That the conjectures of other men, who give all to Belofus, and confound him with Phul, appeare to me more neerely resembling the truth. Neither doe I thinke, that Torniellus would have conceived two different wayes, by which Phul might have gotten Assyria (for how Belosus came to get Babylon, it is plaine enough) if either of them alone could have contented him. Headhæres to the later of the 20 two, as better agreeing with Diodore, and other Historians. But he perceived that to make Phul on the suddaine King of Asyria; or to give him so noble a Province, as would of it selfe, inuite him to accept the name and power of a King, was a thing most vnlikely to have happened, vnlesse his deserts (whereof wee finde no mention) had beene proportionable to so high a reward. And for this cause (as I take it) hath hee deuised the meanes, whereby Phul might be made capable of so great a share in the Empire. If this were a true or probable supposition, then would a new doubt arife, Why this Phul, being one of the three that divided all betweene them, was vtterly forgotten by all Historians? yea, why this Division it selfe, and the civile Warres that caused it, were never heard of. Questionlesse, the interver- 40 ting of some Treasures by Belosus, with his Judgement, Condemnation, and Pardon following, were matters of farre lesse note. Therefore I doe not see, how one of the two inconveniences can this way be avoided; but that either wee must contesse, the Dominion given to Phul to have beene exceeding his merits, or else his merits, and name withall, to have beene strangely forgotten: either of which is enouga to make vs thinke, that rather the conjecture, inferring such a sequele, is wide of the truth. As for the rebellion of Phul and Belofus against Arbaces, it was almost impossible for the Assyrians to recouer such strength in foure yeeres, as might ferue to hold out in rebellion: for Belofus, it was needleffe to rebell, confidering, that Arbaces did not seeke to molest him, but rather permitted (as being an ouer- 50 great fauourer of libertie) euen the Medes, that were vnder his owne Gouernment, to doe what they lifted.

But it is now fit that wee perule the Catalogue of these Kings: not passing through them all (for some will require a large discourse in their owne times) but speaking of their order and time in generall. If it bee so vulawfull to thinke, that fome of Annius his tales (let them all be counted his tales, which are not found in other Authors as well in his) may bee true, especially such, as contradict no acknowledged truth, or apparant likelihood, why then is it said, that Phal did raigne in Allyria eight and fortie yeeres? For this hath no other ground than Annius. It is true, that painefull and judicious Writers have found this number of yeeres, to agree fitly with the course of things in History: yet all of them tooke it from Annius. Let it therefore be the punishment of Annius his forgerie (as questionlesse he is often guiltie of this crime) that when he tells truth, or probabilitie, hee be not belee-10 ned for his owne fake; though for our owne fakes we make vie of his boldneffe, taking his words for good, whereas (nothing else being offered) wee are vnwilling our selues to be Authors, of new, though not vnprobable conjectures. Herein we shall have this commoditie, that wee may without blushing alter a little, to helpe our owne opinions, and lay the blame vpon Annius, against whom wee shall be sure to finde friends that will take our part.

CHAP.23. S.4. of the Historie of the World.

The raignes of Theglathalasar and Salmanassar did reach, by Annius his meafure, to the length of fine and twentie yeeres the one, and senenteene the other; Tornicllu hath cut off two from the former, and seuen from the later of them, to fit (as I thinke) his owne computation; vsing the libertie whereof I spake last: for that any Author, faue our good Metasthenes, or those that borrowed of him, hath gone about to tell how long each of these did raigne, it is more then I have yet found. To Senasherib and Afarbaeldon, Torniellus giues the same length of raigne, which is found in Metaschenes. I thinke there are not many, that will arrogate so much vnto them clues, as may well bee allowed vnto a man so judicious as is Torniellus: yet could wish, that he had forborne to condemne the followers of Annius, in this bufinesse, wherein he himselfe hath chosen, in part, rather to become one of them.

The like libertie we finde that he hath vsed in measuring the raignes of the Chaldeans; filling up all the space betweene the end of Sardanapalus, and the beginning 30 of Nabonassar, with the threescore and eight yeeres of velosis. In this respect it was, perhaps, that heethought Belofus might have begunne his raigne somewhat later then Phal; for threefcore and eight yeeres would feeme along time for him to hold a Kingdome, that was no yong man when he tooke possession of it. But how is any whit of his age abated by shortning his raigne, seeing his life reacheth to the end of fuch a time, as were alone, without adding the time wherein hee was a private man, enough for a long liver? Indeede, eight and fortie yeeres had beene somewhat of the most, considering that hee seemes by the Storie to have been little lesse, at such time as hee joyned with Arbaces; and therefore the addition of twentic yeeres did vvell deserve that note (which Torntellus advisedly gives) that if his raigne extended not of farre, then the raigne of fuch as came after him, occupied the middle time, vnto

I neither doe reprehend the boldnesse of Torniellus, in conjecturing, nor the modestie of Scaliger and Sethus Caluifius, in forbearing to set downe as warrantable, such things as depend only vpon likelihood. Forthings, whereof the perfect knowledge is taken away from vs by Antiquitie, must be described in Flistorie, as Geographers in their Maps describe those Countries, whereof as yet there is made no true discouerie, that is, either by leauing some part blanke, or by inserting the Land of Pigmies, Rocks of loade-stone, with Head-lands, Bayes, great Riuers, and other particularities, agreeable to common report, though many times controlled by follow-50 ing experience, and found contrarie to truth. Yet indeede the ignorance growing from distance of place, allowes not such libertie to a Describer, as that which arifeth from the remedilesse oblinion of consuming time. For it is true that the

Nor Southerne heate, nor Northerne fnow That freezing to the ground doth grow, The subject Regions can fence, And keepe the greedie Marchant thence. The subtile Shipmen way will find, Storme neuer fo the Seas with winde.

Therefore the fictions (or let them be called conjectures) painted in Maps, doe ferue only to mislead such discourrers as rashly believe them; drawing upon the publishers, eyther some angry curses, or well deserved scorne; but to keepe their own credit, they cannot serue alwaies. To which purpose I remember a pretic jest of Don Pedro de Sarmiento, a worthie Spanish Gentleman, who had beene employed by his King in planting a Colonie vpon the Streights of Magellan: for when I asked him, 20 being then my Prisoner, some question about an Island in those Streights, which me thought, might have done eyther benefit or displeasure to his enterprise, he told me merrily, that it was to be called the Painters wives Island; faying, That whilest the fellow drew that Map, his wife fitting by, defired him to put in one Countrey for her; that the, in imagination, might have an Island of her owne. But in filling vp the blankes of old Histories, we need not be so scrupulous. For it is not to be seared, that time should runne backward, and by restoring the things themselues to knowledge, make our conjectures appeare ridiculous: What if some good Copie of an ancient Author could bee found, shewing (if wee haue it not alreadie) the perfect truth of these vncertainties? would it be more shame to have beleeved in the meane 30 while, Annius or Torniellus, than to have beleeved nothing? Here I will not fay that the credit, which we give to Annius, may chance otherwhiles to be given to one of those Authors whose names he pretendeth. Let it suffice, that in regard of authority, I had rather trust Scaliger or Torniellus, than Annius, yet him than them, if his aftertion bee more probable, and more agreeable to approved Histories than their conjecture, as in this point it seemes to me; it having moreover gotten some credit, by the approbation of many, and those not meanly learned.

To end this tedious disputation, I hold it a sure course in examination of such opinions, as have once gotten the credit of being generall, fo to deale as Pacunius in Capua did with the multitude, finding them desirous to put all the Senatours of the 40 Citie to death. He lockt the Senatours vp within the State-house, and offered their liues to the Peoples mercie; obtayning thus much, that none of them should perish, vntill the Commonaltie had both pronounced him worthie of death, and elected a better in his place. The condemnation was haftie; for as fast as every name was read, all the Towne cryed, Lethim dye: but the execution required more leifure; for in substituting another, some notorious vice of the Person, or basenesse of his condition, or infufficiencie of his qualitie, made each new one that was offered, to be rejected: so that finding the worfe and lesse choise, the further and the more that they fought, it was finally agreed, that the old should be kept for lack of better.

Of the Olympiads, and the time when they began.

Fter this division of the Assyrian Empire, followes the inflauration of the Olympian games, by Iphitus, in the raigne of the same King Vzzia, and in his one and fiftieth years. It is, I know, the generall opinion, that these games were established by Iphitus, in the first of Iotham: yet is not that opinion so generall, but that Authors, waightic enough, haue given to them a more early beginning. The truth is, that in fitting those things vnto the facred Historie, which are found in prophane Authors, wee should not bee too carefull of drawing the Hebrewes to those workes of time, which had no reference to their affaires; it is enough, that fetting in due order these beginnings of accompts, we joyne them to matters of Israel and Inda, where occasion

These Olympian games and exercises of activitie, were first instituted by Hercules, who measured the length of the race by his owne foot; by which Pythagor as found out the stature and likely strength of Hercules his bodic. They tooke name, not from the Mountaine Olympus, but from the Citic Olympia, otherwise Pisa, neere vin-20 to Elis; where also Iupiters Temple in Elis, famous among the Gracians, and reputed among the wonders of the World, was knowne by the name of the Temple of Iupiter Olympius. These games were exercised from every fourth yeare compleat in the plaines of Elis, a Citic of Peloponnesus, necre the River Alpheus.

A feet the death of Hercules, these meetings were discontinued for many yeares, and Gell. 1. c. Law-giuer then liuing: from which time they were continued by the Gracians, till Hermippus. the raigne of Theodosius the Emperor, according to Cedrenus: other thinke that they were dissolued under Constantine the Great. From this institution, Varro accompted the Gracian times, and their stories, to be 30 certaine: but reckoned all before either doubtfull, or fabulous: and yet Plinie gives Plinie gives Plinie gives little credit to all that is written of Greece, till the raigne of Cyrus, who beganne in the five and fiftieth Olympiad, as Eufebius out of Diodore, Caftor, Polybius, and others hath gathered, in whose time the seuen wife Gracians flourished. For Solon had speech with Crassus, and Crassus was overthrowne and taken by Cyrus.

Many patient and piercing braines have laboured to finde out the certaine beginning of these Olympiads, namely, to set them in the true yeare of the World, and the raigne of fuch and fuch Kings: but seeing they all differ in the first accomptathat is. of the Worlds yeare, they can hardly jumpe in particulars thereon depending.

Cyril against Iulian, and Didymus, beginne the Olympiads the nine and fortieth of AO Ofias, or Azariah.

Eufebins, who is contrarie to himselfe in this reckoning, accompts with those that Eufeb. de Prap. finde the first Olympiad in the beginning of the foure hundreth and fixth veere after Enang. 1.10,6.3. Troy, yet he telleth vs, that it was in the fiftieth yeare of Vzzia, which is (as I finde it)

Eratosthenes placeth the first Olympiad foure hundred and seven yeares after Troy, Eratosth, apud reckoning the yeares that passed betweene; to whom Dionysius Halicarnoffeus, Dio-Clem. Alex.
Strongly. dorus Siculus, Solinus, and many others adhere.

The distance betweene the destruction of Troy, and the first Olympiad, is thus collected by Eratosthenes. From the taking of Troy, to the descent of Hercules his Po-50 steritie into Peloponnesus, were fourescore yeares; thence to the Ionian expedition, threescore yeares; from that expedition to the time of Lycurgus his government in Sparta, one hundred fiftie nine; and thence to the first O'ympiad, one hundred and eight yeares. In this account the first yeare of the first Olympiad is not included.

CHAP. 27. S. 6.

But vaine labour it were, to feeke the beginning of the Olympiads, by numbring the yeares from the taking of Troy, which is of a date farre more vncertaine. Let it fuffice, that by knowing the inftauration of these games, to have beene in the foure hundreth and eight yeare current after Troy, we may reckon backeto the taking of that Citic, fetting that, and other accidents, which have reference thereto, in their proper times. The certaintie of things following the Olympiads, must teach vs how to finde when they began.

To this good vie, we have the enfuing yeares, vnto the death of Alexander the Great, thus divided, by the same Eratosthenes. From the beginning of the Olympiads, to the paffage of Xerxes into Greece, two hundreth fourefcore and feuenteen yeares: 10 from thence to the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre, eight and fortic yeares; forwards to the victorie of Lylander, seuen and twentie; to the battaile of Leuctra. thirtie foure; to the death of Philip King of Macedon, fine and thirtie; and finally to the death of Alexander, twelve. The whole summe ariseth to foure hundred fiftie and three yeares; which number he otherwise also collecteth, and it is allowed by the most.

Now for placing the institution of the Olympiads in the one and fiftieth years of Vzziah, we have arguments, grounded vpon that which is certaine, concerning the beginning of Cyrus his raigne, and the death of Alexander; as also vpon the Astronomical calculation of fundrie Ecliples of the Sunne as of that which happened, when 20 Xerxes fet out of Sardis with his Armie to inuade Greece; and of diversother.

Touching Cyrus, it is generally agreed that his raigne as King, before hee was Lord of the great Monarchie, began the first yeere of the five and fiftieth Olympiad, and that he raigned thirtie yeeres; they who give him but twentie nine yeeres of Tull.deDiu.l.1. raigne (following Herodotus rather than Tully, Iulline, Eulebius, and others) beginne July. I.a. English de Prep. a yeere later, which comes all to one reckoning. So is the death of Alexander set by Euang. Ino c.3. all good Writers, in the first yeere of the hundreth and fourteenth Olympiad. This later note of Alexanders death, serves well to leade vs back to the beginning of Cyrus; as many the like observations doe. For if we reckon vpwards from the time of Alexander, we shall finde all to agree with the yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein Cy- 30 ress beganne his raigne, either as King, or (taking the word Monarch, to fignific a Lord of many Kingdomes) as a great Monarch. From the beginning of Cyrus, in the first veere of the fine and fiftieth Olympiad, vnto the end of the Persian Empire, which was in the third of the hundreth and twelfth Olympiad, we find two hundred and thirtie yeeres compleat: from the beginning of Cyrus his Monarchie, which lafted but seuen yeeres, we finde compleat two hundred and seuen yeeres, which was the continuance of the Persian Empire.

Now therefore feeing that the first yeere of Cyrus his Monarchie (which was the last of the sixtieth Olympiad, and the two hundreth and fortieth yeere from the inslitution of those games by Iphitus) followed the last of the seventie yeeres, of the 40 captiuitie of Inda, and desolation of the Land of Israel; manifest it is, that wee must reckon backe those seventie yeeres, and one hundred threescore and ten yeeres more, the last which passed under the Kings of Juda, to finde the first of these Olympiads; which by this accompt is the one and fiftieth of Vzzia, as wee have already noted.

The Eclipses whereof we made mention, serue well to the same purpose. For examples sake, that which was seene when Xerxes mustered his Armie at Sardis, in the two hundreth threescore and seventh yeere of Nabonassar, being the last of the threescore and fourteenth Olympiad; leades vs backe vnto the beginning of Xerxes, and from him to Cyrus, whence we have a faire way through the threefcore and ten 50 yeeres, vnto the destruction of Ierusalem; and so vpwards through the raignes of the last Kings of Iuda, to the one and fiftieth yeere of Vzzia.

Thus much may suffice, concerning the time wherein these Olympiads beganne.

To tell the great solemnitie of them, and with what exceeding great concourse of all Greece they were celebrated, I hold it a superfluous labour. It is enough to say, that all bodily exercises, or the most of them, were therein practised; as Running. Wrastling, Fighting, and the like. Neither did they onely contend for the Mastrie in those feates, whereof there was good vse, but in running of Chariots, fighting with Whorle bats, and other the like ancient kinds of exercises, that served onely for oftentation. Thirther also repaired Orators, Poets, Musicians, and all than thought themselues excellent in any laudable qualitie, to make triall of their skill. Yea the very Cryers, which proclaimed the victories, contended which of them 10 should get the honour, of having plaied the best part.

The Eleans were Presidents of those Games; whose justice, in pronouncing without partialitie, who did best, is highly commended. As for the rewards given to the Victors, they were none other than Garlands of Palme, or Oline, without any other commoditie following, than the reputation. Indeede there needed no more. For that was held so much, that when Diagoras had seene his three Sonnes crowned for their feuerall victories in those games, one came running to him with this gratulation: Morere, DIAGORAS, non enim in calum ascensurus es; that is; Die. DIAGORAS, For thous shalt not clime up to heaven: as if there could bee no greater happinesse on earth, than what alreadie had befallen him. In the like sense Horace 20 speakes of these Victors, calling them,

Horat, Carpilla

Such as like heavenly weights doe come With an Elæan Garland home.

Neither was it only the voice of the People, or the fongs of Poets, that so highly extolled them, which had wonne these Olympian prizes; but even grave Historians 30 thought it a matter worthie of their noting. Such was (as Tullie counts it) the va- Tullie Orat. pra nitic of the Greekes, that they effected it almost as great an honor, to have wonne Flaces, the victorie at Running or Wrastling in those games, as to have triumphed in Rome for some famous victorie, or conqueit of a Prouince.

That these Olympian games were celebrated at the full of the Moone, and vpon the fifteenth day of the Moneth Hecatombeon, which dothanswere to our June; and what meanesthey ysed to make the Moneth begin with the new Moone, that the fifteenth day might be the full; I have shewed in another place. Wherefore I mav now returne vnto the Kings of Inda, and leave the merrie Greekes at their games, whom I shall meete in more serious emploiments, when the Persian quarrells draw to the bodie of this Historie into the coasts of Ionia and Hellespont.

OTHAM the Sonne of Vzziah, when hee was fine and twentie yeeres old, and in the second of Pekah King of Israel, was anointed King in 21Kings 15.33 ? Ierusalem, his Father yet living. He built an exceeding high Gate to the Temple, of threescore cubits vpright, and therefore called Ophel: besides divers Cities in the Hills of Iuda, and in the Forrests, Towers, and Palaces: heinforced the Ammonites to pay him Tribute, to wit, of Silver an hundreth talents, and of Wheate and Barly two thousand measures: hee raigned fixe and twentie yeeres: of whom Iosephus gives this testimonie: Eiusmodi vero Princeps hie fuit, ot nullum in eo virtutis genus desideres : ot qui Deum adeo pre coluerit. hominibus (uis adeoiuste prafuerit, whem ipsam tanta sibi cura essepassus sit, er tantopere auxerit, vt vniuer (um regnum hostibus quidem minime contemnendum, domesticis autem cius incolis atque cinibus fælix, faustum & fortunatum sua virtuc effecerit : This was such a Prince, as a man could finde no kinde of vertue wanting in him: hee worshipped God foreligiously, hee governed his men fo righteously, hee was fo provident for the Citie, and did so greatly amplifie it, that by his vertue and proweffe hee made his whole Kinedome not contemptible to his enemies, but to his Sernants, Inhabitants and Citizens. prosperous and happie.

This is all that I finde of lotham: his raigne was not long, but as happie in all 10 things, as he himselfe was denout and vertuous.

Auchomenes about this time succeeded Phelesteus in Corinth: after whom, the Corinthians erected Magistrates, which gouerned from yeere to yeere. And yet Paufanias in his second Booke, with Strabo and Plutarch, in many places are of opinion, That Corinth was gouerned by Kings of the race of the Bacide, to the time of Cyplelus, who droue them out.

Teglathphalaffar, or Tiglathpeleser, the sonne of Phul, the second of the Babylonians and Affyrians that was of this new race, about this time inuaded Ifrael, while Pekah (who murthered his Master Pekaiah) was King thereof. In which Expedition hee tooke most of the Cities of Nephtali and Galile, with those of Gilead, ouer Iordan, and 20 carried the inhabitants captine. This Tiglath raigned fine and twentie yeeres, according to Metasthenes. But Krentzhemius findes, that with his sonne Salmanassar he raigned yet two yeeres longer: which yeeres I would not ascribe to the sonne, because the Aera of Nabonassar beginnes with his single raigne, but reckon them to Tighlath Phulassar himselfe, who therewith raigned seven and twentie yeeres:

Afchylus, the sonne of Agamnester, about the same time, the twelfth Archon in Athens, ruled five and twentic yeeres. Aleamenes gouerned Sparta: after whom, the Estate changed, according to Eusebius: but therin surely Eusebius is mistaken. For Disdore, Plutarch, Pausanias, and others, witnesse the contrarie. Pausanias affirmeth, That Polydorus, a Prince of eminent vertues, succeeded his father, and raigned threescore 30 yeeres, and out-lived the Meffeniack Warre: which was ended by Theopompus, the sonne of Nicander, his royall companion.

At this time lived Nahum the Prophet, who fore-told the destruction of the Af-Syrian Empire, and of the Citie of Winine; which succeeded (saith Insephus) a hundred and fifteene yeeres after. The Cities of Cyrene and of Aradus were builtat this time, while in Media, Sofarmus and Mediaus raigned, being the second and third Kings of those parts.

Of ACHAZ and his Contemporaries.

HAS, or Achaz, succeeded vnto Iotham in the seventeenth yeere of Peka, the sonne of Remalia: the same being also the last yeere of his fathers raigne, who began in the second of the same Peka, and raigned sixteene. but not complete yeeres. This Abaz was an Idolater, exceeding all his predecessors. Hee made molten Images for Baalim, and burnt his sonne for sacrifice before the Idoll Moloch, or Saturne, which was represented by a man-like brazen bodie, bearing the head of a Calfe, set vp not farre from Ierusalem, in a Valley 50 shaddowed with Woods, called Gehinnom, or Tophet, from whence the word Gehenna is vsed for Hell. The children offered, were inclosed within the carkasse of this Idoll, and as the fire encreased, so the sacrificers, with a noyse of Cymbals and other Instruments, filled the ayre, to the ende the pitifull cries of the children might not be heard: which vnnaturall, cruell, and deuillish Oblation, Ieremie the Prophet vehemently reprehendeth, and of which S. Hierome vpon the tenth of Matthew hath written at large. By the prohibition in Leuiticus the eighteenth, it 6.7.19.32. appeareth that this horrible finne was ancient; in the twelfth of Deuter onomie, it is called an abomination which God hateth. That it was also practifed elsewhere, and by many Nations remote from Iudea, divers Authors witnesse; as Virgil in the fecond of his Ancids, - Sanguine placastis, &c. and Silius, - Poscere cade Deos. Saturne is faid to have brought this cultome into Italie, besides the casting of many foules into the River of Tyber, in stead of which, Hercules commanded, that the to waxen Images of men should be throwne in and drowned. The Deuill also taught the Carthaginians this kinde of butcherie, in so much, that when their Citie was beficeed, and in diffresse, the Priess made them beleeve, that because they had spared their owne children, and had bought and brought vp others to bee offered that therefore Saturne had flirred vp, and strengthened their Enemies against them: whereupon they presently caused two hundred of the noblest youths of their Citie to be flaine, and offered to Saturne or Satan, to appeale him: who befides these forenamed Nations had instructed the Rhodians, the people of Crete, and Chios, of Meffer Dion. Lt. na of Galatia, with the Maffagets, and others, in these his services: Further, as if hee Diod. 1,20. were not content to destroy the soules of many Nations in Europe, Asia, and Africa, 20 (as Acolla writeth) the Mexicans and other people of America, were brought by the Deuill under this fearefull feruitude, in which he also holdeth the Floridans and Virginians at this day.

Acoft. de Hift.

For the wickednesse of this King Ahaz, God stirred vp Rezin of Damaseus; and Pekah the Sonne of Remaliah, King of Ifrael against him, who inuaded Iudaa, and befieged Ierusalem, but entred it not.

The King of Syria, Rezin, possest himselfe of Elah by the Red Sea, and cast the Iewes out of it, and Pekah flaughtered in one day an hundred and twentie thousand Indeans, of the ablest of the Kingdome, at which time Maaleiah, the Sonne of Achaz 2. Chron. 28.6. was also slaine by Ziehri, with Azrikam the Gouernour of his house: and Eleanath 30 the second person vnto the King. Besides all this, two hundred thousand prisoners of women and children, the Ifraelites led away to Samaria: but by the counfell of the Prophet Oded, they were returned and deliucred backe againe.

As Ifrael and Aram vexed Inda on the North; so the Edomites and the Philistims, who euermore attended the ruine of Indea, entred upon them from the South; and tooke Bethfemes, Aialon, Gaderoth, Socho, Timnah, and Gemzo, flew many people, and 2.chron. 28. carried away many prisoners. Whereupon when Achaz saw himselfe environed on all sides, and that his Idolls and dead gods gaue him no comfort, hee sent to the Assyrian Tiglathpileser, to desire some alde from him against the Israelites and Aramites, presenting him with the silver and gold both of the Temple, and Kings 2-Kings 16,

Tiglathpileser wanted not a good example to follow, in making profit of the troubles that role in Palastina. His Father having lately made himselfe from a Provinciall Lieutenant, King of Babylon and Assyria, had a little before led him the way into Iudea, inuited by Menaham, King of Ifrael. Wherefore now the Sonne willingly harkened to Achaz, and embraced the advantage. As for Belochus himselfe, he was content to affigne some other time for going through with this enterprise: because (as I have faid before) he was not firmely fettled at home, and the Syrian Kings lay directly in his way, who were yet strong both in men and fame. But Tiglath, having now, with the treasures of Ierusalem, prepared his Armie, first inuaded the Terri-50 torie of Damaseus, wanne the Citic, and killed Rezin, the last of the race of the Adads, who beganne with Dauid, and ended with this Achaz. At Damascus Achaz met Tiglath, and taking thence a patterne of the Altar, sent it to Vriah the Priest, commanding the like to be made at Ierusalem, whereon at his returne hee burnt Sacrifice to the Gods of the Syrians. In the meane while Tiglath possest all Bajan, and the rest beyond Jordan, which belonged to the Tribe of Reuben, Gad, and Manasse. And then paffing the River, he mastered the Cities of Galilee, invaded Ephraim, and the King. dome of Ifrael, and made them his Vasfalls. And notwithstanding that he was innited and waged by Achaz, yet after the spoile of Ifrael, he possess himselfe of the greater part of Inda, and as it leemeth, inforced Achaz to pay him Tribute. For in the second of Kings, the eighteenth, it is written of Ezechia, that he revolted from Albur, or rebelled against him, and therefore was inuaded by Senacherib. After Ahaz had beheld and borne these miseries, in the end of the sixteenth yeere of his raigne hee died: but was not buried in the Sepulchers of the Kings of Inda. With Abaz lived Medidus, the third Prince in Media, who governed fortie yeeres, 10

have beene Sofarmus his Successiour, to whom they give fiftie yeeres.

Tiglath Phileser held the Kingdome of Assyria, all the raigne of Abaz: yet so, that Salmanaffar his Sonne may feeme to have raigned with him some part of the time. -Kings as. 16. For we finde that Abazdid fend unto the Kings of ASHVR to helpe him. The Genewa note faics, that these Kings of Ashur were Teglath Pilefer, and those Kings that were vnder his Dominion. But that hee or his Father had hitherto made fuch conquests, as might giue him the Lordship ouer other Kings, I doe neither finde any Historie, nor circumstance that proueth. Wherefore I thinke that these Kings of Ashur, were Tiglath, and Salmanassar his Sonne, who raigned with his Father, as 20 hath beene said before: though how long hee raigned with his Father, it bee hard to define.

At this time beganne the Ephori in Lacedamon, a hundred and thirtie yeeres after Plut.invitasoli. Lycurgus, according to Plutarch. Eufebius makes their beginning farrelater, namely, in the fifteenth Olympiad. Of these Ephori, Elalus was the first; Theopompus and Polydorus, being then joynt Kings. These Ephori, chosen euery yeere, were controllers, as well of their Senators as of their Kings, nothing being done without their advice and confent. For (faith Cicero) they were opposed against their Kings, as the Roman Tribunes against the Consuls. In the time of Abaz died A schrolus, who had ruled in Athens ever fince the fiftith yeere of Vzzia. Alcamenon the thirteenth of the Medon- 30 tide, or Gouernours of the Athenians (so called of Medon who followed Codrus) fucceeded his Father Afchylus, and was the last of these Governors: he ruled only two yeeres. For the Athenians changed first from Kings (after Codrus) to Governors for life; which ending in this Alcamenon, they erected a Magistrate, whom they termed an Archon, who was a kind of Burghomaster, or Gouernor of their City for ten yeeres.

This alteration Paulanias in his fourth Booke beginnes, in the first yeere of the eight Olympiad. Eufebius and Halicarnassaus in the first of the seventh Olympiad; at which time indeed, Carops the first of these, began his ten yeeres rule.

The Kingdome of the Latines governed about three hundred yeere by the Sylvij, of the race of Aneas, tooke ende the same Ahaz time: the foundation of Rome, being 40 laied by Romulus and Romus in the eight yeere of the same King. Codoman builds it the eleventh of Achaz, Bucholzer in the eighth, as I think he should, others somewhat later, and in the raigne of Ezechias. Cicero, Eutropius, Orosius, and others, square the time of the foundation to the third yeere of the fixth Olympiad. But Halicarna (leus. Solinus Antiochenus, Clemens Alexandrinus, and Eusebius, to the first yeere of the seuenth: who feeme not only to me, but to many very learned Chronologers, to have kept herein the best accompt.

Of the Antiquities of Fialie, and foundation of Rome in the time of Ahas.

N D here to speake of the more ancient times of Italia. and what Nations possess it before the arrivall of . Eneas, the place may seeme to inuite vs : the rather because much fabulous matter hath beene mixed with the truth of those elder plantations. Italie before the fall of Troy, was knowne to the Greekes by divers Hallear, Lx. names : as first Hesteria, then Ausonia, the one name arising of the Seate, the other of the Ausones, a people inhabiting part of it: one ancient name of it was also Oenotria, which it had of the Oenotri: whom Halicarnassaus thinks to have been the first, that brought a Colonie of Areadians into that Land. Afterward it was called Italie of Italies: concerning which changes of names, Virgil speakes thus.

> Est locus Hesperiam Gray cognomine dicunt: Terra antiqua, potens armis, atque vbere gleba: Oenotrij coluëre viri, nunc fama minores Italiam dixisse, ducis de nomine, gentem.

There is a Land which Greekes Helperia name, Ancient, and strong, of much fertilitie. Oenotrians held it, but we heare by fame, That by late ages of Posteritie, 'Tis from a Captaines name called Italie.

Who this Captaine or King may have beene, it is very vicertaine. For Virgil 42 speakes no more of him, and the opinions of others are many and repugnant. But like enoughit is, that the name which hath continued so long upon the whole Countrie, and worne out all other denominations, was not at the first accepted without good cause. Therefore to finde out the original of this name, and the first planters of this noble Countrie, Reineccius hath made a very painful search, and not improbable conjecture. And first of all he grounds upon that of Halicarna flans, Halicarn las, who speakes of a Colonie which the Eleans did leade into Italie, before the name of Italie was given to it: Secondly, vpon that of Iustine, who faith, that Brundusium tus. 1.12. was a Colonie of the Etolians: Thirdly, vpon that of Strabo, who affirmes the Sumbol.6. same of Temela or Templa, a Citie of the Brutij in Italie: Lastly, upon the au-50 thoritie of Plinie, who shewes that the Italians did inhabite onely one Region of the Plin. 1.3.c.5:

Land, whence afterward the name was derived over all. Concerning that which is faid of the Eleans and Ætolians, who (as hee shewes) had one originall; from them hee brings the name of Italia. For the word Italia, differs in nothing from Mitolia, faue that the first Letter is cast away, which in the Greeke like changes are very familiar in the Lolic Dialect; of which Dialect ( being almost proper to the Etolions) the accent and pronunciation, together with many words little altered, were retained by the Latines, as Dionysius Halicarnasseus, Quintilian, and Prissian the Grammarian teach. Hereunto appertaines that of Julian the Apostata.

Greekes and Latines from lauan; and the Fable of lanes, whose Image had two faces, looking East and West, as Greece and Italie lay, and was stamped on Covnes. with a Ship on the other side; all which is, by interpretation, referred to Inuan, 10 father of the Greekes and Latines: who fayling ouer the Ionian Sea, that Ives betweene Atolia and the Westerne parts of Greece and Italie, planted Colonies in both. Now whereas Requeccius thinkes, that the names of Atlas and Italias belonged both to one man, and thereto applyes that of Berofus, who called Cethim, Ita-lus; though it may seeme strengthened by the marriage of Dardanus, whilest hee abode in Italie with Electra, the daughter of Atlas, yet is it by arguments (in my valuation) greater and stronger, cally disproued. For they who makemention of

Atlas, place him before the time of Moles: and if Atlas were Cethim, or Kittim, then was he the sonne of Iauan, and nephew of Iapheth, the eldest sonne of Noah: which antiquity farre exceedes the name of Italie, that began after the departure of Hercules 20

Likewise Firgil, who speakes of Atlas, and of Dardanus his marriage with Ele-

Etra, hath nothing of his meeting with her in Italie; but calleth Electra and her fifter

Maia (poetically) daughters of the Mountaine Atlas in Africa, naming Italia among fore the Warre of Troy, had left in Italie a Colonie of the Eleans (who in a manner were one and the same Nation with the Etolians, as Strabo, Herodotus, and Paulanias teach) then the name of Italie began: and feeing Virgil makes mention of Italias among the Italian Kings, it were no great boldnesse to say, that Italias was Commander of these Eleans. For though I remember not, that I have read of any such Greeke as was named Italus; yet the name of Etolus, written in Greeke Aitolus, was

King of Elis, and founder of the Atolian Kingdome. Neither is it more hard to derive the name of Italus from Ætolus, then Italia from Ætolia. So may Virgils autho-ritie stand well with the collections of Reyneceiu; the name of Italie being taken both from a Captaine, and from the Nation, of which he and his people were.

words is common, and the letter (a) is changed into (a) which change is found in the name of Athalia an Island neere Italie, peopled by the Athalians; and the

Of the Aborigines, and other Inhabitants of Latium, and of the reason of the names of Latini and Latium.

N Italie the Latines and Hetrurians were most famous; the Hetrurians having held the greatest part of it under their subjection; and the Latines by the vertue and felicitie of the Romans, who were a branch of them, subduing all Italie, and in few ages whatsoeuer Nation was knowne in Europe: together with all the Westerne parts of Asia, and

North of Africk.

The Region called Latium, was first inhabited by the Aborigines, whom Halicarnasseus, Varro, and Reyneccius (following them) thinke to have beene Arcadians: and this name of Aborigines (to omit other fignifications that are strained) imports as much as originall, or native of the place, which they possessed: which title the Arcadians are knowne in vaunting manner to have alwaies vsurped, fetching their antiquitie from beyond the Moone; because indeede, neither were the inhabitants of Peloponnesus inforced to forsake their seates so oft as other Greekes were, who dwelt without that halfe Island, neither had the Arcadians so vnsure a dwelling as 20 the rest of the Peloponnesians, because their Countrie was lesse fruitfull in land. mountainous, and hard of accesse, and they themselves (as in such places commonly are found) very warlikemen. Some of these thereforehaving occupied a great part of Latium, and held it long, did according to the Arcadian manner, stile themselues Aborigines, in that language, which either their new Seate, or their Neighbours thereby had taught them. How it might bee that the Arcadians who dwelt fomewhat farre from Sea, and are alwaies noted as vnapt men to proue good Mariners, should have beene Authors of new discoueries, were a question not easie to be answered, were it not so, that both fruitfulnesse of children, in which those ages abounded, inforceth the superfluous companie to seeke another seat, and that some 30 expeditions of the Arcadians, as especially that of Euander, into the same parts of Italie, are generally acknowledged.

After the Aborigines, were the Pelasgi, an ancient Nation, who sometimes gaue name to al Grecce: but their antiquities are long fince dead, for lack of good records. Neither was their glorie such in Italie, as could long sustaine the name of their owne Tribe; for they were in short space accounted one people with the former inhabitants. The Sicani, Ausones, Aurunci, Rutili, and other people, did in ages following disturbe the peace of Latium, which by Saturne was brought to some civilitie; and he therefore canonized as a god.

This Saturne S. Augustine calleth Sterces or Sterculius, others terme him Stercu-40 tius, and fay, that hee taught the people to dung their grounds. That Latium tooke his name of Saturne, because he did tatere, that is, lie hidden there, when he fled from Iupiter, it is a questionlesse fable. For as in Heathenish superstition, it was great vanitie to thinke that any thing could be hidden from God, or that there were many gods of whom one fled from another; so in the truth of Historie, it is well knowne, that no King raigning in those parts was so mightie, that it should be hard to finde one Countrie or an other, wherein a man might be safe from his pursuit. And veras most fables and poeticall fictions, were occasioned by some ancient truth, which See lib. 1. eag. 6. either by ambiguitie of speech or some allusion, they did maimedly and darkly ex- $1.6 feq. presse (for so they fained a passage ouer a River in Hell, because death is a passage to 50 another life, and because this passage is hatefull, lamentable, and painefull, thereforethey named the River styx of Hate, Cocytus of Lamentation, and Acheron of Paine: so also because men are stonie-hearted, and because the Greeke Adol people, Acts 17.23. E (4) 45.15. be, that the original of Saturnes hiding himselfe, was some allusion to that old oninion of the wifest of the Heathen, that the true God was ignotus Deus, as it is noted in the Acts; whence also E/ay of the true God saies, Tu Deus abdens te. For it can not be in vaine, that the word Saturnus should also have this very signification, if it bee derined (as some thinke) from the Hebrew Satar, which is to hide: Howbeit I denie not, but that the original of this word, Latinm, ought rather to be fought elsewhere.

Remeccius doth conjecture that the Cereans, who descended of Cethim, the Sonne of Lauan, were the men who gaue the name to Latium. For these Ceteans are remembred by Homer as aiders of the Troisns in their Warre. Strabo interpreting the place of Homer calls them subjects to the Crowne of Troy. Hereupon Reynecous gathers, 10 that their abode was in Alia . viz. in agro Elastico; in the Elastian Territorie, which agreeth with Strabo. Of a Citie which the Lolians held in Asia, called Elea, or Elaia. Paulanias makes mention: Stephanus calls it Cidamis, or (according to the Greeke writing) Cidamis, which name last rehearsed bath a very neeresound to Cethim, Citim, or Cithim; the Greeke Letter (D) having (as many teach) a pronunciation very like to (TH) differing onely in the strength or weakenesse of vtterance, which is found betweenemany English words written with the same letters. Wherefore that these Ceteans being descended of Cethim, Cittim, or Kittim, the Sonne of Iauan, who was Progenitor of the Greekes, might very well take a denomination from the Citie, and Region, which they inhabited, and from thence be called Elaites, or Elai- 20 tes, it is very likely, considering that among the Arcadians, Phocians, Atolians, and Eleans, who all were of the Folique Tribe, are found the names of the Mountaine Eleus, the Hauen Eleas, the people Elaita, the Cities Eleus, Elaia, and Elateia, of which last it were somewhat harsh in the Latine tongue to call the Inhabitants by any other name then Elatini, from whence Latini may come. Now whereas both the Ceterand Arcadians, had their originall from Cethim, it is nothing vnlikely, that agreeing in language and similitude of names, they might neuerthelesse differ in found and pronunciation of one and the same word. So that as he is by many called Sabinus, to whom some (deriving the Sabines from him) give the name of Sabus: in the like manner might he whom the Arcadians would call Elatus (of which name 30 they had a Prince that founded the Citie Elateia) bee named of the Ceteans Latinus. Reyneccius pursuing this likelihood, thinks, that when Eurypilus, Lord of the Ceteans, being the Sonne of Telephus, whom Hercules begat youn Auge, the Daughter of Aleus King of Arcadia, was flaine by Achilles in the Troian Warre: then did Telephus, brother to Euripylus, conduct the Ceteans; who (fearing what euill might befall themselves by the Greekes, if the affaires of Troy should goe ill) passed into that part of Italie, wherethe arcadians were planted by Ocnotrus. And Reyneccius farther thinks, that Telephus being the more gracious among the Oenotrian Arcadians, by the memorie of his Grand-mother Auge, an Arcadian Ladie, was well contented to take an Areadian name, and to be called Elatus, which in the dialect and pronunciation 40 either of the Ceteans, or of the Oenotrians, was first Elatinus, and then Latinus: That this name of Elatus may have been taken or imposed by the Arcadians, it is the more easie to be thought, for that there were then two Families, the one of Aphidas, the other of Elatus, who were Sonnes of Arcas King of Arcadia, which gaue name to the Countrie: and betweene these two Families the succession in that Kingdome did passe, almost enterchangeably for many ages, till at the end of the Trojan warre it fell into the hand of Hippotheus of the race of Elatus, in whose Posteritie it continued vntill the last. Againe, the name Latinus, having a derivative sound, agrees the better with the supposition of such an accident. This is the conjecture of Reyneccius, which if he made ouer-boldly, yet others may follow it with the leffe re- 50 proofe, confidering that it is not easie to finde either an apparent truth, or faire probabilitie among these disagreeing Authors, which have written the originals of

Of the ancient Kings of the Latines untill ANEAS his commine.

He Kings which raigned in Latium before the arrival of Anew, were. Saturnus, Picus, Faunus, and Latinus. Of Saturne there is nothing remembred, saue what is mentioned alreadie, and many sables of the Greekes, which whether they be appliable to this man, it is for him to judge, who shall be able to determine, whether this were the Saturne

10 of the Greekes, called by them Kporo, or some other, stilled Saturne by the Aborigines. For the age wherein hee lived, may very well admit him to have beene the same: *Exclide often but the names of * Sterces, and Stercutius (for it may be, this name was not bor- cals the Idols rowed from the skill which hee taught the people, but rather the foile which they of the heathen doos flereores: laied on their grounds, had that appellation from him) doe rather make him feeme and hence it

Of Picus it is said, that he was a good Horse-man. The sable of his being chan-wee reade for ged into a Bird, which we call a Pie, may well feeme (as it is interpreted) to have Belzebus, Belzegrowne from the skill which he had in footh-faying, or dinination, by the flight and interpreted chattering of Fowles. Faunus, the Sonne of Pieus, raigned after his Father. Hee Dominus Ster-20 gaue to Eusender the Arcadian (who having flaine by mischance his Father Echemiss corcus; and it may be that King of Arcadia, fled into Italie) the waste grounds on which Rome was afterward after that Sa-

Fauni, called Fatua, the lifter of Faunus, was also his Wife, as all Historians a-an Idol, it pleagree; shee was held a Prophetesse, and highly commended for her chastitie; which sed God that praise in her must needs have beene much blemished by her marriage, it selfe being in a like sense this name stermeerely incestuous.

It is not mentioned that Faunus had by his fifter any child, neither doe we reade ficke vano of any other Wife which he had, saue only that Virgil gives vnto him Latines as his Acres 4. Sonne, by a Nymph, called Marica.

But who this Marica was it is not found, saue onely that her abode was about the Riuer Liris neere Minturne.

Of the name Latinus, there are by Pomponius Sabinus recounted foure : one, the Sonne of Faunus, another of Hercules, a third of Vly fes by Circe, the fourth of Telemathus. Suidas takes notice onely of the second, of whom hee faith, that his name was suidas in the Telephus, and the people anciently named the Cety, were from his furname called word Latini, Latini. This agrees in effect with the opinion of Reyneccius, the difference confifting almost in this only, that Suidas calls Telephus, the Sonne of Hercules, whereas Reyneccius makes him his Nephew, by a sonne of the same name. This Latinus having obtained the succession in that Kingdome after Faunus, did promise his only Daughter 40 and Heire Lauinia, to Turnus the sonne of Venilia, who was lifter to Amata Latinus

But when Eners arrived in those parts with fifteene ships, or perhaps fewer, wherein might bee imbarked according to the rate which Thucydides allowes to the Vessells then vsed, about one thousand & two hundred men: then Latinus finding that it would stand best with his assurance, to make alliance with the Troian, and moued with the great reputation of Aneas, which himselfe had heard of in the Warre of Troy, gaue his Daughter to him, breaking off the former appointment with Turnus, who incented herewith, fought to avenge himfelfe by warre: which was foone ended with his owne death.

50 Of Amatathe Wife of Latinus, it is very certaine, that were shee an Italian, shee could not have borne a Daughter marriageable at the arrivall of £neas; vuleffe we should wholly follow Suidas, and rather give the conduct of the Ceter into Italie, to Telephus the Father, than to his Sonne, who served in the last yeere of the Troian Warre. But Reyneccius holds her an Assatique, and thinkes withall, that Lauinia was borne before Telephus came into Italie. That this name Amata, by which Virgil and Halicarnasseus call her, was not proper, but rather a surname, it may seeme by Varro: who calleth her Palatia: which name very well might bee derived from the Greeke name Pallas, Amata, which fignifieth beloued, or deare, was the name by which the High Priest called euery Virgin, whom hee tooke to serue as a Nunne of Vella; whereforeit is the more easily to be thought a surname, how soeuer Vireil discourse of her and Venilia her fifter.

Laninia, the daughter of Latinus, being given in marriage to Aneas, the Kingdome of Latium, or the greatest part of that Countrie, was established in that race : wherin it continued vntill it was ouer-growne by the might and greatnesse of the Romans. 10

Q. IIII. Of ÆNEAS, and of the Kings and Governours of Alba.

NEAS himselfe being of the royall bloud of Troy, had the commaund of the Dardanians: hee was a valiant man, very rich, and highly honoured among the Troians. By his wife Crenfa, the daughter of Priamus, hee had a sonne called Ascanius; whose surname vvas Iulus, having before the ruine of Troy (as Virgil notes) beene furna-20 med Ilus. But when Eneas vvas dead, his wife Lauinia, the daughter of Latinus, being great with child by him, and fearing the power of this Ascanius, fled into the Woods, where she was delivered of a sonne, called therevpon Sylvius, and surnamed Posthumus, because hee was borne after his fathers Funerall. This flight of Lauinia was so euill taken by the people, that Ascanius procured her returne, entreated her honourably, and vfing her as a Queene, did foster her young sonne, his halfe-brother Syluius. Yet afterwards, whether to avoid all occasions of disagreement, or delighted with the fituation of the place; Ascanius leaving to his mother in law the Citie Laninium, which Eneas had built, and called after his new wives name, founded the Citie 30 Alba Longa, and therein raigned. The time of his raigne was, according to some, eight and twentie yeeres: Firgil gives him thirtie; others five and thirtie, and eight and thirtie. After his decease, there arose contention betweene Sylvius, the sonne of Aneas, and Iulus the sonne of Ascanius, about the Kingdome: but the people inclining to the sonne of Lauinia, Inlus was contented to hold the Priesthood, which he and his race enjoyed, leaving the Kingdome to Sylvius Posthumus, whose posteritie were afterward called Syluy.

The raigne of the Alban Kings, with the continuance of each mans raigne, I finde thus let downe

Latinus founded many Townes in the borders of Latium: who standing much vpon the honour of their originall, grew thereby to be called Pri/ci Latini, Of Tiberinus some thinke that the River Tiber had name, being formerly called albula: but Virgil gives it that denomination of another called Tibris, before the comming of Aneas into Italie. The Mountaine Auentinus had name (as many write) from Auentinus King of the Albanes, who was buried therein: but Virgil hath it otherwife. Iulius, the brother of Auentinus, is named by Enfebius as father of another Iu-10 lius, and grandfather of Iulius Proculus; who leaving Alba, dwelt with Romulus in Rome. Numitor, the elder sonne of Procas, was deprined of the Kingdome by his brother Amulius; by whom also his sonne Agesthus was slaine, and Ilia his daughter made a Nunne of Velta, that thereby the issue of Numitor might be cut off. But the conceived two fonnes, eyther by her vncle Amulius, as fomethinke; or by Mars, as the Poets faine; or perhaps by some man of warre. Both the children their vncle commanded to be drowned, and the mother buried quicke, according to the Laws which so ordained, when the Vestall Virgins brake their chastitie. Whether it was fo, that the mother was pardoned at the entreatie of Antho, the daughter of Amulius, or punished as the Law required (for Authors herein doe varie) it is agreed by 20 all, that the two children were preserved, who afterward revenged the crueltie of their vncle, with the flaughter of him and all his, and restored Numitor their grand. father to the Kingdome; wherein how long hee raigned, I find not, neyther is it greatly materiall to know; for as much as the Estates of Alba and of Latium were presently eclipsed by the swift increase of Rome; vpon which the computation of Time following (as farre as concernes the things of Italie) is dependant. After the death of Numitor, the Kingdome of Alba ceased; for Numitor left no male issue. Romulus chose rather to live in Rome; and of the Line of Sylvius none else remained. So the Albanes were gouerned by Magistrates; of whom onely two Dictators are mentioned, namely Caius Cluilius, who in the dayes of Tullus Hoftilius, King of 20 the Romanes, making Warre vpon Rome, dyed in the Campe; and Metius Suffetius, the successor of Cluilius, who surrendred the Estate of Alba vnto the Romanes, hauing committed the hazard of both Signories to the successe of three men of each fide, who decided the quarrell by Gombattin which, the three brethren Horati, the Champions of the Romanes, prevailed against the Curiaty, Champions of the Abanes. After this Combat, when Metius (following Tullus Hostilius with the Albane forces against the Veientes and Fidenates) withdrew his Companies out of the battaile, hoping thereby to leaue the Romanes to fuch an ouerthrow, as might make them weak enough for the Albanes to deale with Tullus, who notwithstanding this falsehood. obtained the victorie, did reward Metius with a cruell death, causing him to be tyed 40 to two Chariots, and fo torne in pieces. Then was Alba destroyed and the Citizens carried to Rome, where they were made free Denizens, the noble Families being made Patritians; among which were the Iuly: of whom E. Iulius Cafar being descended, not onely gloried in his ancient, royall, and forgotten pedegree, in full affembly of the Romanes, then gouerned by a free Estate of the People: but by his rare industrie, valour, and judgement, obtained the Soucraignetic of the Roman Empire (much by him enlarged) to himselfe and his posteritie; whereby the name of Aneas, and honour of the Troian and Alban Race, was so revived, that seldome, if cuer, any one Family hath attained to a proportionable height of glorie.

3. V

· Of the beginning of Rome, and of ROMVLVS birth and death.

Stra.l.5.fol.159

F Rome, which denoured the Alban Kingdome, I may here best shew the beginnings, which (though somewhat vacettaine) depend much youn the birth and education of Romalus, the grand-child of Numi-tor; the last that raigned in Alba. For how not onely the bordering people, but all Nations between Euphrates and the Ocean were broken in peeces by the yion teeth of this fourth Beaft, it is not to bee described in one 10 place, having beeneather worke of many Ages; whereof I now doe handle onely the first, as incident into the discourse preceding. Q. Fabius Pictor, Portius Cato, Calphurnius Pifo, Sempronius, and others, seeke to derive the Romans from Ianus: but Herodotus, Marfylus, and many others of equall credit, give the Gracians for their ancestors: and as Sirabo reportethin his fifth Booke; CAECILIVS rerum Romanorum scriptor co argumento colligit, Romain à Gracis esse conditam, quod Romani Gracovitu, antiquo instituto HERCVLIVE saman faciunt, matrem quoque EVANDRI venerantur Romani; CAECILIVS (saith he) a Romane Historiographer, doit by this argument gather, that Rome was built by the Greekes, because the Romanes, after Greekish sashion, by ancient Ordinance doe facrisce to HERCVLES: the Romanes also worship the mother of 20 Evan Desi.

Plutarch in the life of Romulus remembers many founders of that Citie: as Romanus the sonne of Plysses and Circe; Romus the sonne of Emathion, whom Diomedes sent thither from Troy; or that one Romus, a Tytant of the Latines, who drawe the Tuscans out of that Cothriey, built it. Solinus bestowes the honour of building Rome upon Euru er; saying; That it was beforetimes called Valentia. Heraclides gives the denomination to apaptine Ladie, brought thither by the Grecians: others say; That it was anciently called Febru, after the name of Februa, the mother of Maris, witnesses anciently called Februa, even from the sonder Countain Dei. But Livie will have it to be the worke of Romalus, even from the soundation: of whom and his 30 consorts Inneral to a Roman Citizen vaunting of their originall, answered in these Verses:

Attamen vi longe repetas, longeg, reuoluas Maiorum qui ques primus fuitile tuorum, Mut paftor fuit, aut illud quod dicerenolo.

> Yet though thou fetch thy pedegree so farre; Thy first Progenitor, who ere he were, Some Shepheard was, or else, that Ileforbeare. meaning cyther a Shepheard, or a Theese.

Now of Romulus begetting, of his education and preservation, it is said, That he had Rhea for his mother, and Mars was supposed to be his father; that he was nurst by a Wolfe, found and taken away by Faustrala, a Shepheards wife. The same vnnaturall nursing had Cyrus, the same incredible fostering had Semiramis; the one by a Bitch, the other by Birds. But, as Plutarch sayth, it is like enough that Amulius came couered with armour to Rhea, the mother of Romulus, when he begat her with child: and therein it seemeth to mee that hee might have two purposes, the one, to destroy her, because she was the daughter and heire of his elder brother, from whom he injuriously held the Kingdome; the other to satisfie his appetite, because she yas faire and goodly. For shee being made a Nunne of the Goddesse Vesta, it was death in her, by the Law, to breake her chastitie. I also find in Fauchet his Antiquitez de Gaule, that Meroneë, King of the Frans, was begotten by a Monster of the Sea: but Fauchet sayes, Let them beleeve it that list; It le croira qui voudra:

also of Alexander, and of Scipio African, there are poetical inventions: but to answere these imaginations in generall, it is true, that in those times, when the World was full of this barbarous Idolatrie, and when there were as many gods as there were Kings, or passions of the minde, or as there were of vices and vertues; then did many women greatly borne, couer such slips as they made, by protesting to bee forced by more then humane power: io did Oenone confesse to Paris, that shee had beene ranished by Apollo. And Anchyses boasted that hee had knowne Venus. But Rhea was made with childe by some man of Warre, or other, and therefore called Mars. the God of battell, according to the fense of the time, Genone was ouercome by a strong to wit, and by fuch a one as had those properties ascribed to Apollo. The Mother of Merouee might fancie a Sea Captaine to be gotten with yong by such a one : as the Daughter of Inachus fancied, according to Herodotus. Aneas was a bastard and begotten vpon some faire Harlot, called for her beautie Venus, and was therefore the child of luft, which is Venus. Romulus was nurft by a Wolte, which was Lupa, or Lupina, for the Curtelans in those dayes were called Wolfes, que nunc (fayth HALI-CARNASSAEVS) honestiori vocabulo amice appellantur; Which are now by an honester name called friends. It is also written, that Romulus was in the end of his life taken vp into heauen, or rather out of the world by his Father Mars, in a great storme of thunder, and lightning: fo was it faid that Anew vanished away by the River Nu-20 micus : but thereof Liaie also speaketh modestly; for he rehearseth the other opinion, that the storme was the furie of the Senatours, but seemeth to adhere partially to this taking vp; and many Authours agree, that there was an vnnaturall darkenesse, both at his birth and at his death, and that hee might bee slaine by thunder or lightning, it is not vnlikely. For the Emperour Anastasius was slaine with lightning, so was Strabo the Father of Pompey flaine with a thunder-bolt: so Carus the Emperour (who succeeded Probus) whilest he lodged with his Armie vpon the Riuer Tigris, was there slaine with lightning. But a Mars of the same kinde might end him that began him; for he was begotten by a man of warre, and by violence destroyed. And that he dyed by violence (which destinie followed most of the Roman Empe-20 rours) it appeareth by Tarquinius Superbus: who was but the seuenth King after him: who when hee had murthered his Father-in-law, commanded that hee should not bee buried, for (faid he) Romulus himselfe dyed and was not buried. But let Halicarnasseus end this dispute; whose words are these: They (layth he) who draw neerest to the trub, (ay that he was flaine by his owne Citizens; and that his crueltie in punishments of offendors, together with his arrogancie, were the cause of his stughter. For it is reported. that both when his mother was rauished, whether by some man, or by a God, the whole body of the Sunne was eclipsed, and all the earth coursed with darkenesse like unto night, and that the same did happen at bis death.

Such were the birth and death of Romulus: whose life historified by Plutarch, 40 doth containe (besides what is here alreadie spoken of him ) the conquest of a few myles which had soone beene forgotten, if the Roman greatnesse built vpon that foundation, had not giuen it memorie in all ages following, euen vnto this day. Avaliant man hee was, very strong of bodic, patient of travell, and temperate in dyet, as forbearing the vie of wine and delicacies: but his raging ambition he knew not how to temper, which caused him to slay his brother, and neglect reuenge of the death of Taius, his companion in the Kingdome, that he himselfe might be Lord alone in those narrow Territories. He raigned seuen and thirtic yeeres: first alone, then with Tatius, and after his death fingle, till he was flaine, as is alreadic shewed: after which time the Soueraigntie fell into the hands of Numa, a man to him vn-50 knowne, and more Priest-like than King-like: wherein Rome it selfe in her later times hath somewhat resembled this King. For having long beene sole Governesse till Constantinople shared with her: afterwardes, when as the Greeke Emperour was crushed by forraine enemies, and the Latines dispoyled of Imperial power, she fell into the subjection of a Prelate, swelling by degrees from the Sheepe hooke to the Sword, & therewith victorious to excelline magnificence, from whence by the fame degrees it fell, being driven from luxurie to defensive armes, and therein having bin vnfortunate, at length betakes her selfe againe to the Crossers staffe.

And thus much of Rome in this place by occasion of the Storie of the times of King Ahaz, during whose raigne in Iurie, the foundations of this famous Citie were laied.

Of EZEKIA, and his Contemporaries:

S the first yeere of Ahaz his Raigne was confounded with the last of his father Iotham, so was the later end of his fixteene veeres taken vp in the three first of Ezekias his Sonne. This appeares by the Raigne of Holea, ouer Ifrael, which beganne in the twelfth of Ahaz. and therefore the third thereof was concurrent with Ahaz his toureteenth. But the third of Holea was the first of Ezekia; so it followes, that Ezekia beganne to raigne in his Fathers foureteenth yeere. Like e- 30 nough it is, that the third yeere of Hofea, the same being the fourteenth of Ahaz, was almost spent when

Ezekia beganne, and so the fifteenth yeere of Ahaz may have beene concurrent, for the most part, with the first of Ezekia.

By supposing that Hosea beganne his Kingdome, when the twelfth yeere of Abaz was almost compleat, some would find the meanes how to disloyne the first of Hezekia from the fifteenth of Ahaz, placing him yet one yeere later, of which yeere, Ahaz may perhaps have lived not many dayes. But feeing that the foureteenth and fifteenth yeeres of Ezekia, may not be removed out of their places; it is vaine labour to alter the first yeere.

2.Kime, 8.13.

In the foureteenth of EZEKIA, SENACHERIB invading Inda, and the Countries adjoyning, loft his Armie by a miraculous stroke from Heauen, fled home, and was flaine. The yeere following it was that God added fifteene yeeres to the life of Ezekia, when he had alreadie raigned fourteene of his nine and twentie: and the fame yeere was that miracle seene of the Sunnesgoing backe; of which wonder (as I heare) one Bartholomew Scultet, who is much commended for skill in Astronomie, hath by calculation found the very day which answered vnto the twentie fifth of April, in the Iulian yeere, being then Thursday. I have not seene any workes of Scultet; but furely to find a motion fo irregular and miraculous, it is necessarie that he produce some record of observation made at such a time. How soever it bee, the 50 fifteenth yeere of Ezekia is agreed upon; and therefore wee may not alter the first. 2. Chron, 28, 27. As for that faying, which is vivall in the like cases, that A H & Z sept with his Fathers, and EZEKIA bis Sonneraigned in his stead, it doth no more proue that Ezekia raigned not with his Father, than the like faying doth inferre the like at the death of Iehofaphat, and succession of Iehoram; whereof, as concerning the beginning of the Sonne to raigne whilest his Father lived, we have alreadie said enough.

Of this godly King Ezekias, we finde, that his very beginning teltified his deuotion and zeale. For whether it were fo, that his vnfortunate and vngracious Father (who had out-worne his reputation) gaue way to his Sonnes proceedings, which perhaps it lay not in him to hinder; or whether (as I rather thinke) the first yeere and first moneth of his raigne, wherein Ezekins opened the doores of the Temple, 2.chio.29. 2.3. were to be understood as the beginning of his fole gouernement; we plainely finde it to have beene his first worke, that he opened the doores of the house of the Lord, to which Achaz had thut vp, cleanfed the Citie and Kingdome of the Idols, reftored the Priests to their offices, and estates, commanded the Sacrifices to bee offered 2, chron. 29. which had beene for many veeres neglected, and brake downe the brasen Serpent of Moles, because the people burnt incense before it, and he called it Nehushtan, a Kings 18. which fignifieth a lumpe of braffe. He did also celebrate the Paffe ouer with great magnificence, inuiting thereunto the Israelites of the ten Tribes: many there were.

euen out of those Tribes, that came vp to Ierus slem, to this feast. But the generall multitude of I/rael did laugh the Messengers of Ezekia to scorne.

It was not long erethey that scorned to solemnize the memorial of their delinerance out of the £gyptism scruitude, fell into a new seruitude, out of which they 20 Bener were delinered. For in the fourth of Ezekia his raigne, Salmanaffar the Sonne of liglath, the Sonne of Belochus, hearing that HofenKing of Ifrael had practifed with Soe King of Agypt, against him, inuaded Ifrael, besieged Samaris, and in the third yeare (after the Inhabitants had endured all forts of miseries) forced it, and carried thence the ten Idolatrous Tribes into Affria and Media: among whom Tobias and his Sonne of the same name, with Annahis Wife, were sent to Winine, in whose Seates and Places the Asyrians fent strangers of other Nations, and among them many of the ancient Enemies of the Ifraelites, as those of Cutha, Ana, Hamah, and Sphernaim, besides Babylonians: whose Places and Nations I have formerly described in the Treatise of the Holy Land.

30 These later Asyrian Kings, and the Persians, which followed them, are the first, of whom wee finde mention made both in Prophane and Sacred bookes. These therefore serue most aptly to joyne the times of the old World, (whereof none but the Prophets have written otherwise than fabulously) with the Ages following that were better knowne, and described in course of Historie. True it is, that of Cyrus and some other Persians, we finde in the Bible the same names by which other Authors have recorded them: but of Phul and Salmanifar, with other Affyrian, Chaldean Kings, diversitie of name hath bred question of the persons. Therefore, whereas the Scriptures doe speake of Salmanasiar, King of Assur, who raigned in the time of Abaz, and Ezekia, Kings of Inda, and of Hofea King of Ifrael, whom he 42 carried into captiuitie: and wheras Ptolomie makes mention of Nabonaffar, speaking precifely of the time wherein he lived; it is very pertinent to shew, that Salmanassar and N abonassar were one and the same man. The like reason also requireth, that it bee shewed of Nebuchadnezzar, that hee was the same, whom Ptolomie calleth

Of both these points Bucholeres hath well collected sufficient proofe from the exact calculations of fundrie good Mathematicians. For by them it appeares, that betweene Nabonasar and the birth of Christ, there passed seven hundred fortie and fixe yeares: at which distance of time the raigne of Salmanassar was. One great proofe hereof is this, which the same Bueholerus alleageth out of Erasmus Reinholdus,

10 in the Prutenick Tables. Mardocempadius King of Babylon (whom Ptolomic, Speaking of three Eclipses of the Moone, which were in his time, doth mention) was the same whom the Scriptures cal Merodach, who fent Embassadors to Hezekia, King of Iuda. So that if wee reckon backwards to the difference of time, betweene Merodach and Salmanafar, we shall finde it the same which is betweene Mardocempadus and Nabonaljar. Likewise tunctius doth shew, that whereas from the destruction of Samaria. to the denastation of ierusalem, in the nineteenth of Nebuchadnessar, we collect out of the Scriptures, the distance of one hundred thirtie and three yeeres: the selfe-same distance of time is found in Ptotomie, betweene Nabonassar and Nabopolassar. For, whereas Ptolomic seemes to differ from this accompt, making Nabonassar more ancient by an hundred and fortie yeeres, than the destruction of lerusalem, wee are to understand that he took Samaria in the eighth yeere of his raigne; so that the seuen foregoing yeares added to these one hundred thirty and three, make the accompts of the Scriptures fall euen with that of Ptolomies Computation is, that from the first of Nabonapar, to the fifth of Nabopolagar, there passed one hundred twentie 10 and scuen yeeres. Now it wee adde to these one hundred twentie seuen, the thirteene ensuing of Nabuchadnessers yeeres, before the Citie and Temple were destroied, we have the samme of one hundred and fortie yeeres. In so plaine a case more proofes are needlesse, though many are brought, of which this may serue for all. that Ptolomie placeth the first of Nabopolass, one hundred twentie and two veeres. after the first of Nabonassar, which agreeth exactly with the Scriptures. To these notes are added the confent of all Mathematicians: which inaccompt of times I hold more fure than the authoritie of any Historic; and therefore I thinke it follie to make doubt, whereas Historians and Mathematicall observations doe for throughly concurre.

Yet forasmuch as that argument of the learned Scaliger doth rest vnanswered. whereby he proved Buladan the Father of Merodach, to have been this Nabonaffar, I will not spare to look a word or two ingiging the Reader satisfaction herein. It is true, that the next observations of the heavenly Bodies, which Protomie recorded, after the time of Nabon iffar, were in the raigne of Mardocempadus; the second yeare of whose raigne is, according to Ptolomie, concurrent in part with the twentie feuen of Nabanaffar. For the fecond of three ancient Eclipses which hee calculates, being in the second yeare of Mardocompadius, was from the beginning of Nabonassar twentie seuen yeeres, seuenteene daies, and eleuen houres : the accompt from Nabona far, beginning at high-noone the first day of the Agyptian moneth Thot, then 30 answering to the twentie fixt of Februarie; and this Eclipse being fiftie minutes before mid-night, on the eighteenth day of that Moneth, when the first day thereof agreed with the nineteenth of Februarie; so that the difference of time betweene the two Kings Nabonassar and Mirdocempadus, is noted by Ptolomie, according to the Agyptian yeeres. But how does this proue, that Mardocempadus or Merodach, was the Sonne of Nabonaffar? yea, how doth it proue, that he was his next Succesfor, or any way of his Linage? It was enough to fatisfie me, in this argument, that Scaliger himselfe did afterwards belieue Merdocempadus to haue beene rather the Nephew, than the Sonne of Baladan, or Nabonassar. For if he might be either the Nephew, or the Sonne; hee might perhaps be neither the one, nor the other. But 40 because our Countrie-man Lidyate hath reprehended Scaliger for changing his opinion; and that both Tornielliss, who followes Scaliger herein, and Seihus Calusfius, who hath drawne into forme of Chronologie, that learned worke, De Emendatione Temporum, doe hold up the same affertion, confounding Buladan with Nabonassar: I hauetaken the paines to fearch, as farre as my leisure and diligence could reach, after any sentence that might proue the Kindred or succession of these two. Yet cannot I finde in the Almagest (for the Scriptures are either silent in this point, or aduer se to Scaliger; and other good authoritie, I know none, in this businesse) any fentence more neerely prouing the fuccession of Merodech to Nahonassar, than the place now last rehearfed: which makes no more, to shew that the one of these was 50 Father to the other, than (that I may vie a like example) the as neere succession of William the Conqueror, declares him, to have beene Sonne, or Grand-child to Edward the Confessor. This considered, wee may safely goe on with our accompt from Nabonassar, taking him for Salmanassar; and not fearing, that the Readers will be driven from our booke, when they finde something in it, agreeing with Annius. for a fruch as these Kings mentioned in Scriptures, raigned in Babylon, and Asignia. in those very times which by Diodorus and Ptolomie are affigued to Belefus, Nahonallar, and Mardocempadus, and the rest: no good Historie naming any others, that raigned there in those ages, and all Astronomicall observations, fiely concurring, with the yeeres that are attributed to these, or numbred from them.

ð. I I.

Of the danger and deliverance of Indea from SENNSCHERIB.

Hen Salmanassar was dead, and his sonne Sennacherib in possession of the Empire, in the fourteenth yeere of Ezechias, he demanded of him fuch Tribute as was agreed on, at fuch time as Tiglath, the Grand-father of Sennacherib, and Father of Salmanaffar, invited by Alaz, inuaded Rezen King of Damafens, and delivered him from the dangerous Warre which Israel had undertaken against him. This Tribute and acknowledgement when Ezechias denied, Sennacherth, having (as it feemes) a purpose to in-20 uade Egypt, sent one part of his Armie to lie before terusaters. Now though Ezechias (fearing this powerfull Prince) had acknowledged his fault, and purchased his peace, as he hoped, with thirtie hundred talents of filuer, and thirty talents of gold: wherewith he prefented Sennacherib, now fet downe before Liebis in Judica, yet vnder the colour of better affurance, & to force the King of India to deliuer holtages, 2.Kina8.221 the Asserian environed Ierusalem with a groffe Armie, and having his Sword in his hand, thought it the fittest time to write his owne conditions.

Ezechias directed his three greatest Counsellers, to parlie with Rabsaces, ouer the Wall; and to receive his demands: who yfed three principall arguments to perfwade the people to yeeld themselves to his Master Sennacherib. For though the 30 Chancellor, Steward, and Secretarie, fent by Ezcobias, defired Rabfoces to speake vnto them in the Syrian tongue, and not in the intill, yet hee with a more loud voice directed his speech to the multitude in their owne language. And for the first, hee made them know, That if they continued obstina e, and adhered to their King, that they would, in a short time, be inforced to eate their owne dung, and drinke their owne vrine: Secondly, healtogether difabled the King of Deppt, from whom the Indeans hoped for fuccour; and compared him to a broken staffe, on which whoso - 2. Kings 18.21. ener leaneth, pierceth his owne hand: Thirdly, that the gods who should helpe them, Executas had formerly broken and defaced, meaning chiefly (as it is thought by some) the brasen Serpent, which had beene preserved ever since Moses time: 40 and withall he bade them remember the gods of other Nations: whom notwithftanding any power of theirs, his Mafter had conquered and throwne downe; and for God himfelfe, in whom they trusted, hee persuaded them by no meanes to relie on him; for he would deceive them. But finding the people filent (for so the King had commanded them) after a while, when he had vinderstood that the King of Arabia was marching on with a powerfull Armie, hee himselfe left the Assyrian forces in charge to others, and fought Sennacherib at Lebna in Indian, either to informe him of their resolution in Ierusalem, or to conferre with him concerning the Armie of Terbaca the Arabian. Soone vpon this there came letters from Sennacherib to Ezechias, whom he partly aduited, and partly threatned to submit himselfe: vsing the 50 same blasphemous outrage against the all-powerfull God, as before. But Exechias fending those Counsellers to the Prophet E/17, which had lately beene fent to Rabfaces, received from him comfort, and affurance, that this Heathen Idolater should not preuaile; against whom the King also befought aide from Almightie God, repeating the most insolent and blasphemous parts of Sennacheribs letter, before the

The reason that moved Sennacherib to desire to possesse himself in haste of Ierusalem, was, that he might thereinto haue retraited his Armie, which was departed, as it seemeth, from the siege of Pelusum in Egypt, for seare of Terhaca: and though the Scriptures are filent of that enterprise (which in these bookes of the Kings, and of the Chronicles or Paralipomenon, speake but of the affaires of the lewes in effect) yet the ancient Berofus, and out of him tofephus, and S. Hierome, together with Herodo-

Herodotus calleth Sennacherib King of Arabia and Af. 10 fyria: which he might justly doe, because Tiglath his Grand-father held a great part thereof, which he wrested from Pekah King of Israel: as Gilead ouer Iordan, and the rest of Arabia Petras adjoyning: the same Herodotus also maketh Sethon King of Agypt, to be Vulcans Priest, and reporteth that the reason of Sennacheribs returne from Pelusium in Agypt, which hee also belieged, was, that an innumerable multitude of Rars had in one night eaten in funder the Bow-strings of his Archers, and spoiled the rest of their weapons of that kinde, which no doubt might greatly amaze him:

10/4011.linear. but the approch of Terhaca, remembred by Iofephus and Berofus, was the more vrgent. S. Hierome vpon the seuen and thirtie of Esay, out of the same Berofus, as also Her, Euterp.L. in part out of Herodotus, whom Iofephus citeth somewhat otherwise than his words 20 lie, reports Senacheribe retraitin these words. Pugnasse autem Senacherib Regem Asyriorum contra Agyptios, & objediffe Pelusum, ismá, extructis aggeribus, vrbi capiende, venisse TARACHAM Regem Æthiopum in auxilium, & vna nocte iuxta Ierusalem, centum octoginta quing, millia exercitus Asyrij pestilentia corruisse narrat HE-

Out of Elay it is gathered, that this destruction of the Assrian Armie was in this manner: Thou first be visited of the Lord of Hosts with thunder and shaking, and a great noise, a whirle-winde and a tempest, and a flame of denouring fire. But Iosephus hath it more largely out of the same Berofus, an authoritie (because so well agreeing with the Scriptures) not to be omitted, SENNACHERIBUS autem ab Egyptiaco bello Iofant l. 10 c.1. revertens, oftenditibiexercitum, quem fub RABSACIS Imperio reliquerat pefte divinitus immisa deletum, prima nocte posteaquam Vrbem oppugnare carperat, absumptis cum

With which destruction being terrified, and withall afraid what might become of the rest of his Armie, hee made great marches into his Kingdome; to his Royall Citie, which is called Winus, where 50 shortly after by the treason of two of the eldest of his Sonnes, Adrametech and Se-

LENNAR or SHAREZER, he lost his life in the Temple dedicated to ARASCES. or NES-ROCH: whom he especially worshipped. These his sonnes being for their parricide chased a-Eldranica va. way by the people: and flying into Armenia, As AR AGOLDAS his yonger sonne succee-

What this Nefroch was, it is vncertaine: Hierone in his Hebrew traditions hath fomewhat of him, but nothing positively. It is certaine, that Venus Vrania was worshipped by the Asyrians; and so was Inpiter Belus, as Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrillus witnesse. Many fancies there are, what cause his sonne had to murther him; but the Lyr. most likely is, that he had formerly dis-inherited those two, and conferred the Empire on Affarhaddon. Tobit tells vs, That it was fiftie fine dayes after Senacheribs returne, ere he was murthered by his sonnes; during which time he slew great num-10 bers of the Israelites in Nineue, till the most just God turned the Sword against his owne breft.

ð. III.

Of EZEKIAS his sicknesse and recoverie; and of the Babylonian King that congratulated him.

Fter this maruellous deliuerie, Ezekias fickened, and was told by Isaiah; that he must die: but after hee had before to deliuerie, Isiah, as hee was going from him, returned againe, and had warrant from the Spirit of God to promise him recouerie after three dayes, and a prolongation of his life for fifteene yeeres. But Ezekias somewhat doubtfull of this exceeding grace, prayeth a figne to confirme him: whereupon, at the prayer of Isatah, the shadow of the Sunne cast it selfe the contrarie way, and 2. King 10. went backe tenne degrees, vpon the Dyall of Achaz. The cause that moued Ezekias to lament (faith Saint Hierome) was, because he had as yet no sonne, and then in despaire that the Messas should come out of the house of Danid, or at least of his Seede. His disease seemeth to be the Pestilence, by the medicine given him by the Prophet, to wit, a masse of Figges layed to the Botch or Sore.

This wonder when the Wife-men of Chaldea had told to Merodach, King of Babylon, the first of that house, he sent to Ezekias, to be informed of the cause: at which time Ezekias shewed him all the Treasure hee had, both in the Court and in the Kingdome: for which he was reprehended by the Prophet Isaah, who told him; The dayes are at hand, that all that is in thine house, and what sower thy fathers have layed Elay :9. up in fore to this day, shall be carried into Babel; nothing shall bec left, saith the Lord. It may feeme strange, how Ezekia should have got any treasure worth the shewing: for Senacherib had robbed him of all, the yeere before. But the spoile of the same Senacherib his Campe repayed all with advantage, and made Ezekia richer vpon the fuddaine then euer he had beene: which vnexpected wealth was a strong temptati-40 onto boasting. After this time Ezekia had rest, and spending without noyse that addition which God had made vnto his life, he died, having raigned nine and twentie yeeres. One onely offensiue Warre he made, which was against the Philistims with good successe. Among his other acts (shortly remembred in Ecclesiasticus) hee Eccles.

denised to bring water to Ierusalem. In two respects they say that hee offended God: the one, that hee rejoyced too much at the destruction and lamentable end of his enemie; the other, that hee so much gloried in his riches, as he could not forbeare to shew them to strangers. But the reason which moved Ezekias (speaking humanely) to entertaine the Embassiadors of Merodach in this friendly and familiar manner, was, because he came to visit 50 him, and brought him a present, congratulating the recourie of his health; as also in that Merodach had weakened the house of Senacherib, his fearefullenemie. For Merodach, who was Commander and Lieutenant under Senacherib in Babylon, vfurped that State himselfe, in the last yeere of that King, and held it by strong hand against his sonne Assarbaddon; who was not onely simple, but impaired in strength, by the molestation of his brothers. This advantage Merodach espied, and remembring, that their ancestor Phul Belochus had set his owne master Sardanapalus besides the cushion, thought it as lawfull for himselfe to take the opportunitie which this Kings weakenesse did ofter, as it had beene for Belochus to make vse of the others wickenesse: and so, finding himselfe beloved of the Babylonians, and sufficiently powerfull, he did put the matter to hazard, and prevailed. The assertion of this historie is made by the same arguments that were vsed in maintaining the common opinion of Writers, touching Phul Belochus; which I will not here againe rehearse. So of this new Race, which cut a sunder the Line of Winus, there were onely sine Kings.

Phul Belochus.
Tiglath Philassar.

Assarbaddon,

But for a finuch as the last yeere of Salmanassar was also the first of Senacherib his sonne, we reckon the time, wherein the house of Phul held the Assyrian Kingdome, to have been an hundred and one yeeres, of which, the last sive and twentie vvere spent with Ezekia, vnder Salmanassar, Senacherib, and Assardadon.

The Kings that were in Media during the raigne of Ezekia: Of the difference found betweene fundrie Authors, in rehearling the Median Kings.

Other contemporaries of Ezekia: of CANDAV
Les, Gyges, and the Kings descended from Hercyles.

N the time of Exèkia, Medidus, and after him Cardiceas, raigned in Media. Whether it were so, that varietie of names, by which these Kings 30 were called in seuerall Histories, hath caused them to seeme more than indeede they were; or whether the sonnes raigning with the fathers, have caused not onely the names of Kings, but the length of Time, wherein they gouerned Media, to exceede the due proportion: or whether the Copies themselves, of Ctessas and Annius his Metasthenes, have beene faultie, as neither of these two Authors is over-highly commended of trustinesses: shat the names, number, and length of raigne, are all very diversly reported of these Median Kings, that followed Arbaces: Therefore it neede not seeme strange, that I reckon Medidus and Cardiceas as contemporaries with Ezekia. For to reconcile so great a difference, as is sound in those Writers that varie from Eusebius, is more than I do dare undertake. I will onely here set downe the roll of Kings that raigned in Media, accordingly as sundrie Authors have delivered it.

Annius his Metasthenes orders them and their raignes thus:

Diodorus Siculus following Ctesus (as perhaps Annius made his Metasthenes follow Diodore, with some litte variation, that he might not seeme a borrower) placeth them thus.

Astypara. Sthe continuance of these two he doth not mention.

Mercator hath laboured with much diligence, to reconcile these Catalogues, and to make them also agree with Eusebius. But forasimuch as it seemes to mee an impossible matter, to attaine vnto the truth of these forgotten times, by conjectures 20 founded upon Ctess and Metassbenes, I will lay the burthen upon Eusebius, who liued in an age better furnished than ours, with bookes of this argument. Let it therefore shiftee, that these two Kings (whom I have reckoned as contemporaries with Ezekia) Medidus and Cardiceas, are found in Eusebius: for whether Cardiceas were Diodorus his Arbianes, I will not stay to search. The Kings of Media, according to Eusebius, raigned in this order.

These names, and this course of succession I retaine; but adde vnto these, Cyaxares the sonne of Asyages, according to Xenophon; and sometimes follow Herodotus, in setting downer the length of a Kings raigne, otherwise than Eusebus hathit: of which variations, I will render my reasons in due place.

The twentie nine yeeres of Ezekia were concurrent, in part, with the rule of the foure first that were chosen Gouernours of Athens for ten yeeres; that is, of Charppy, Alimedes, Elidicus, and Hippones. Touching the first of these I heare nothing, saue that Rome was built in his first yeere; of which perhaps himselfe did not heare. Of the second and third I finde only the names. The fourth made himselfe knowne by a strange example of justice, or rather of crueltie, that hee showed vpon his owne Daughter. For hee sinding that shee had offended in vnchastitie, caused her to be locktyp with an Horse, giving to neither of them any foode: so the Horse, constrained by hunger, deaoured the vnhappie Woman.

In Rome, the first King, and Founder of that Citie Romulus, did raigne both be-

50 fore, and somewhat after Ezekia.

In Lydia, Candaules the last King, ruled in the same age.

Of the Kings that raigned in Ægypt, betweene the deline-rance of Israel from thence, and the raigne of Ezekiainfuda, when Ægypt and Iuda made a league against the

That many names of Ægyptian Kings, found in Historie, are like to have belonged only to Viceroyes. In example prouing this out of WILLIAM of Tyre bis Historie of the holy Warre.

He emulation and quarrells arising in these times, betweene the mightic Kingdomes of Agypt and Affyria, doe require our paines, in collecting the most memorable things in £gypt, and fetting downe briefly the state of that Countrie, which had continuedlong a flowrithing Region, and was of great power, when it contended with Asyria for the Maftrie. Of Chamthe sonne of Noah, who first planted that Countrie, and of Osiris, Orus, and other ancient Kings, that raigned there, vntill the Ifraelites were thence delivered, more hath beene faid a'readie than 3º I can fland to; though I hold it no shame to faile in such coniectures. That which I have delivered, in speaking mine opinion of the Egyptian Dynasties, must heere againe helpe me. For it may truely be affirmed, That the great number of Kings, which are faid to have raigned in Agypt, were none other than Viceroyes or Stewards, such as Ioseph was, and such as were the Soldanes in later ages. Therefore, I will not onely forbeare to seeke after those, whom Herodotus and Diodorus have reckoned vp, from the mouthes of £gyptian Pricsts, delivering them by number. without rehearling their names; but will faue the labour of marthalling them in order, whose names only are found; the yeares of their raignes, and other circumstances, prouing them to have beene Kings in deede, being not recorded.

But that I may not seeme before hand, to lay an imaginarie ground, whereupon after I may build what Hift; it were not amisse, to give vnto the Reader such satisfaction in this point, as apparent reason, and truth of Historic doth assoord. First therefore, wee ought not to beleeue those numbers of Generations, which the lying Priests have reckoned up, to magnific their Antiquities. For weeknow, that . from Abraham, our Sauiour Christ was removed onely fortic two descents, which makes it euident, that in farre shorter time, namely before the Persian Empire, there could not have passed away twice as many successions in Agypt: especially considering, that many of these, whose continuance is expressed, baue raigned longer than fortie yeeres. It followes that we should square the number of the Agyptian Kings in some even proportion, to those which did beare rule in other Countries, As for the rest, whose names we finde scattered here and there; any man that will take the paines to reade the nineteenth booke of the holy warre written by William Archbilhop of Tyre, may casily perswade himselfe, that it is not hard to find names enow, of such as might be thought to have raigned in Agypi, being none other the name of Lydia, if wee beleeue such authoritie as wee finde. This Kingdome was afterward, by the appointment of an Oracle, conferred vpon Argon, who came of Alegus the sonne of Hercules, by Iardana, a bond-woman. The race of these Heraclida continued raigning fiftie fine yeeres (in which two and twentie Generations paffed) the sonne continually succeeding the father. Candaules the sonne of Myr sus was the last of his race, who doated so much vpon the beautie of his owne Wife, that hee could not bee content to enjoy her, but would needs enforce one Gyges, the fonne of Daseylus, to behold her naked bodie; and placed the vnwilling man secretly in her chamber, where he might see her preparing to bed-ward. This was not so to closely carried, but that the Queene perceived Gyges at his going forth, and vnderflanding the matter, tooke it in such high disdaine, that she forced him the next day to require the Kings follie with treason. So Gyges, being brought againe into the fame chamber by the Queene, flew Candaules, and was rewarded not only with his Wife, but with the Kingdome of Lydia. He raigned thirtie eight yeeres, beginning in the last of Ezekia, one yeere before the death of Romulus.

This Region was first called Maonia. Lydus the sonne of Atys raigning in it, gaue

After Gyges, his sonne Ardys raigned nine and fortie yeeres; then Sadyattes, twelue; Halvattes, fiftie feuen; and finally Crafus, the sonne of Halyattes, fourteene yeeres:

who lost the Kingdome, and was taken by Cyrus of Persia.

And here by the way we may note, that as the Lydian Kings, whom Crafus his 20 Progenitor disposses, are deduced from Hercules, so of the same Hercules there sprang many other Kings, which gouerned severall Countries very long; as in Asia, the Mysians; in Greece, the Lacedamonians, Messenians, Rhodians, Corinthians, and Argines; and from the Argines, the Macedonians; as likewife from the Covinghians, the Syraculanes: belides many great and famous, though private, Families.

But of the Heraelida that raigned in Lydia, I have not troubled my selfe to take notice in the times of their seuerall raignes: for little is found of them, beside the bare names, and the follie of this last King Candaules.

CHAP.26. S.1.

then Regents or Viceroies. Yet will I here insert, as briefly as I can, some things making to that purpose for the pleasure and information of such, as will not trouble themselues with turning ouer many Authors.

When Elhadech the Caliph ruled in £gypt, one Dargan, a powerfull and a subtile man, made himselfe Soldan, by force and cunning, chaling away Sanar an Arabian, who was Soldan before and after him. This Dargan ministred matter of quarrell to Amalricke King of Ierusalem; and sustained, with little losse, an inuasion, which Amalricke made vpon Egypt. Hecreupon hee grew so insolent and proud, that Sanar the former Soldan hoped to make his partic good against him, if he could get any forces wherewith to enter Agypt. Briefly, Sanar sueth to Novadine, King of 10 Damasco, for aide, who sends an Army of his Turkes, vnder the command of Syracon, against the Soldan Dargan. So Dargan and Sanar met, and fought: The Victoric was Dargans; but hee enjoyed it not : for in few daies after, hee was slaine by treason. whereby Sanar did recouer his Dignitie: which to establish, he slew all the Kindred and Friends of Dargan, that he could finde in the great Citie of Cairo.

To all these doings, the Caliph Elhadech gaue little regard: for he thought it little concerned him, which of them lived, and had the administration of the Kingdome, whilest he might have the profit of it, and enjoy his pleasure. But new troubles presently arise, which (one would thinke) doe neerely touch the Caliph himselfe. Syracon with his Turkes, whom Sanar hath gotten to come into Agypt, will not 20 now be entreated there to leave him, and quietly goe their way home. They feize vpon the Towne of Belbeis, which they fortifie, and there attend the arrivall of more companie from Damasco, for the conquest of al Agypt. The Soldan perceives their intent, and findes himselse not strong enough to expell them; much lesse to repell the Turkish Armie, that was likely to second them. He therefore sends Mesfengers to King Almaricke of Ierufalem, whom with large promifes, he gets to bring him aide, and so drives out the Turkes. Of all this trouble, the great Caliph heares nothing, or not so much, as should make him looke to the playing of his owne game.

A greater mischiese ariseth, concerning the Caliph Elhadech particularly, in his owne Title. Syracon, Captaine of the Turkes that had beene in Egypt, goes to the 20 Caliph of Baldach (who was opposite to him of £gypt, each of them claiming as heire to Mahomet, that falle prophet, the Soueraignetic ouer all that were of the Saracen Law) and tells him the weakeneffe of the Agyptian, with his owne abilitie of doing feruice in those parts, offering his best meanes for the extirpation of the Schismaticall Caliph, and the reduction of all Egypt, with the Westerne parts, vnder the Subjection of the Babylonian. This motion is readily and joyfully entertained; all the Easterne Prouinces are vp in Armes; and Syracon, with a mightie power, defcendeth into Agypt. The noise of this great expedition so affrighteth King Almaricke, that with all his forces he hasteth into Agypt: well knowing how neerely it concerned him and his Kingdome of Ierusalem, to keep the Saracens from ioyning 40 all vnder one head. Sanar the Soldan perceiuing the faithful care of the Christians his friends, welcomes them, and bestirs himselse in giving them all manner of content, as it behoued him: for by their admirable valour, he finally draue the enemies out of the Countrie. But this victorie was not so soone gotten, as it is quickly told.

Strangeit is (which most concernes our present purpose) that of so desperate a danger, the Caliph, as yet, seemes to know nothing. May we not thinke him to have beene King in title only, who medled so little in the Gouernment? The Soldan, finding that the Christians (without whose helpe, all was lost) could not well stay, so long as his necessities required; makes large offers to King Almaricke, vpon condition, that he should abide by it. He promiseth a great Tribute (William of Tyre cals 10 it a Tribute; the Saracens, perhaps, called it a Penfion) which the Kings of Ierufalem should receive out of Laypt, for this behoovefull assistance. But the Christians vnderstanding that the Soldan (how much soeder he tooke vpon him) was subject to an higher Lord, would make no bargaine of fuch importance, with any other than the Calipb himselfe. Hercupon Hugh Earle of Cafarea, and a Knight of the Templars, are fent vnto Elbadech, to ratific the conenants. Now shall we see the greatnesse of the Calipb and his estate.

These Embassadors were conneighed by the Soldan to Cairo; where arriving at the Palace, they found it guarded by great troupes of Souldiers. The first entrance was through darke Porches, that were kept by many armed bands of Æthiopians, which with al diligence, did reverence vnto the Soldan, as he paffed along. Through these streights the Warders led them, into goodly open Courts, of such beautie and riches, that they could not retaine the gravitie of Embassadors, but were enforced 10 to admire the things which detained their eyes. For there they faw goodly marble Pillars, gilded Beames, all wrought ouer with emboffed works, curious pauements. fish-ponds of marble with cleare waters, and many forts of strange Birds, vnknown in these parts of the world, as comming perhaps from the East Indies, which then were vndiscouered. The further they went, the greater was the magnificence; for the Caliph his Eunuche's conveighed them into other Courts within these; as farre excelling the former, as the former did furpasse ordinary houses. It were tedious perhaps to rehearle, how, the further they entred, the more high state they found. and cause of maruaile; suffice it, that the good Archbishop, who wrot these things, was neuer held a vaine Author. Finally they were brought into the Caliphs owne 20 lodgings, which were yet more flately, and better guarded, where entring the prefence, the Soldan having twice proftrated himfelfe, did the third time cast off his Sword, that he ware about his neck, and throw himselfe on the ground, before the curtaine, behinde which the Caliph fate. Presently the trauerse, wrought with Gold and pearles was opened, and the Caliph himselfe discouered, sitting with great Maiestie on a throne of gold, having very few of his most inward servants and Eunuches about him. When the Soldan had humbly kiffed his Masters feet, he briefly told the cause of his comming, the danger wherein the land stood, and the offers that he had made vnto King Almericke, desiring the Caliph himselfe to ratifie them, in presence of the Embassadors. The Caliph answered, That he would throughly performe all 20 which was promised. But this contented not the Embassadors: They would have him to give his hand vpon the bargaine; which the Agyptians, that flood by, thought an impudent request. Yet his greatnes condescended at length, after much deliberation, at the earnest request of the Soldan, to reach out his hand. When the Earle of Cafarea faw that the Caliph gaue his hand, neither willingly nor bare, hee told him roundly thus much in effect. SIR, Truth feekes no holes to hide it felfe; Princes, that will hold couenant, must deale openly, nakedly, and sincerely a Giue vs therefore your bare hand, if you meane that we shall trust you, for we will make no bargaines with your Gloue. Much adoc there was about this: for it seemed against the Maiestie of such a Prince to yeelde so farre. But, when it would none o-40 therwife be, with a smiling cheare (though to the great griefe of his Servants) hee vouchfafed to let the Earle take him by the bare hand; and fo rehearling the couenants word by word, as the Earle spake them, he ratified all; dismissing finally the Embassadors, with such rewards as testified his Greatnesse.

In this Caliph and his Sultan, we may different the Image of the ancient Pharaoh, and his Viceroy: we fee a Prince of great effate, fitting in his Palace, and not vexing himself with the great preparations made against him, which terrifie his neighbour Countries: we see his Viceroy, in the meane season, vsing all Royal power, making warre and peace; entertaining, and expelling Armics of strangers; yea making the Land of Egypt tributarie to a forraine Prince. What greater authoritie was given 50 to Tofeph, when Pharaoh faid vnto him, Thou shalt be over mine house, and at thy word shall all my people be armed, only in the Kings Throne will I bee about thee, Behold, I have Set thee over all the Land of Azypt?

I doe not commend this forme of Government; neither can I approoue the coniecture of mine Author, where hee thinks, that the Egyptians, ouer fince Fff 2

Iolephs time, have felt the burden of that servitude, which hee brought vpon them. when he bought them, and their Lands, for Pharaoh. Herein I finde his judgement good; that he affirmes this manner of the Agyptian Kings, in taking their ease, and ruling by a Viceroy, to be part of the ancient customes, practifed by the Pharaohs. For we finde, that even the Piolomies (excepting Ptolomaus Lazi, and his sonne Philadelphus, founder and chablisher of that race) were given, all of them, wholly to please their owne appetites, leauing the charge of the Kingdome to Women, Eunuches, and other ministers of their desires. The pleasures which that Countrie affoorded, were indeede sufficient to inuite the Kings thereof vnto a voluptuous life; and the awfull regard wherein the Agyptians held their Princes, gave them to fecuritie, whereby they might the better trust their officers, with so ample Commission. But of this matter, I will not stand longer to dispute. It is enough to have shewed, that the great and almost absolute power of the Viceroyes gouerning ofgypt, is fet downe by Mofes, and that a lively example of the same is found in William of Tyre; who lived in the same age; was, in few yeeres after, Chancellour of the Kingdome of lerusalem; and had full discourse with Hugh Earle of Casarea, touching all these matters. Wherefore it remaines, that wee bee not carried away with a vaine opinion, to beleeue that all they were Kings, whom reports of the fabulous Ægyptians have honored with that stile; but rest contented with a Catalogue of fuch, as we finde by circumstance, likely to have raigned in that Countrie; after 20 whom it followes that we should make enquirie.

ò. II.

Of ACHERRES; whether he were V CHOREVS that was the eighth from OSYMANDYAS. Of OSYMANDYAS and his Tomber.

N this businesse I hold it vaine to be too curious. For who can hope to 30 attaine to the perfect knowledge of the truth, when as Diodorus varies from Herodotus, Eusebius, from both of them; and late Writers, that haue fought to gather the truth out of these and others, finde no one with whom they can agree? In this case Annus would doe good ser-

nice, if a man could trust him. But it is enough to be beholding to him, when others doc either say nothing, or that which may justly bee suspected. I will therefore hold my felfe contented, with the pleasure that he hath done me, in saying somewhat of Osiris, Iss, Orus, and those antiquities removed so farre out of sight: as for the Kings following the departure of Ifrael out of Agypt, it shall suffice, that Herodotus, Diodorus, and Eufebius, haue not beene filent, and that Reineccius hath taken 40 paines, to range into some good order the names that are extant in these, or found Scattering in others.

From the departure of Ifrael out of Agypt, vnto the raigne of Thuoris (who is generally taken to be the same that the Greeks call Proteus) there is little or no disagreement about the Egyptian Kings. Wherefore I fet downe the same which are found in Eusebius, and give to cuerie one the same length of raigne.

Acherres was the first of these, who succeeded vnto Chenchres, that perished in the Red Sea. This King seemes to Reinecrius to be the same whom Diodorus calls Vehoreus, the founder of Memphis. But whereas mention is found in Diodorus of a great King, named Ofymandyus, from whom Vchoreus is faid to be the eighth; it will 50 either hardly follow, that Timaus (as Reineceius coniectures) was the great Ofymandyas; or else that this Acherres was Vehoreus : for the distance betweene them was more then eight generations. Mercator iudgeth Osymandyas to have beene the husband of Acencheres, Orns the second his Daughter; thinking that Manethon (cited (cited by Iosephus) doth omit his name, and insert his wives, into the Catalogue of Kings, because he was King in his wives right. As for Vohoreus, it troubles not Mercator to finde him the eighth from this man : for he takes Ogdous, not to fignific in this place of Diodore (as that Greeke word elfe doth) the eighth, but to be an Agretian name, belonging also to Veboreus, who might have had two names, as many of the rest had. I will not vexe my braines in the vnprofitable search of this, and the like inextricable doubts. All that Diodore hath found of this Ofmandyas, was wrought vpon his monument; the most thereof in figures, which I thinke the Egyptians did fabulously expound. For whereas there was pourtraied a great Armie with the fiege of a Towne, the captivitie of the People, and the triumph of the Conqueror; all this, the Egyptians said to denote the conquest of Bactria made by that King: which how likely it was, let others judge. I hold this goodly peece of worke, which Diodore so particularly describes, to have been erected for a common place of buriall, to the ancient Kings and Queenes of Agypt, and to their Viceroves; whilest yet they were not so ambitious, as every one to have his owne particular monument, striuing therein to exceed all others. This appeares by the many statuacs, therein placed, by the Warres, the judgement Seate, the receiving of Tribute, the offering Sacrifice to God, the account of Revenues, and plentie of all Cattaile and Foode; all which were there curiously wrought, shewing the 20 seuerall Offices of a Gouernour. On the Tombe of Ofmandyas was this inscription. I am O S Y M A N D Y A S King of Kings; If any desire to know what I am, or where I lie. let him exceede some of my workes. Let them, that hope to exceede his workes, labour to know what he was. But fince by those wordes, Or where I lie, it should feeme that hee lay not there interred, wee may lawfully suspect that it was Tofeph. whose body was preserved among the Hebrewes, to be buried in the Land of Canaan, and this emptie Monument might King Orus, who out-lived him, erect in honor of his high deferts, among the royall Sepulchers. To which purpose, the plentic of Cattell, and all manner of viands, had good reference. The name ofymandy as doth not hinder this coniecture; seeing Ioseph had one new name given to 30 him by Pharaoh, for expounding the dreame, and might, vpon further occasions. have another, to his encrease of honor. As for that stile, King of Kings, it was perhaps no more than Beglerbeg, as the Turkilh Ballaes are called that is, Great about the Great.

CHAP.26. S.2.

Now although it be so, that the reckoning falls outright, betweene the times of Ioseph and Acherres (for Acherres was the eighth in order, that raigned after the great Orw, whose Viceroy Ioseph was) yet will I hereby seeke, neither to fortifie mine owne coniccture, as touching Iofeph, nor to inferre any likelihood of Acherres his being Vchoreus. For it might well bee, that Memphis was built by some such King as was Gehoar, Lieutenant vnto the Caliph Eleain, who having to his Masters Iohn Leo Hish.

vse, conquered £gypt, and many other Countries, did build, not farre from old Memphis, the great Citie of Cairo (corruptly so pronounced) naming it El Cahira, that is, an enforcing, or an imperious Mistresse, though he himselfe were 2 Dalmatian

d. III.

Of CHERRES, ARMEVS, RAMESSES, and AMENOPHIS. Of MYRIS. and the Lake that beares his name.

Hen Acherres had raighed eight yeeres, Cherres succeeded, and held the Kingdome fitteene yeeres: then raigned Armeus five yeeres, and after him Ramesses, threescore and eight. Of Armeus and Ramesses is that Historie vnderstood by Eusebius, which is common among the 10 Greekes, under the names of Danaus and Agyptus. For it is faid that

Danaus, being expelled out of Egypt by his Brother, fled into Greece, where he obtained the Kingdome of Argos: that he had fiftie Daughters, whom vpon feeming reconciliation, hee gaue in marriage to his Brothers fiftie Sonnes, but commanded cuery one of them to kill her husband the first night; that onely Hypermnestra, one of his Daughters, did sauc her husband Lynceus, and suffered him to escape; finally, That for this fact, all the bloudse sisters, when they died, were enjoyined this foolish punishment in Hell, to fill a leaking Vessell with water.

The raigne of Danau in Argos was indeed in this age; but that Armeus, was Danaus ; and Ramesses, Egyptus; is more then Reineccius belecues: hee rather takes 20 Armeus to have beene Myris, or Meris, who caused the great lake to be made which beares his name. For my owne part, as I can eafily beleeue, that he which fled out of Agypt into Greece, was a man of such qualitie as the Soldan Sanar, of whom we spake before; so doe I not finde how in so short araigne, as fine yeeres, a worke of that labour could be finished, which was required vnto the Lake of Myris, and the Monuments therein; whereof his owne Sepulchre and his wines being some part, it is manifest that he was not buried in Argos. Wherefore of Myris, and of all other Kings, whose age is vncertaine, and of whose raignes we have no assurance, I may truly fay, that their great workes are not enough to prooue them of the house of Pharaoh, seeing that greater deedes or more absolute, then were those of Ioseph, who 30 bought all the people of Agypt as bond-men, and all their Land for bread; of Gehorr, who founded Cairo; and of Sanar, who made the Countrie Tributarie; were performed by none of them.

It shall therefore be enough to set downethe length of their raignes, whom we finde to have followed one another in order of succession; but in rehearling the great acts which were performed, I will not fland to examine, whether they that didthem were Kings or no.

The Lake of Myris is, by the report of Diodore and Herodoius, three thousand fixe hundred furlongs in compasse, and fistic sadomes deepe. It served to receive the waters of Nilus, when the ouer flow, being too great, was harmefull to the Coun- 40 trie; and to supply the defect, by letting out the waters of the Lake, when the Riuer did not rise high enough. In opening the sluces of this Lake, for the letting in or out of waters, were spent fiftie talents; but the Lake it selfe defraied that cost; seeing the tribute imposed upon Fish taken therein, was every day one talent, which Myris gaue to his Wife to buy sweet ointments, and other ornaments for her bodie. In the middest of it was left an Iland, wherein were the Sepulchers of Myris and his Wife, and ouer each of them a Pyramis, that was a furlong, or (according to Herodotus) fiftie paces high; having on the tops their statues, sitting in Thrones. I finde not the description of this Lake in Maps, answerable to the report of Historians; yet is it very great. The yeeres of Armeus are by Manethon divided, by inferting one Armelis (whom Eusebius omits) that should have raigned one yeere and odde moneths of the time; but I hold not this difference worthy of examination.

After Ramesses, his sonne Amenophis held the Kingdome fortie yeares. Some give him only nineteene yeeres; and Mercator thinkes him to have beene the of the Historie of the World. CHAF.26. S.4.

King that was drowned in the Red Sea: whereof I have already spoken in the first Booke.

ò. IIII.

Of the Kings that raigned in the Dynastie of the Larthes.

ETHOSIS, or Zethus, raigned after his Father Amenophis, fiftic five yeeres. To him are ascribed the samous acts of that ancient Sesoftris. But the state of the World was not such in these times, that so great an expedition, as the old Sesosiris made, could have beene either eaan expedition, as the old selour is made, some data.

fily performed, or forgotten in the Countries through which he paf-

sed had it now beene performed, as any man will perceive, if hee looke vpon my Chronologicall Table, and consider who lived with this Zethus. With this King beganne the Dinastie of the Larthes; which Reineceius conjectures to have had the fame fignification, wherein the old Kings of Hetruria were called Lartes, (the Hetrurians being iffued out of Lydia, the Lydians out of Egypt) and to have fignified as much as Imperator or Generall. The Warres in which these Kings were Generalls. I take to have beene against the Ethiopians for sure I am, that they troubled not the Countrie of Palestina, that lay next vnto them on the one hand; nor is it likely that they trauailed ouer the defart fands, on the other hand; to seeke matter of conqueit, in the poore Countries of Africa. But these Generalls (if the Larthes were fuch) were not many. Fine only had that title; and the last of these tookeit, perhaps, as hereditarie from the first; in such fort as the Roman Emperors were proud for a while, to be called Antonini, till the most vusueable conditions of Heliogabalus, made his Successors forbeare the name.

Here it may be objected, that the Dynasties (as appeares by this particular) tooke name from the Kings, that the Kings also did administer the government them-30 selues; and that therefore I am deceived in ascribing so much vnto the Viceroies, But it is to be confidered, that what is faid of these Larthes, depends only vpon conjecture, and that the authoritic of the Regents, or Viceroies, might bee great enough, though some few Kings tooke the conduct of Armies into their owne hands. For fo we finde in lohn Leo, that the Soldan of Agypt (after fuch time as the 10hn Leo, 1.3) Soldan Saladine, murdering the Caliph, got the Soucraignetic to himselfe) had vnder him a Vicerov, stiled Eddaguadare, who had authoritie to place, or displace, any Magistrates, or Officers; and that this mans Familie was almost as great, as the Soldans owne. Yet was there also the Amir Cabir, or Lord Generall of the Soldans forces, who had the charge of defending the Land, and might as he thought good, spend of 49 the Soldans Treasure. So might the Office of the Viceroies continue, though the Kings themselves, taking the charge, or title of Generalls vpon them, did somewhat abridge the greatnesse of that second place. As for the names of the Dynasties, it skills not whence they were drawne; whether from their Countrie, as those of the Thebans and Diapolitans, or from some eminent men, or man, who ruled in that time, as many thinke, that the seuenteenth Dynastie was called of the Sheep-heards, because loseph gouerned in part therof; or from the Kings themselues that raigned; as this was said to be of the Larthes or Generalls. The next, as Manetho (but Annius his

50 now returne to the bulinesse which we left. Ramfes was King after Zethus, or Sethofts, threefcore and fixe yeeres. He is mistaken for that second Sefostris, of whom I have spoken in the first Bookes. I finde nothing worth rehearfall of this Ramfes, or of Amenophis, and Annemenes, that followed him in order, the former of which raigned fortie, the later fixe and twentie Manetho) hath it, was without any Larthes or Generals, yet was it not without Kings, for a much as Vaphres, and Sefac, raigned therein, if many others did not. But let vs

Thuoris, the last of the Larthes, raigned only scuen yeeres; yet is hee thought to have beene that Process, of whom Herodotus hath mention, faying, That hee tooke Helena from Paris, and after the fack of Troy, restored her to Menelaus. Incede fay no more in refutation of this, then that the time of Thuoris his raigne, lasted not fo long as from the Rape of Helen to her restitution.

This Proteus or Cetes (as he is named by some) together with Thon, and others. mentioned by Greeke Writers in this bulinesse, or inother such matters, may seeme to be under Officers: for such only are like to have had their residence about Phase to ros, and the Sca-coast, where Menelaus arrived.

Of Proteus, who detained Helen, it is faid, That he could forctell things to come. and that hee could change himselse into all shapes: whereby is signified his crastic head, for which he is growne into a Prouerbe. The Poets fained him a Sca-God, and keeper of Neptunes Scale-fishes, for belike he was some vnder-Officer to the Admirall, having charge of the Fishing about the Isle of Pharos, as was faid before.

Remphes, the Sonne of Proteus, is reckoned the next King, by Diodore, as also by Herodotus, who calls him Ramsinitus, and tells a long tale, fit to please children, of his couetousnesse, and how his treasure-house was robbed by a cunning Theese, that at last married his Daughter. But of this a man may believe what he list. How long 20 this King raigned I know not, nor thinke that either hee, or his Father, did raigne

è. V.

Of Egyptian Kings whose names are found scattering in sundrie Authors. their times being not recorded. The Kings of Agypt, according to CEDRENVS. Of VAPHRES and SESAC.

Any other names of Agyptian Kings, are found scattered heere and there; as Tonepher jobis, of whom Suidas deliuers only the bare name and title; Senemures, or Senepos, mentioned in Macrobius, who perhaps was the same that by Suidas is called Senyes, or Euenes, noted by occasion of a great Phisicion that lined under him; Banchyris, recorded by the same Suidas, for his great justice; and Thulis, of whom Suidas tells great matters; as that his Empire extended to the Ocean Sea; that he gaue name to the Isle of Thule, which some take to be Iseland; and that he consulted with the Deuill, or (which is all one) with Seraphis, defiring to know, who before him had beene, or after him should be so mightie as himselfe. The answere or confession of the Deuill 40 was remarkable; which I finde Englished in the translation of Plesis his worke, Of the truenesse of Christian Religion. The Greeke Verses are somewhat otherwise, and more imperfect in those Copies that I have of Cedrenus and Suidas, but the sense is all one, which is this:

First God, and next THEW ORD, and then THESPRITE, Which three be ONE, and joyne in ONE all three: Whose force is endlesse. Get thee hence fraile wight, The Man of Life vnknowne excelleth thee.

I should have thought that Suides had borrowed all this of Cedrenus, had I not 50 found somewhat more in Suidas, than Cedrenus hath hereof; as the forme of inuocation which Thulis vsed, and that clause, of his giving name to the Iland: though in this last point I hold Suidas to be deceived; as also Cedrenus is, or (at least) seemes of the Historie of the World. CHAP.26.S.5. to me, in giuing to this King such profound antiquitie of raigne. Indeede the very name of that Booke, cited often by Cedrenus, which he calls Little Genesis, is alone enough to breede suspition of some impossure: but the Frierly stuffe that hee alledgeth out of it, is such as would serue to discredit himselfe, were it not otherwise apparant, that he was a man both deuout, and of good judgement, in matters that tell within his compasse. I will here set downe the List of olde Egyptian Kings delivered by him, and leave the censure to others.

The first King of Egypt that he sets downe, is Mizraim, the sonne of Cham, After him hee findes many of a new race, deriving their pedegree thus: Nimrod, the 10 fonne of Chus, was also called Orion; and further, tooke vpon him the name of the Planet Saturne, had to wife Semiramis, who was of his owne Linage, and by her three sonnes; Picus, surnamed Iupiter, Belus and Ninus. Picus chasing his father out of Affyria into Italie, raigned in his stead thirtic yeeres, and then gaue up that Kingdome to Inno, his fifter and wife, and to Belus his sonne : after which Belus, who raigned onely two yeeres, Nimus had the Kingdome, and married his owne mother Semiramis. But Picus went into Italie, to visite his olde father Saturne; Saturne forthwith religned the Kingdome to him. Pieus Inpiter raigned in Italie threescore and two yeeres, had threescore and tenne Wines or Concubines, and about as many children: finally died, and lyes buried in the Isle of Crete. The principall of Iupi-20 ters sonnes were Faunus, Perseus, and Apollo. Faunus was called by the name of the Planet Mercurie : hee raigned in Italie, after his father, five and thirtie yeeres : and then (finding that all his brethren conspired against him) he went into Egypt, with abundance of Treasure; where, after the death of Mizraim, hee got the Kingdome, and held it nine and thirtie yeeres. After Mercurie, Vulcan raigned in Aegypt foure yeeres and a halfe. Then Sol, the some of Vulcan, raigned twentie yeeres and ahalfe. There followed in order Sosis, Osris, Orus, and Thules, of whome we spake before: the length of their seuerall raignes is not set downe. After Thules, was the great Sesostris King twentie yeeres. His successor was Pharao, called Naresho, that held the Crowne fiftie yeeres, with which there passed from him the surname of 30 Pharao, to a very long posteritie.

These reports of Cedrenus I hold it enough to set downe as I finde them: let their credit rest vpon the Author.

Others yet we finde, that are said to have raigned in Aegypt, without any certaine note, when, or how long: about whome I will not labour, as fearing more to be reprehended of vaine curiositie, in the search made after these already rehearsed, then of negligence, in omitting fuch as might have beene added. Vaphres, the father in law to Salomon; and Sefac, the afflicter of Rehoboam; leade vsagaine into faire way, but not faire. The name of Vaphres is not found in the Scriptures; but wee are beholding to Clemens Alexandrinus and Eufebius for it. Clem. Strom.Lt 40 These give vs not the length of his raigne; but we know, that he lived in the times Enfelde Prep. of David and of Salomon. He came into Palestina with an Armie, tooke Gezar from the Canaanites, and gaue it to his daughter, Salomons wife: though for her fake per-1.King 9. 16.50 haps it was, that in time following either he, or (as I rather take it) Sefac his sonne did fauour the enemies of Salomon, who kept fo many Wives and Concubines, besides this Aegyptian Princesse. In the life of Rehoboam all hath beene written that I finde of Sefac, excepting the length of his raigne, which must have beene sixe and twentie yeeres, if he were that Smendis with whome Eusebius beginnes the one and twentieth Dynastie.

Now for a fmuch as it would ferue to no great purpose, that week new the length 50 of Sefachis raigne, and of theirs that followed him, vnleffe therewithall we knew the beginning of Sefac, vpon which the rest have dependance; this course I take. From the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, King of Inda, in which Pharao ZV eco was flaine, I reckon vpwards the yeeres of the same Neco, and of his predecessors, vnto the beginning of Sesae: by which acommpt, the first yeere of Sesae is found, concurrent with the twentieth of Salomons raigne, and the twentie fixt of Sefac with the fift of Rehoboam: wherein Sefac spoyled the Temple, and died, enjoying the fruits of his Sacriledge no longer, then loss the Israeltte and Crassus the Romane did; who, after him, spoyled the Temple of terusalem.

To fill vp the time betweene Sefae and Neco, I have rather taken those Kings that I find in the Greeke Historians, than them which are in Eufebius his Catalogue. For of these that are delinered by Eusebius, wee finde no Name nor Act recorded elsewhere, sauc onely of Bocchoris, who is remembred by Diodore, Plutarch, and others, much being spoken of him, that makes him appeare to have beene a King, Hercunto I may adde, that the succession is often interrupted in Eulebius by Ac. 10 thiopians, which got the Kingdome often, and held it long: whereas contrariwise it appeares by the Prophet Esay, that the Councellors of Pharao did vaunt of the long and flourishing continuance of that house, insomuch, that they said of Pharaoh, 1 am the Sonne of the Wife, I am the Sonne of the ansient King. But that which overthrowes the reckoning of Eusebius, is, the good agreement of it with his mistaken times of the Kings of Iuda. For though it please him well to see how the raignes of Iofias and Neco meete by his computation, yet this indeede marres all; the raigne of loss being misplaced. This error growes from his omitting, to compare the raignes of the Kings of Iuda with theirs of Ifrael: by which occasion, Ioram, King of Israel, is made to raigne three yeeres after Ahazia of Iuda; Samaria is taken by Sal. 20 manassar before Hezekia was King: and in a word, all, or most of the Kings, haue their beginnings placed in some other yeere of their collateralls than the Scriptures haue determined.

Q. VI.

Of CHEMMIS, CHEOPS, CEPHRENES, and other Kings recited by HERODOTYS and DIODORYS SICVLYS, which raigned betweene the times of REHOBOAM and EZEKIA.

Ollowing therefore the Greeke Historians, I place Chemmis, or (according to Diodore) Chembis, first in the ranke of those that were Kings after Sesac. He eraigned fiftie yeeres, and built the greatest of the three Pyramides, which was accompted one of this worlds Wonders. The Pyramis hath his name from the shape, in that it resembleth a flame of fire, growing from the bottome spwards narrower and narrower to the toppe. This of Chemmis being foure-square, had a Base of seuenakers enery way, and was aboue sixe akers high. It was of a very hard and durable Stone, which had lasted, 40 when Diodore saw it, about a thousand yeeres, without complaining of any injurie that it had suffered by weather in so long space. From the raigne of Chemmis, vnto the age of Augustus Casar, wherein Diodore lined, are indeede a thousand yeeres; which gives the better likelyhod vnto this time wherein Chemmis is placed. As for this and other Pyramides, late Writers tessifie, that they have seene them yet sanding.

After Chemmis, Diodore placeth Cephrenes his brother; but doubtfully, and enclining rather to the opinion, that his sonne Chabreus succeeded. Herodotus hath Cheeps (who might bee Chabreus) and Cephrenes after him. These are said to have beene brethren; but the length of their raignes may argue the later to have beene sonne to the former: for Cheops raigned fiftie yeeres; Cephrenes fiftie sixe. These were, as Chemmis had beene, builders of Pyramides, whereby they purchased great hatred of their people, who already had over-laboured themselves in erecting the first. These Pyramides were ordained to be Tombes, for those that raised them;

but the malice of the Ægyptians is said to haue cast out their bodies; and to haue called their Monuments by the name of an Heardsman, that kept his Beasts thereabouts. It may be, that the robbing them of their honour, and entituling a poore sellow to their workes, was held to be the casting out of their bodies; otherwise, it is hard to conceiue, how it might bee, that they, who had not power to auoide the sike slaueric, laid vpon them by the yonger brother, or sonne, should haue power or leisure to take such reuenge vpon his Predecessor. To the like malice may be ascribed the tale deuised against Cheops his Daughter; That her Father, wanting mony, did prositiute her, and that shee, getting of every man that accompanied her, one 10 flore, did build with them a fourth Pyramis, that flood in the middeft of the other three. Belike shee was an infolent Lady, and made them tollow their drudgery, for her fake, longer a while than they thought to have done, in raising a Monument, with the superfluitie of her Fathers prouisions.

Mycerinus, the sonne of Cephrenes, raigned after his Father fixe yeeres. He would haue built as his foregoers did, but preuented by death, finished not what hee had begunne. The people thought him a good King, for that he did set open the Temples, which Cheeps and Cephrenes had kept flut. But an Oracle threatned him with ashort life of fixe yeeres only, because of this his denotion; For (said the Oracle) Egypt (bould have beene afflicted an hundred and fiftie yeeres, which thy Pradeceffors new, and performed for their parts, but thou hast released it, therefore shalt thou line but fixe yeeres. It is very strange, that the Gods should bee offended with a King for his pietie; or that they should decree to make a Countrie impious, when the people were desirous to serue them; or that they having so decreed, it should lie in the power of a King, to alter destinie, and make the ordinance of the Gods to faile in taking full effect. But these were Aegyptian Gods. The true GoD was, doubtlesse, more offended with the restitution of such Idolatrie, than with the interruption. And who knowes, whether Chemmis did not learne somewhat at Ierusalem, in the last yeere of his Father sefac, that made him perceive, and deliver to those that followed him, the vanitie of his Aegyptian superstition? Sure it is that his raigne, and the raignes of Cheops, and Cephrenes, were more long and more happie, than that of Mycerinus, who, to delude the Oracle, revelled away both daies and nights, as if by keeping candles lighted, hee had changed his nights into daies, and so doubled the time appointed: a service more pleasing to the Deuill, than the restitution of Idolatriedurst then seeme, when it could speede no better. I finde in Reinecolus fistie yeeres affigned to this King; which I verily beleeue to have beene some errour of the print, though I finde it not corrected among other fuch ouer-fights: for I know no Author that gives him so many yeeres, and Reineccius himselse takes notice of the Oracle, that threatned Mycerinus with a short life, as is before shewed.

Bocchorus is placed next vnto Mycerinus, by Diodore, who speakes no more of him than this, that he was a strong man of body, and excelling his Predecessors in wit. He is spoken of by diners Authors, as one that loued justice; and may be taken for that Banchyris, whom Suidas commends in that kinde: Ensebius reckons four eand

After Bocchorus, one Sabacus an Acthiopian followes, in the Catalogue of Diodore; but certaine ages after him. Herodotus, quite omitting Bocchorus, hath Afrehis; who made a sharpe law (as it was then held) against bad debtors, that their dead bodies should be in the creditors disposition, till the debt were paied. This Afrehis made a Pyramis of brick, more costly and faire, in his owne judgement, than any of those that the former Kings hadraised. Besides this Afrehis, Herodotus placeth one Anysis, ablinde man, before the Aethiopian. The raignes of these two are perhaps those many ages, which the Aegyptians, to magnific their antiquities, accounted betweene Bocchorus and him that followed them. But all this could make but sixe yeeres, and so long doth Functius, so long doth Reineccius hold, that these two Kings, betweene them both, did gouerne. If any man would lengthen this time, holding it vnprobable.

bable, that the raignes of two Kings should have beene so soone spent; he may doe it by taking some yeeres from Sethen or Pfammeticus, and adding them to either of these. To adde vnto these, without subtracting from some other, would breede a manifest inconvenience: for a smuch as part of Sefac his raigne, must have beene in I. King. 14.15. the fift of R E HOBOAM, as also the last of Pharao Neco was the fourth of lehoiakim. 2. Chien. 12.0.2. and the first of Nebuchadnezzar. For mine owne part I like it better to allow fixe yeeres only to these two Kings, than to loose the witnesse of Herodotus, who, concurring herein with the Scriptures, doth speake of Senacheribs warre; at which time Sethon was King of Aegypt. I will not therefore adde yeeres unto these obscure names; for by adding vnto these men three yeeres, wee shall thrust the beginning to of Sethon out of place, and make it later than the death of Senacherib. In regard of this agreement of Herodotus with the Scriptures, I am the more willing to hold with him, in his Accyptian Kings. Otherwise it were a matter of no great enuie, to leave both Alreha and Anylis out of the roll; which were cally done, by placing selec lower, and extending his life yet fixe yeeres further, or more, (if the like abridgement shall be required of Planmeticus his raigne) into the vecres of Rehobeam.

Of Sabacus the Aethiopian, who tooke the Kingdome from Amy fis, it is agreed by the most, that he raigned sistic yeeres. He was a merciful! Prince, not punishing all capitall offences with death, but imposing bondage and bodily labour you malefactors; by whose toyle he both got much wealth into his owne hands, letting out 20 their feruice to hire, and performed many workes, of more vie than pompe, to the fingular benefit of the Countrey. Zonaras calls this King Sua; the Scriptures call him So. Holea, the last King of Israel, made a League with him against Salmanastar. little to his good : for the Aegyptian was more rich than warlike, and therefore his

It teemes, that the encroching power of the Affyrian, grew terrible to Aegypt a. bout these times; the victories of Tiglath Phulassar, and Salmanassar, having eaten so farre into Syria, in the raigne of this one King So or Sabacus. Yea, perhaps it was in his daies (for his raigne beganne in the fourth of Menahem) that Phul him selfe did make the first entrance into Pilastina. This caused so to animate the halfe subdued 30 people, against their Conquerours; but the helpe which he and his Successor gaue them was so faint, that Senocheribs Embassador compared the Aegyptian succour to a broken staffe of Reede. Such indeede had Hofea found it, and such Ezekia might have found it, had hee not beene supported by the stronger staffe of Him, that rules all Nations with a 10d of yron. It appeares by the words of Rablake, that the opinion was great in Iuda, of the Agyptian forces, for Charrets and Horfe-men; but this power, what soever it was, grew needfull, within a little while, for the defence of Agypt it felfe, which So left vnto Sethon his successor, having now fulfilled the fiftie yeeres of his raigne. Herodotus and Diodorus have both one tale, from the relation of Acgyptian Pricits, concerning the departure of this King; faying, that he 40 left the Countrie, and willingly retired into Ethiopia, because it was often fignified vnto him in his dreames, by the God which was worshipped at Thebes, that his raigne should be neither long nor prosperous, vnlesse he slew all the Pricits in E. gyps; which rather than to doe, he refigned his Kingdome. Surely, these Agyptian gods were of a strange qualitie, that so ill rewarded their Scruants, and invited Kingsto doe them wrong. Well might the Agyptians (asthey likewise did) worship Dogs as gods, when their chiefe gods had the propertie of Dogs, which love their Masters the better for beating them. Yet to what end the Priests should have fained this tale, I cannot tell; and therefore I thinke that it might be some denice of the fearefull old man, who feeing his Realme in danger of an inualion, fought an 50 honest excuse for his departure out of it, and with drawing himself into Athiopia, where he had beene bred in his youth. What if one should say, that the £thiopia into which he went, was none other than Arabia, whereof Tirhaka the King (perhaps at the infligation of this man) raifed an Armic against Senacherib, when hee meant to inuade £gypt, within two or three yeeres after? But I will not trouble my selfe with such enquirie. This I hold, that So, or Sabacus, was not indeede an Æthiopian (for in his time lived the Prophet Esay, who mentioneth the antiquitie of Pharaohs house) but onely so surnamed for his education, and because islining from thence, he got the Kingdome from Anysis, who was his opposite. The quiet and milde forme of his Gouernement; his holding the Kingdome fo long without an Armie; and many other circumstances argue no lesse. But whether finally hee betooke to a private life, or whether hee fore went his Life and Kingdome at once, being now very old, it is time that we leave him, and speake of Sethon his next Suc-10 ceffor, who is omitted by Disdore, but remembred by Herodotus, by a fure token of his haning beene King.

d. VII.

CHAP.26. S.7.

He first yeere of Sethons raignefalls into the twelfth of Ezekia, which was the fift of Sennacherib. It was a troublesome age, and full of danger; the two great Kingdomes of A Bris and Egypt, being then ingaged in a Warre, the iffue whereof was to determine, whether of them should rule or serue. The Asgrian had the better men of warre;

the Agyptian better prouision of necessaries: the Asyrian, more Subjects; the Agyptian, more Friends; and among the new conquered halfe Subjects of Allur, manie that were Agyptian in heart, though Agyrian in outward shew.

Of this last fort were Ezekia, and his people; who, knowing how much it concerned Pharao, to protect them against his owne great Enemie, preferred the friend-3° ship of so neere and mightie a Neighbour, before the seruice of a terrible, yet sarre remoued King. But herein was great difference, betweene Ezekia and his Subjects: For the good King, fixing his especiall confidence in God, held that course of policie, which hee thought most likely to turne to the benefit of his Countrie: the multitude of Indea, looking into the faire hopes which this Agyptian league promiled, were puffed up with vaine conceits, thinking that all was fafe, and that now they should not neede to feare any more of those jniuries, which they had suffered by the Affyrians, and so became forgetfull of God, taking counsaile but not of him. The Esty 30.10 Prophet Estry complained much of this presumption; giving the people of Inda to understand, That the Agyptians were men, and not God, and their Horsesslesh, and not 40 Spirit; that God himselfe should defend Israel vpon repentance, and that AssvR Should fall by the (word, but not of man. As for the Agyptians ( faid the Prophet ) they Elayat.v.3.

are varitie, and they shall beloe in vaine, their strength is to sit still. According to the Prophets words it came to passe. For in the treatie of Confe-Esay 3.4. deracie that was held at Zoan, all manner of contentment and affurance was given to the Iewes, by Sethon, or his Agents, who filled them with fuch reports, of Horses and Charets, that they did not looke (as Elay faith) unto the holy one of Ifrael, nor feeke unto Eliy 31.1,20 the Lord. But he yet is wifeft.

After a while came Sennacherib with his Armie, and wakened them out of these dreames; for Sethon their good Neighbour, as neere as hee was, did seeme farre off, 50 being unreadie, when his helpe was most needfull. It may seeme that he purposed, rather to make Palastina than Agypt the stage, whereon this great Warre should be acted, and was not without hope, that the Affyrians and lewes, weakening one another, should yeeld vnto him a faire aduantage over both. Yet he fought with monie; for he sent Horses and Camels laden with treasure, to hire the Arabians, whom Esa) 30.6.

Esay calleth a people that cannot profit. These Arabians did not profit indeede; for (besides that it seemes by the same place of Esay, that the rich treasures miscarried, and sell into the enemies hands before any helpe appeared from Tirhaea,) all the strong Cities of Iuda were taken by Sennacherib, except Libna, Lachis, and Ierusalem it selte, which were in fore distresse, till the sword of God, and not of Man, descated the Assignment, who did goe, for seare, to his Tower, that is, he sled to Ninene, where he was slaine.

Concerning this expedition of Sennacherib, Herodotus takes this notice of it: That it was purposed against Agypt, where the men of warre, being offended with Sethon their King, who had taken away their allowance, refused to beare armes in de- to fence of him and their Country; that Sethon being Vulcans Prieft, bemoaned himselfe to his god, who by dreame promifed to fend him helpers; that hereupon Sethon, with such as would follow him, which were crafts-men, shop-keepers, and the like) marched towards Pelusium; and that a great multitude of field-mice entring the Campe of Sennacherib by night, did so gnaw the bowes quivers, and straps of his mens armour, that they were fainethe next day to flie away in all haste, finding themselies disarmed. In memorie hereof (saith Herodotus) the statue of this King is set up in the Temple of Vulcan, holding a Mouse in his hand, with this inscription: Let him, that b holds me, ferue Gol. Such was the relation of the Egyptian Priefts. wherein how farrethey swarued from the truth, being desirous to magnifie their 20 owne King, it may easily be perceived. It seemes that this Image of Sethon was fallen downe, an Ithe tale forgotten in Diodorus his time, or else perhaps, the Priests did for beare to tell it him (which caused him to omit it) for that the Nation of the Jewes was then well knowne to the world, whereof every child could have told, how much falsehood had beene mingled with the truth.

We finde this historie agreeable to the Scriptures, thus farre forth; That Sennacherib King of the Affyrians, and Arabians, (so Herodotus calleth him : the Syrians or peraduenture some borderers upon Syria, being meant by the name of Arabians) liued in this age, made Warre vpon Ægypt, and was miraculously driven home. As for that exploit of the Mice, and the great pleasure that Vulcan did vnto his Priest; 30 happy it was (if Sethon were a Priest) that he took his god now in so good a moode. For within three or foure yeeres before this, all the Priests in Egypt should have beene flaine, if a merciful King had not spared their lives, as it were halfe against the gods will. Therefore this last good turne was not enough to scrue as an example, that might stirre up the Egyptians to pietie, seeing that their denotion, which had lasted so long before, did bring all the Priests into danger of such a bad reward. Rather I thinke, that this Image did represent Sennacherib himselfe, and that the Mouse in his hand, signified Hieroglyphically (as was the Agyptian manner of expressing things) the shamefull iffue of his terrible expedition, or the destruction of his Armie, by meanes which came no man knew from whence. For the vengeance of 40 God, shewed upon this ungodly King, was indeede a very good motiue to pietie. But the embleme, together with the Temple of Vulcan (being perhaps the chiefe Temple in that Towne where this Image was erected) might give occasion to such a fable; the Deuill helping to change the truth into a lie, that God might be robbed of his honour. Yet that we may not belie the Deuill, I hold it very likely, that Sethon, finding himselfe in danger, did call vpon his gods, that is, vpon Vulcan, Serapi, or any to whom hee had most denotion. But so had other of his Predecessors done in the like neede: yet which of them had obtained succour by the like miracle? Surely the Ienes (cuen fuch of them as most were given to Idolatrie) would have been ashamed of the confidence which they reposed, in the Charets of Agypt, be- 50 cause they were many, and in the Horse-men, because they were very strong; had it beene told them, that Sethen, in stead of sending those Horse-men and Charets, was befeeching Valcan, to fend him and them good luck, or else (for these also were Agyptian gods) addressing his praiers to some Onyon or Cat. Howsoever it was, doubtlesse the prophecie of Esay tooke essect, which said, They shall be all ashamed of the people that cannot profit them, nor helpe, nor doethem good, but shall beea shame and also a reproch. Such is commonly the issue of humane wisedome, when resting secure vpon prouision that it selse hath made, it will no longer seeme to stand in need of God.

CHAP.26. S.7.

Some there are who take Sethon to have beene set downe by Eustinus, under the name of Tarachus the Athiopian; and therefore the twentie yeeres which are given to Tarachus, they allow to the Raigne of Sethon. These have well observed, that Tarachus the Athiopian is mentioned in the Scriptures, not as a King of Agypt, but as so a friend to that Countrie, or at least an enemie to Sexacherih, in the war last spoken of the Athiopians (as they are englished) over which her raigned, being indeede Chusses or Arabians. Hereupon they suppose aright, that Eusebius hath mistaken one King for another. But whereas they thinke, that this Tarachus or Turhaka, is placed in the roome of Sethon, and therefore give to Sethon the twentie yeeres of Tarachus, I hold them to have erred on the other hand. For this Athiopian (as he is called) began his Raigne over Agypt, by Eusebius his accompt, after the death of Senacherib and of Ezekia, in the first yeere of Manisses King of India. Therefore he, or his yeeres, have no reference to Sethon.

Herodows forgets to tell how long Sethon raigned; Functive peremptorily, citing 20 no Authour, nor alleaging reason for it, sits him downe thirtie three yeers; many omit him quite; and they that name him, are not carefull to examine his continuance. In this case, I follow that rule which I propounded vnto my selfe at the first, for measuring the Raignes of these Egyptian Kings. The yeeres which passed from the fift of Rehaboam, unto the fourth of teboiakim, I so divide among the Egyptians, that giving to every one the proportion allowed unto him by the Author in whom hee is sound, the rest is to be conferred upon him whose length of Raigne is uncertaine; that is, upon this Sethon. By this accompt I find the thirtie three yeeres, that are set downe by Functions, to agree very neerely, if not precisely, with the time of Sethons Raigne; therefore I conforme my ownereckoning to his, though I could be content to have it one yeere leffe. The reason of this computation I shall render more at large, when I arrive at the time of Psammitieus, whereupon it hath much dependance, and whereinto the course of this Historie will shortly bring me, the Lagran affaires growing now to be interlaced with the matters of Iuda, to which is meete that I returne.

Of MANASSE and his Contemporaries.

The wickednesse of MANASSES. His imprisonment, Repentance, and Death.

ANDSSE, the Sonne of Ezekias, forgetting the pietie of his Father, and the prosperitie which followed him, fet vp, repaired, adorned, and furnished, all the Altars, Temples, and high Places, in which the Deuill was by the Heathen worshipped. Besides, hee himselfeesteemed the Sunne, the Moone, and the Starres, with all the hofte of Heauen, as gods, and 20 worshipped them: and of all his acts the most abominable was, that he burnt his Sonnes for a Sacrifice to the Deuill Moloch, or Melchor, in the Valley of Hinnon, or Benhennon: wherein was kindled the fire of Sacrifice to the Deuills.

He also gaue himselfe to all kinde of Witchcraft and Sorcerie, accompanied and maintained those that had familiar Spirits, and all sorts of Enchanters: besides, he shed so much innocent bloud, as Ieru(alem was replenished therewith, from corner to corner. For all his vices and abominations, when he was reprehended by that aged and reverent Prophet E/ay (who was also of the Kings race, and as the Iewes 30 affirme, the Father in-law of the King) he caused the Prophet neere vnto the Fountaine of Silve to be fawne in funder, with a woodden faw, in the eightieth yere of his life: a cruelty more barbarous and monstrous then hath been heard of. The Scriptures indeede are illent hereof yet the fame is confirmed by Epiphanius, Isldore, Eu-2. chron. 33. 11. /cbins, and others too many to rehearfe, and too good to be suspected. Therefore the Lord brought upon them the Captaines of the Host of the Kings of As HVR, which tooke MANASSE, and put him in fetters, and bound him in chaines, and carried him to Babel: Where after he had lien twentie yeere as a caprine, and dispoiled of all honour and hope; yet to his heartie repentance and continuall praier, the God of infinite mercie had respect, and moved the Assyrians heart to deliver him.

It is also likely that Merodach, because he loued his father Ezechias, was the easilier perswaded to restore Manasse to his libertie and estate. After which, and when hee was againe established, remembring the miseries which followed his wickednesse, and Gods great mercies toward him, he changed forme, detelted his former foolish and deuillith Idolatry, and cast downe the Idols of his owne erection, prepared the Alrar of God, and facrificed theron. He repaired a great part of Ieru(alem: and dyed after the long raigne of fiftie fine yeeres. Glycas and Suidas report, that Manaffe was held in a case of yron by the Asyrians: and therein sedde with bread of branne and water, which men may beleeve as it shall please their fancies.

Of troubles in Egypt following the death of SETHON. Theraigne of Hat the wickednesse of King Manasses was the cause of the euill, which fell youn his Kingdome and Perfon, any Christian must needes beleeue: for it is affirmed in the Scriptures. Yet was the state of things, in those parts of the World, such, at that time, as would have invited any Prince (and did perhaps inuite Merodach, who fulfilled Gods pleasure, vpon respect borne to his owneends) desirous of enlarging his Empire to make attempt upon Inda. For the Kingdome of Agypt, which was become the pillar, whereon the state of luda leaned, about these times was miserably distracted with civill diffension, and after two yeeres, ill amended by a division of the government betweenetwelue Princes. After some good agreement betweene these eleuen of them fell out with the twelfth of their colleagues, and were all finally subdued by him, who made himselfe absolute King of all. This Inter-regnum, or meere Anarchie, that was in Agypt, with the division of the Kingdome following it, is 20 placed by Dioclore, who omitteth Sethon, betweene the raignes of Sabacus, and Plammiticus: but Herodotus doth set the Arislocratie, or twelve Gouernours, immedistely before Pfammiticus, who was one of them, and after Sethon.

The occasion of this diffension seemes to have been the vncertainetie of title to that Kingdome (for that the Crowne of Agypt passed by succession of bloud, I have often shewed) which ended, for a while, by the partition of all among twelve, though things were not fettled, untill one had obtained the Soueraignetie.

These twelue Rulers gouerned sifteene yeeres, in good seeming agreement, which to preserue, they made strait couenants and alliances one with another, being jealous of their estate, because an Oracle had foretold, that one of them should 30 depose all the rest, noting him by this token, that he should make a drinke offering, in Vulcans Temple, out of a Copper goblet. Whilest this vnitie lasted, they joyned together in raising a Monument of their Dominion, which was a Labyrinth, built necre vnto the Lake of Maris; a worke so admirable, that (as Herodotus, who beheld it, affirmes) no words could giue it commendation, answerable to the statelinesse of the worke it selfe. I will not here set downe that unperfect description, which Herodotus makes of it, but thinke enough to fay, that he preferres it farre before the Pyramides, one of which (as he saith) excelled the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, or any of the fairest workes in Greece. Diodorus reports this Labyrinth to haue beene the worke of Marus, or Menides, a King which lived five generations before Pro-40 tem, that is, before the Warre of Iroy, and from this Labyrinth (faith hee) Dedalus tooke the patterne of that which hee made for Minos in Creete. Who this Marus, or Menides was, I cannot tell. Reineccius takes him to haue beene Annemenes, which raigned immediately before Thuoris. But this agrees not with Diodore: for Dadalus and Minos were both dead long before Annemenes was King. Belike Reineccius, defiring to accommodate the fabulous relations of Manethon, Charemon, and others, that are found in Io (ephin, touching Amenophis and his children, to the storie of A- 10/cont. Applic. masis, & Actisanes the Ethiopian, mentioned by Diodore; held it consequent, after he had conjectured Manethons Amenophis, to be Dioclorus his Amasis; that Sethon should be Actifanes, and that Annemenes should bee Marus. If in this case I might intrude 30 a conjecture; the times which wee now handle, are those, about which Reineccius hath erred in making fearch; Amasis was Anysis; Actifanes was Sabacus; and Marus was one of the setwelue Princes, to whom Herodotus gives the honour of building

offendors; so likewise was Sabacus; Marus the next King after Actifanes built this Labyrinth; and the next (lauing Sethon, whom Diedore omits, as having not heard of him) that ruled after Sabaeus, performed the same worke, according to Herodotus, who was more likely to heare the truth, as living necrer to the Age wherein it was performed. The varietie of names, and difference of times, wherein Diodore beleeued the Priests, might bee a part of the Agyptian vanitie, which was familiar with them, in multiplying their Kings, and boatting of their antiquities. Here I might adde, that the twelue great Hals, Parlours, and other circumstances remembred by Herodotus, in speaking of this building, doe helpe to proue, that it was the worke of these twelve Princes. But I hasten to their end.

At a solemne feast in Vulcans Temple, when they were to make their drinke-offerings, the Priest, forgetting himselfe, brought forth no more than eleuen Cups. Hereupon Psammiticus, who standing last, had not a Cup, tooke off his brazen Helmet, and therewith supplyed the want. This caused all the rest to remember the Oracle, and to suspect him as a Traitor; yet, when they found that it was not done by him vpon set purpose, or ill intent, they forbare to kill him, but, being jealous of their estate, they banished him into the marish Countries by the Sea side. This Oracle, and the euent, is held by Diodore as a fable, which I beleeue to have beene none other: In the rest Herodotus and Diodore agree, saying, that Planemiticus hyred Souldiers out of Carin and Ionia, by whose aide he vanquished his Companions, and 20

made himfelfe fole King.

The yeeres of his raigne, according to Herodotus, were fiftie foure; according to Eusebius, fortie foure; Mercator, to reconcile these two, giues fortie foure yeeres to his single raigne, and ten to his ruling, joyntly with the Princes before spoken of. Indeede, he that was admitted, being a man growne (for hee cannot in reason be supposed to have beene then a yong fellow) into the number of the twelve Gouernours, must be thought to have lived vnto extreme old age, if he ruled partly with others, partly alone, threescore and nine yeeres. I therefore yeeld rather to Eusevius; but will not aduenture to cut fine yeeres from the Aristocratic: though peraduenture Psammiticus was not at first one of the twelve, but succeeded (either by election, or 30 as next of bloud) into the place of some Prince that dyed, and wasten yeeres com-

Another scruple there is, though not great, which troubles this reckoning. The yeeres of these Aegyptians, as we finde them set downe, are more by one, than serue to fill up the time, betweene the fift of Rehoboam, and the fourth of Iehoiskim. This may not be. Wherefore either we must abate one yeere from Sethons raigne; that was of vncertaine length; or else (which I had rather doe; because Function may have followed better authoritie than I know, or than himselfe alleageth, ingiuing to Section a time so neerely agreeing with the truth) wee must confound the last yeere of one raigne, with the first of another. Such a supposition were not insolent. 40 For no man can suppose, that all the Kings, or any great part of them, which are fet downe in Chronologicall tables, raigned precifely so many yeeres as are ascribed vnto them, without any fractions: it is enough to thinke, that the surplusage of one mans time, supplied the defect of anothers. Wherefore I confound the last yeere of those fifteene, wherein the twelve Princes ruled, with the first of Pfammiticus; who furely did not fall out with his Companions, fight with them, and make himfelfe Lord alone, all in one day.

Concerning this King, it is recorded, that he was the first in Agypt, who entertained any strait amitie with the Greekes; that hee retained in pay his Mercenaries of Caria, Ionia, and Arabia, to whom hee gaue large rewards and possessions; and that 50 he greatly offended his Egyptian Souldiers, by bestowing them in the left wing of his Armie, whilest his Mercenaries held the right wing (which was the more honorable place) in an expedition that he made into Syria. Vpon this difgrace it is faid, that his Souldiers, to the number of two hundred thousand, for sooke their naturall

Countrie of £gypt, and went into £thiopia, to dwell there : neither could they be renoked by kinde Messages, nor by the King himselfe, who ouer-tooke them on the way; but when hee told them of their Countrie, their Wines, and Children, they answered, that their weapons should get them a Countrie, and that nature had enabled them to get other wines and children.

It is also reported of him, That he caused two Infants to be brought up in such fort, as they might not heare any word spoken; by which meanes, he hoped to find out, what Nation or Language was moltancient; for almuch as it feemed likely, that nature would teach the children to speake that language, which men spake at 10 the first. The issue hereof was, that the children cried, Beccus, Beccus, which word being found to lignific Bread in the Phrygian tongue, served greatly to magnific the Phrygian antiquitie. Goropius Becanus makes no small matter of this, for the honour of his Low-Dutch; in which the word Becker, fignifies (as Baker in English) a maker of bread. He that will turne ouer any part of Goropius his works, may finde enough of this kinde, to perswade a willing man, that Adam and all the Patriarchs vsed none other tongue than the Low-Datch, before the confusion of languages at Babel; the name it selfe of Babel, being also Dutch and given by occasion of this consusion; for that there they beganne to babble, and talke, one knew not what.

But I will not infift upon all that is written of Pfimmities. The most regardable 20 of his acts was the flege of Azotee in Paleforna, about which he spent nine and twentie veeres. Neuer haue wee heard (faith Herodotus) that any Citie endured fo long a ficee as this; yet Pfammitieus carried it at the last. This Towne of Azotus had beene wonne by Tartan, a Captaine of Senacherib, and was now, as it seemeth, releened, but in vaine, by the Babylonian, which made it hold out fo well.

ð. III.

what reference these Ægyptian matters might have to the imprisonment and enlargement of MANASSES. In what part of hisraigne MA NASSES was taken prisoner.

Ere it certainely knowne, in what yeere of his raigne Manaffes was taken prisoner, and how long it was before hee obtained libertie; I thinke weethould finde these Agyptian troubles to have beene no fmall occasion, both of his captinitie and enlargement : God so dispo-fing of humane actions, that even they, who intended onely their owne businesse, fulfilled onely his high pleasure. For either the civill warres in A-49 gype that followed upon the death of Sethen; or the renting of the Kingdome, as it were into twelve peeces; or the warre betweene Planmitieus and his Colleagues; or the expedition of Plammiticus into Syria, and the fiege of Azotus, might minister vnto the Babylonian, either such cause of hope to enlarge his Dominion in the South parts; or such necessitie of sending an Armie into those parts, to defend his owne, as would greatly tempt him, to make fure worke with the King of Inda. The same occasions sufficed also, to procure the deliuerie of Manasses, after he was taken. For hee was taken (as to fephus hath it) by fubtiltie, not by open force, neither did they that apprehended him, winne his Countrie, but only waste it. So that the lewes, hauing learned wit, by the ill successe of their folly, in redceming Amazia, were like to 50 bemore circumspect, in making their bargaine upon such another accident: and the Babylonian (to whom the Aegyptian matters presented more weighty arguments of hope and feare, than the little Kingdome of inda could affoord, had no reason, to spend his forces, in pursuing a small conquest, but as full of difficultie as a greater, whereby hee should compell his mightiest enemies to come to some good agreement; when by quitting his present advantage over the lewes, hee might make his way the fairer into . Egypt.

Now concerning the yeere of Manaffes his raigne, wherein hee was taken prifoner; or concerning his captiuitie it selfe, how long it lasted; the Scriptures are filent, and lofephus gives no information. Yet I finde cited by Torniellus three opinions. the one of Beilarmine, who thinkes that Manasses was taken in the fifteenth yeere of his raigne; the other of the Author of the greater Hebrew Chronologie, who affirmes, that it was in his twentie feuenth yeere; the third, of Rabbi Kimhi vpon Ezekiel, who faith, that he was fortie yeeres an Idolater, and lived fifteene yeeres after his repentance. The first of these conjectures is vpheld by Torniellus, who rejects the second, 10 as more vnprobable, and condemnes the third as most false. Yet the reasons alleaged by Torniellus in defence of the first, and refutation of the last opinion, are such as may rather proue him to fauour the Cardinall, as farre as he may, (for where need requires, hee doth freely diffent from him) than to have vsed his accustomed diligence in examining the matter, before hee gaue his judgement. Two arguments he brings to maintaine the opinion of Bellarmine: the one, that Ammon the Sonne of Manaffes, is faid by Infephius, to have followed the workes of his Fathers youth; the other, that had Manafes growne old in his finnes, it is not like that bee should have continued, as hee did, in his amendment vnto the end of his life. Touching the former of these arguments, I see no reason, why the sinnes of Manasses might not be distin- 20 guished from his repentance in his old age, by calling them workes of his youth, which appeared when he was twelue yeeres old; though it were granted that hee continued in them (according to that of Rabbi Kimbi) vntill he was but fifteene veeres from death. Touching the fecond; howfoeuer it be a fearefull thing, to cast off vnto the last those good motions vnto repentance, which we know not whether euer God will offer vnto vs againe; yet were it a terrible hearing, That the sinnes, which are not forfaken before the age of two and fiftie yeeres, shall bee punished with finall impenitencie. But against these two collections of Torniellus, I will lay two places of Scripture, whence it may be inferred, as not vnlikely, That Manafles continued longer in this wickednesse, than Bellarmine hath intimated, if not as long 30 as Rabbi Kimbi hath affirmed. In the second Booke of Kings, the euill which Manasses did, is remembred at large, and his repentance vtterly omitted; so that his ameadment may seeme to have taken vp no great part of his life, the storie of him SKings 22.17. being thus concluded, in the one and twentieth Chapter. Concerning the rest of the acts of MANASSES, and all that he did, and his sinne that hee sinned, are they not written in the booke of the Chronicles of the Kings of Iuda? The other place is in the foure and twentieth Chapter of the same Booke, where in rehearling the calamities with which that Nation was punished in the time of Iebojakim, the great Grand-child of this Manaffes, it is faid; Surely by the commandement of the Lord came this upon Iuda, that hee might put them out of his fight, for the sinnes of MANASSE, according to all that 40 hee did, and for the innocent bloud that hee shed (for he filled Ierusalem with innocent bloud) therefore the Lord would not pardon it. Whoso considers well these places, may finde small cause to pronounce it most false, That the repentance and amendment of Manasses was no earlier then fifteene yeeres before his death; or most probable, That when he was twenty feuen yeeres old, he repented, and becomming a new man, liued in the feare of God fortie yeeres after. I will no longer dispute about this matter, seeing that the truth can not be discouered. It sufficeth to say, that two yeeres of civill dissension in Egypt, fourteene or sisteene yeeres following, wherein that Kingdome was weakened, by partition of the Soueraignetie: the warre of Pfammiticus against his Associates: and source and twentie yeeres, of the nine and twentie, wherein the siege of Azotus continued, being all within the time of Manasses, did leaueno one part of his raigne (after the first fifte ene yeeres) free from the danger of being oppressed by the Babylonian, whose men of warre had continual occasions of visiting his Countrie. All which I will adde hereto is this; that the fifteenth of

Manaffes, was the last yeere of Sethon in Egypt, and the one and thirtieth of Merolach his raigne, or (accounting from the death of Afarhaddon) the twentieth: The leven and twentieth of Manalles was the tenth of the twelve Princes, and the three and fortieth of Merodach: his fortieth, was the twentie third of Pfammiticus, and the fift of Nabulassar, the sonne of Merodach in Babylon: but which of these was the vecre of his imprisonment, or whether any other, I forbeare to shew mine opinion, lest I should thereby seeme to draw all matters ouer violently to mine owne

This was the first great mastrie that the Babylonians had of the Kingdome of Iu-10 da. For though Achaz promised Tribute to Silmanassar, yet Ezechias neuer payed it. True it is, that hee hoped to flay Semnacheribs enterprise against him, by presen- 2. Kings 18: ting him with three hundred talents of filuer, and thirtie of gold, befides the plate which couered the doores and pillars of the Temple.

But Manaffes being pressed with greater necessitie, could refuse no tolerable conditions, that the Bab; lonian would impose vpon him; among which it seemes, that this was one, (which was indeede a point of seruitude) that hee might not hold peace with the Agaptians, whilest they were enomics to Balylon. This appeares not onely by his fortifying with men of warre all the strong Cities of Juda after his returne ( which was rather against Pfammiticus, whose partie hee had forsaken, than 20 against the Babylonian, with whom hee had thenceforth no more controuersie) but likewise by that opposition, which Iosias made afterwards to Pharao Neco, in famour of Nabulillar, which had beene against all reason and policie, if it had not beene his dutie by couenant. Of this I will speake more in convenient place.

t. IIII.

Of the first and second Messenian Warres, which were in the raignes of Ezekia, and Manasses Kings of Iuda.

Ow concerning fuch actions as were performed abroad in the world, about these times of Manasses, the most remarkeable were the Messenian Warres; which happening in this age, and being the greatest a-eftion performed in Greece, betweene the Troian and Persian Warres, deserve not to be passed over with silence.

The first Messenian Warre beganne and ended in the daies of Ezekia; the second in the raigne of Manifes: but to avoide the trouble of interrupting our Historie, I have thought it best, to rehearse them both in this place. Other introduction is 40 needlesse, than to say, that the posteritie of Hercules, driving the issue of Pelops, and the Acheans, out of their feates, divided their lands betweene themselves, and ere-Sted the Kingdomes of Lacedamon, Argos, Meffene, and Corinth; all which agreeing well together a while, didafterwards forget the bond of Kindred, and fought one anothers ruine with bloudie Warres; whereof these Messenian were the

The pretended grounds of the Messenian Warre, are scarce worth remembrance; they were so fleight. Ambition was the true cause of it; wherewith the Lacedamonians were fo transported, that any thing served them as a colour, to accomplish their greedie desires. Yet other matter was alleaged; namely, that one Polychares 50 a Meffenian had flaine many Lacedemonians, for which the Magistrates of Sparta defiring to have him yeelded into their hands, could not obtaine it. The Messenians on the other fide, excused Polychares, for that he was growne frantick, through injuries received from Eusphnesa Lacedemonian. This Eusphnes had bargained to give pasture to the Cattell of Polychares, and was therefore to receive part of the increase:

but not confented with the gaine appointed, hee fold the Cattaile, and Slaues that kept them, to Merchants, which done, he came with a faire tale to his friend, faying, that they were stollen. Whilest the lye was yet scarce out of his mouth, one of the flaues that had escaped from the Merchants, came in with a true report of all. The Lacedamonian being thus deprchended, confessed all, and promised large amends: which to receive, he carried the Sonne of Polychares home with him; but having him at home, hee villanously slew him. Wherefore, the Lacedamonians having refused, after long fute made by the wretched Father, to doe him right against this Theefe and Murderer, ought not to pick matter of quarrell, out of those things, which hee did in that madnesse, whereinto they themselves had cast him. So said the Messent to ans, & further offered to put the matter to compromise, or to stand vnto the judgement of the Amphictyones, who were as the generall Counfaile of Greece, or to any other faire course. But the Lacedemonians, who had a great desire to occupy the faire Countrie of Mellene, that lay close by them, were not content with fuch allegations. They thought it enough, to have some shew for their doings, which the better to colour, they reckoned vp many old injuries, and so without sending any defiance, fecretly tooke an oath, to hold warre with Meffene, till they had mastered it: which done, they seized vpon Amphia, a frontier Towne of that Prouince, wherein they put all to the Sword without mercie, very few escaping.

Hereupon the Messenians tooke Armes, and were met by the Enemie. A furious 20 battaile was fought betweene them, which ended not vntill darke night, with vncertaine victorie. The Messenims did strongly encampe themselues; The Lacedemontans, viable to force their Campe, returned home. This Warre beganne in the fecond were of the ninth Olympiad, and ended in the first of the fourteenth Olympiad, having lasted twentie yeeres. The two enemie Nations tried the matter, for a while, with their proper forces; the Lacedemonians wasting the inland parts of Mef-(ene; and the Meffenians, the Sca-coast of Laconia. But it was not long ere friends, on both sides, were called in to helpe. The Areadians, Argines, and Sicronians, tooke part with Messene; the Spartans had, besides many Subjects of their owne, aide from Corinth, and hired Souldiers out of Crete. So a second, third, and sourth battaile 30 were fought, with as great obstinacie as the first; fauing that, in the fourth battaile, the Lacedamonians were enforced to turne their backs; in the other fights, the victorie was stil vncertaine, though in one of them the Messenians lost Euphaes their King.

in whose stead they chose Aristodemus.

Many yeeres were spent ere all this bloud was shed; for pestilent diseases, and want of monie to entertaine Souldiers, caused the Warre to linger. And for the fame reasons, did the Messemans for sake all their inland Townes, excepting Ithome, which was a mountaine with a Towne vpon it, able to endure more, than the enemies were likely to doe. But, as some Authors tell vs, the Lacedamonians were so obstinate, in this Warre, because of their vow, that having absented themselves ten 40 yeeres from Sparta, their wines sent them word, that their Citie would grow vnpeopled, by reason that no children had been borne them in all that time: Wherevpon they fent back all their ablest yong men, promiseuously to accompanie the yong women, who got so many of them with child, as they became a great part of their Nation, and were called Parthenians. Diodorno referres the begetting of these This degrees Parthenians to a former time. But in processe of this Messenian Warre, when the Deuillin an Oracle had aduised the Messenians to sacrifice a Virgin of the stock of * Egyptus, that so they mig't be victorious against the Lacedamonians; the lot falling vpon the Daughter of one Lycifeses, Epibolies the Priest, willing to faue her, said, oppliesking of thee was only a follered child, and not borne of the wife of Lecifeus: which answere to Areadia: of which creshon giving delay to the execution of the Maide, Lycifeus secretly fled away with her into which critished in Sparta. Then Aristodemus, which afterwards was King, voluntarily offered his bilitie of the owne Daughter: but a yong Noble man, being in love with the Maide, when other-Megenian was wise he could not prevaile, said openly that shee was no Virgin, but that he had defloured her, and got her with child: whereupon the Father in a rage ripped vp his innocent Daughters belly, to disproue the Louers slander: at the grave of which Daughter of his, afterward falling, by other superstitions, into despaire of prenailing against the Lacedamonians, he slew himselfe, to the great hurt of his Countrie, which he loued most dearely. For after his death the Messenians lost their courage, and finding themselues distressed by many wants, especially of victuals, they craued peace; which they obtained vnder most rigorous conditions. Halfe the veerely fruits of their Land they were bound to lend vnto Sparta; and they, with their Wives, to make solemne lamentations, at the death of every Spartan King; they so were also sworne to live in true subjection to the Lacedemonians; and part of their Territorie was taken from them, which was given to the Ame, and such as had followed the Spartans in this Warre.

This peace being made vpon so vneuen termes, was not like to holdlong. Yet nine and thirtie yeeres it continued (the Mesenians not finding how to help themselues) and then brake out into a new and more furious Warre, than the former. The able your men, that were growne vp in the roome of those Messenians, whom the former Warre had confumed, beganne to confider their owne strength and multitude, thinking themselves equall to the Lacedemonians, and therefore scorning to serue such Masters, as had against all right, oppressed their Fathers. The chiefe

20 of these was Aristomenes, a noble Gentleman, of the house of Epytus; who perceiuing the vniforme desires of his Countrie-men, aduentured to become their Leader. Hetherefore founding the affections of the Argines, and Arcidians, which he found throughly answerable to his purpose, began open warre vpon the State of Lacedamon. This was in the fourth yere of the three and twentieth Olympiad; when the Lacedamonians, hasted to quench the fire before it should grow too hor, with fuch forces as they could raile of their own, without troubling their friends, meaning to deale with their Enemies, ere any fuccour were lent them. So a strong battaile was fought betweene them, and a doubtfull; faue that the Messenians were pleafed with the issue, for a smuch as they had thereby taught their late proud Lords,

30 to thinke them their equalls. Particularly, the valour of Aristomenes appeared such in this fight, that his people would have made him their King: but he, refufing the honour of that name, accepted of the burthen, and became their Generall. Within one yeere another battaile was fought, whereunto each part came better provided. The Lacedemonians brought with them the Corinthians, and some other friends to helpe: the Meffenians had the Argines, Arcadians, and Sicyonians. This also was a long and bloudie fight; but Aristomenes did so behaue himselfe, that finally hee made the Enemies runne for their lives. Of fuch importance was this victory, that the Lacedamonians beganne to bethinke themselues, of making some good agreement. But one Tyrtain an Athenian Poet, whom by appointment of an Oracle they

40 had gotten to direct them, reenforced their Spirits with his Verses. After this, A. ristomenes tooke by surprise a Towne in Laconia and vanquished in fight Anaxander King of sparta, who did fet vpon him, in hope to have recovered the bootie.

But all these victories of Aristomenes perished, in the losse of one battaile, whereof the honour ( if it were honour) or furely the profit, fell vnto the Laced emonians, through the treason of Aristocrates, King of Areadia, who being corrupted by the enemies with mony, fled away, and left the Messenians exposed to a cruell butcherie. The losse was so great, that together with Andania their principal Citie, althe towns in Mesene, standing too farre from the Sea, were abandoned, for lack of men to defend them, and the Mount Era fortified, whither the multitude, that could not bee

50 fafeabroad, was conneied, into a place of fafetie. Here the Lacedemonians found a tedious worke, that held them eleuen yeeres. For belides that Era it felfe was a strong peece, Aristomenes with three hundred stout Souldiers, did many incredible exploits, that wearied them, and hindred their attendance on the fiege. Hee wasted all the fields of Messene, that were in the enemies power, and brake into Laconia, taking away Corne, Wine, Cattaile, and all prouisions, necessarie for his owne people; the Slaues and houlhold stuffe he changed into monie, suffering the owners to redeeme them. To remedie this mischiese the Lacedemonians made an Edist, that neither Messen, nor the adjoyning parts of their owne Countrie, should be etilled or husbanded; which bred a great tumult among private men, that were almost vndone by it. Yet the Poet Tyriam appealed this vproare with pleafing Songs. But Arillomenes grew so bold, that he not onely ranged ouer all the fields, but aduentured upon the Townes, surprised, and fackt Amyele, and finally caused the enemies to encrease and strengthen their Companies; which done, there yet appeared

In performing these and other services, thrice Aristomenes was taken prisoner; yet fill hee escaped. One escape of his descrues to bee remembred, as a thing very strange and maruailous. Hee had with too much courage aduentured to set voon both the Kings of Sparta; and being in that fight wounded, and felled to the ground, was taken up senselesse, and carried away prisoner, with fiftie of his Companions. There was a deepe naturall Caueinto which the Spartans vied to cast head long, fuch as were condemned to die for the greatest offences. To this punishment were Arissamenes and his companions adjudged. All the rest of these poore men dyed with their falls; Aristomenes (howloeuer it came to passe) tooke no harme. Yet was it harme enough to be imprisoned in a deepe Dungeon, among 20 dead carcaffes, where he was like to perish through hunger and stench. But after a while heeperceived by some small glimmering of light (which perhaps came in at the toppe) a Foxe that was gnawing vpon a dead bodie. Hereupon hee bethought himselfe, that this beast must needs know some way, to enter the place and get out. For which cause he made shift to lay hold vpon it, and catching it by the taile with one hand, faued himselfe from biting with the other hand, by thrusting his coate into the mouth of it. So letting it creepe whither it would, hee followed, holding it as his guide, vntill the way was too strait for him; and then dismissed it. The Foxe being loofe, ranne through an hole, at which came in a little light; and there did Aristomenes deluc so long with his mailes, that at last he clawed out his passage. 20 When some fugitives of Messene brought word to Sparta, that Aristomenes was returned home, their tale founded alike, as if they had faid, that a dead man was reuiued. But when the Corinthian forces, that came to helpe the Lacedamonians in the fiege of Era, were cut in pecces, their Captaines flaine, and their Campe taken; then was it easily beloeved, that Aristomenes was alive indeede.

Thus eleuen yeeres passed whilest the enemies houering about Era, saw no likelihood of getting it; and Aristomenes with small forces did them greater hurt than they knew how to requite. But at the last, a slaue, that had fled from Sparts, betraied the place. This fellow had enticed to lewdnesse the wife of a Messenian, and was entertained by her, when her husband went forth to watch. It happened in a rai- 40 nie-winter-night, that the hulband camehome v nlooked for, whilest the Adulterer was within. The Woman hiddeher Paramour, and made good countenance to her husband, asking him, by what good fortune he was returned so soone. He told her, that the storme of foule weather was such, as had made all his fellowes leave their Stations, and that himselfe had done as the rest did; as for Aristomeres, he was wounded of late in fight, and could not looke abroad; neither was it to bee feared, that the enemies would stirre, in such a darke-rainie-night, as this was. The slaue that heard these tidings, rose vp secretly out of his lurking hole, and got him to the Lacedemonian Campe with the newes. There hee found Emperamus his Master, commanding in the Kings absence. To him hee vttered all; and obtaining pardon 50 for his running away, guided the Armie into the Towne. Little or nothing was done that right. For the Allarme was presently taken; and the extreme darkenesse together with the noise of winde and raine, hindred all directions. All the next day was spent in most cruell fight; one part being incited, by neere hope of ending a long worke; the other inraged by meere desperation. The great aduantage that the Spartans had in numbers, was recompensed partly by the assistance: which women and children (to whom the hatred of seruitude had taught contempt of death) gaue to their husbands and fathers; partly by the narrownesse of the freets and other paffages, which admitted not many hands to fight at once. But the Messenans were in continual voile; their enemies tought in course, refreshing themselves with meat and sleepe, and then returning supplyed the places of their wearie fellowes, with fresh Companies. Aristomenes therefore, perceiuing that his men for want of reliefe were no longer able to hold out, (as having beene three to daies, and three nights, vexed with all miseries, of labour, watchings, fighting, hunger, and thirst, besides continuall raine and cold) gathered together all the weaker fort, whom he compassed round with armed men, and so attempted to breake out through the midst of the enemies. Emperamus Generall of the Lacedamonians was glad of this: and to further their departure, cauled his Souldiers to give an open way, leaving a faire passage to these desperate madmen. So they issued forth, and arrived safe in Arcadia, where they were most louingly entertained.

Vpon the first bruit of the taking of Era, the Arcadians had prepared themselves to the rescue : but Aristocrates their false hearted King, said it was too late, for that all was alreadie lost. When Aristomenes had placed his followers in safetic, he chose 20 out fine hundred the luftiest of his men, with whom he resolved to march in all secret haste vnto Sparta, hoping to find the Town secure, and ill manured, the people being runne forth to the spoile of Messene. In this enterprise, if he sped well, it was not doubted, that the Lacedamonians would be glad to recouer their owne, by restitution of that which they had taken from others; if all failed, an honourable death was the worst that could happen. There were three hundred dreadians that offered to joyne with him; but Aristocrates marred all, by sending speedie aduertisement hereof, to Anaxander King of Sparta. The Epille which Anaxander sent backe to Aristocrates, was intercepted, by some that mistrusted him to whom it was directed. Therein was found all his falsehood, which being published in open 30 affembly, the Arcadians froned him to death, and casting foorth his body vnburied, erected a monument of histreacheric, with a note: That the Periurer cannot de-

Of Aristomenes no more is remaining to be said, than that committing his people to the charge of his sonne Gorgus and other sufficient Gouernours, who should plant them in some new seat abroad, he resolved himselfe to make abode in those parts, hoping to finde the Lacedemonians worke at home. His daughters hec beflowed honourably in marriage. One of them Demagetus, who raigned in the Ile of Rhodes, tooke to wife, being willed by an Oracle, to marrie the daughter of the best manin Greece. Finally Aristomenes went with his daughters to Rhodes, whence 49 he purposed to have travailed vnto Ardys the Son of Gyges King of Lydia, and to Phraortes King of Media: but death prevented him at Rhodes, where hee was ho-

The Messenians were inuited by Anaxilus (whose great Grandfather was a Messenian and went into Italie after the former war) being Lord of the Rhegians in Italie, to take his part against the Zancleans in Sicilie, on the other side of the Straights. They did so; and winning the Towne of Zanele, called it Messene, which name it keepes to this day.

This second Messenian warre ended in the first yeere of the twentie eight Olympiade. Long after which time, the rest of that Nation, who staying at home served 50 the Lacedamonians, found meanes to rebell; but were soone vanquished, and being driven to forsake Peloponnesus, they went into Acarnania; whence likewise, after few ages they were expelled by the Lacedamonians, and then followed their ancient Countrimen into Italie and Sicilie; some of them went into Africa, where they chose vnto themselues a scat. Hhh Τć

It is veric strange, that during two hundred and foure score yeeres, this banished Nation retained their name, their ancient customes, language, hatred of Sparta, and loue of their forsaken Countrie, with a desire to returne vnto it. In the third vecre of the hundred and second Olympiad, that great Epaminondas, having tamed the pride of the Lacedamonians, revoked the Messenians home, who came flocking out of all quarters, where they dwelt abroad, into Peloponnesw. There did Epaminondes restore vnto them their old possession, and helpe them in building a faire Citie: which, by the name of the Prouince, was called Messene, and was held by them euer after, in despight of the Lacedamonians, of whom they neuer from thenceforth stood in feare.

Of the Kings that were in Lydia and Media, while MANASSES raigned. Whether DEIOCES the Medewere that AR-PHAXAD which is mentioned in the Booke of IVDITH. Of the historie of IVDITH.

RDYSKing of Lydia, and Phraortes of the Medes, are spoken of by Pausanias, as raigning shortly after the Messenian warre. Ardys succeeding vary bis farbar Grace because his mineral warre. ceeding vnto his father Gyges, beganne his raigne of nine and fortie yeeres, in the second of the fine and twentieth Olympiad. He followed the steppes of his father, who encroaching upon the Ionians in Asia, had taken Colophon by force, and attempted Miletus and Smyrna. In like manner Ardys wanne Priene, and affailed Miletus; but went away without it. In his raigne, the Cimmerians, being expelled out of their owne Countrie by the Scythians, ouerranne a great part of Afia, which was not freed from them before the time of Alyattes this mans Grand child, by whom they were driven out. 30 They had not onely broken into Lydia, but wanne the Citie of Sardes; though the Castle or Citadell thereof was defended against them, and held still for King Ardys; whose long raigne was vnable, by reason of this great storme, to ef-

Phraortes was not King vntill the third yeere of the nine and twentieth Olympiad, which was fixe yeeres after the Messenian warre ended; the same being the last yeere of Manasses his raigne ouer Inda.

Deioces the father of this Phraortes, was King of Media, three and fiftie of these five and fiftie yeeres in which Manasses raigned. This Deioces was the first that ruled the Medes in a strict forme, commanding more absolutely than his predecessors 40 had done. For they, following the example of Arbaces, had given to the people so much licence, as caused euery one to desire the wholesome seueritie of a more Lordly King. Herein Deieces answered their desires to the full. For he caused them to build for him a stately Palace; he tooke vnto him a Guard, for defence of his person; he seldome gaue presence, which also when he did, it was with such austerity, that no man durst presume to spit or cough in his sight. By these and the like ceremonies he bred in the people an awfull regard, and highly vpheld the Maiestie, which his Predecessours had almost letten fall, through neglect of due comportiments. In execution of his Royall Office, he did vprightly and seuerely administer instice, keeping secret spies to informe him of all that was done in the King- 50 dome. Hee cared not to enlarge the bounds of his Dominion, by encroaching vpon others; but fludied how to gouerne wel his own. The difference found between this King, and fuch as were before him, seemes to have bred that opinion which Berodissi. Herodotus deliners, that Deioces was the first who raigned in Media.

This

This was he that built the great City of Echatane, which now is called Tauris; and therefore he should be that King Arphaxad, mentioned in the storie of Indith, as also Ben Merodach, by the same accompt, should bee Nabuchodonofor the Affyrian, by whom Arphaxad was flaine, and Holophernes fent to worke wonders, vpon Phud and Lad, and I know not what other Countries. For I reckon the last yeere of Deicees to haue beene the nineteenth of Ben Merodach; though others place it otherwise, fome earlier in the time of Merodach Baladan, some later, in the raigne of 2V abula/-(ar, who is also called 2V abuchodonosor.

In fitting this Booke of Indith to a certaine time, there hath much labour beene 10 front with ill fuccesse. The raignes of Cambyses, Darius, Hystaspis, Xernes, and Ochus, haue beene fought into; but affoord no great matter of likelihood : and now of late, the times, foregoing the destruction of Ierusalem, have beene thought vpon, and this age that we have in hand, chosen by Bellarmine, as agreeing best with the storie; though others herein cannot (I speake of such as faine would) agree with him. Whilest Camby fes raigned, the Temple was not rebuilt, which in the storie of Iudith, is found standing and dedicated. The other two Persian Kings, Darius and Xerxes are acknowledged to have been very favourable to the Iewes; therefore neither of them could be Nabuchodonofor, whose part they resuled to take, and who sent to destroy them. Yet the time of Xerxes hath some conveniences, aptly fitting this Histo-

20 rie; & about al, the opinion of a few Ancient writers (without whose judgement the authoritie of this Booke were of no value) having placed this argument in the Persan Monarchie, inclines the matter to the Raigne of this vaine-glorious King. As for Ochw, very few, and they faintly, entitle him to the businesse. Maniscst it is. and granted, that in the time of this Historie, there must be a returne from captiuiticlately foregoing; the Temple rebuilt; toacim High Priest; and a long peace, of threescore and ten yeeres or thereabout, ensuing. All these were to bee among the Temes. Likewise on the other side, we must finde a King that raigned in Niniuie, eighteene yeeres at the least; that vanquished and slew a King of the Medes; one whom the Iewes refused to affist; one that fought to bee generally adored as God, 30 and that therefore commanded, all temples, of fuch as were accounted gods, to be

but was faine to learne what they were of the bordering people.

Ofall these circumstances; the Priesthood of Ioacim, with a returne from Captiuitie, are found concurring, with either the time of Manasses before the destruction of Ierusalem, or of Xerxes afterward: the rebuilding of the Temple a while before, and the long peace following, agree with the raigne of Xerxes; the rest of circumstances requisite, are to be found all together, neither before, nor after the Captinitic of the Iewes, and desolation of the Citie. Wherefore the briefe decision of this controuersie is, That the Booke of Iudith is not Canonicall. Yet hath Torniellus done

40 as much, in fitting all to the time of Xerxes, as was possible in so desperate a case. For he supposeth, that under Xerxes there were other Kings, among which Arphaxad might be one (who perhaps restored and reedified the Citie of Echatane, that had formerly beene built by Deioces) and Nabuchodonofor might be another. This granted; he addes, that from the twelfth yeere to the eighteenth of Nabuchodonofor, that is fine or fixe yeeres, the absence and ill fortune of xerxes, in his Grecian expedition (which he supposeth to have beene so long) might give occasion vnto Arphaxad, of rebelling : and that Nabuchodonofor having vanquilled and flaine Arthanad, might then feek to make himselse Lord of all, by the Armie which he sent forth vnder Holofernes. So should the Iewes have done their dutie, in adhering to Xerxes their 50 Soueraigne Lord, and resisting one that rebelled against him; as also the other circumstances rehearsed before, be well applyed to the argument. For in these times, the affaires of Iurie were agreeable to the Historic of Iudith, and such a King as this supposed Nabuchodonosor, might well enough bee ignorant of the Iewes, and as proud as we shall need to thinke him. But the silence of all Historics, takes away Hhh2

beliefe, from this coniecture: and the supposition it selfe is very hard, that a rebell. whose King was abroad, with an Armie consisting of seuenteene hundred thou. fand men, should presume so farre, vpon the strength of twelve hundred thousand foot, and twelve thousand Archers on horsebacke, as to thinke that hee might doe what he lift, yea that there was none other God then himselfe. It is indeed case to find enough that might be said against this device of Torniellus: yet if there were any necessitie, of holding the booke of Indith, to bee Canonicall, I would rather choose to lay aside all regard of prophane Histories, and build some desence vpon this ground; than, by following the opinion of any other, to violate, as they all doe, the text it selfe. That ludith lived under none of the Persian Kings, Bellarmine to (whose workes I have not read, but finde him cited by Torniellus) hath prooued by many arguments. That shee lived not in the Raigne of Manasses, Torniellus hath prooued very substantially, shewing how the Cardinall is driven, as it were to breake through a wall, in faying that the text was corrupted, where it spake of the destruction of the Temple foregoing her time. That the Kings Arphaxad and Nabuchodonosor, found out by Torniellus, are the children of meere fantasie, it is so plaine that it needs no proofe at all. Wherefore we may truly fay, that they, which have contended about the time of this Historie, being well furnished of matter, wherewith to confute each other, but wanting wherewith to defend themselves (like naked men in a stony field) have chased Holefernes out of all parts of time, and 20 left him and his great expedition, Extra anni foli que vias, in an age that neuer was. and in places that were neuer knowne.

Surely, to find out the borders of larheth, which were towards the South, and oner against Arabia; or the Countries of Phud and Lud, that lay in Holosernes his way; I thinke it would as much trouble Cosmographers, as the former question hath done Chronologers. But I will not busic my selfe herewith; having already so farre digressed, in shewing who lived not with Manasses, that I think it high time, to return ynto mine owne worke, and rehearse what others I finde, to have had their part, in the long time of his Raigne.

۵. VI.

Of other Princes and actions that were in these times.

HE first yeere of Manasses was the last of Romulus; after whose death, one yeere the Romans wanted a King. Then was Numa Pompilius a Sabyne chosen; a peaceable man and seeming verie religious in his kinde. He brought the rude people, which Romulus had employed onely in warres, to some good civilitie, and a more orderly fashion of 40 life. This he effected by filling their heads with superstition; as perswading them, that he had familiarite with a Nymph called Egeria, who taught him a many of Ceremonics, which hee deliuered vnto the Romans as things of great importance. But all these delivers of Nama were, in his owne indgement, no better then meere delusions that served onely as rudiments to bring the Sauage multitude of theeues and out-lawes, gathered into one bodie by Romulus, to some forme of milder discipline, then their boysterous and wilde natures was otherwise apt to entertaine. This appeared by the Bookes that were found in his grave, almost sixe hundred yecres after his death, wherein the Superstition taught by himselfe was condemned as vaine. His grave was opened by chance, in digging a piece of ground that 50 belonged to one L. Petisius a Scribe. Two Cossines or Chests of stone were in it, with an inscription in Greeke and Latine letters, which said, That Numa Pompilius the sonne of Pompe, King of the Romans lay there. In the one Cossin was nothing sound; his bodie being viterly consumed. In the other were his Bookes, wrapped vp in two bundels of wax; of his owne conftitutions seuen, and other seuen of Phylosophie. They were not onely vncorrupted, but in a manner fresh and new. The Pretour of the Citie desiring to have a sight of these Bookes, when hee perceived whereunto they tended, refused to deliver them back to the owner, and offered to take a solemne oath that they were against the Religion then in vse. Hereupon the Senate, without more adoe, commanded them to bee openly burnt. It seemes that Nums did meane to acquite himselfe vnto wifer ages, which he thought would follow, as one that had not beene so foolish as to beleeve the Dostrine wherein he instructed his owne barbarous times. But the poyson wherewith hee had insected to Rome, when he sate in his Throne, had not less working, when hee ministred the Antidote out of his grave. Had these Bookes not come to light, vntill the dayes of Tully and Cesar, when the mist of ignorance was somewhat better discussed, likely it is that they had not onely escaped the fire, but wrought some good (and peraduenture generall) effect. Being as it was, they served as a consutation, without remedie, of Idolatrie that was invertence.

Numa raigned three and fortie yeeres in continual peace. After him Tullus Hofilius the third King was chosen, in the fix and fortieth of Manasses, and raigned two and thirtie yeeres, busiled, for the most part in warre. Hee quarrelled with the Albanes, who met him in the field, but in regard of the danger, which both parts had so cause to seare, that might grow vnto them from the Thusenes, caused them to bethinke themselues of a course, whereby without essuin of so much bloud, as might make them too weake for a common enemie, it might bee decided, who should command, and who obey.

There were ineach Campe three Brethren, Twinnes borne at one birth (Diony-fim fayes that they were Cosen Germans) of equall yeeres and strength, who were appointed to fight for their seuerall Countries. The end was, that the Horaty, Champions for the Romans, got the victory, though two of them first loss their lines. The three Curaty that sought for Alba (as Linie tels it) were all aline, and able to fight, yet wounded, when two of their opposites were slaine; but the third Horaton time, pretending seare, did runne away, and thereby drew the others, who by reason of their hurts, could not follow him with equall speede, to follow him at such distance one from another, that returning vpon them, he slue them, as it had beene in single sight, man after man, ere they could iopne together and set vpon him all at once. Dionysius reports it somewhat otherwise, telling verie particularly, what wounds were given and taken, and saying, that first one of the Horatiy was slaine, then one of the Curaty, then a second Horatim, and lastly the two Curaty, whom the third Horatims did cunningly severe one from the other as is shewed before.

This is one of the most memorable things in the old Roman Historie, both in regard of the action it selfe, wherein Rome was laid, as it were in wager, against Al40 ba, and in respect of the great increase which thereby the Roman State obtained.
For the Citic of Alba did immediately become subject vnto her owne Colonie, and was shortly after, ypon some treacherous dealing of their Gouernour, vtterly razed, the people being removed vnto Rome, where they were made Citizens. The strong Nation of the Latines, whereof Alba, as the mother Citie, had beene chiefe, became ere long dependant vpon Rome, though not subject vnto it, and divers pettie States adiacent, were by little and little taken in: which additions, that were simall, yet many, I will for beare to rehearse (as being the works of sundrie ages, and few of them remarkeable considered apart by themselves) vntill such time as this sourch Empire, that is now in the infancie, shall grow to bee the maine subject of

The feuenth yeere of Hippomenes in Athens, was current with the first of Manaffes. Also the three last Gouernours for tenne yeeres, who followed Hippomenes, were in the same Kings time. Of these I find onely names, Leocrates, Apfander, and Erizias. After Erixias yeerely Rulers were elected.

but their time of rule was shortned, and from tearme of life reduced vnto renne veeres; it being thought likely that they would gouerne the better, when they knew that they were afterwards to live private men under the command of others. I follow Diony sies of Halicarnassus, in applying their times vnto those yeeres of the Olympiads, wherein the Chronological table, following this worke, doth fet them. For he not onely professeth himselfe to have taken great care in ordering the rec-Dian. Halied.s. koning of times; but hath noted alwaies the yeeres of the Greeks, how they did answere vntothe things of Rome, throughout all the continuance of this Historic. Whereas therefore he placeth the building of Rome, in the first yere of the seventh 10 Olympiad, and affirmes, that the same was the first yeere of Charops his gouernement in Athens; I hope I shall not need excuse, for varying from Pausanias, who sets the beginning of these Athenians somewhat sooner. In the Raigne of Manasses it was, that Midas, whom the Poets fained to have had

Assesses, held the Kingdome of Phrygia. Many fables were deuised of him especially that he obtained of Bacchus, as a great gift, that all things which he should touch, might immediately be changed into Gold; by which meanes he had like to have beene started (his meat and drinke being subject to the same transformation) had not Bacchus deliuered him from his miserable facultie, by causing him to wash himselse in the River Pattolus, the streame wherof hath ever since, for sooth, aboun- 20 ded in that precious Metall. Finally, it is said hee died by drinking Buls bloud: being inuaded by the Scythians.

In this age flourished that Antimachus, who (faith Plutarch in the life of Romulus) observed the Moones Eclipse at the foundation of Rome.

The Milesians, or, (as Eusebius hath it) the Athenians having obtavned some power by Sea, founded Macieratis a Citie on the East of Agypt. Pfammiticus herein feemes to have affilted them, who wied all meanes of drawing the Greekes into Agypt, accounting them his furest strength. For neither Miletus nor Athens were now of power sufficient to plant a Colonie in Agypt by force.

About this time Archias with his companion Miscellus, and other Corinthians, 30 founded Syracula in Sicily, a Citie in after-times exceeding famous:

The Citic of Nicomedia sometime * Astacus, was enlarged and beautified in this Strabothere is age by Zipartes native of Thrace. Sybilla of Samus according to Paufanias lived about

About these times also was Croton founded vpon the Bay of Tarentum by Mispoints where this Citie flan cellus, the companion of Archies that built Syracuse. Strabo makes it somewhat more ancient: and so doth Pausanias.

About the same time the Parthenians being of age and banished Lacedemon, were conducted by Phalantus into Italie: where it is said they founded Tarentum: but Iufine and Pausanias find it built before, and by them conquered and amplified: and 40 about the same time Manasse yet liuing, the Citie Phaselis was founded in Pamphylia, Gela in Sicily, Interamne in the Region of the Vmbri, now Vrbin in Italie. About which time also Chalcedon in Afia, ouer against Byzantium (now Constantinople) was founded by the Megarenses: who therefore were vpbraided as blind, because they chose not the other side of Bosphorus. It were a long worke to rehearse all that is faid to have beene done in the five and fiftie yeeres of Manasses: that which hath alreadie beene told is enough: the rest being not greatly worth remembrance, may well be omitted, referring onely Ben Merodach, and Nabulassar, to the businesse that will shortly require more mention of them.

MMON the sonne of Manalle, a man no lesse wicked then was his Father before his conversion, restored the exercise of all forts of Idolatrie: for which God z.King.21. hardened the hearts of his owne servants against 2.chron.33. him: who flew him after he had raigned two yeeres: Philo, Eulebius and Nicephorus giue him tenne yeeres, following the Septuagint.

Iolias succeeded vnto Ammon, being but a childe 2.King.22. of eight yeeres old. Hee beganne to feeke after the 2.6 m 83.34. God of Davidhis Father; and in his twelfth yeere

he purged Inda and Ierufalem from the high places, and the groues, and the carned and molten Images: and they brake downe in his fight the Altars of BAALIM: He caused all the Images as well those which were grauen, as molten, to be stampt to powder, and strewed on their graues that had erected them, and this he commanded to be done throughout all his Dominions. Hee also slew those that sacrificed to the Sunne and Moone, and caused the Chariots and Horses 20 of the Sunne to be burnt. Of Iosias it was prophecied in the time of Ieroboam the first, when he erected the Golden Calfe at Bethel, that a child should be borne vnto the house of David, Iosias by name, and vpon thee (said the Prophet speaking to the Altar) shall he sacrifice the Priests of the high places, that burne incenses upon thee: a prophecie very remarkeable.

In the eighteenth yeere of his raigne, hee rebuilt and repaired the Temple, at which time Helkiah the Priest found the Booke of Moses, called Deuteronomie, or, of the Law, which hee fent to the King : which when hee had caused to bee read before him, and considered of the seuere commaundements therein written, the prosperitie promised to those that observe them, and the sor-40 row and extirpation to the rest, he rent his garments, and commaunded Helkiah, and others, to aske counsell of the Prophetesse Huldah, or, Olds, concerning the Booke, who answered the messengers in these words. Thus faith the Lord, Behold, I will bring cuill opon this place, and opon the inhabitants thereof, euen all the curses that are written 2.chron.34.24? in the Booke, which they have read before the King of Iuda, because they have for saken mee, and burnt incense to other Gods. Onely for the King himselfe, because he was a louer of God and of his Lawes, it was promifed that this cuill should not fall on Iuda 2.King. 22-15. and Ierusalem in his dayes, but that hee himselse should inherit his grave in 2.cbron.34-

Iostas assembled the Elders, caused the Booke to bee read vnto them, made a 50 covenant with the Lord, and caused all that were found in Ierusalem and Beniamin to doe the like, promiting thereby to observe the Lawes and commaundements in the Booke contained.

The execution done by Iosias vpon the Altar, idols, monuments, and bones of the falle Prophets, at Bethel, argueth his Dominion to have extended vnto those Countries, nor thinke, that any victorie of Iosias in warre got possession of these places; but rather that Ezekias, after the flight and death of Senacherib, when Merodach opposed himselfe against Asarhaddon, did vse the advantage which the faction in the North presented vnto him, and laid hold vpon so much of the Kingdome of Israel, as hee was able to people. Otherwise also it is not improbable, that the Babylonian finding himselfe vnable to deale with Pfammiticus in Syria (as wanting power to raise the fiege of Azolus, though the Towne held out nine and twentie yeeres) did give vnto Manasses, together with his libertie, as much in Israel as himselfe could not casily defend. This was a good way to breake the amitie that the Kings of Iuda had fo 10 long held with those of Egypt, by casting a bone betweene them, and withall by this benefit of enlarging their Territorie with addition of more than they could challenge, to redeeme the friendship of the Iewes, which had beene lost by injuries done in seeking to bereaue them of their owne. When it is said, that Manasses did 2.Chron, 33.14. after his deliuerance from imprisoment, put Captaines of warre in all the strong Cities of Iuda; it may be that some such businesse is intimated, as the taking possession. and fortifying of places delivered into his hands. For though it be manifest that he tooke much paines, in making lerufalemit selfe more desensible; yet I should rather belowee, that he, having aircady compounded with the Babylonian, did fortific himselfe against the Egyptians, whose side hee had forsaken, than that hee travailed in 20 making such prouitions, onely for his minds sake. The earnestnesse of Iosias in the King of Babel his quarrell, doth argue, that the composition which Manasses had made, with that King or his Ancestor, was vpon such friendly tearmes, as required not only a faithfull observation, but a thankfull requitall. For no perswasions could fuffice to make Iosias fit still, and hold himselfe quiet in good neutralitie, when Pharao Neco King of £gypt passed along by him, to warre vpon the Countries about the River of Euphrates.

Countries, that had beene part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. Yet I doe

The last yeere of Iosias his raigne it was, when as Neco the sonne of Psammiticus, came with a powerfull Armie towardes the border of Iudea, determining to paffe 2 chron. 35.20. that way being the necrest toward Eughrates, either to strengthen the passages of 30 that River, about Carchemish or Cercusium, for the defence of Syria (as long after this; Dioclesian is said by Ammian u Marcellenus to haue done) or perhaps to inuade Syria it selfe. For it seemeth that the travaile of Pfammiticus had not beene idlely confirmed about that one Towne of Azotus, but had put the Agyptians in possession of no small part of Syria, especially in those quarters, that had formerly belonged vnto the Adades Kings of Damafeo.

Neither was the industrie of Neco leffe than his Fathers had beene, in pursuing the warre against Babel. In which warre, two things may greatly have availed the Ægyptians, and advanced their affaires and hopes: the extraordinarie valour of the mercenarie Greekes, that were farre better Souldiers than £gypt could of it selfe 40 afford; and the danger wherein Affria stood, by the force of the Medes, which under the command of more absolute Princes, began to feele it selfe better; and to shew what it could doc. These were great helpes, but of shorter endurance than was the warre; as in place more convenient shall be noted. At the present it seemes, that either some preparation of the Chaldaans to reconquer, did enforce, or some disabilitie of theirs to make resistance, did inuite the King of Agpt, into the Countries bordering vpon Euphrates; whither Pharao Neco ascended with a mighty

These two great Monarchs, having their swords drawne, and contending for the Empire of that part of the World, loss aduised with himselfe to which of so these he might adhere, having his Territorie set in the mid way betweene both, so as the one could not inuade the other, but that they must of necessitie tread vpon the very face and body of his Countrie; Now though it were so that Neco himselfe desired by his Embassadors, leave to passe along by Indea, protesting that hee directed himselfe against the Assyrians onely, without all harmefull purpose against Iosias; yet all sufficed not, but the King of Ifrael would needs fight with him.

Many examples there were, which taught, what little good the friendship of Egypt could bring to those that had affiance therein; as that of Hofea the last King of Ifrael, who whenhe fell from the dependance of the Affirian, and wholly trufied to Sabacus or Sous King of Egypt, was veterly disappointed of his hopes, and in conclusion lost both his life and estate, which the Assyrian, so rooted vp and tare in pieces, as it could neuer after be gathered together or replanted. The calamities also that fell vpon Iuda in the thirteenth and four etecnth yeeres of Ezekia, whilest to that good King and his people relied vpon Sethon; and more lately, the imprisonment of Manasses, were documents of sufficient proofe, to shew theill assurance, that was in the helpe of the Agyptians, who (neere neighbours though they were) were alwayes vnready; when the necessities of their friends required their alfiflance. The remembrance hereof might be the reason why Neco did not seeke, to haue the Iewes renew their ancient league with him, but onely craued that they would be contented to fit still, and behold the pastime betweene him and the Asiyrians. This was an easie thing to grant; seeing that the countenance of such an Armic, as did, soone after this, out-face Nabula sar, vpon his owne borders, left vnto the lewes, a lawfull excuse of feare, had they forborne to give it any checke vpon the 20 way. Wherefore I beleeue, that this religious and vertuous Prince Iostas, was not stirred up onely by politike respects, to stop the way of Neco; but thought himselse bound in faith & honour, to doe his best in desence of the Babylonian Crowne: whereunto his Kingdome was obliged, either by couenant made at the enlargement of Manafes, or by the gift of fuch part as hee held in the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. As for the Princes and people of Inda, they had now a good occasion to shew, both vnto the Fibylonians, of what importance their friendship was, and to the Agyptians what a valiant Nation they had abandoned, and thereby made

Some thinke, that this action of Iosias, was contrarie to the aduice of Ieremie 30 the Prophet; which I doe not finde in the Prophecie of Ieremie, nor can finde reafon to beleeue. Others hold opinion, that he forgat to aske the counsell of God: and this is very likely; seeing hee might beleeue that an enterprise grounded vpon fidelitie and thankfulnesse due to the King of Babel, could not but be displeasing vnto the Lord. But the wickednesse of the people (in whom the corruptions of former times had taken such roote, as all the care of losias in reforming the Land, could not plucke vp) was questionlesse farre from harkning how the matter would stand with Gods pleasure, and much farther from enquiring into his secret will, wherein it was determined, that their good King, whose life flood betweene them and their punishment, should now bee taken from among them, and that in 49 luch fort, as his death should give enterance to the miseries ensuing. So Iosias leauying all the firength hee could make, necre vnto Megiddo, in the halfe Tribe of Manasses, encountered Necho: and there he received the stroke of death, which lingring about him till hee came to Ierusalem, brought him to the Sepulchers of his Ancestors. His losse was greatly bewailed of all the people and Princes of Inda, especially of Ieremie the Prophet: who inferted a forrowfull remembrance thereof Laments ACS

Of PHARAO NECO that fought with Iosias: Of IEHOAHAZ and IEHOIAKIM Kings of Inda.

F these warres, and particularly of this victoric, Herodotus hath mention, among the acts of Neco. He tels vs of this King, that hee went about to make a channell, whereby Ships might passe, out of Nilus into the Redsea. It should have reached aboue a hundred miles in 10 length, and beene wide enough for two Gallies to row in front. But in the middest of the worke, an Oracle foretold that the Barbarians should have the benefit of it, which caused Neco to desist when halfe was done. There were consumed in this toilesome businesse twelve hundred thousand Agyptians : a losse great enough to make the King for sake his enterprise, without troubling the Oracle for admonition. How soeuer it were, he was not a man to be idle; therefore hee built a Fleet, and leavied a great Armie, wherewith hee marched against the King of Babel. In this expedition he vsed the service, as well of his Nauic, as of his landforces; but no particular exploits of his therein, are found recorded, saue onely this victorie against Iosia, where Herodotus cals the place Magdolus, and the Iewes Sy-20 rians, which is a small errour, seeing that Iudaa was a Pronince of Syria, and Magdolus or Magdala is taken to have beene the same place (though diversly named) in which this battaile was fought. After this, Necus tooke the Citic of Cadytis. which was perhaps Carchemish, by Euphrates, and made himselfe Lord, in a manner, of all Syria, as Iofephus witneffeth.

Particularly we finde, that the Phanicians, one of the most powerfull Nations in Syria, were his Subjects, and that by his command they furrounded all Africa, fetting faile from the gulfe of Arabia, and so passing along all the Coast, whereon they both landed, as neede required, and sowed corne for their sustenance, in that long voyage which lasted three yeeres. This was the first nauigation about Africa, 39 wherein that great Cape, now called, Of good hope, was discouered; which after was forgotten, vntill Valco de Gama the Portingall found it out, following a contrarie course to that which the Phanicians held; for they, beginning in the East, ranne the way of the Sunne, South and then Westward, after which they returned home by the pillars and streights of Hercules (as the name was then) called now the straights of Gybraltar, having Africke still on the right hand : but the Portingals, beginning their voyage not farre from the same straights, leave Africke on the Larboard, and bend their course vnto the East. That report of the Phanicians, which Herodotus durst not beleeue, how the Sunne in this journie was on their right hand, that is, on the Northside of them, is a matter of necessarie truth; and the observation then 40 made hereof, makes mee the better to beleeue, that such a Voyage was indeede performed.

But leaving these discourses of Neco his magnificence, let vs tell what hee did. in matters more importing his Estate. The people of Iuda, while the Egyptians were busic at Carchemish, had made Ichoahaz their King, in the roome of his father Iosias. The Prophet Ieremie cals this new King Shallum, by the name of his younger brother; alluding perhaps to the short Raigne of Shallum King of the tenne Tribes: for Shallum of Israel raigned but one moneth; Iehoahaz no more than three. Hee was not the eldest some of losias: Wherefore it may seeme that he was set up as the best affected vnto the King of Babel; the rest of his house being more inclined to the 50 Ægyptian, as appeares by the sequell. An Idolater he was, and thrived accordingly. For when as Neco had dispatched his businesse in the North parts of Syria, then did he take order for the affaires of Iudea. This Countrie was now so farre from making any refistance, that the King himself came to Riblah in the Land of Hamath, where the matter went foill on his fide, that Neco did cast him into bonds and carry him prisoner into Agypt, giving away his Kingdome to Eliakim his elder brother, to whom of right it did belong. This Citie of Riblath, in after times called Antiochia, was a place vnhappie to the Kings and Princes of Inda, as may bee obserued in diuers examples. Yet here Iehoiakim, together with his new name, got his Kingdome; an ill gaine, fince he could no better vse it. But how-cuer Ieloiakim thriued by the bargaine, Pharao sped well, making that Kingdome Tributarie, without any stroke stricken, which three moneths before was too stoute to give him peace. when he desired it. Certaine it is, that in his march outward, Neco had a greater to taskelying vpon his hands, than would permit him to wast his forces vpon Iudea: but now the reputation of his good successe at Megiddo, and Carchemillo, together with the diffention of the Princes Iosias his sonnes (of whom the eldest is probably thought to have stormed at the preferment of his yonger brother) gave him power to doe, euen what should please himselfe. Yet hee did forbeare to make a conquest of the Land; perhaps vpon the same reason, which had made him so carnest, in seeking to hold peace with it. For the lewes had suffered much, in the Agyptians quarrell, and being left by the fetheir friends, in time of need, vnto all extremities, were driven to for sake that party, and joyne with the enemies; to whom if they shewed themselves faithfull, who could blame them? It was therefore enough to reclaime 20 them; feeing they were fuch a people, as would not vpon enery occasion shift side. but endure more, than Pharao, in the pride of his victories, thought that any henceforth should lay vpon them: so good a Patron did he meane to be vnto them. Neuerthelesse he laid voon them a Tribute, of an hundred Talents of siluer, and one Talent of gold; that so he might both reape at the present, some fruit of his paines taken, and leaue vnto them some document in the future, of greater punishment then verball anger, due to them, if they should rebell. So hee departed, carrying along with him into Agypt the vnfortunate King tehoahaz, who died in his Capti-

The raigne of Iehoshaz was included in the end of his Fathers last yeere; o-30 therwife it would hardly be found, that Ichoiakim, his successour, did raigne tenne whole yeeres; whereas the Scriptures give him eleven, that is current and incomplete. If any man will rather cast the three moneths of this short raigne, into the first yeere of the brother, than into the fathers last; the same arguments that shall maintaine his opinion, will also proue the matter to be evnworthy of disputation;

and so I leaue it.

Iehoiakim in impietie was like his brother, in faction he was altogether Egyptian, as having received his Crowne at the hand of Pharao. The wickednesse of these last Kings, being expressed in Scriptures none otherwise, than by generall wordes, with reference to all the cuill that their Fathers had done; makes it apparent, that 40 the poylon wherewith Ahaz and Manaffes had infected the Land, was not so expelled by the zealous goodnesse of Iosias, but that it still cleaned vnto the chiefe of the people, Tea unto the chiefe of the Priests also; and therefore it was not frange; that 2.chron.cap.36; the Kings had their part therein. The Royall authoritie was much abased by the versita. dangers wherein the Countrie stood, in this troublesome age: the Princes did in a manner what they lifted; neither would the Kings for beare to professe, that they could denie them nothing. Yet the beginning of Iehoiakim had the countenance of the Egyptian to grace it, which made him infolent & cruell; as we find by that example of his dealing with Friathe Prophet: though herein also the Princes docappeare to have beene inftigators. This Holy man denounced Gods judgements a-30 gainst the Citie and Temple, in like fort as other Prophets had formerly done, and did in the same age. The King with all the men of power, and all the Princes, hearing of this determined to put him to death. Hereupon the poore man fled into Ægypt: but such regard was had vnto Iehoiakim, that Vria was deliuered vnto his Embassadour, and sent backe to the death ; contrary to the custome vsed, both in those dayes, and since among all Ciuill Nations of giuing refuge vnto strangers, that are not held guiltie of such inhumane crimes, as for the generall good of mankind should be exempted from all priviledge.

It concerned Pharas to give all contentment possible to Ieheiakim: for the Allyrian Lyon, that had not stirred in many yeeres, beganne about these times, to roare followd vpon the bankes of Euphrates, that his voice was heard vnto Nilus, threatning to make himselse Lord of all the Forrest. The causes that hitherto had withdrawne the house of Merodach, from opposing the Egyptian in his conquest of Svria, require our consideration in this place; before we proceed to commit them together at Charchemish, where shortly after this, the glory of Egypt is to fall.

d. III.

Of the Kings of Babylon and Media. How it came to passe that the Kings of Babel could not give attendance on their businesse in Syria; which caused them to loose that Prouince.

ERODACH the fonne of Baladan, who taking the advantage that Sen-20 nacheribs misaduenture and death, together with the dissension betweene his children presented, made himselfe King of Babylon, was eleuen yeeres troubled with a powerfull Enemie Arhaddon the sonne of Senacherib, raigning ouer the Affyrians in Niniuie; from whom whilest he could not any other way divert his cares, he was faine to omit all bufinesse in Syria, and (as hath beene formerly shewed) to make ouer vnto Ezekia. fome part of the Kingdome of the tenne Tribes. From this moleflation, the death of Afarhaddon did not onely fet him free, but gaue vnto him some part of Assyria, if not (as is commonly but lesse probably thought) the whole Kingdome. How 30 greatly this was to the liking of the Affyrians, I wil not here stand to enquire: his long raigne following, and his little entermedling in matters of Syria, make it plaine, that he had worke enough at home either in defending or in establishing that which he had gotten. Tolephus gives him the honour of having wonne Niniuie it selfe; which we may believe; but furely he did not hold it long. For in the times foone following, that great Citie was free, and vanquished Phraortes the Median. Perhaps it yeelded vpon some capitulation: and refused afterwards to continue subject, when the Kings being of the Chaldaan race, preferred Babylon before it.

Some thinke that this was the Affyrian King, whose Captaines tooke Manasses prisoner; but I rather believe those that hold the contrarie; for which I have given 40 my reasons in due place. To say truth, I find little cause why Merodach should have looked into those parts, as long as the Iemes were his friends, and the Agyptians, that maligned the Northerne Empire, held themselves quiet at home, which was vntill the time of Pfammiticus, about the end of this Kings Raigne, or the beginning of his fonne.

Ben Merodash the sonne and successour of this King, is not mentioned in the Scriptures; yet is hee named by good confent of Authours, and that speake little of his doings. The length of his Raigne is gathered by inference to have beene one and twentie yeeres, for somuch remaineth of the time that passed betweene the beginning of his Fathers and his Nephewes Raignes (which is a knowne fumme) de- 5° ducting the yeeres of his Father, and of his sonne Nabulassar. This (as I take it) was he that had Manasses Prisoner and released him. He sped ill in Spria: where Plammiticus, by the vertue of his Mercinarie Greekes, did much prevaile. This may haue beene some cause that he released Manasses, and did put into his handes some part more of the Kingdome of Samaria: which is made probable by circumstances alleaged before.

Nabulassar that raigned in Babylon after his Father Ben Merodach, had greater bulines in his own Kingdome, than would permit him to looke abroad: infomuch as it may beethought to have beene a great negligence or over-light of Pfammitiess and Neco, that they did not occupie some good part of his Dominions beyond Euphrates. For it was in his time, that Phraortes King of the Medes inuaded Aligna, and belieged Niniue; from whence he was not repelled by any force of Nabulassar, but constrained to remove by the comming of Scythians, who in these ages did o-10 uer-flow those parts of the World, laying hold vpon all, that they could master by strong hand. Of these Scythians, and the Lordship that they held in Asia, it is convenient that I speake in this place; shewing briefly afore-hand, how the Medes, vpon whom they first fell, were busied in the same times with hopes of conquering Aßyria.

Phraortes, the sonne of Deioces, King of the Medes, having by many victories enlarged his Dominions, conceived at length a faire possibilitie of making himselfe.

CHAP.28. S.3.

That Citie (as Herodotus reports it) having beene a Soucraigne Ladie, was not Herod.lib.s. forsaken of all her dependants; yet remained in such case, that of her selfe shee was 20 well enough.

This makes it plaine, that how socuer Merodach had gotten possession of this imperiall feat, and made it subject as was the rest of the Countrie; vet it found the meanes to fet it selfe at libertie: as after this againe he did, when it had been regai-

Sharpe warre, and the very nouelty of fuddaine violence, vieto difmay any State or Countrie, not inured to the like : but custome of danger hardeneth even those that are vnwarlike. Niniue had been the Palace of many valiant Kings lately raigning therein; it had suffered, and resisted, all the surie, wherewith either Domesticall tumults betweene the sonnes of Senacherib, or forraigne warre of the Babyloni-30 ans, could afflict it: and therefore it is the leffe wonderfull, that Phraortes did speed foill in his journey against it. He and the most of his Armie perished in that expedition: whereof I find no particular circumstances (perhaps he vnderualued their forces, and brought a leffe power than was needfull) It is enough, that we may herein beleeue Herodotus.

Cyaxares the sonne of Phraortes, a brauer man of warre then his Father, wanne as much of Asia the leffe, as lay Eastward, from the River of Halys; he sought revenge vpon the Afgrians for the death of his Father, and belieged Niniue it selfe, having a purpose to destroy it. I rather beleeue Ev s EBIVS, That he tooke the Citie, and fulfilled his displeasure upon it, than HERODOTVS, That the Scythian Armie came upon 40 him whilest he lay before it. For where equal authorities are contradictorie (as Eusebius, though farre later then Herodotus, yet having seene other Authors, that are now loft, is to be valued according to his great reading) there doe Ihold it best, to yeeld vnto the best likelihoods.

To thinke that the Scythians came vpon Cyaxares, whilest hee lay before Ninine, were to accuse him of greater improvidence, then ought to bee suspected in one commended as a good Souldier. But to suppose that hee was faine to leave the Towne, when a warre so dangerous tell voon his owne Countrie, doth well agree both with the condition of such businesse as that Scythian expedition brought into those parts, and with the State of the Chaldaan and Affgrian affaires en-

The destruction of this great Citie is both foretold in the Booke of Tobit, and there set downe as happening about these times; of which Booke who soener was the Authour, hee was ancient enough to know the Storie of those ages, and hath committed no fuch errour in reckoning of times, as should cause vs to distrust him in this. As for the Prophelic of Nahum, though it be not limited vnto any certaine tearme, vet it appeares to have taken effect, in the finall destruction of Ninine by Nabuchodone for, according to the common opinion. For the Prophet hath mention of a Conquest of Agypt, foregoing this calamitie, whereof we will speake in due place. Some that ascribe more authoritie then the reformed Churches yeelde, to the Booke of Tobit, are carefull, as in a matter of necessitie, to affirme, that about these times Niniue was taken; but they attribute (coniecturally) the victorie over it, to Ben Merodach: a needleffe coniecture, if the place of Eufebius be well confidered. Yet I hold it probable, that Nabulas ar the sonne of Ben Merodach, did seize vpon it and place a King or Viceroy therein, about such time as the Countrie of Cris was abandoned by Cyaxares, when the Seythian warre ouerwhelmed Media. For then was the Conquell wrought out readic to his hand; the swelling spirits of the Miniuites were allayed, and their malice to Babylon fo affwaged, that it might be thought a great fauour, if Nabula flar, appointing vnto them a peculiar King, took him and them into protection: though afterwards to their confusion, this vnthankfull people and their King, rebelled againe, as shall be shewed in the Raigne of 2/4buchodonofor.

d IIII.

The great expedition of the Scythians, who ruled in Asia eight and twentie yeeres.

The time of this expedition.

O W that I have shewed what impediment was given by the Ass. Prians and the Medes, to the Babylonians, who thereby were much difabled to performe any action of worth vpon the Agyptians in Syria; it is time that I speake of that great Scythian expedition, which grie-uousiy afflicted not only the Babylonians, but the Medes and Lydians, with the Countries adiacent, in such wise, that part of the trouble redounded cuen to the Agyptians themselves. Of the Soythian people in generall, Herodotus makes very large discourse, but interlaced, as of matter ill knowne, with many Fables; of this expedition he tels many particulars, but il agreeing, with confent of time. Concerning his fabulous reports, it will be needlesse to recite them, for they are farre enough distant from the businesse in hand. The computation of times which by 40 inference out of his relations, may feeme very strange, needeth some answer in this place: lest otherwise I should either seeme to make my selfe too bold with an Authour, in citing him after a manner different from his owne tale; or else to bee too forgetfull of my selfe, in bringing to act vpon the Stage, those persons, which I had already buried. Eight and twentie yeeres, he faith, that the Seythians Raigned in Asia, before Cyaxares deliuered the Countrie from them. Yet he reports a warre betweene Cyaxares and Halyattes the Lydian, as foregoing the fiege of Niniue; the fiege of Niniue being ere the Seythians came. And further he tels, how the Seythians, hauing vanquished the Medes, did passe into Syria, and were encountred in Palestina by Pfammiticus King of Egypt, who by gifts and entreatie procured them to de- 50 part from him. These narrations of Herodotus may, every one of them, bee true; though not in such order of time, as hee hath marshalled them. For Psammiticus was dead before Cyaxares beganne to Raigne: and Cyaxares had spent halfe of his fortic yeeres, ere Halyattes was King of Lydia; so that he could not, after those Lydian warres, Raigne eight and twentie yeeres together with the Scythians. It is true. that Eufebius doth also call Psammis the sonne of Pharao Neco, by name of Psammiticus; and this King Pfammis may, by some strained coniecture, bee thought to haue beene he that met with the Soythians: for he lived with both Craxares and Halrattes. But Eusebius himselfe referres all that businesse of the Seythian irruption into Palastina, to Pfammiticus the Father of Neco, whom hee leaves dead before the Raigne of Halyattes. Therefore I dare not relie vpon Herodotus, in this matter, otherwise then to beleeve him, that such things were in these ages, though not in fuchorder as he fets them downe.

10 It remaines, that I collect as well as I can, those memorials which I finde of this expedition scattered in divers places: a worke necessarie, for that the greatnesse of this action was such, as ought not to bee omitted in a generall Historie; yet not easie, the consent of those that have written thereof, being nothing neere to vniformitie.

Ihaue noted before, that in the Raigne of Ardys King of Lydia, the Cimmerians ouer-ranne that Kingdome, and were not expelled, untill Halyattes the Nephew of Ardys got the vpper hand of them. In thele times therefore of Ardys, Sadiattes, and Halyattes, are we to find the eight and twentie yeeres, wherein the Scythians raigned ouer Asia. Now for a much as Psammiticus the Agyptian had some dea-20 lings with the Scythians, euen in the height of their prosperitie, wee must needs allow more then one or two of his last yeeres vnto this their Dominion. But the beginning of Halyattes his Raigne in Lydia, being three and twentie yeeres compleat after the death of Psammitieus, leaues the space very scant, either for the great victories of the Scythians, necessarily supposed before they could meet the Agyptian in Syria, or for those many losses, which they must have received ere they could be driven quite away. To increase this difficultie, the victorious Raigne of Nabuchodono for in Babylon, is of no small moment. For how may we thinke it possible, that he should have adventured the strength of his Kingdome against the Agyptians and Iewes, had hee stood in daily feare of losing his owne; to a more mightie Nati-30 on that lay upon his necke? To speake simply as it appeares to me; the victories ascribed to Cyaxares & Halyattes ouer these warlike people, were not obtained against the whole body of their Armie, but were the defeatures of some troupes, that infested their severall Kingdomes; other Princes, and among these, Nabulassar having the like successe, when the pleasures of Asia had mollified the courages of these hardie Northerne Laddes. Wherefore wee may probably annexe the eight and twentie yeres of the Scythians rule, to as many almost the last of Nahulassars Raigne. in compasse whereof their power was at the greatest. This is all that I can say of the time, wherein Asia suffered the violence of these oppressors.

† II.

What Nations they were that brake into Asia; with the cause of their Iournie.

Touching the expedition it selfe, Herodotus tels vs, that the Cimmerians being dri-uen out of their Countrie by the Scythians, inuaded and wasted some part of Afia; and that the Scythians not contented with having wonne the land of the Cim-30 merians, did follow them, I know not why, into farre remooued quarters of the world, so (as it were by chance) falling vpon Media and Egypt, in this pursuit of men that were gone another way into Lydia. Hereby we may gather that the Cimmerians were an odious and base people; the Stythians, as mischieuous and foolish; or else Herodotus, and some other of his Countrimen, great slanderers of those, by whom their Nation had beene beaten, and Ionia, more then once, gricuously ranfackt. The great valour of the Cimmerians or Cimbrians is so well known, and their manic Conquests so well testified in Histories of divers Nations, that the malice of the Greekes is infufficient to staine them with the note of Cowards. These were the posteritic of Gomer, who peopled the greatest part of our Westerne World; and whose reflow did ouerwhelme no small portion of Greece and Asia, as well before and after, as in the age whereof wee doe now entreat. He that would more largely informe himselfe of their originall and actions, may perule Goropius Becanus his Amazonica; of many things in which Booke, that may be verified, which the learned Ortelius is said to have spoken, of all Goropius his works, that it is easie to laugh at them, 10 but hard to confute them: There wee find it proued, by such arguments and authorities, as are not lightly to be regarded, that the Cimmerians, Scythians, and Sarmatians, were all of one Linage and Nation; how soeuer distinguished in name, by reason of their divers Tribes, professions, or perhaps dialect of speech. Homer indeede hath mention of the Cimmerians, whose Countrie whether he place in the West, as neer vnto the Ocean and boundes of the Earth, Or in the North, as being farre from the Sunne, and couered with eternall darkneffe; certaine it is that he would have them neere neighbours to Hell: for he had the same quarrell to them, which Herodotus had, and therefore belike would have made them feeme a kinde of Goblins. It was the manner of this great Poet (as Herodotus writing his life affirmes) to infert into 20 his workes the names of such as lived in his owne time, making such mention of them, as the good or ill done by them to himselfe deserved. And for this reason it is proued by Eustathius, that the Cimmerians were so disgraced by him, because they had wasted his Countrie. Perhaps that invasion of Phrygia by the Amazons, whereof Homer puts a remembrance into Priamus his discourse with Helen, was the very same, which Eusebius noteth to have happened somewhat before the age of Homer, at what time the Cimmerians with the Amazons, together inuaded Asia. This is certaine, that both the Amazons and the Cummerij (who in after-times were called Cimbri) did often breake into Greece and Asia 3 which though it bee not in expresse tearmes written, that they did with ioynt forces, yet seeing they inua- 20 ded the selfe same places, it may well be gathered, that they were companions. One iourney of the Amazons into Greece, mentioned also by Eusebius, was by the straights of the Cimmerians, as we finde in Diodore, who further telleth vs, that the Scythians therein gaue them affistance. The same Authour, before his entrie into Diod.lib.2.c. 11. those discourses of the Amazons, which himselfe acknowledgeth to bee fabulous, doth report them to have beene Wives of the Septhians, and no leffe warlicke than their Husbands; alleadging the example of that Queene, who is faid to have flaine the great Persian Cyrus. That it was the manner of the Cimbri to carrie their wines along with them to the warres; and how desperate the courage was of those women; the terrible descent of them into Italie, when Marius the Roman ouerthrew 40 them, gives proofe sufficient. I will not here enter into a discourse of the Amazons; other place will give mee better leifure to speake of them: but seeing that they are noted by divers Historians to have belonged vnto the Cimmerians, to the Soythians, and to the Sarmatians, wee may the better approous Goropius his conclusion, That these three Nations were one, at least that they were neere allies.

Now concerning the expulsion of the Cimmerians by the Scythians, it appeares to have beene none other than the sending a Colonie of them forth into Asia, with an Armie of Scythians to helpe them, in purchasing a new seat, and establishing the plantation.

The Surmatians also were companions in this journic. For the Citie of Nouo- 50 grad in Rusia (which Countrie is the same that was called Sarmatia) stood in their way homewards, as shall anon be further shewed. So that all the North was vp in Armes: and therefore it is no maruaile though many Countries felt the weight of this great inundation. Such another voiage was that, which the same people made five hundred yeeres and more after this, when they were encountred by the Romans. For they issued from the parts about the Lake Maoris; they were then likewife affisted (faith Plutarch in the most likely report of them) by the Scythians their Plutarch in the neighbours; they had in their Armic about three hundred thousand fighting men, life of Marias. besides a huge multitude of women & children; they wandered ouer many Countries, beating all down before them; and finally, thinking to have fetled them selves in Italie, they divided their companie, for the more easie passage thither, and were consumed in three terrible battailes by the Roman Consuls. Meere necessitie enforced these poore Nations, to trouble the World, in following such hard aduentures. 10 For their Countrie, being more fruitfullof men than of fultinance, and shut vo on the North side with intolerable cold, which denied issue that way to their ouerfwelling multitudes; they were compelled to discharge vpon the South, and by right or wrong to drive others out of possession, as having title to all that they had power to get, because they wanted all, that weaker, but more civill, people had. Their sturdie bodies, patient of hunger, cold and all hardnesse, gaue them great advantage over such as were accustomed vnto a more delicate life, and could not be without a thousand superfluites. Wherefore commonly they prevailed very farre; their next neighbours giving them free passage, that they might the sooner be ridde of them; others giving them, belides passage, victuals and guides to con-20 duct them to more wealthie places; others hiring them to depart with great prefents; fo as the farther they went on, the more pleasant Lands they found, and the

Of the Cimmerians warre in Lydia.

30 THE first Companie of these, consisting for the most part of Cimmerians, held the way of the Euxine Seas, which they had still on the right hand; leaving on the other fide, and behinde them, the great Mountaines of Caucasus. These hauing passed through the Land of Cholchis, that is now called Mengrelli, entered the Countrie of Pontus, and being arrived in Paphlagonia, fortified the Promontorie Herod. Ilb. Ac whereon Sinope, a famous Hauen Towne of the Greekes, was after built. Here it feemes that they bestowed the weakest and most unseruiceable of their traine, together with the heaviest part of their carriages, under some good gard: as drawing necre to those Regions, in conquest whereof they were to trie the vtmost hazard. For in like fort afterwards did the Cimbri (of whom I spake even now) dispose of 40 their impediments, leaving them in a place of firength, where Aniwerpe now flands, when they drew necre into Gaule, vpon which they determined to aduenture themselues in the purchase. From Synope, the way vnto Phrygia, Lydia, and Ionia, was faire and open to the Cimmerians, without any ledge of Mountaines or any deepe Rivers to stay their march: for Iris and Halys they had already passed. What battailes were fought betweene these inuaders and the Lydians, and with what variable successe the one or other part wanne and lost, I finde not written nor am able to coniecture. This I find, that in the time of Ardys, the Cimmerians got pofsession of Sardes the Capitall Citic of Lydia; onely the Castle holding out against them. Further I observe, that whereas Herodotus tels of the acts performed by Gyges and Ardys Kings of Lydia, before this invalion, and by Halyattes and Crassus in the times following; all that Ardis did against the Cimmerians, and all, saue burning the Milesians Corne fields, that was done in twelue yeres by Sadiattes his Son (who perhaps had his hands so full of this businesse, that he could turne them to nothing else) is quite omitted: whereby it may seeme, that neither of the two did any thing

Certainly, the miseries of warre are neuer so bitter and manie, as when a whole Nation, or great part of it, for faking their owne feates, labour to roote out the effablished possessions of another Land, making roome for themselves, their wines and children. They that fight for the masterie, are pacified with tribute, or with some over services and acknowledgements, which had they beene yeelded at the first, all had been equiet, and no sword bloudied. But in these migrations, the affailants bring fo little with them, that they need all which the defendants have, their Lands and Cattell, their houses and their goods, even to the cradles of the sucking to infants. The mercilesse tearmes of this controuersie arme both sides with desperate resolution: seeing the one part must either winne, or perish by famine; the other defend their goods, or look their lines without redemption. Most of the Countries in Europe have felt examples thereof; and the mightie Empire of Rome was overthrowne by such invasions. But our Isle of Britaine can best witnesse the diversitie of Conquests; having by the happic victoric of the Romans, gotten the knowledge of all Civill arts, in exchange of libertie, that was but flenderly instru-Ged therein before; whereas the iffue of the Saxon and Danish warres, was, as were the causes, quite contrarie. For these did not seeke after the Dominion onely, but the entire possession of the Countrie, which the Saxons obtained, but with horrible 20 crucltie, cradicating all of the British Race, and defacing all memoriall of the ancient inhabitants through the greater part of the Land. But the Danes (who are alfo of the Cimmerian bloud) found such end of their enterprise, as it may seeme that the Cimmerians in Lydia, and Seythians in the higher Asia, did arrive vnto. So that by considering the processe of the one, we shall the better conceive the fortune of the other. Many battailes the Danes wonne; yet none of such importance, as sufficed to make them absolute Conquerours: Manie the Saxons wonne vpon the Danes, yet not fo great, as could drive them quite away, and backe from hence, after they had gotten firme footing. But in course of time, the long continuance cuen of vtter enmitie, had bred fuch acquaintance betweene them, as bowing the natures of 30 both these people, made the one more plyant vnto the other. So their disagreeable qualities, both ill and good, being reduced into one milde temper, no small number of the Danes became peaceable cohabitants with the Saxons, in England, where great flaughter had made large roome; others returning home, found their owne Countrie wide enough to receive them, as having disburthened it selfe of many thousands, that were sent to seeke their graves abroad. And such (as I thinke) was the end of the Cimmerian warre in Lydia; whereunto though some victorie of Halyattes may have hastened the conclusion, yet the wearifome length of time feemes to have done most, in compelling them to desire of rest. I know not why I should feare to adde hereunto my further coniecture; which is, that the matter was so 40 compounded between the Cimmerians and Halyattes, that the River of Halys should divide their Territories. For Halys was henceforth the border of the Lydians, and on the Easterne side of the River was the Countric of the Amazons, that is indeed, of the Cimmerians and other Scythian people; whole wives and daughters these warlike women are supposed to have beene.

And hereunto the quarrell enfuing, betweene Halyattes and Cyaxares the Mede, hath very good reference. For Halyattes (as is faid) fought in defence of certaine Seythians, vpon whom the Median Sought reuenge. And it stands with reason, that the Lydians and Cimmerians, being much weakened with mutuall flaughters, should have joyned in a league of mutual defence for their common safetie: though o- 50 therwise it had beene dangerous to Halyattes, if he had permitted the Median to extend his Kingdome so farre Westward, what socuer the pretences might be, of taking revenge vpon such as had spoiled each of their Countries. As for that occasion of the warre between these two Kings, which Herodotiss relates, I find it of little

waight, and leffe probabilitie. He tels of Scythians, that being chased out of their Countrie by faction, came vinto Cyaxares; who committed vinto them certaine Boves, to be instructed in the Scythian tongue, and feate of Archeric. Now it so Herod, lib. 1. fell out (faith he) that these Seythians vsing much to hunt, and commonly bringing home somewhat with them, did neverthelesse other whiles misse of their game, and come home as they went. Hereupon the King being froward and cholericke, bitferly regiled them; and they, as impatient as he, killed one of the Boyes that was under their charge, whom dreffing like Venison, they presented vnto him; which done, they fled vnto Halyattes. This Herodotus deliuers, as the ground of a warre to that lasted fixe vecres betweene the Medes and Lydians; the one King demanding these Fugitiues to be deliuered into his hand, the other resuling to betray such men as were become his suppliants. To this I will say no more, than that I see no cause that might induce the Scythians, to betake themselves to either of these Kings, unto whom their Nation had wrought so much displeasure. Particularly they had reason to distrust Cyaxares, for the treacherie that he shewed in the massacring of their Countrie men, that were in his Kingdome; of whom it is now meet that wee should speake.

t. IIII.

The warre of the Scythians in the higher Asia.

Sthe Cimmerians held their course Westerly, along the shores of the Euxine Sea: fo the Scythians and Sarmatians tooke the other way, and having the Cafpian Sea on their left hand, passed betweene it and Caucas through Albania, Colthene, and other obscure Nations, where now are the Countries of Seruan and Georgia and fo they entered into Media. The Medes encountered them in Armes, but were beaten, and thereupon glad to come to any agreement with them. This was 20 in the time of Phraortes, whilest Pfammiticus raigned in Egypt. If it were in the fixt veere of Nabulassars Raigne over Babylon (supposing him to have raigned five and thirtie; otherwise we must allow to Ben Merodach what we take from him) then doe the eight and twentie yeeres of their Dominion end, one yeere before the great Nabuchodonofor was King; fogiuing him good leave to provide fecurely, for the invalion of Syria, which expedition he began while his Father yet lived, as Io/ephus out of Berofus relates the Historic.

Now the Medes, desirous to saue themselves as well as they might, from this terrible Nation, which when they had no lust to a second triall of the sword, refufed not to undergoe the burthen of a Tribute, but thought nothing dishonourable, 40 that would ferue to remooue these troublesome guests into some other lodging. On the other part, the Seythians finding still the Countries pleasanter & better, the further that they marched into the South, did suffer themselves to bee perswaded that a little more trauaile, would adde a great deale more to their content. For they relied fo much upon their owne valour, that they feared no relistance; and being the brauest men, they thought it reason that they should dwell in the best Region. That Phraortes perswaded them into Egypt, I doe not thinke: Babylon was neere enough; whither if hee could fend these Locusts to graze, then should not his vnfriendly Neighbours have cause to laugh at his misfortune. What shift Nabulassar made with them, or that at all he had any dealings with them, I doe not reade. But 50 it is well knowne, that his Dominions lay in the middeft betweene Media and Agypt; as also, that they made all those parts of Asia Tributarie; wherefore we may very well beleene, that they watered their horses in his Riners, and that hee also was content to give them prouender.

tooke care that they might not looke vpon Agypt; lest the sight thereof should more easily detaine them there, than any force or perswasion, that hee could vse, would fend them going. Therefore he met them in Syria, presuming more on the great gifts which he meant to bestow vpon them, than on his Armie that should keepe them backe. Agypt was rich; and halfe the riches thereof had not beene ill spent in saving all. Yet Pfammitieus tooke the most likely course, whereby to make his part good against them by strong hand, in case they had beene so obstinate as to refuse all indifferent composition. For hee lay close vponthe edge of the Wildernesse in Gaza (as I take it) the Southermost border of Palassina: whence hee never scalding Sunne-beames, ill agreeing with their temper, as all the length of Svria could beat vpon them. When they were come as farre as Ascalon, the next Citie to Gaza, then did he affay them with goodly words, accompanied with gifts, which were likely to work fo much the better, by how much the worse they were pleased with the heate of a Climate so farre different from their owne. Psammitieus had at his backe a vast wildernesse, ouer the scorching sands whereof, the Scythians more patient of cold and wet, than of the contrarie distempers, could ill haue indured to pursue him, through vnknowne wayes, had they sought with him and prevailed:

especially the Kingdome of Egypt being ready to entertaine him with reliefe, and to visite their acquaintance in the high Countries. The Agyptian King (besids that he preserved his owne Estate from a dangerous adventure, by hyring this great Armie to depart from him) found all his Cost well repayed in the processe of his wars in Syria, where the Nations beyond Euphrates had no power to molest him, being more then euer troubled themselues, with the returne of their oppressors. For the Scythians, resoluing now to secke no further, beganne to demaund more than the Tribute formerly imposed. And not contented to fleece the Naturals with grienous exactions, they prefumed to line at discretion vpon the Countrie, taking what king often) taking all at once. This Tyrannous Dominion they long vsed our the higher Ma, that is, ouer the Countrielying betweene the Calpian and Red Seas; and betweene India and Asia the lesse. Happie it was for the poore people, that in so large a space of ground, there was roome enough for these new comers; otherwise the calamitie that fell, as it were by chance, vpon those private men, to whose wealth any Seythian did beare a fancie, would have lighted in generall vpon all at one clap, leaving few alive, and none able to relieve their fellowes. Yet it seemes that the heaviest burthen lay vpon Media; for it was a fruitfull Countrie not farre from their owne home, and lay under a Climate well agreeing with the constitution of their bodies; there also it was that they had the fatall blow, by which their 40

they listed from the Owners; and many times (as it were to saue the labour of ta- 30 them with new trouble at the end of their wearie journie. Wherefore they were 20 content to be intreated, and taking in good part his courteous offers, returned back advanced to meet with the Seythians; but gave them leave to feele as much of the 10

Townes, Lands, Honfes, Wives, and all. At which newes being somewhat amazed; and get disdayning the Villanie of their servants, they made the more speed home: and so not farre 49 from Nouograd met them in warlike manner marching against them. Whereupon aduiting what was best to be done, they agreed also to set upon them with no other shew of weapon but with their horfe whips (which as their manner is, euery manrideth with all) to put them in remembrance of their seruile condition, thereby to terrifie them, and abate their courage. And so marching on, and lashing all together with their whips in their hand; they gaue the onfet. Which seemed so terrible in the eares of their Villaines, and strooke such a sense into them of the smart of the whip, which they had felt before, that they fled all together like Sheepe before the Drivers. In memorie of this victorie, the Noungradians ever fince bane stamped their Coine (which they call a Dingoe Nousgradskoy, carrant through all Russia) with the figure of a Horseman shaking a whip aloft in his hand. It may seeme, that all the

50 women of that Countrie, haue fared the worse euer since, in regard of this vniuerfall fault: for such a Pudkey or whip, as terrified those slaues, curiously wrought by her selfe, is the first present that the Moscouian Wife, euen in time of wooing, sends to him that shalbe her husband, in token of subjection; being well affured, to seele it often on her owne loines. But this was a Document vnto the Scythians, or rather

This is the more strange, for that the Armie returning home out of Media, was very firong, and encountred with opposition (as Herodotius reports it) no leffe then it had found abroad. Wherefore it may be, that the deuice of Cyaxares to free his Herod. ib.4. Country, tooke good effect, with leffe bloud-shed than hath beene supposed. For if hee surprised all the chiefe of them, it was no hard matter to make a good compolition. Many of them doubtleffe in eight and twentie yeeres had so well settled themselues, that they were desirous of rest, and might be permitted, without any danger, to remaine in the Countrie; many (of whom I shall speake anon) having done what they could in the businesse, for which they came forth, were willing to to returne home, with what they had gotten; fuch as were not pleased with either of these two courses, might goe joyne with the Cimmerians in Lydia, or seeke their fortunes in other provinces, among their owne Companions. Whereas all the Families of the North are faid to have beene with Nabuchadnezzar, it may be vnderstood, that a great part of the Scythians, vpon hope of gaine, or defire to keepe what they had already gained, were content to become subject vnto 2\( abula | far: mens loue of their wealth being most effectuall, in taming the more vnquiet loue of inordinate libertie. This is certaine, that Nabuchadnez zar, as ever after, fo in his first beginning 107,25.94 ofwarre, did beate the Egyptians, who in ages foregoing had beene accultomed to deale with the Babylonians after another fathion : and this new successe of that

Of the Scythian Armiereturning out of Media, divers Authours report a Storie. which confirmes mee in the opinion, that this Companie went forth to affift their kindred and friends, in acquiring a new scate, and establishing their plantation. Forthese had lest their wives behinde them ; a good argument to prove that they meant to come againe. The Seythian women, to comfort themselves in their husbands absence, became bed sellowes to their slaues. These got a lusty brood of youths, that were loth to be troubled with Fathers in Law, and therefore prepared to fight with them at their returne. If they were only the children of slaues, 30 which compounded an Armie (as Herodotus would haue it, who tels vs, that the Seythians were wont to pull out all their Bond-mens cies) it must needs be that they were very Boyes, or else that the Women did very little while continue chaste. Wherefore I rather belocue that tale as it is told by the Russes themselves, who agreeing in the rest with the consent of Histories, make that report of their Anceftors returning homewards, which I will fet downe, as I finde it, in M. Doctor Fletcher his exact discourse of the Russe Common-wealth. They under stood by the way, that Russ Common be their Cholopey, or Bond-slaues whom they left at home, had in their absence possessed their cap.a.

insolent Rule was taken from them. Craxares King of the Medes, who in this extremitie was no better then a Rentgatherer for the Scythians, perceiuing that his Land lay vnmanured and waste, through the negligence of his people, that were out of heart by daily oppressions, and that the matter could not be remedied by open force, refolued to proue what might be done by stratagem. The managing of the businesse is thus deliuered in briefe; That he, and his Medes, feasted the better part of the Seythians; made them drunke; and slew them; recourring heereby the possession of all that they had Such another flaughter was committed vpon the Danes in England; but it was re- 50 uenged by their Countrimen, with greater cruelties than euer they had practifed before. That the Scythians, which escaped this bloudy feast, made any stirre in Media, I doe not find; neither doe I read that either in reuenge hereof, or vpon other pretence, the Medes were troubled by inualion from Seythia in time following.

Sarmatians (for Nouograd stands in the Countrie that was called Sarmatia) to beware of absenting themselves any more so long from their Wives; which after this, I find not that they did.

Thus much I thought good to fet downe of the Scythian expedition; not only because it is the most memorable act performed abroad by that Nation, famous in Histories, and terrible to many Countries; but for that it appeares to have beene a great cause, of the Egyptians prevailing hitherto in Syria, and about Indea, which continues yet a while the centre of our discourse.

Auing thus farre digressed from the matters of Iuda, to avoide all further occasion of doing the like, I will here insert a note of such Kings and men of marke, as were betweene the death of Manasses, and the ruine of Ierusalem. Of the Egyptians, Babylonians, Medes, and Lydians, I have spoken as much, as I thought needfull. In Rome, Tullus Hostilius held the Kingdome, vntill the one and twentieth yeere of Iosias; at 20 which time Ancus Martius fucceeding, raigned foure and twentic yeeres. After him L. Tarquinius Priscus, a new-come stranger, but very rich, prevailed so farre by his graciousnesse among the people, that he got the Kingdome to himselfe, disappointing the sonnes of Ancus, ouer whom he was Tutor. He began in the fourth yeere of Zedekia, and Raigned eight and thirtie yeeres. In this time it was, namely, in the second yeere of the thirtieth Olympiad, that the Lacedamonians, bethinking them how to bee avenged of the Arcadians, who gave succour to the Messenians against them in the former warre, entred the Territorie, tooke the Citie of Phigalia or Phialia, from whence their Garrisons were soone after beaten out. Cyplelus expelling the race of the Bacida, made himselfe Lord of Corinth about 20 these times, and governed it in peace thirtie yeeres; leaving for successour his sonne Periander, one of the seuen Sages, but acruell Tyrant: who among other vile acts, flew his owne wife, and afterwards, as in her honour, fripped all the Corinthian women starke naked, burning their apparell, as an acceptable offering to her Ghost. Hereby we may perceive, that the wiledome of the Greekes was not excellent in those dayes; when such a one as this could bee admired as excelling all the Coun-

In these times also were Zaleucus, and Draco, samous Lawgiuers, the one among the Locrians in Italie, the other in the Citie of Athens. The Lawes of Draco were fo rigorous, that he was faid to have written them with bloud: for hee rewarded eue- 40 rie small offence with death. Wherefore his constitutions were soone abrogated, and power given to Solon, by the Athenians, to make new in their stead. But the Lawes of Zaleucus were very milde. He forbad any Gentlewoman to walke abroad with more than one Bond-woman attending on her, unlesse it were when shee was drunke; or to goe forth of the Towne by night, vnlesse it were to some sweet-hearts bed; or to dresse herselfe vp in immodest brauerie, vnlesse it were to inueigle alouer. By which pleasant Ordinances, he effected his desire: for none would seeme, in breaking the Statutes, to be in such case as challenged the dispensation. It is noted in this man as a fingular example of justice, that when his owne fonne had committed adulterie, and was therefore to loofe both his eyes, he did not cause him 70 to be pardoned, but gaue one eye of his owne to faue the yong man (who also lost one) from vtter blindnesse.

I shall not henceforth need, so farre to wander, as hitherto I often haue done, in pursuing of actions collaterall to the Historie, for inserting them in their order of time. The Chaldeans will soone fall under the Persians; the Persians, crelong, encounter with the Greekes; the Greekes, with the Romans, the Romans, with many Nations. Concerning all these, as they shall successively present themselves, in their flourishing Estate; it will be enough to recapitulate the most memorable accidents. that befellthem in their Minoritie. But in the long space of more than thirteene hundred yeeres, which passed betweene the calling of Abraham, and the destruction on of Ierusalem, we finde little matter, wherein the Historic of Israel had any dealing with other Nations, than the very neerest borderers. Yet reade we of many Kingdomes, that in these many ages were erected, and throwne downe; as liketo wife, many memorable acts were performed in Greece and elsewhere, though not following one another at any neere distance, all which must have beene quite omitted, or else reserved vnto a very vnscasonable rehearfall, had they not beene disposed in this method, whereof he that will not allow the conveniencie, may pardon the necessitie.

The oppression of Iudea, and destruction of Ierusalem by the Chaldeans.

CHAP.28. S.6.

OW to returne to the Iewish Storie, from whence wee haue so farre digressed. In the third yeere of Iehoiakim, Nabuchodonosor the second, his Father yet liuing, entred Iudea with a great Armie, who belieging and forcing Ierusalem, made Iehoiakim his Vassall in despight of Neco, that had established him King, and tooke with him for pledges

Daniel, being as yet a childe, with Ananias, Misael, and Azarias. Also hee tooke a part of the Church treasures; but staiced not to search them throughly; for Necho hasted to the succour of Ieboiakim, hoping to finde Nabuchodonos or in Indaa: wherein this great Babylonian had no disposition to hazard himselfe and his Armie, it being Countrie of an euill affection towards him, as also farre off from any succour or sure place of retrait. If he had, as may be supposed, any great strength of Scythian horsemen in his Armie; it was the more wisely done of him, to fall backe, out of the rough, mountainous, and ouer-hot Countrie, into places that were more euen and temperate. But besides all these reasons, the death of his father, happening at the same time, gaue him iust occasion to returne home, and take possession of his owne Kingdome, before he proceeded further in the fecond care, of adding more vnto it. This he did at reasonable good leisure: for the Agyptian was not ready to follow 40 him fo farreand to bid him battaile, vntill the new yeere came in , which was the fourth of Iehoiakim, the first of Nabuchodonofor, and the last of Neco. In this yeere the Babylonian lying voon the Banke of Euphrates (his owne Territoric bounding it on the North-side) attended the arrivall of Necho. There, after a resolued contention for victorie, Necho was slaine, and his Armie remaining forced to saue it selfe, which full ill it did, by a violent retrait. This victorie Nabuchodonofor so well pursued, as he recoucred all Syria, and what soener the Egyptians held out of their proper Territorie towards the North. The Agyptians being in this conflict beaten, and altogether for the present discouraged, Iehoiakim held himselfe quiet, as being friend in heart vnto the Azyptian, yet having made his peace with the Chaldean the veere 50 before; who contented with fuch profit as hee could then readily make, had forborne to lay any Tribute vpon Iuda. But this coole reservednesse of Iehoiakim, was, on both fides, taken in ill part. The Eg)ptian King Pfammis, who succeeded vnto Necho, beganne to thinke vpon restoring Iehoahaz, taken Prisoner by his Father, and setting him vp, as a Domestical Enemie, against his vngratefull brother.

Against all such accidents, the Iudean had prepared the vsuall remedy, practised by his fore-fathers: for he had made his owne sonne Iechonia King with him long before, in the second yeere of his owne Raigne, when the Boy was but Eight reeres olde. As for this rumour of Ieheahaz his returne; the Prophet Ieremie foretold that it should proue idle, saying : he shall not returne thither, but hee shall die in the place whi-10.12.11.6 12 ther they have led him captive, and shall see this Land no more. The Agptians indeed. having spent all their Mercinarie forces, and received that heavie blow at Carchemilb, had not remaining such proportion of sharpe steele, as of saire gold, which without other helpe, is of little effect. The valour of Neco was not in Plammis. Apries who raigned after Psammis, did once aduenture to shew his face in Syria; but 10 after a bigge looke, he was glad to retire, without aduenturing the hazard of a battaile. Wherefore this decaying Nation fought only with braue words, telling such frivolous tales, as men, that meane to doe nothing, vie, of their glorious acts forepaffed, against losias and leheahaz. In this case it was easie for lehoiakim to give them fatisfaction, by letting them understand the sinceritie of hisaffection towardes them, which appeared in time following. But Nabuchodonofor went to worke more roundly. He sent a peremptorie message to lehoiakim, willing him not to stand vpon any nice points, but acknowledge himselfea Subject, and pay him Tribute: adding hercunto such fearefull threats, as made the poore Iudaan lay aside all thought of 10(cob. Antiq lib. Pharaoh, and yeeld to doe, as the more mighty would have him. So he continued 20 in the obedience of Nabuchodonofor three yeeres. At this time Ieremie the Prophet cried out against the lewes, putting them in mind that he had now three and twentie vecres exhorted them to repentance, but because they had stopt their eares against him, and the rest of the Prophets, hee now pronounced their captivitie at hand, and that they should endure the yoke of bondage full seventic veeres. The same calamitic hee threatned to all the neighbouring Nations, to the Agyptians, Moabites, Ammonites, Idumaans, and the rest; foretelling that they should all drinke out of the Babylonian Pitcher, the wine of His furie, whom they had for faken, and after the seuenty yeares expired, that the Babylonians themselves should taste of the fa me cup, and be vtterly subuerted by the Medes, & the Indeans permitted to return 20 againe into their owne fields and Cities. The first imprisonment of the Prophet Ieremie scemes to have beene in the fourth yeere of this Iehoiakim, at which time B4ruch the Scribe wrote all his Prophecies out of his mouth, whom hee sent to reade them vnto the people, and afterward to the Princes, who offered them to the King: but fearing the Kings furie, they had first set Ieremie at libertie, and aduised him and Baruch to hide themselues.

Iehoiakim, after he heard a part of it and perceived the ill newes therein delivered, made no more adoe, but did cut the Booke in pieces and cast it into the fire. All which Ieremie caused to be new written, with this addition; that the dead body of Iehoiakim, should be cast out, exposed in the day to the heat, and in the night to the 40 frost, and that there should be none of his seede to sit on the Throne of David.

Time thus running on, while Iehoiakim rested secure of all danger, as Tributarie to the Babylonian, yet well thought of by the Egyptian; the mightie Citic of Tyre opposed it selfe against the Chaldean forces; and vpon just confidence of her owne strength, despised all preparation that could be made against her. Now for as much as the terme of seventy yeeres was prescribed vnto the desolation, as well of Tyre, as of Ierufalem, and other Townes and Countries; it is apparent, that they which referre the expugnation of this Citie vnto the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodono-(or, haue sure authoritie for their warrant. Whereupon likewise it followes of neceffitie, that the fiege thereof begannein the feuenth of his Raigne; as having lasted 50

Here I will take leaue to intrude a briefe note, concerning the feuerall beginnings that are reckoned of this great Prince his Rule, whereupon bath rifen much disputation. The third yeere of Iehoiakim, was the last of Nabulasar, who being CHAP. 28. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

delinered from other cares, tooke notice of fuch as had revolted from him vnto Pharao Neco, and sent this Noble Prince, his sonne, with an Armic into Syria, to reclaime them. In this expedition was Daniel carried away, who therefore makes Danie. 1. v. 1. mention of the same yeere. The yeere next following, being the fourth of Ichoia- Ierum, 25.1. kim, was the first of Nebuchadnezzar; which Ieremie affirmeth in expresse wordes; and from this we reckon all his time and actions that follow. In his three and twentieth yeere he conquered Agnt; and then beganne to raigne as a great Monarch. finding none that durst offend him. The second from this yeere it was, wherein he faw that vision, of the Image consisting of fundrie Metals; which did prefigurate to the succession of great Kingdomes, that should rule the Earth, before the comming of Christ. I will not stand to dispute about this, which is the best conclusion that I find, of long disputations: but returne vnto the siege of Tyre, which beganne in the seuenth of his Raigne.

The Citie of Tyre coursed all the ground of an Island, that was divided from the maine, by a deep & broad channell of the Sca. The Chaldwans had no Fleet, and were no Sca-men; the Tyrians, in multitude of goodly Ships, and skill to vie them, excelled all other Nations; and euery wind, from one part or other, brought needfull provisions into the Citie. Wherefore neither force, nor famine could greatly hurt the place; whereof neuertheleffe the judgements of God (denounced against it by E/1723. 20 Elay, Ieremie, Ezechiel,) had threatned the destruction; and the obstinate resolution Exchase. of Nabuchodonofor, had fully determined to performe it. This high-minded King, impatient of resistance, vndertooke a vast piece of worke; euen to fill vp the Sea, that parted the Island from the Continent. The Citie of olde Tyrus, that stood opposite to the new, vpon the firme Land, and the mountaine of Libanus neere adjoyning that was loaden with Cedars, and aboundance of other trees, might furnish him with materials. Thirteene yeeres were spent, in this laborious, and almost hopelesse businesse. Which needeth not seeme strange: for Alexander working vpon that foundation which was remayning of Nabuchodonofors Peere; and being withall affisted by a strong Fleet, was yet seuen moneths ere he could make way in-30 to the Citic. Wherefore, if the raging of the Sea was able to carrie away that wherewith Alexander laboured to couer a shelue; with much more violence could it ouerturne, and as it were consume, the worke of Nabuchodonosor, who laid his foundations in the bottome of the deepe; striuing as it were, to fill the emptie belly it pleaseth him oftentimes, in chastising the pride of man, to vie the hand of man; to even the hand of man striving, as may seeme, against all resistance of nature and fortune. So in this excessive labour of the Chaldeans, Euerie head was made bald, and Excess. euerie shoulder was made bare. Yet Nabuchodonosor would not give ouer till hee was 19eth. Anig.

of this Cormorant; whereas the Matedonian did only stop the throat of it. Euerie man knowes, God could have furthered the accomplishment of his owne threats, against this place (though it had not pleased him to vse, eyther miracle, or such of his more immediate weapons, as are Earth-quakes, and the like ) by making at least the Seas calme, and adding the fauourable concurrence of all second helpes. But so master of the Towne. When he was entred vpon this desperate seruice; whether it were so, that some losses received, some mutinie in his Armie, or (which is most likely; and so Iosephus Iud.I.10.17. reports it) some glorious rumours of the Agyptians, gaue courage to his cuill willers, Tehoiakim renounced his subjection, and beganne to hope for the contrarie of that which quickly fell out. For Nabuchodonofor gaue him no leifure to doe much hurt : but with part of his Armie marched directly into Indea; where the amazed 50 King made so little resistance (the Agyptians having left him, as it were in a dreame) that he entred Ierusalem, and laied hands on Iehoiakim: whom hee first bound and determined to send to Babylon, but changing counsell, hee caused him to be slaine in the place, and gaue him the Sepulchre of an Asse, to bee deuoured by beasts and rauenous birds, according to the former Prophecies: leaving in his place, Jehoiakim or Jechonias his sonne; whom after three moneths and ten dayes. Wabuchodonosor removed, and fent Prisoner to Babylon, with Ezekiel, Mardochaus, and Iosedech. the high Priest. The mother of lechonias, together with his servants, Eunuchs, and all the ablest men, and best Artificers of the Land, were also then carryed away Captines. This Iechonias, following the counsell of Ieremie the Prophet, made no refiftance, but submitted himselfe to the Kings will: wherein hee both pleased God, and did that which was best for himselfe; though at the present it might seeme otherwise, to such as considered the cuill that befell him, rather then the greater euill that he thereby avoided. This onely particular act of his is recorded; which was good. But it seemes that he was partaker, at least, of his Fathers faults, if not an in- 10 frigator: which was the cause, that his submitting himselfe to Gods pleasure did not preserve his Estate: for so we reade in generall wordes, that he did evill in the sight of the Lord, according to all that his Father had done. In his stead Nabuchodonofor established Mathania his Vncle in the Kingdome of Inda, and called him Zedechias, which is as much to fay, as the Instice of God. For like as Neco, King of Egypt, had formerly displaced Iehozhaz, after his Father Iosias was flaine, and set vp Iehoiakim, the some of another Mother; so Nabuchodono for flue Iehoiakim, who depended on the Agyptians, and carrying his sonne lechonias Prisoner to Babel, gaue the Kingdome to this Zedechias, that was whole Brother to that Iehoshaz, whom Neco tooke with him into Egypt. From Zedechias hee required an oath for his faithfull obe-20 dience, which Zedechias gave him, and called the lining God to witnesse in the same, that he would remaine assured to the Kings of Chaldea.

In the first yeere of Zedechias, Ieremie saw and expounded the Vision of the ripe and rotten Grapes, the one fignifying those Indeans that were carried away captine, the other those that stayed, and were destroyed.

In the fourth of Zedechias, Ieremie wrote in a Booke all the euill that should fall vpon Babylon, which Book or scrole he gaue to Sheraia, when he went with the King Zedechias to Babylon, to visit Nabuchodonofor; willing him first to reade it to the Captiue lewes, and then to bind it to a stone, and cast it into Euphrates, pronouncing these wordes: Thus shall Babel be drowned, and shall not rife from the enill that I will bring upon 30 her. This iournie of Zedechias to Babel is probably thought to have beene in way of visitation, carrying some presents. But I further thinke, that hee had some suite there to make, which his Lordly Master refused to grant, and senthim away discontented. For at his returne all the bordering Princes sent Messengers to him, inciting him (as it seemes) to those viquiet courses, from which Ieremie dehorted both him and them. The Prophet, by Gods appointment, made bonds and yokes; one of which he wore about his owne neck, others hee fent vnto the flue Kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Zidon, by those Messengers which came to visite Zedechias: making them know, that if they and the Kings of Juda abode in the obedience of Babylon, they should then possesse and enjoy their owne Countries; if not, they 49 should affuredly perish by the sword, by fire, and by pestilence.

Hee also fore-told them, that those Vessells, which as yet remayned in Ierusalem, should also trauaile after the rest, and at length they should bee restored a-

The same yeere Ananias, the false Prophet, tooke off the woodden Chaine which Icremie ware, in figne of the Captinitie of the Iewes, and brake it: Vaunting, that in like manner, after two yeeres, God would breake the strength of Babel, and the yoke which he layed on all Nations; restore Iechonias, and all the Iewes, with the Vessells and riches of the Temple, and give an end to all these troubles. But Ieremie in stead of his woodden Yoke ware a Coller of yron; and in signe that Ananias had 50 giuena deceitfull and falle hope to the people, hee fore-told the death of this cold Prophet, which seized vpon him in the second moneth. After this, when Zedechias had wavered long enough betweene Faith and Passion, in the eight yeere of his Raigne he practifed more feriously against Nabuchodone for, with his Neighbours the Edomites, Ammonites, Moabites, Tyrians, and others that were promifed great aides of the Egyptians: in confidence of whose resistance, he determined to shake off the Babylonian voke. Hereof when Nabuchodonosor had knowledge, hee marched with his Armie in the dead Winter, toward Ierusalem, and besieged it. Ieremie perswaded Zedechias to render the Citie and himselfe : but being confident of the helpe from Agypt, and being perswaded by his Counsellors, and false Prophets, that it was unpossible that the Kingdome of Iuda should bee extirpate, untill the comming of Silo (according to the Prophecie of Incob) hee despiled the wordes of Gen 49.10. Ieremie, and imprisoned him. For Ieremie had told the King, that the Citie should be 10.32. 0 36. to taken and burnt; that the King should not escape, but bee taken Prisoner, and brought to the presence of Nabucho dono for; that he should not perish by the sword, but being carried to Babel, die his naturall death.

lerisalem being, the following yeere, surrounded by Nabuchodonosors Armie; the King of Agypt, Pharao Hophra, according to Ieremie (Herodotus calleth him Apries) Jer. 44entred the border of Inda, with his Armie, to succour Zedechias, of whose revolt he Hered lib.2. had beene the principall Author. But leremie gaue the Iewes faithfull counsell, willing them not to have any trust in the succours of Agypt: for hee assured them, that they should return again, and in no fort relieue them. And it fell out accordingly. For when the Chaldans removed from lerusalem to encounter the Agyp-20 trans, these vaunting Patrons abandoned their enterprise, and taking Gaza in their way homeward returned into Egypt, as if they had already done enough; leaving the poore people of Icrusalem to their destined miseries. In the meane while the Iewes, who, in their first extremitie, had manumised their Hebrew Bond-men (as Gods Law required at the yere of Iubile) and made them free, Levit. 25.39. thereby the better to encourage them to fight; did now vpon the breaking vp of 40.00. the Chaldean Armie, repent them of their Charitie : and thinking all had beene at an end, held them perforce to their former flauerie. But the Chaldees being returned 101.24. to the siege, the Prophet Ieremie, when the State of Ierusalem beganne now to grow to extremitie, counselled Zedechias to render himselfe vnto them; assuring 1er.39. 30 him of his owne life, and the safetie of the Citie, if he would so doe. But his obstinate heart conducted him to that wretched end, which his neglect of God, and his infidelitie and periurie, had prouided for him.

Three and twentie Moneths (as some doe reckonit) or according to Tosephus 1er.39. eighteene; the Babylonian Armielay before Ierusalem, and held it exceeding straightly besieged. For they built Forts against it round about, or (as P. Martyr hath it) ex- 2.Kingias.1. truxerunt contra eam turrem ligneam per circuitum : They surrounded the Citie with woodden Tamers, so as the besieged could neither fally out, nor receive into the Citie any supply of men or victualls. 10/ephus reports, that they ouer-topped the Walls, 10/eph. Ant. Iud. with high Towers railed vpon mounts; from which they did so beat vpon the librocapars. 40 Wall with their Engines, that the defendants were compelled to for lake their stations. Now although it were so that the besieged also raised Counter-buildings, like vnto thefe, Yet the great King of Babel, who commanded all the Regions thereabouts, and had the Woods and Rivers to obey him, found meanes to over-throw all the Citizens endeuours; and to beat downe as fast from without, as they raised from within; the body and foundation of his owne workes being guarded, by the Walls of Ierusalem interposed; and theirs within, layed open to their enemies disturbance. Besides, both famine and pestilence (which commonly accompanie men fireightly belieged) grew on fast vpon them, whereby, when the number, strength, and courage of the lewes failed, the Chaldeans made a breach, and forcing an entry, 50 their Princes did seat themselves, as Lords of the Towne, in the middle gate. Zedechias beholding this vncomfortable fight, and finding no remedie of the danger prefent, loft both his courage and his hope at once; and shifted himselfe together with his Wines, Children, Princes, and principall Seruants, out of the Citie, by a way under ground; leaving his amazed & guidelesse people, to the merciles swords of their enemies. Thus he, who, when Ieremie the Prophet perswaded him to render himselfe, despised both the Counsell of God, and the force of Nabuchalmosor; vsed now that remedie, which Wolphius truly termeth: trifle, turpe, & infation: Wolful, shamefull, and unfortunate.

By this secret subterrane vault, Zedechias making his stealth, recovered (by the helpe of the darke night) the Plaines or Desarts of Iericho: but by reason of the traine, that followed him and his, (every one leading with him those whom they held most deare vnto them) hee was easily traced and pursued. How great soever the companie was that attended on him, yet, as to so him reports it, they on whose sidelitie hee most reposed himselfe, no sooner beheld the Chaldrans approach, but they all abandoned his desence, and shifted themselves into the Desarts as they could. For whom God had for sken, no man sollowed, but the Ministers of his vengeance; by whom Zedechias being made Prisoner, with his Children, and Princes, he was conveighed to Rebla or Reblath a Citie (as some thinke) of Nephtalins, where Nabuchadonosor then lay, as a place indifferent between terns alemand Tyre, with both which at once he had to doe.

Now after Nabuchodono for had laied before Zedekias the many graces and benefits conferred vpon him, together with the notable falschood and perinrie, wherewith he had requited them; he commanded his Children, Princes, and Friends, to be slaine before his face. This being done, to the end that solamentable a spectacle 20 should be the last, that ever hee should behold in the World, hee caused his eyes to be torne out of his head, and so carried him in assauls manner to Babel, where hee consumed the rest of his wretched life in perpetual imprisonment. Herein this most marvailous Prophecie of Excebiel was performed; Adducam eum in Babylonam & ipsam non vidabit. I will bring him into Babylon, and he shall not seeit.

Thus in the Eleuenth and last yeere of Zedekias, which was the eighteenth of Nabuchodonofor, the Chaldran entred the Civic by force, where sparing no sexe nor age, they committed all to the sword that they therein found.

In the yeere next following, Nabuzaradan, Generall of the Armie, burnt the Kings Palace, and the reft of Ierufalem: and after this fire had lasted from the seuenth to 30 the tenth day, he also burnt the Temple of God to the ground, when it had stood source hundred thirtie and one yeeres.

After this vpon a second search, Nabuzaradan (not yet satiated with bloud) commanded seuentie and two others to bee slaughtered, which had hidden themselues from the first furie, to wit, the chiefe and the second Priest, two Commanders of Zedeshias his men of Warre, fine of his House-hold servants, and others to that number; carrying away to Babylon the ablest of the people throughout all Iudaa; and leaving the poorest labouring soules, with some that followed the partie of Nabuchodonofor, to till the ground : ouer whom hee left Gouernour, Godolia the Nephew of that Saphan, whom Iosias had formerly employed in the reformation of 49 Religion, who is, for his iustice and equitie, by Iosephus highly commended. This man, a lew by Nation, left Zedechias, as it seemeth, in the beginning of the warre: and by Ieremies desire to line with him, it appeareth that he had embraced the same aduice, which the Prophet gaue vnto Zedechias; which was, to submit himselfealtogether to the Babylonian, who being ordayned by God to exercise his instice, was therefore resistlesse. The Prophet Ieremie being lest to his owne choice, either to liue in Chaldaa, or elsewhere, he made election of Godoliah, to whom he was recommended; who not onely embraced Ieremie, but gaue comfort to all the other tewes, that were left under his charge, promifing them fauour and libertie, follong as they remained obedient Subjects to Nabuchodonofor, by whom hee was established 40 Provinciall Governour of his owne Nation.

But ere that yeere was expired, a Prince of the late Kings houle (who during the fiege of terufalem, had kept himselfe our of the storme, with Baalis, King of the Ammonites) being followed by ten other chosen men, while Goddiah feasted them in CMaspha or Mitspa, the Citie of his residence, trayterously slue him, together with divers Chaldeans and Iewes that accompanied him. This done, hee made an escape, and in his way encountring with eightie persons, repairing towards Godoliah with presents, hee flue the most of them, and spared the rest, because they promised to discover vnto him some Treasures, hidden in the fields during the warre. Hee also tooke with him a Daughter of Zedechies, committed to the care of Godoliah by Nabuchodonofor. This practice and intent of Ismael had been formerly discovered vnto Godolia by Iohanan, one of the Leaders of the sew remaying Iewes; but Godoliah was incredulous.

indea being now left without a Gouernour (for Ismael durst not take it vpon him, but retired himselfe, or rather fled as sastas he could to the Ammonites) the residue of the Iewes, searing the reuenge of the Chaldeans, resolved to slie away into Egyps, and besought Ieremie to aske counsell of God for them: who readily made them answere, that if they remained in Indea, God would provide for them, and shew them mercy; but if they sought to save themselves in Egyps, that they should then vndoubtedly perish. Notwithstanding this advice, the Iewes held their determination; and despising the Oracle of God, and constraying Ieremie and Baruch to accompanie them, they travailed into Egyps, and inhabited by the permission.

fion of Pharao, neere vnto Taphnes: where, when leremie often reprehended them for their Idolatrie, foretelling both the destruction of themfelues, and the Leyptians also, he was by these his owne hard-hearted and vngratefull Countrimen, stoned to death; and by the Leyptians, who greatly reuerenced him, buried neere the Sepulchre of their owne Kings.

FISRT PART THE HISTORIE OF THE WORLD:

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the destruction of Ierusalem, to the time of PHILIP of Macedon.

THE THIRD BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

Of the time passing betweene the destruction of ferusalem, and the fall of the Assyrian Empire.

è. I.

Of the connexion of Sacred and prophane Historie.

HE course of Time; which in prophane Histories might rather bee discerned through the greatest part of his way, hitherto passed in some out-worne foot-steps, than in any beaten path, having once in Greece by the Olympiads, and in the Easterne Countries by the accompt from Nabonassar, left surer marks, and more appliable to actions concurrent, then were the warre of Troy, or any other token of former date; begins at length in the ruine of lerusalem to discoure the connexion of antiquitie fore-spent, with the storie of succeeding ages; Manifest it is, that the originall and progresse of things could ill bee sought in those that were ignorant of the first creation: as likewise that the affaires of Kingdomes and Empire afterwards growne vp, are not to be found among those, that have now no state nor policie remaining of their owne. Hauing therefore purfued the storie of the world vnto that age, from whence the memorie of fucceeding accidents is with little interruption of fabulous discourse deriued vnto vs, I hold it now conucnient briefly to shew, by what meanes and circumstances the Historic of the Hebrewes, which of all other is the most ancient, may bee conjoyined with the following times, wherein that Image of fundric metalls, discouered by God vnto Nebuchadnezzar, did raigne ouer the earth, when Ifrael was either none, or an vnregar-

ded Nation. Herein I doe not hold it needfull, to infift vpon those authotities, which giue, as it were by heare-say, a certaine yeere of some old Affyrian King vnto some action or to euent, whereof the time is found expressed in Scripture: for together with the end of Ninus his line in Sardanapalus, if not before, all fuch computations were blotted out; the fuccession of Belochus and his issue that occupied that kingdome afterwards, depending upon the uncertaine relations of such, as were neither constant in affigning the yeeres of his beginning, nor of credit enough for others to relie vpon. Let it therefore suffice, that the consent and harmonic, which some have found in the yeeres of those ouer-worne Monarchs, doth preserue their names, which otherwise might have beene forgotten. Now concerning the later Kings of that Nation, how socuer it be true that we find the names of all or most of them in Scriptures, which are recorded by prophane Historians, yet hereby could wee onely 20 learne in what age each of them lined, but not in what yeere his raigne beganne or ended, were it not that the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar is more precisely applyed to the times of Iehoiakim and Zedekia. Hence have we the first light whereby to difeuer the meanes of connecting the facred and prophane Histories. For vnder Nebuchadnezzar was the beginning of the captivitie of Inda, which ended when 70. yeeres were expired; and these 70. yeeres tooke end at the first of Cyrus, whose time being well knowne, affoords vs meanes of looking backe into the ages past, and forwards into the race of men succeeding. The first yeere of Cyrus his raigne in Persia, by generall consent, is joyned with the first yeere of the 55. Olympiad, where, that he raigned three and twenty yeeres before his Monarchie, and feuen yeeres af- 30 terwards, it is apparent, and almost out of controversie. Giving therefore source hundred and eight yeeres vnto the distance betweene the fal of Troy, and the instauration of the Olympiads by Iphitus; we may eafily arrive vnto those antiquities of Greece, which were not meerely fabulous. As for Princes ruling the whilest in sundrie parts of the world, S. Augustine and others may be trusted in setting downe their times, which they had by Tradition from authors of wel-approued faith and industrie.

From Cyrus forwards, how the times are reckoned vnto Alexander, and from him to the battaile of Actium, it were (peraduenture) in this place impertinent to fer down. But feeing that the beginning and end of the Bahylonian captivitie are the 40 markes whereby wee are chiefely directed, in passing from the first vnto the latest yeeres of the world, through any floric, with least interruption, it is very expedient that wee take some paines to informe our selves truely of the 70, yeeres, during which it continued, cuen from Nebuchadnezzar vnto Cyrus.

ð. II.

A briefe rehear fall of two opinions, touching the beginning of the captivitie; with an answere to the cauills of PORPHYRIE, inueighing against S.MATTHEW, and DANIEL, upon whom the later of the fe opinions is founded.

CAHP. I. S.2.

Any Commentators, and other Historians, and Chronologers finde. that the captinitie then beganne, when the normal was carried primer into Babylon, cleuen yeere before the finall destruction of terufalem Excellent. This they proue out of diners places in Exekiel, especially out of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine diffinition of the fourteenth chapter, where he makes a plaine diffinition of the fourteenth chapter. that the captiuitie then beganne, when lechonias was carried prisoner

ction betweene the beginning of the Captivitie, and vtter destruction of Ierusalem by Nabuzaradan in these wordes: In the fine and twentieth yeere of our being in captinitie. in the beginning of the yeere, in the tenth day of the moneth, in the foureteenth yeere after that the Citie was (mitten. In which words hee beginneth the captiuitie in plaine termes, eleuen yeeres before the Citie was destroyed. Beroaldus is of opinion that it beganne in the first of 2 abuchodonosor, and the fourth of loakim, which hee ende-20 uours to proue out of the second of Chronicles, but more especially out S. Matthew. and Daniel, whose words afford matter of long disputation, but serue not to make good so much as Beroaldus would enforce. That place of S. Matthew, and the whole booke of Daniel, have ministred occasion of scoffing and railing at the Christia religion to that wretched man Porphyrie, who, not understanding how the fonnes of King losias were called by divers names, as Epiphanius hath thewed at large, thought that the Apostle had spoken heeknew not what in reckoning the fonnes, or, according to some translations, the Sonne and Nephewes of that good King, begotten about the time of the captiuitie. Vpon Daniel also the same Porphyrie doth spend the twelfth of his malicious books written against the Christians. 30 affirming that these prophecies & visions remembred by Daniel, were written long after his death, and at, or neere the time of Antiochus Epiphanes. This fond supposition of his, Eusebius, Apollonius, and others, have sufficiently answered. For the scuentie Interpreters, who converted the old Testament about an hundred veere before Epiphanes, did also turne this booke of Daniel out of Hebrewinto Greeke, as a part of Scripture received. And were there no other argument to confound Porphyrie, than that of Alexander Macedon, it were sufficient, who lived divers yeeres Mac. 1.12. before Antiochus Epiphanes. For Iaddus the high Priest shewed that great Conqueror, when he came towards lerusalem to have destroyed it, this booke of Da- loseph.ant. 12, niel, wherein he beheld his owne glorie foretold, as the same was plainely expoun-40 ded vnto him; which not only staied his hand from the harme of that Citie and people, but his affurance and refolution was so confirmed and strengthened thereby, as despising all future peril and resistance, he conquered Darius, and the Easterne Empire in a shorter time than Nabuchodonosor had done one Citie, to wit, Trre in

It is true indeed that the Iewes themselucs give lesse authoritie to Daniel, than to Moles, and the Prophets, accompting his booke among those which they call Cetaphim, or Hagingrapha, or holy Writings, which they say Esdras and the Seniors of the Synagogue compiled after their returne from Babylon. But first, that the book of Daniel (I meane so much as is found in the Hebrew) is Canonicall: secondly, that it so was written by Daniel himselfe, and not by Esdras and the Seniors; we may affure our selves by testimonic of Councels, and Fathers. For in the Councell of Laodicas held about the yeere of our Lord 368. after the death of Jouinian the Emperour. and after the Nicene Councell three and fortic yeeres, this booke of Daniel was re-Aaaaz and a continuall desolation. Moreover, I will take from them the voice of mirth, and the ceiued, verified and confirmed among the other Canonicall Scriptures, as in the Epitomie of the same Councell it may be seen, and so doth Meliton the most ancient Bishop of Sardis number it, witnesse Eusebius in his Ecclesiastical historic, the fourth booke, and fine and twentieth chapter, so doth the same Author in the Catalogue of Canonical bookes vpon Origen, so doth Hilarius in his Preface vpon the Pfalmes, and Epiphanius in his booke of Waights and Measures, &c. To these I may adde S. Hierome, Gregorie Nazianzene, and others. For the Hagiographa bookes or holy Writings, the lewes and Rabbines reckon to be these, Daniel, Pfalmes, Prouerbs, lob. Canticles, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Hester, Esra, Nehemiah, and the Chronicles. And that it was Daniel, and not Esdras, that wrote this booke, Gods commande- to ment vnto him by his Angell, to seale vp the same to the time appointed, is an vnanswerable testimonic. Yea that which exceedeth all strength of other proofe, our Sauiour Christ who citeth no Apocryphal Scripture, in Mathew & Marke alleageth Daniel the Prophet, to wit, the last verse of his ninetcenth chapter. Further, in the fift of John, Christ distributeth the risen from the dead, as in Daniel the twelfth, verse the second. S. Paul describeth Antichrist out of Daniel, and the Reuelation is wholly an interpretation of Daniels visions.

That the 70. yeeres of captinitie are to be numbred from the destruction of Ierufalem; not from the migration of IECHONIA.

Auing thus farre digreffed, in maintaining that authority, which must often be cited in the present argument, it is now conuenient, that wee returne vnto the differences of opinion, concerning the beginning of these 70. yeeres. Neither will I stand to trouble my selfe and others with laying open the grounds or weakenesse of that which Eusebim 30 and some few namelesse Authors, have sometimes held in this point, which is lately reuiued by Beroaldus; but will foorth-with enter into confideration of that opinion, which many both ancient and late Writers have so carnestly maintained, that it wants not much of being common.

Foure Kings of Inda were carried away captines to Babylon: First, Manasses; then lehoiakim, and with him among others, Daniel the Prophet: thirdly, Iechonias, and with him Ezekiel : lastly, Zedekias; at which time the Citie and Temple were destroyed. To the first of these captivities the beginning of the 70. yeeres is referred by none that I have read; to the second by few and with weake proofe; to the third by very many and with much confidence. For besides those places of Ezekiel al- 40 readie cited, there is a strong argument gathered out of Ieremie, which may seeme to make the matter plaine. For the Prophet in comforting the people that were carried away with lechonias, vieth these words: Thus faith the Lord, After 70. yeeres be accomplished at Babel, I will visit you, and performe my good promise towards you, and cause you to returne to this place.

But it stands indeed with little reason that we should seeke the interpretation of a prophecie out of circumstances, when the prophecie is such as doth sufficiently expound it selfe. Ieremie had alreadie, in the fourth yeere of Iehoiakim, denounced the judgement of God against the Land, for the sinnes and impositencie of that obstinate people, in these wordes: Behold, I will fend and take to me all the families of 50 the North, faith the Lord, and Nebuchadnezzar, the King of Babel, my fernant, and will bring them against this Land, and against the Inhabitants thereof, and against all these Nations round about, and I will destroy them, and make them an astonishment, and an histing, voice of gladneffe, the voice of the Bridgroome, and the voice of the Bride, the noise of the mill stones and the light of the candle, and this whole Land shall be desolate, and an astonishment, and these Nations shall serve the King of Bibel 70. yeares. And when 70. yeares are expired, I will visit the King of Babel. Here wee see prescribed vnto the captivitie the terme of 70. yeeres, which were to commence, neither when the prophecie was vitered; nor when lehoiakim, who then raigned, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar. nor yet in the time of Iechonia; but with the vtter desolation of the Citie, whereof leremie did againe give notice to those that were alreadie in Babylon, at such time to as he sent them the comfort of deliuerance before rehearsed. And so did the people vnderstand this prophecie, in those times when they saw it accomplished, beginning the 70. yeares at the time of the defolation, as manifeftly appeares in the end of the Historie of Iuda, where it is said thus: They burnt the house of God, and 17.018. brake downe the wall of Ierusalem, and burnt all the Palaces thereof with fire, and all the precious vesselles thereof to destroy all: And they that were lest by the sword, carried he away to 2. Chron. 36.19. Babel and they were servants to him and to his sonnes, untill the Kingdome of the Persians hadrule, to fulfill the word of the Lord by the mouth of IEREMIA. untill the Land had her fill of her Sabbaths: for all the daies that she lay desolate, she kept Sabbath, to fulfill 70. veeres. But in the first veere of C x R v s King of Persia ( when the word of the Lord, 20 Boken by the mouth of IER H MIA, was finished the Lord stirred up the spirit of CYRVS. We seldome find one piece of Scripture so precisely and plainely expounded by another as in this prophecie, to have afterwards beene the subject of altercation. For one can hardly deuife, how either the defolation could have been expressed more sensibly than it was by the Prophet, or the event of the prophecie have been more exactly fet downe, than it was in the place now last of all cited. If it bee requilite that we bring more proofe in so euident a case, the ninth Chapter of Daniel yeelds testimonie sufficient, vnto this exposition of Ieremia his prophecie, that Ierusalem was to lie waste 70. yeeres. For in the first yeere of Darius the Mede. which was the last of the 70. Daniel obtained of God the deliuerance that had been 30 promised by praier, which he made vpon consideration of the time that was expired: as he telleth vs in these wordes: In the first yeere of his raigne, 1 DANIBL vnder stood by bookes the number of the yeeres, whereof the Lord had spoken unto I ER B. MIAH the Prophet, that he would accomplish 70. yeeres in the desolation of Ierusalem. So that how soeuer the time of Daniel his owne captivitie bee reckoned from the taking of Iehoiakim, and that the people carried away with Iechonia, did accompt, as well they might, the yeeres of their owne captiuitie; yet with the generall deso-

which by Gods appointment continued vnto the end of 70. yeeres. This I will not further seeke to proue, by the authoritie of Iosephia and others affirming the same; for as much as that which alreadie hath beene produced, is enough to fatisfie any man that hath not fully determined to hold the contrarie.

lation of the Countrie, wherein were few or none of the Ifraelites left remaining to inhabite, beganne in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodone for the great captiuitie, Sundrie opinions of the Kings which raigned in Babylon during the 70. yeeres.

Hat Kings raigned in Babylon, during these 70. yeeres of the captiuity. and how long each of them did weare the Diademe, it is a matter of no great importance to know, for as much as neither their acts were notable in the age wherin they lived, nor the length of their raignes, any way helpefull to the concordance of times, fore-going or succee- to Nerophon. Cyro- ding. The conquests recounted by Xenophon of Syria, Arabia, (or rather some part ofit) Hyrcania, Bactria, and perhaps of some other Countries, may sceme fruits of the victories obtained by Nebuchadnezzar the Great (or by some of his Ancestors) in the former part of his life, before he betooke himselfe to case, and to the sumptuous building of his great Babel, for the house of his Kingdome, and for the honor of his Maiestie, where it may seeme that he and his Heires kept a great state, and did very little. The idle behauiour of the Afgrian Souldiers, in such skirmishes as afterwards they had with the Medes, doth argue no lesse. For whereas vnder Nebuchadnezzar, they were so stout and industrious, that (to omit other proofes) they attempted, and finished, that hardie piece of worke, of winning the strong Citie of 20 Tyre, by joyning it vnto the continent, filling vp the deepe and broad channel of the Sea, dividing it from the maine with a mole, or peete of carth, and other matter, the reparation whereof, when the Sea had washed it away, was the very greatest of Alexanders works in the times following, they became timorous, that they durft not approach neerer to the enemy than their bowes would carrie, but were readie to turne their backs, as soone as any, though inferiour in numbers, aduenturing within the distance offered to charge them.

Now as their actions from the end of Nebuchadnez wars warres, till the ruine of pag, 46.1, & l.3 their Empire, were not worthie to be recorded; fo was the distinction of their times, and raigne of their seuerall Kings, vnworthy of the great labour that hath 30 in vaine been taken in that businesse. For when it is granted, that the captinitie of Juda, ending with that Empire, lasted 70. yeeres, we may as reasonably forbeare to fearch into the particular continuance of two or three flouthfull Kings, as we are contented to be ignorant of the ages of the Patriachs, and their children, lining in the Agyptian leruitude; resting satisfied in both with the generall affured summe.

Yet for as much as many have travelled in this businesse, vpon desire (as I take it) to approue the beginning and end of the 70. yeeres, not only by the raignes of other Princes, ruling else-where, but by the times of the Asyrians themselves: I wil not refuse to take a little paines in collecting their opinions, and shewing what I thinke, may best be held for likely, if the certaine truth cannot be found.

The opinions are many, and greatly repugnant, both in recounting the Kings themselves, and in setting downe the yeeres of their severall raignes. The first (as I take it) the furest, is theirs, who meerely follow the authoritic of the Scriptures, without borrowing any helpe from others. These name onely three Kings, Nebuchadnezzar, Euilmerodach, and Balthasar. Neither have they only the silence of Daniel, who names none other to be their warrant, but the prophecie of Ieremie precifely, and in a manner purpofely teaching the very fame. For God, by the mouth of that Prophet, shewing that he being absolute Lord of all, would dispose of all, according to his owne will, and making it knowne that he had some Counserem.27.v.7. tries here named, into the hands of the King of Babel, faith thus: And all Nations 50 shall serue him, and his Sonne, and his Sonnes Sonne, untill the very time of his Landcome also; then many Nations and great Kings shall serve themselves of him. These wordes expressing the continuance of the Chaldean Empire, and number of the Kings, will hardly be qualified with any distinction. But indeede I finde no other necessitie of qualification to be vied herein, than fuch as may grow out of mens delire to reconcile the Scriptures vnto profane authors. And this desire were not vniust, if the consent of all histories were on the one side, and the letter of the holy Text were single

But contrariwise, the Authors which are cited in this case, are so repugnant one to the other, and the proofes of their different reports are so slender and vnsufficient, that the succession of these Princes, had it not bin thus deliucred in Scriptures, but onely set downe by some Author of equall credite with the rest, might verie well haue found and deferued as good beliefe, as any of those things which they Inferbus antique

10 have delivered in this point. For some there are, who following Iosephus, derive lib. 10.029.123. that Empire, as by descent from father to sonne, through fine generations; beginning with Nabuchodonofor the great, and giving to him 43. yeres, to Euilmerodach 18, to Niglifar the sonne of Euilmerodach 40, to Labofardach the sonne of Niglifar 9. moneths, and laftly to Balthafar (whom lofephus intimates to be of the race of Nabuchedono for , without naming his father) 17. yeeres. And this opinion (faue that he forbeares to reckon the yeeres, and plainely calls Balthafar the sonne of Labo-(ardach) Saint Hierome doth follow, alledging Berofus, and Infephusas a sectator of Berofus for his Authors; though Berofus, as he is cited by lofephus, report the matter farre otherwife. For he tells vs that Euilmerodach the fonne of Nabuchodonofor did tofcontr. Ap-

20 raigne but 2. yeeres, being for his wickednesse and lust, slaine by his sisters husband pian. iib. 1. Nizigissor, who occupied the kingdome after him 4. yeeres, and left it to his owne sonne Labosardach, who being an in-conditioned boy, was at the end of 9. moneths flaine by fuch as were about him, and the kingdome given to one Nabonidus, who held it by the election of the Conspirators, and left it vnto Cyrus after 17. yeeres. This relation ill agrees with that of Iolephas, and both of them as bad with the Scriptures, in number either of yeeres, or of generations; yet the particularities which they handle, have procured vnto them some authoritie, so that the names which they have inserted, are taken as it were vpon trust. There is a third opinion, which makes the three last kings brethren, and sonnes of Euilme-

30 rodach; and this may well enough agree with the Scripture : though I had rather beleeue Kenophon, who faith that the last king of Babylon was immediate successour Xenopho, cyroped. to his father. But whereas the Author of the Scholasticall Historie, who is founder of this opinion, placeth betweene him that tooke Ierusalem, and Euilmerodath, another Nabuthodonofor : plaine it is that he hath, out of any Historic facred or profanc, as little warrant to guide him, as we have reason to follow him. Eusebine, Sollpitius, Seuerus, and Theodoret, vpon better ground, haue supposed, that Euilmerodach and Balthafar were brethren and sonnes of the great Nabuchodonosor. This is built on the fift chapter of Daniel, wherein Balthafar (for of Euilmerodach there is none that ever doubted) is often called Nabuthodonofor his sonne. And so common grew 40 this explication, that Saint Hieronie called it the vulgar opinion. But the place of leremie before cited, produes that Balthafar was not the sonne indeede, but the grandchild of that great conquerour, though by the phrase very common in Scriptures, and familiar in those Easterne languages, he was called the sonne. Annius his Metashenes hits very rightly the 70. yeres of captiuity, giving to Nabuchodonofor 45 . yeeres, to Euilmerodach 30 . yeeres, and to the three fonnes of Euilmerodach, nephews of Nabuchodonofor 14. yeeres; that is, to Reg-Affar the eldeft fonne three yeeres, to Lab-Affar Dach the second some fixe yeeres, and to Baithafar the third sonne fiue. To this accompt agreeing with the Scriptures, both in the whole summe of 30 yeeres, and in the number of generations, I have sometime subscribed, as not daring to reiect an appearance of truth, vpon no greater reason than because the Author was of Annius his edition. Yet could I not fatisfie my selfe heerein; both for that none of the Ancient, and few such of the moderne Writers as deserue to be regarded, have consented with this Metasthenes; and for that in making Balthasar fucceede vnto his brother in the kingdome, and not vnto his father, he is wholly against Xenephon, whose Historic of the elder Cyrus in his Assyrian warre I can not flightly value in many respects, and especially because it is very agreeable to the Scriptures, in the taking of Babylon, while the king was at his drunken feast.

DAR.2.49.

Seeking therefore diligently into all circumstances that might give any light in this obscuritie, I found manifest proofe, that the time allotted vnto Balthafar, by Dan, tha S. verfe Annius his Metasthenes, was farre short of the truth, which is enough to render all suspected that he hath said in distributing what part of the 70. yeeres hee pleased among the rest. For in the third yeere of Balthafar, Daniel saw a vision, after which he was licke certainedayes, but when hee rose vp, he did the kings businesse: from 10 which businesse, that hee did afterwards withdraw himselfe, and line retired, so long that he was forgotten in the Court, it appeares plainely, both by the many words which the old Queene vied to fet out his sufficiencie, and by the Kings asking of him, when he came into his presence, whether he were Daniel. Now to thinke that a man of such account and place as Daniel had held, could in two yeeres have beene worne out of remembrance, were in my judgement a very strange conceipt, which rather than I would entertaine, I can well be contented, to thinke the whole storic (thus related) a part of Annius his impostures.

Out of these reports of Tosephus, Berofus, and others, many new opinions are framed, by conicctures of late Writers. For the endurance of the captiuitie being 70. 20 vecres, and these yeeres extending vnto the first of Cyrus, in which course of time Nebuchadnezzar, his fonne and grand-child, must have raigned; it bath seemed needfull to supply the yeeres of these three descents, by inserting some, whose raignes might fill vo the whole continuance of the captivitie, with which the time allotted by Berofus and others, to Euilmerodach and Balthafar, ioyned vnto the yeeres following the nineteene of Nebuchadnezzar, (wherein Ierusalem was laid desolate) are Therefore Mercator and others following him, fashion the yeeres of Euilmersdach in this fort. They say, that the 18. yeeres given to him by Iofephus in the tenth of his Antiquities, should be read and numbred 28. yeeres, and the two yeeres 20 that Berofus hath allowed to Euilmerodach should be written 23, in the first number the figure of (1) is mistaken for the figure of (2) and in the latter there should have bin added the figure of (3) to that of (2:) this granted (to wit) that Euilmerodach raigned 28. yeeres, whereof fine together with his father, and 23. after his death, and the same number of 23. added to the 25. which Nabuchodonofor lived after the destruction of Ierusalem, make 49, then 4 yeeres of Nightar according to Berefus, 9. moneths of Labassardach his sonne, and 17. yeeres of Labonidus or Balthasar make vp the number of 70. yeeres to the first of Cyrus. But whether by errour in figures, or in words, the numbers be vtterly mistaken, in all copies extant; vpon how weake a foundation doe they build, who have nothing to helpe them, saue onely the bare 40 names of two vnknowne Kings, found in Authors manifestly corrupted, and such as if they had beene entirely extant, were not worthy, to have that place of Ieremie called into dispute, in regard of their authoritie?

). V.

A more particular examination of one opinion touching the number, per (ons, and raignes of the Babylonian Kings.

Ther suppositions, little different in substance from this of Mercator, 50 I purposely forbeare to rehearle, as falling vnder the same answere. That of Ioseph Scaliger I may not forget, as descruing to be considered apart from the rest. He gives to Nebuchadnezzar 44. yeres, to Euilmerodach 2, to Belfazer, 5: and to Nabonidus 17. So that from the 19. of Nabuchadnezzar, in which Ierusalem was deltroyed, vnto the time of Cyrus he accompteth onely 59. yeeres ; beginning (as many doe) the captivitie 11. yeeres fooner, from the transportation of Iechonia. But hereof enough hath beene said already. That which we are now to consider, is his distribution of the time running betweene the 19.0f Nabuchadnezzar, and the fall of the Caldean Empire: wherein

if he have erred, then is all further inquilition friuolous. Concerning the length of Nabuchadnezzars raigne, I shall hereafter upon better occasion deliuer my opinion. The time which he gives to Euilmerodach, is very short, and more precisely agreeing with Berofus than with the Scriptures. For wee to find in Ieremie, that this Euilmerodach in the first of his raigne, shewing all fauour to Ichonia, did among other things take order for him at his table; and that he did continually eate bread before him all the dayes of his life. His portion was a continuall portion given him of the King of Babel, every day a certaine, all the dayes of his life Icrem. 32. verfe vntill he died. The very found of these words (which is more to be esteemed, than 33.0 34. the authoritie of Berofus, were he perfectly extant) imports a farre longer time than two yeeres, wherin lechonia, vnder this gentle Prince, enioyed the comfort fent by God, whose commaundement he had obeyed in yeelding himselfe to Nabuchadnezzar. Indeed how long Iechonia did line it can not be proved; but plaine it is hereby, that all his remaining daies hee did cate bread before this King. Now that hee li-

20 ued not fo shorta while after this as 2. yeeres, it is more than likely, for he was but 55-yeeres old when he was fet at liberty, hauing bin 37. yeeres in the prison, whereinto hewas cast at the age of 18. yeeres; after which time it seemes plaine that hee begat Salathiel, as well by the age of Zorobabel, who is said to have beene but a yong man, and one of Darius his Pages threescore yeeres after this, as by other circum-

CHAP.1.$.5.

Of Belfazer, to whom Scaliger gives the next five yeeres, naming him also Laborosoardoch, I should wonder why he calls him Nabuchadnezzars daughters sonne. were it not that herein I find him very carefull to helpe out Berofus, by shifting in his Niriglissoror, as husband to Nabuchadnezzars daughter, and Protector of his 30 fon foure of these yeeres; by which meanes there remaines about one yeere to Belfazer alone, agrecing necrely with the o. moneths affigned by Berofus to the sonne of Niglifar. But Ieremie hath told vs that it was to Nabuchadnezzar, and to his fon. and to his sonnes sonne (not to his daughters sonne) that the Empire was promifed: which difficultie if Scaliger could not helpe, it was well done of him, to paffe it

Nabonidas the last of these (whome others, desirous to reconcile Berosus to the Scriptures) haue judged to be all one with Balthafar, is by Scaliger thought to bee Darius of the Medes. But herein Scaliger is no firme Berosan : for Berosus makes him of the same stocke or race a Babylonian. I speake not this to disgrace the trauaile of 49 that most learned man (for it highly commends his diligence and judgement, that he was not so wedded to any author, as assected with the loue of truth) but to shew that he himselse having in some points disliked those Writers, whome in generall he approueth, might with greater reason have wholly reformed them by the Scriptures, wherein can be no errour. Two things there are which chiefly did breed or confirme this opinion in Scaliger, that hee whome Berofus calls Nabonidus, was the same whom Daniel had called Darius of the Medes : First, the phrase of Scripture, which fignifies vnto vs, that Darius tooke the kingdome, not faying that hee wanne it by force of armes; Secondly, a fragment of Megasthenes found in Eusebius, wherein this Nabonidus is called the Median. Touching the word of the Originall, 50 or of the Greeke translation, which expressing no force of armes, doth only signific, that Darius tooke or received the kingdome; I see no reason why we should therupon inferre, that the next king entred by Election: seeing Daniel relateth not the meanes and circumstances of Balthafars death, but onely the swift accomplishment of his owne prophecie. Neither could it indeede have properly beene faid (if Daniel had cared to vie the most expressive termes) that Darius of the Medes breaking into the citic, did win the kingdome, seeing this was performed by Cyrus in the absence of Darius, though by his forces, and to his vie. Now concerning the fragment of Megalibenes, true it is, that in Eusebius his workes printed at Basile, in the yeare 1559. I finde onely thus much of Megastbenes, cited out of Alpheeus; That Nabuchodonofor was more valiant than Hercules; that hee subdued all Lybia, and the rest of Alia as farre as to the Armenians; and that as the Chaldeans report, being returned into his kingdome, and rapt with a divine furie, he cried with a loude voice: O Babylonians, I foretell yee of a great calamitie that shall come upon you, which neyther Bel, nor any of the God: Shall avert: There will come a Persian, halfe an Asse, that shallbring 10 flauery whon yee: and that, this and the like when he had spoken, he vanished. Of all this I beleeve little or nothing, faving that Nabuchodonofor knew before-hand, that his Empire should be translated, as Daniel had foretold from the golden head, to the siluer brest. But that he wan all Africa or Lybia, I hold it neither true nor pro-

If Scaligers copy of Eulebius were the more perfect, out of which Megasthenes tells vs that Nabuchodonofor wanne both Afrike and Spaine, I beleeue the fragment fo much the leffe: and am as little moved with the authoritie of it, where it calls a Median the pride and confidence of the Affyrians, as where it tells of Nebuchadnezzar his owne vanishing away. Indeed that same title of halfe an Asse, by which 20 he calleth Cyrus, makes me to suspect the fable as cunningly forged out of Apollo his Oracle, wherein he termeth him a Mule, because his parentage was more noble on the mothers fide, than on the fathers; as Mules are begotten by Ases vpon Mares. And thus much in answer of the two principall foundations whereon this opinion is built. As for the concinnitie and coherence which it hath within it selfe. I casily allow it. But this proues nothing, for meere fictions have not wanted these commendations: neither can any man beleeue that one so indicious, industrious and deepely learned as Io (eph Scaliger, would over-shoote himselfe in setting downe re-pugnancies. It now remaineth to examine the agreement of this with the Scriptures, from 30 which there is no appeale. And herein it seemes that Scaliger, well knowing his owne sufficiencie, hath beene little carefull to satisfie men that would frame Arguments against him. For if the prophecie of Daniel were true, that the kingdome of Balthafar was divided, and given to the Medes and Persians, either wee must thinke that Darius of the Medes was not Nabonidus, or else wee must bethinke our selues what Persian it might be that shared the kingdome with him. For it is not more certaine, that Balthafar loft his life and kingdome, than that his kingdome was divided and given to the Medes and Persians. Neither did the Medes and Persians fall out and fight for it, as by supposing Nabonidus to have beene Darius, they should be thought to have done; but these two Nations did compound the body of that 40 Empire, and were accounted as Lords ouer all the fubiest provinces, infomuch that the Greeke Historians did commonly call those warres which Darius, and after him Xerxes, made your Greece, The warres of the Medes. Yea to cleare this point, cuen Daniel himselfe resembles that King, with whom Alexander fought, vnto a Ramme with two hornes, calling him the King of the Medes and Persians. Wherefore the whole Nation of Chronologers were not to have been condemned by Iofeph Scaliger. for maintaining upon such good grounds, that Darius of the Medes, was partner with Cyrus in his victories, and not a Chaldean King by him subdued. Neither was Infephus to be the leffe regarded, for affirming that Balthafar was destroyed by Darius of the Medes, and his nephew Cyrus, though herein hee varied from Berofus, and 50 others, whose authoritie elsewhere he gladly citeth. For tosephus had no reason to beleeue any mans faith or knowledge of those times, halfe so well as Daniels, whom I beleeue that hee understood as farre as was needefull in this case. Lawfull it was for him to alleage all Authors that had any mention, though vnperfect of the same things that were contained in the writings of the lewes, to whole histories thereby he procured reputation in the Roman world, where they were strangers, and might feeme fabulous. Euen so doe Eusebius, and other Christian Writers, willingly embrace the tellimonies of heathen bookes making for the truth in some particulars; yet will they not therefore be tried in generall by the selfe same Ethnicke philosophers, but leaue them where they are against the truth; as Isfephus in this case hath left Berofus. And thus much I thought it meete to fay of Scaligers opinion in this point; holding neuerthelesse in dueregard his learning and judgement, which if in some things it had not failed, the miracle had beene very great.

What may be held as probable of the Persons and Times of NABVCHO. DONOSOR bis successors.

CHAP.I.S.6.

T nowremaines that I freely acknowledge mine owne weaknes, who cannot find how the 70. yeeres of captinitie are to be divided among them which raigned in Babylon, though I finde that the distribution made of them, in such wise as already is rehearsed, be ill agreeable to the holy Scriptures. Wherefore I may truely say with Pererius, that wee ought liberally to pardon those whose feete have failed them in the slipperie wayes of Chronologie, wherein both learning and diligence are subject to take a fall at one time or other, by ignorance, forgetfulnesse, or heedelesse reckoning. Yet will I aduenture to deliuer my opinion, wherein the judgement of Lyra and others (holding those onely to have raigned over Chaldeans, whose Names are found in the Scriptures) appeares more conformable to reason and account of time, than any of the other Sentences or Coniccures before rehearfed. Not that I will take vpon me to defend Lyra his Coniectures, when hee supposeth by Niglifar and Labofardach to be meant the same persons which are called in Scrip-30 tures Euilmerodach and Balthafar (for this can by no good colour be maintained) but onely to shew that the Kings by him cited, are likely to have occupied the whole time of seuenty yeeres. First therefore let vs consider the raigne of Nebuchadnezzar. in whose eighteenth yere Ierusalem was taken and sackt, but in his nineteenth layd vtterly desolate.

Most of Writers have given to him 43. yeeres of raigne, following therein Berofus. There are who have added one yeere more; and some have made it vp 45. To dispute about the certainety were needlesse: for in shewing by what length of time the Scriptures measure him, we shall shew the certaine truth.

Manifestitis, that the 19. yeere of Nebuchsdnezzar, is joyned with the 11. of 2.Kin 24.8. 40 Zedekia; as also that his eight yeere, was the first yeere of Iechonia his captinitie; the & Ierem 51.12. raigne of Zedekia occupied all the meane space being of 11. yeeres. This is generally 2. King. 24-12. agreed vpon, so that it needes no further proofes: As for the beginning of his suc- 2. Kingas, 27: ceffor Enilmerodach, it was in the seuen and thirtieth yeere of Jechonia his captiuitie; & Icrem. 52.31. fo that Nebuchadnezzar after his eight yeerc (which was the first of lechonia his bondage)raigned 35. whole yeeres, and peraduenture a good part of the fixe and thirtieth, forasmuch as Jechonia was inlarged with so great fauour, not vntill the end of the yeere. Substracting therefore out of these foure and forty, which Nebuchsdmezzars raigne did wel-neere occupie, those eighteene yeeres of his which passed away before the captiuitie of Iuda, and ruine of the citie, we have remaining fixe and To twenty yeeres of the seuentic, that were almost wholy spent, when his sonne be-

It is now to be confidered how the remainder of the feuentic yeeres were divided betweene the kings ruling in Babylon untill the first of Cyrus. A question more difficult (as I said before) than greatly needefull: the whole summe being certaine, and the distinction of times affording no benefit in knowledge of their actions, who were flouthfull Princes. Neither can any man the more justly suspect the beginning or end of the whole 70, yeeres, for that the distribution of some part of them is only coniecturall; seeing that none who gives any other termes to their beginning or end, hath refused to follow both valikely and desperate coniectures in dividing them. I will therefore be bold to doe as others have done; knowing well before hand, that who so euer shall discouer my errour, must doe mee the pleasure (which I could rather wish in a case more materiall) of making mee to understand

Of the foure and forty yeeres remayning in accompt at Nebuchadnezzars death. we are to take away the last, which was the first of Darius the Mede, and then hauing authority good enough to warrant vs from blame of presumption, in giuing vs seuenteene yeeres to Balthasar, we finde left in our hands to bestow vpon Enilmerodach fixe and twenty yeeres. Of the yere belonging to Darius the Mede, I have already spoken what I thought sufficient, in deliuering my opinion of the beginning & continuance of this captivity. That Balthafar olid raigne seventeene veeres. we have the authority of Iofephus, before cited in expresse words. We have also the generall consent of all, or the most late Writers, interpreting Berofus his Nabonidus, who raigned fo long; and Balthafar to have beene one. But nothing moueth me fo much to beleeue this Tradition, as first those cuident places in Daniel, shewing that in the third yeere of Balthafar he followed the Kings businesse, and yet was forgotten ere the end of his raigne, (a proofe sufficient of no few yeeres, passing under this man, especially seeing it is no where found that Daniels emploiments tooke end either that yeere or the next.) Secondly, the consideration of Cyrus his warres against the Asyrians, which beginning with the death of this mans father, and being alwaies prosperous, could hardly have occupied any longer time, though wee make large allowance to his deedes in the lower Asia, which fell out in the mid-way: I have already shewed, that there appeares in the Scriptures likelihood enough to make it credible, that the raigne of Euilmerodach was not short: and that men of great judgement have found it most probable, that he was King three and twentie veeres. More, I thinke, they would have allowed him, had not the desire of satisf-20 fying Berofus caused them to rest content with this. And surely it were greatly to be wished, that bookes of such antiquitie, as those of Berofus, were extant without corruption; a great light (no doubt) they would yeeld in many darke passages of Antiquitie. I will yet confesse, that were his workes neuer so excellent, and in all things else vnquestionably true, I would not therefore condescend vnto him in fome one point, wherein the Scriptures were his open enemie. How much leffe ought I to obey a broken fragment of his, containing only seuen or eight lines, and part even of the title corrupted, as they believe that follow him in the rest? The Scriptures haue told vs that God gaue the Empire to Nebuchadnezzar, to his sonne, and to his fonnes fonne: How long each of them held it, wee finde not expressed; 40 yet would we gladly know it of Berofus, or of any other that would teach vs; prouided alwaies, that helping vs in a particularitie, he destroy not thereby the general! truth. More words are needleffe. It is enough to fay with others, that Berofus or Infephus who cited him, bath bin wronged by the carelefnesse of Scribes; and that it was as easie for those Scribes to erre in writing two for fixe & twentie, as for three and twentie, or perhaps more easie. For the omiffion of the second figure, was as likely the one way as the other; and the Character 5. fignifying 6. hath a neerer resemblance of & that stands for 2. than hath 2 which is vsed for 3. So that the numerall notes $5. expressing 26. were not safe enough from being mistaken in the true copie, and might be altered, as ill written, if some crooked hand, or other mis- 50 chance not vnusuall, had omitted the first stroke of the former letter, or added a dash to the latter, which might cause them to seeme not two different figures, but the one a correction of the other, which how it could be supposed in By standing for 23. I doe not well perceive. As for the arithmeticall figures now in vie, they were long after the time of Iosephus brought in by the Arabians, and therefore doe not appertaine to this businesse; vnlesse we should ghesse that his works were corrupted in that vnlearned age, which following the Saracen conquest, was little occupied in the studies of humanitie, but in a fort wholly given over to the doctrine of Aristotle. If this will serve to make Berofus our friend, so let it be; if not, I will not purchase the fauour of his authoritie, by forsaking teremie and Daniel, when they feeme his opposites.

d. VII.

Of the victories which NABVCHODONOSOR obtained betweene the destruction of Ierusalem and conquest of

Ith what actions this time of 70. yeeres was entertained by the Babylonian Kings, few have written, or little is remaining in record. Which may peraduenture haue bin some cause that the time it selfe was, and is yet fought to bee abridged, as not having left fufficient matter to witnesse the length of it. But by such an argument wee might as well

20 deny to many people even their being. For every Nation (I know not whom I should except) betweene the beginning and last end of it, hath in some slothfull. age rather dreamt away the time, than spent it. It is therefore no maruell, if the posteritie of Nabuchodonosor, finding all things readie to their hand, which their hearts could have defired, betooke themselves to their case and pleasures, thinking perhaps, like the prodigall sonnes of greedie fathers, their owne wisedome greater, which knew how to enjoy, than that of their Ancestors, which wearied away their daies in the refflesse trauell of purchasing: Though indeede the raigne of Nabnchodonofor was so divided, that his youthfull and stronger yeeres having beene exercised in victorious armes, no small part of his life was remaining to be spent in e-

30 stablishing what was gotten, and gathering the fruit of his worthie labours past. The nineteenth yeere of his raigne it was, when destroying vtterly the great and mightie Citic of Ierusalem, hee enriched himselfe with abundance of spoyle, and terrified all that would offer to relist him, by that fearefull example. From that time forward, he, vntill his three and twentieth yeere, laboured in the conquest of those adioyning Regions, which God had exposed vnto his sword, & commanded to weare his yoke; namely, the Edomites, Moabites, Ammonites, Tyrians, Sidenians, and Ægyptians, though some of these were already become his followers, and serued vnder him, when Ierusalem was beaten down and burnt. But the Tyrians, whose Citic was founded on an Iland, fafe enough from any danger of a Land armie, and 40 whose fleet was so strong, that they needed not to feare any enemy at sea, were neither danted with the fall of their neighbour Cities, nor with the obstinate resolution of this mightie Prince, imploying all his power to their subuersion.

That the Citie of Tyre was rather well pleased, than any way discouraged with the fall of Ieru/alem (which had held the same course that Tyrus did, and endured all that might be in the same quarrell against the common enemy) it appeares by the words which Ezechiel condemneth as the common voice of Tyrus; A H A, the gate Exech. 26.2, of the people is broken, it is turned unto me; for seeing shee is desolate, I shall be replenished. Yet at the length, even in the nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonofor, that great worke of his, whereof we have alreadic spoken, began to appeare about the waters, and

But those prophecies of Ieremie and of Esay, which appoint vnto this desolation Ier. 25. of Tyre the same terme of 70. yeeres, that was prescribed vnto the raigne of the Ejai.23.151 Chaldeans, doe plainely shew, that shee followed Ierusalem, the same nineteenth yeere of Nabuchodonofor, in the same, or a very like fortune. The particularities, which doubtlesse were memorable in the issue of so great and laborious a siege, are in a manner veterly loft. Thus much we finde, That the Citizens perceiuing the Towns vnable to hold out, embarked themselves, and fled into the Isle of Cyprus.

Nevertheleffe it seemes that this enasion served only the principal men, who escaping with their goods, abandoned the poorer fort vinto the enemies furie. For not only fuch people of Tyre as dwelt on the Continent (who are called her Daughters in the field) were put to the sword; but the like execution was done in the streets, into which, with excessive labour, the Assyrian made way for his Horses and Chariots. Thus NABVCHODONOSOR caufed his Armie to ferue a great feruice against TYRYS, wherein enery head was made bald, and enery (houlder was made bare, yet had he 10

no wages, nor his Armic; but was faine to rest contented with the Honor of having destroied that Citie, which in all mens judgements had beene held inuincible.

The destruction of these two great and powerfull Cities, having made the name of the Chalda ins dreadfull in the cares of all the Nations thereabout, Nabuchodono. for vsed the advantage of that reputation which hee had obtained by victories alreadie gotten, to the getting of more, and more profitable, with leffe paine. The Kingdome of Agypt was the marke at which he aimed; a Country fo abounding in allriches and pleasures, that it might wel have tempted any Prince, finding himfelfe strong enough, to seeke occasion of quarrell against it; and so farre an enemic to the Crowne of Babylon, that had it beene poorer, yet either it must have beene sub- 20 dued, or the conquest of Syria could ill haue beene established. Neuerthelesseit was needfull, that before hee entred into this businesse, the Countries adjacent should be reduced into such termes, that either they should wholly stand at his denotion, or at least bee vnable to worke him any displeasure. And herein the decree of God concurred, as in all prosperous enterprises, with reason of state. For the people of Moab, Ammon, Edom, Damaseus, Kedar, Hazor, and other adioyning Regions, whom God for their fins had condemned to fall vuder the Babylonian Iwords, were such, as regarding onely their owne gaine, had some of them, like Rauens, followed the Chaldean Armie, to feede voon the carcasses that fell by the crueltie thereof; others taking advantage of their neighbours miseries, occupied the Coun- 30 tries which were by his victories belonging to Natuchodonofor; al of them thinking, that when the Affyrean had fatisfied his furie, he should be faine to for sake those defolate parts, and leave the possession to those that could lay hand upon it. Particu-Exect. 25.12.6 larly the Edomites and Philistims had shewed much malice to the Tewes when their Citic was taken. What good feruice they had done to the Chaldwans, I finde not; if they did any, it is likely to have been with reference to their own purpoles, wherein they were disappointed. The Ammonites were not contented to reioyce at the fall of Ierusalem, but presently they entered upon the Country of Gad, and took possession, as if not the Assyrians, but they, had subdued Israel. Neither can I perceine what other ground that practice had of Baalis King of the Ammonites, when he fent 40 Ifmael, a Prince of the bloud of Iuda, to murther Gedalia, whom the King of Babel had left Gouernour over those that remained in I/rael, and to carry captive into the Ammonites Countrie the people that abode in Mizpah, than a delire of embroiling Nabuchodonofor with so many labours at once, as should make him retire into his Icrem.40.14. owne Country, and abandon those wasted Lands to himselfe and others, for whom they lay conveniently. Such or the like policie the Moabites did exercise; whose

> All these Nations had the art of rauening, which is familiar to such as liue or border vpon desarts; and now the time afforded them occasion to shew the vttermost 50 cunning of their theeuish wits. But Nebuchadnezzar did cut asunder all their denices by sharpe and suddaine war, ouer-whelming them with vnexpected ruine, as it were in one night; according to the prophecies of Efar, leremie, and Ezekiel, who fore-told, with little difference of words, the greatnesse and swiftnesse of the mi-pride and wrath were made frustrate by God, and their diffimulation condemned, ferie that should come vpon them. With which of them he first began, I find not; it seemes that Mosb was the last which felt his hand: for so doe many good Authors interpret the prophecie of E/ay, threatning Moab with destruction after three yeeres, as having reference to the third yeere following the ruine of Terufalem; the next yeere after it being spent in the Aegyptian expedition. This is manifest, that all the principall Townes in these Regions were burnt, and the people slaine, or made slaves, few excepted, who being preserved by flight, had not the courage to returne to their habitations ouer-hastily, much lesse to attempt any thing against Nabuchodonosor, but lived as miserable out-lawes, or at least, oppressed wretches, vntill the to end of the seventie yeeres, which God had prescribed vnto the desolation of their Countries, as well as of the Land of Inda.

ð. VIII.

That Agypt was conquered, and the King therein raigning flaine by NABVCHODO-NOSOR, contrarie to the opinion of most Authors: who following HERO-DOTVS and DIODORVS, relate it otherwise.

> Hen by a long course of victoric Nabnchodonosor had brought into Subjection all the Nations of Syria, & the bordering Arabians, in such wise, that no enemie to himselfe, nor friend of the Aegyptian, was left at his back, that might give impediment vnto his proceeding, or take advantage of any misfortune; then did hee forth-with take in hand the conquest of Aegypt himselfe, vpon which those other Nations had formerly beene depending. Of this expedition, and the victorious iffue thereof, the three great Prophets, Efay, Ieremie, and Ezechiel, have written fo plainely, that I hold it altogether needlesse to looke after more authoritie, or to cite for proofe halfe of that which may be alleadged out of these. Neuerthelesse, we finde many and good Au-30 thors, who following Herodotus, and Diodorus Siculus, are well contented to firaine these prophecies with vnreasonable diligence vnto such a sense, as gives to Nabuchodono for little more than the honour of having done some spoile in Aegypt, omitting the conquest of that Land by the Babylonian, and referring the death of Apries or Hophra to a chance long after following, which had no coherence with these times or affaires. So prepofterous is the delight which many men take in the meanes and fecond helps conducing to their purpose, that often times they preferre the Commentator before the Author; and to vp-hold a sentence, giving testimonie to one clause, doe carelesly ouerthrow the historicit selfe, which thereby they sought to have maintained. The reports of Herodotus and Diodorus, concerning the Kings of 40 Aegypt, which raigned about the se times, are already rehearsed in the former book:

but that which they have spoken of Apries, was purposely reserved vnto this place. Herodotus affirmes, that he was a very fortunate King, but wherein he telleth not; Herod, La & La (vnlesse we should understand that he was victorious in the Warre, which he is said to have made vpon Tyrus and Sidon) that hee raigned five and twentie yeeres, and was finally taken and put to death by his owne subjects; who did set vp Amasis, as King, which prevailed against him. The rebellion of the Aegyptians he imputeth to a great losse which they received in an expedition against the Cyrenians, by whom almost their whole Armie was destroied. This calamitie the people of Aegypt thought to be well pleasing to their King, who had sent them on this dangerous 50 expedition, with a purpose to have them consumed, that so he might with greater fecuritie raigne over fuch as staied at home. So they who escaped, and the friends offuch as were flaine, tebelled against Apries, who sent Amasis to appeale the tumult; but Amass became Captaine of the rebells, and was by them chosen King. Finally, the whole Land confented vnto this new Election; whereby Apries whom hee kept in readinesse thirtie thousand good Souldiers that fought valiantly for him, but were vanquished by the great numbers of the Agyptian forces, amounting vnto two hundred and fiftie thousand, which were all by birth and education, men of warre. Apries himselfe being taken prisoner, was gently intreated by Amasis for a while, vntill the Agyptians, exclaiming upon him, as an extreme enemie to the Land, got him delivered into their hands, and strangled him, yet gaue him honourable buriall. Such is the report of Herodotus, with whome Diodorus Siculus necrely agrees, telling vs that Apries did vanquish the Cyprians and Phanicians in battell at Sea, tooke by force and demo- 10 lished Sidon, wan the other townes of Phanicia, and the Isle of Cyprus, and finally, perished as is before rehearsed, when he had raigned two and twentie yeeres. This authoritie were enough (yet not more than enough) to informe vs of Apries his historie, if greater authoritie did not contradict it. But the destruction of Agypt by the Babylonian, fore-told by the Prophets, which hath no coherence with these relations, hath greater force to compeliour beliefe, than have the traditions of . Egyptian Priests (which the Greeke Historians followed) and greater probabilities to Esa. 20. ver. 4.5. perswade those that looke onely into humane reasons. For Esay prophecied long before of the shameful captivitie of the Agyptians, whom the king of Assbur should carry away naked, young and old, in such wise, that the Iemes, who fled vnto them 20 for deliverance from the Affyrian, should be ashamed of their owne vaine confidence in men so vnable to defend themselves. But Ezekiel and Ieremie, as their prophecies were neerer to the time of execution. fo they handled this Argument more precifely. For Ezekiel telleth plainely, that Egypt should be given to Nebuchadnezzar, as wages for the service which hee had Exech. 29. verfe done at Tyre: Also hee recounteth particularly all the chiefe Cities in Agypt, saying, That these by name should bee destroyed, and goe into captiuitie; yea, that PHARAOH and all his armie should be staine by the sword. Wherefore it must needes be a violent expolition of these Prophecies, which by applying the issue of such threatnings to an infurrection and rebellion, concludes all, without any other alte- 20 ration in £gypt, than change of the Kings person, wherein Amasis did succeed vnto Apries, by force indeede, but by the vniforme consent of all the people. Certainely, if that notable place of leremie, wherein hee foretelleth how the lewes in Ægypt (hould see Pharaoh Hophra delivered into the hand of his enemies, as Zedekia had beene, were to be referred vnto the time of that rebellion, whereof Herodotus hath spoken, as the generall opinion hath ouer-ruled it, then was it vainely done of the same Prophet (which God forbid that any Christian should thinke, seeing hee did it by the appointment of God himselfe) to hide in the clay of a Brick-hill, those very stones, vpon which the throne of Nabuchodone for should be ser, and his pauilion forcd. Yea then was that prophecie no other than falle, which expressed the 40 Rerem. 46. verfe and of Pharaoh thus: Behold, I will visite the common people of No, & PHARAOH, and Agypt, with their gods and their kings, even P H AR AOH, and all that trust in him: and I will deliuer them into the hands of those that seeke their lives, and into the hand of NE-BVCHADNEZZAR, King of Babel, and into the hands of his feruants. The clearenes of this prophecy being such as could not but refute that interpretation of many other places, which referred all to the rebellion of Amasis, it caused me to wonder what those Commentators would say to it, who are elsewhere so diligent in fitting all to the Greeke Historians. Wherefore looking vpon Iunius, who had in another place taken the enemies of Pharaoh Hophra to be Amasis, and his followers, I found him beere acknowledging that the Aegyptian Priests had notably deluded Herodotus 50 with lies, coined vpon a vaine-glorious purpose of hiding their owne disgrace and bondage. And furely it may well be thought, that the historic of Nebuchadnezzar, was better knowne to the lewes, whom it concerned, than to the Greekes, that scarcely at any time heard of his name. Therefore I see no cause why we should not rather beleeve Iofephus, reporting that Nabuchodonofor in the three & twentieth yeere of his raigne, and the fift yeere of the destruction of Ierusalem, did conquer Egypt, kill the King thereof, and appoint another in his flead, than Herodotus or Diocore; tofephus de Anwho being meere strangers to this businesse, had no great reason to labor in search. ing out the truth, but might rest contented with any thing that the Priests would tell them. Now if setting alide all advantage of authoritic, we should only consider the relations of Iofephus, and of the Greeke Historius, as either of them might bee verified of it selfe by apparant circumstances, without reflecting vpon the Hebrew Prophets or Egyptian Priests; me thinks the death of Apries can no way be appro-10 ued as having beene wrought by consent of the people, but affords great matter of suspition; yea, though no man had opposed the reports of Herodetus and Diodore. For the great loue and houour which the Agyptians did beare vnto their Kings, is notorious by the vniforme testimony of al others that have handled the matters of that Countrey, as well as by the report of Diodore himselfe. How then can wee thinke it probable, that Apries having wonne great victories, did for one only losse fall into the hatred of all his people, or which may serue to perswade vs, that a King of Agypt would leeke, or so demeane himselfe, that he might be thought to seeke the destruction of his naturall subjects? As for that armie of thirtie thousand souldiers, Carians and Ionians, which the King of Agypt, whom Amasis tooke prisoner, 20 is faid to have kept for his defence: doth it not argue that hee was a forrainer, and one that armed himselfe against the Aegyptians, withing them few and weake; rather than any of the Pharaohs, who accounted the force of the Country, as affuredly their owne, as the strength of their owne bodies? It were more tedious than any way needfull, to vie all Arguments that might bee alleadged in this case. The very death of this supposed Apries, which the clamours of the people obtained of Amasis, who sought to have kept him alive, doth intimate that he was some forren Gouernour, not a naturall Prince; otherwise the people would have defired to fauchis life, and Amasis to take it quickly from him. I will not labour any further to disproue that opinion, whereunto I should not have yeelded, though it had 30 flood vpon great apparance of truth, considering that the voice of Truth it selfe cries out against it; but leave the circumstances, proving the Conquest of Aegypt by Nabuchodonofor to bee observed, where due occasion in course of the storic fol-

T is a great losse, that the generall Historic of the World hath suffered, by the spoile and waste which Time hath made of those Monuments, that should have preserved the memorie of such samous actions as were accomplished by this mightic Prince Nabuchodonofor; wherein, whether his Vertue, or Fortune were greater, it is now vncertaine. That his victories following the Conquest of Syria, and the Neighbour-Prouinces, were such as did more enlarge his dominion, than all his former warres had done, it may easily be gathered out of Ezektel, who reckons vp in his thirtieth chapter (besides the whole Countrey of Agypt) Phut and Lud, with other Nations that may seeme to have reached out into Mauritania, as people subdued by this great Babylonian. The circumstances of these warres are in a maner vtterly lost; 50 but that the victorie was easie and swift, any man shall find, who will take the pains to conferre the places, wherein the three great Prophets touch this Argument. Thus much I thinke worthy of more particular observation; that Pharaoh, who (as is already noted in the former Booke) thought himselfe safe in Agopt by the well defenced fituation of his Countrey, did very vnwisely in suffering his enemies for the guard of his Viceroy, and custodic of the new subdued Province : as likewise to sweepe the way cleane vnto his owne doores, by consuming all his friends and the company returning from Cyrene and Bareas, who together with the friends of adhærents in Syria. For as the labour of this businesse did more harden then weafuch as were flaine in that expedition, remembred before out of the Greeke Historirie the Chaldaan army, so the confidence and vaine securitie of the Agyptians, relyans, deposed and slew Apries, I take them to have beene the Aegyptian fugitives, ing vpon the difficult passages which the enemie was to make thorow the Arabian which then recouered their owne Countrey. Sure it is that this Prophecie of Ezedefarts, and the much advantage which the great river of Nilus would afford vnto kiel was verified, At the end of fortie yeeres will I gather the Ægyptians from the people Each 30. v. 13. themselves, did little availe them in provision for the war, and much assonish them where they were scattered, and I will bring againe the captinitie of Agypt, and will cause 614. (as may justly bee thought) in the time of execution: it being vsually seene, that them to returne into the land of Pathros, into the land of their habitation, and they shall be the hearts of men faile, when those helps faile, in which they had reposed more there a small king dome. If the Agyptian Priests alluded heereunto in the tale which confidence than in their owne vertue. Hitherto the Kingdome of Agypt had flouto they made of Amalis his obtaining the Kingdome, then are they to be helped with rished under the rule of the Pharaohs, about a thousand five hundred & source score 10 this or the like interpretation; if they deuised matter that had no shadow of truth, yeeres; but from this time forward it remained forty yeeres without a King, vnder onely to keepe the Greekes from knowledge of their Countries difgrace; then are the subjection of the Babylonians; and then at length it began to recour by little & they little to be regarded, fince we know the truth with them. litle the former greatnes, yet fo, that it was neuer dreadful vnto others, God having Ecch. 29.13.14. faid of that people, I wil diminish them, that they shal no more rule the Nations. For wher-

Hele victories brought the greatnes of the Assyrian Empire to the full, and from them was reckoned the time of Nebuchadnezzar's raigne in fundry places of Scripture. To speake any more of the questions arising about the supputation of Nebuchadnezzar his times, might feeme to be the ouer-handling of one Argument: Yet thus much I will note; that whereas Daniel was carried captine in the third yeere of Ielioiakims Daniel was carried captine in the third yeere of Ielioiakims Daniel was carried captine in the third yeere of Ielioiakims raigne (which ranne along with some part of Nebuchadnezzar's first yeere) and was kept in diet three yeeres more, before he was brought into the Kings presence; it could not be the second of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdome, wherin he interpreted the 30 forgotten dreame of the great Image, foreshewing the succession of Monarchies, but the second of his Empire. The same or the like may be said of divers places which referre fundry matters vnto their fet yeeres; as that of Ezekiel before cited, where he fore-tells, that Aegypt should be given in reward for the service done before Tyrus, dating his prophecie in the seuen and twentieth yeere; and that of Daniel, placing the erection of the golden Image in the eighteenth yeere: for these yeeres held no dependance vpon either the beginning of Nebuchadnezzar's kingdome, or of his Empire, nor yet vpon any of the captinities, but had reference to some memorable action, omitted in Scripture, and therefore not casie to be found, nor worth the labour of vncertaine fearch.

Ofany warre made by Mebuchadnezzar, after fuch time as he returned from the Conquest of Aegypt, I doe not read : excepting that against Ainiuie, the destruction whereof was fore-tolde by the Prophet Naum. Mininie had long before beene taken by Merodach (as in due place hath beene shewed) and together with the rest of Affyria made subject to Babylon. Yet was it left under a peculiar King, who rebelling against the Chaldean, as Ichoiakim & Zedekias, tributary Kings of Inda, had done, talled likewise of the same fortune. That the destruction of Nininie followed the Conquest of Aegypt, it appeareth by the comparison which Nahum the Prophet Nahum. 2. 2. made betweene this Citie, that was to fall, and the Citie of No in Acgypt, that was fallen already. But how long after this came to passe, it is (me thinks) vnpossible 50 to finde out. For whereas it is found in an Hebrew Chronologie, that it was in the first of Nebuchadnezzar's raigne; the place of Nahum last cited is enough to disprooue it. Whereasit is referred by some vnto the first of his Monarchie, which began at the end of the Aegyptian warres; the whole Prophecie of Nahum which went betweene the one and the other, argueth fluongly, that there was a longer space of time inter-found in that Countrie. Now concerning the time which lofephus gives vnto this bufinesse, and the businesse it selfe, I have already shewed, that it is warranted by all the prophecies which infinuate the same. As likewise the last destruction of Ierusalem, and carrying away those vnto Babel, who inhabited the miserable ruines of that great city, which was in the same three of twentieth veere of NEBVCHADNEZZAR. is not vnprobably thought by good authors to have been eat the returne from this Experian expedition. But whereas Islephus tels vs. that there was another King put in the roome of Apries by Nebuchadnezzar, wee must viderstand that hee was onely a Viceroy, and not (as some have mistaken it) thinke that this was Amasis. For to 30 place the beginning of Amasis his raigne in the three and twentieth of Nebuchadnez. zar, were as well repugnant vnto the prophecies before alleadged, as to all Chronologie and historic. Some there are, which to helpe this inconvenience, imagine that there were two successfuely bearing the name of Amass, others, that there were two Apries, the one flaine by Nebuchadnezzar, the other by Amasis: a question of small importance, because the difference is onely about a name, it being once granted that the person mentioned in Scriptures, was depriued of life and kingdome by the Asfyrians. Yet for any thing that I can perceive, that Apries, of whom the Greeke Historians wrote, could not be the Deputie of Nebuchadnezzar, feeing that hee was the Grand-childe of Pharao Necho, and made warre (as they report) vpon the Phanici- 40 ans, who were, before the Egyptians, become subject vnto the Crowne of Babylon. I might adde, perhappes, that he whom Nebuchadnezzar left as Governour of Agypt, was more likely to have had some Chaldean or Asyrian, than Agyptian name; vnlesse we should thinke that hee had beene a traytor to his natural Prince, and so rewarded by the Conquerour with Lieutenantship of the Country: about which it were but friuolous to dispute. Thus much in briefe we ought to beleeue, that Na-buchodonofor made an absolute Conquest of Agypt; that he was not so foolish as to giue it away, any man may gueffe; that he appointed one to rule the Countrev. it is consequent vnto the former, and hath authoritic of Iosephus; that this Gouernour babilitie enough to perswade my selfe, and yet can well bee content, that others vie their libertie, and beleeue what they lift. As for the armie which this . A gratian

King Apries is supposed to have kept of Ionians and Carians; I hold them to be none other than the garifons of mercenarie fouldiers which were left by the Affyrian

as it hath beene said of Pharaoh: I am the sonne of the wife, I am the sonne of the ancient Kings: and whereas he had vaunted, The River is mine, and I have made it; the Princes of Leypt now became fooles, the river failed them, the King himselfe was taken and flaine, and that ancient linage quite extinguished. This came to passe in the first yeere after the destruction of Ierusalem, and the three and twentieth of current. So that to enquire into the very yeere of this destruction, or other circumstances of the Warre, whether managed by Nabuchodonosor in person or by his Licutenants, were somewhat like vnto the vaine curiositie of Tyberius Casar, enquiring who was the Mother of Heeuba; or to the like idle paines which he should take, who would feeke to learne what woman that Huzzab Queen of Nininie was, whose wofull captiuitie the same Prophet 2V aum likewise did fore-tell.

φ. XI.

Of the later time of NEBVC HADNEZZAR; his buildings, madnesse, and death.

F the time which this great Monarch spent in quiet, I thinke there are no Monuments extant; faue those which wee finde among the prophecies of Daniel. Among these wee may reckon his great works at Babylon, wherewith he pleased himselfe so well, that he brake out into these glorious words: Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of the Kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my Maiestie? Surely if those things bee true that are by tosephus rehearsed of him out of Berofus and Megasthenes, he might well delight himselse with the contemplation of such 20 goodly and magnificent buildings. For it is said, That he fortified Babylon with a triple wall; that besides other stately works, he raised those huge arches wherewith were borne vp the high Orchards, hanging as it were in the ayre, and equalling the tops of Mountaines; which most sumptuous frame, that out lasted all the remainder of the Affyrian, and all the Persian Empire, is said to have beene reared, and fi-

But of all this, and other his magnificence, we finde little else recorded, than that (which indeede is most profitable for vs to consider) his ouer-valuing of his owne greatnesse abased him vnto a condition, inferiour to the poorest of men. And not vindescruedly fell these judgements of God vpon him. For whereas God had ho- 30 noured him, not onely with many victories, and much happinesse in his owne life, but with a discouerie of things to come after him, yea and had approoued the certaintic of his dreame, by the miraculous reducing of it into his memorie, and interpretation thereof by Daniel the Prophet: he neuerthelesse became so forgetfull of God, whose wonderfull power he had seene and acknowledged, that hee caused a golden Image to be set vp and worshipped: ordaining a cruell death as reward vnto them that should dare to disobey his Kingly will and pleasure, which was vtterly repugnant to the law of him that is the King of Kings. Hereof S. Hierome hath well noted; Velox oblinio veritatis, vt qui dudum sernum Dei quasi Deum edorauerat, nune Statuam sibi fieri inbeat, vt ipse quasi Deus in statua adoraretur : A hastie forges-40 fulnesse of the truth, that hee who so lately had worshipped (DANIEL) the servant of God, as if he had beene God himselfe, should now command a Statua to be creeted unto himselfe, wherein himselfe might bee worshipped as God. From this impietie it plcased God to reclaime him, by the strange and wonderfull deliverie of those blesfed Saints out of the fierie fornace; who being thrown einto it bound, for refusing to commit Idolatrie, were affisted by an Angell; preserved from all harme of the fire; loosened from their bands; and finally called out with gracious words, and restored to their former honour, by the King: who amazed at the miracle, madea decree tending to the honour of God, which by erection of his Image he had violated. Yet this denotion of Nabuchadnezzar was not so rooted in him, that it could 50 bring foorth fruit answerable to his hastie zeale. Therefore was he forewarned by God in a dreame of the terrible judgement hanging over his head, which Daniel expounding, aduised him to breake off his sinne by righteousnesse, and his iniquitie by mercy towards the poore, that there might be an healing of his error. Hereby it seemes

that injuffice and crueltic were the faults, for which he was threatned. but this threating sufficed not vnto his reformation. For that so great a Monarch should be driven from among men, (according to the tenor of the dreame and interpretation) yea.compelled to dwell with the beafts of the field, and made to cate graffe as the Oxen, was a thing so incredible in mans judgement, that easily it might be thought an idle dreame, and much more easily be forgotten at the yeeres end. One whole veeres leafure to repent was given to this haughtie Prince: which respite of the execution may seeme to have bred in him a forgetfulnesse of Gods sentence. For at the end of twelve moneths, walking in the royall Palace of Babel, he was so over-ioved to and transported with a vaine contemplation of his owne seeming happinesse, that without all feare of Gods heavie judgement pronounced against him, hee vttered those loftie words before rehearsed, in vaunting of the Maiesticall works which he had reared, as well befeeming his maiefticall person. But his high speeches were not fully ended, when a voice from heaven, telling him that his Kingdome was departed from him, rehearfed ouer vnto him the sentence againe, which was fulfilled vpon him the very same houre.

That Salomon, and many other Princes, and great ones, have taken delight in their owne buildings, it cannot any way be doubted; yet I doe not remember that ever I have read of any, that were punished for reloying in works of this kinde (though 20 it is hard in ioy, or any passion of the minde, to keepe a just measure) excepting one-ly this Nabuchadnezzar.

The like may be faid of David: for other (and some very godly) Kings have mufired all their forces to the very last man; but few or none haue been known to haue beene punished as Dauid was. Surely I not onely hold it lawfull to reioyce in those good things, wher with God hath bleffed vs; but a note of much vnthankfulneffe to entertaine them with a fullen and vnfeeling disposition. Yet as all humane affections, wherein due reference to God is wanting, are no better than obscure cloudes, hindring the influence of that bleffed light, which clarifies the foule of man, and predisposeth it unto the brightnesse of eternall felicitie; so that insolentioy, which 30 man in the pride of his vaine imagination conceineth of his owne worth, doth aboue all other paffions blaft our mindes, as it were with lightning, and make vs to reflect our thoughts vpon our seeming inherent greatnesse, forgetting the whilest him, to whom wee are indebted for our very being. Wherefore the lemalamentis gaudia; The euillioyes of the minde, were not vnaptly, by the Prince of Latine Poets, bestowed in the entrance of Hell, and placed further inward than forrowes, cares, and teares, not farre from the yron Cabbins of the Furies. And certainely it is no vnlikely token of vengeance neere at hand, when these vnreasonable slushes of proud and vaine ioy, doe rage in a minde, that should have beene humbled with a iust repentance and acknowledgement of ill deserving.

40 This was verified vpon Nebuchadnezzar, whose punishment was singular and vnexampled. For he ranne among beafts in the fields and woods, where for feuen vecres hee lived, not onely as a faluage man, but as a faluage beaft, for a beaft hee thought himselfe secundum suam imaginationem, as Thomas noteth, and therefore La. de Reg. fed himselfe in the same manner, and with the same food that beasts doe; Not that prihe was changed in figure externall, according to Mediana, in so much as he appeared Med. 1.2. derea beast to other mens eies, as S. Hierome in the life of Hilarius (how true God knows) dain Denn side cap. 7. speakes of a woman that appeared to all other mens sight a Cow, but to Hilarius onely a woman; neither was he changed as Iphigenia the Daughter of Agamemnon was said to be, into a Hinde, nor made a Monster, as Dorotheus and Epiphanius drea- Dor. in Synopsi.

50 med: but according to S. Ieromes exposition of these words: At the same time was my Epin vit Days understanding restored unto me &c. Quando dicit (Saith S. Ierome) sensum sibi redditum. ostendit non formam se amilisse, sed mentem; when he saith that his sense was restored unto him, he sheweth that he had not lost his humane shape, but his understanding. Seuen yeeres expired, it pleased God to restore Nabuchodonosor, both to his understanding, and his estate, for which heack nowledged and praised God all the rest of his life, confessing his power, and everlasting being; that he was the Lord of heaven and Dan. 4. 1. 32. c. earth, and wrought without resistance what he pleased in both; that his works were all truth, and his waies righteous. Which gave argument to many of the Fathers, and others, not to doubt of his faluation; namely, S. Augustine, Theodoret. Lyra, Carthusianus, and others. And for that place of Esay, the fourteenth, out of which his perdition may be gathered, the aforenamed Authors apply the same to Balthafar, because Isay, both in the thirteenth and fourteenth Chapter, speaketh of the King, and the destruction of Babylon iountly.

ð. XII. of EVILMERODACH.

Auing already spoken what I could of the succession and yeeres of Nebuchadnezzars posteritie; the most that may be said of him, is said of Euilmerodach, which I will not here againe rehearle. He loft some part of that which his Father had gotten; and left his Kingdome burning in a warre that confumed it to ashes. He lost &gypt by rebellion of the people, in the nineteenth yere of his raigne, which was for- 20 tic yeeres after his Father had conquered it. But this agrees neither with the accompt of Herodotus, who allowes to Amasis foure and fortie yeeres of raigne; nor with that of Diodorus, who gives him five and fiftie, faying that he died in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, when Cambyses did conquer Agypt. There were indeed but seuen and thirtie yeeres, which passed betweene the second yeere of the foure and fiftieth Olympiad, (which was the nineteenth of Euilmerodach, and the first of Amasis) and the fift of Cambyses his raigne, wherein hee wanne Egypt; of which seuen and thirtie yeeresit is credibly held, that Plamennitus, the sonne of Amasis, raigned three: so that Amasis could be no longer King than source and thirtie yeeres. But seeing that these two Greeke Historians have beene abused 20 by Aegyptian Priests, in the substance of that which was spoken of Amasis, it is no maruell though they were also deceived in the length of his raigne. This is the plaine answere to this obiection. For to say either that the numbers were miswritten, and foure and fortie set downe in stead of foure and thirtie, or that Amasis did temporise awhile with the Affyriam, and not beare himselfe as absolute King of Egypt, vntill the ninetcenth of Euilmerodach (at which time, and not before, it hath beene proued out of Ezeshiel, that Agypt became againe a Kingdome) I holdit a fuperfluous excuse.

Whether these Aegyptian troubles did animate the King of the Medes to deale with Euilmerodach, as with a Prince greater in fame, and reputation, gotten by the 40 decaied valour of his people, than in present forces, or whether (as I rather thinke) some foile received by the Asyrian invading Media, emboldned the Aegyptians to rebell against him: I will neither undertake, nor seeke to define. Xenophon tels, that the first service of young Cyrus in warre, was under Astrages King of the Medes, his Grand-father, in a prosperous fight against the Assyrian Prince, who did set upon hims at which time Cyrus was fifteen or fixreen yeeres old. If therefore Cyrus lived threescore & three yeeres (as he is said to have died well stricken in yeeres) which is held to be the ordinarie terme of no short life, then was this encounter in the third yeere of Euilmerodath his raigne. Yet by the same reckoning it should follow, that the warre began more early betweene these Nations, for as much as the manner 50 of their fight informer times, with other circumstances infinuating as much, are found in the same place of xenophon. And it may well be, that the death or destruction of Nabuchodonofor gaue courage vnto those that had felt him a troublesome neighbour, to stand vpon prouder termes with the Affgrians, than in his flourishing citate they durft have vied. How focuer the quarrell beganne, wee finde that it ended not before the last ruine of the Affyrian Monarchie. For the Babylonian, being too proud to digest the losses which hee received by the Medes and their Alijes the Perlians, drew vnto his partie the Lydians, and all the people of the leffer Alia. with gifts and strong perswasions, hoping so to ouer-whelme his enemies with a flrong inualion, whome in vaine hee had fought to wearie out with a lingting

This happened after the death of Aftyages, who left the World in the ninetcenth veere of Enilmerodach, at which time Amalis tooke possession of Agypt. So that 10 the Allrian having his hands alreadic full of businesse, which more carnessly did affect him, feemes thereby to have given the better meanes vnto the Acceptaints of new erecting their Kingdome, which by long distance of place did fundry times finde occasion to rebell in after ages, and set up a King within it selfe, against the far more mightie Persan.

The iffue of these great preparations made by Euilmerodach against the Medes. was fuch as opened the way vnto the fulfilling of those prophecies, which were many veeres before vitered against Babel, by Efay and Ieremie.

For the Assertians, and their Confederates, who, trusting in their numbers, thought to have buried the Medes and Persians under their thicke shewes of arrowes and 20 darts, were encountred with an armie of flout and well-trained men, weightily armed for close fight, by whom they were beaten in open battell, wherein Eurlmerodach was flaine. So that great frame of Empire which Nabuchodonofor had rayled and vp-held, being shaken and grieuously crackt under his vnfortunate Sonne, was lest to bee sustained by his vnworthy Nephew: a man more likely to have ouerthrowne it, when it was greatest and strongest, than to repair it, when it was in way of falling.

Aprivate coniecture of the Author; ferwing to make good those things, which are cited out of BEROSVS, concerning the Successors of EVILMERO. DACH, without wrong to the truth, the qualitie, and death of BALTHASAR.

Hough I have alreadie (as it seemes to mee) sufficiently produced that Balthafar was the Sonne, and immediate Successiour to Euilmerodach. yet confidering earnestly the coniectures of those Writers, which following Berofus, infert Niglifar, or Niriglifforoor, and his fonne Labaffardach betweene them : as also that which I finde in Herodotus of Nitorris, a famous Queene of Babylon, who greatly adorned and fortified that Citie; I have thought it not superfluous here in this place to shew, by what meanes it was possible that some errour might have crept into the Historic of those times, and thereby have brought vs to a needleffe trouble of fearching out the truth as it were by candle-light, in the vncertaine fragments of lost Authors, which we might have found by day-light, had we adhered onely to the Scriptures. First, therefore I obferue, that the time which Berofus dinides betwixt Euilmerodach, and the two next Kings, agrees with the vecres in which Nebuchadnezzar lived wilde among brute 50 beafts in the open field: Secondly, that the fuddainenesse of this accident, which came in one houre, could not but worke much perturbation in that state, wherein doubtleffethe honour of so noble a Prince was highly regarded, his calamitic pittied, and his restitution hoped; the prediction of Daniel finding reputation in that Herod I.s.

clause which promised his recouerie, as being verified in that which had bin more incredible. Now if we doe in common reason judge, what course was like to be taken by the great ones of the Kingdome, for fettling the government, whilest the King was thus distracted, we shall finde it most likely, that his Sonne and Heire did occupie the royall Throne, with condition to restore it vnto his Father, when God should enable him to repossesse it. In this his rule Euilmerodach being to supplie the viter want of vnderstanding in his Father, as Protectors doe the vnripenesse of it in young, but reasonable Kings, might easily either commit the insolencies, or fall into the troubles, incident to such an office. That hee had in him very small abilitie of gouernment, it appeares by his ill maintaining the Empire, when hee held it in his 10 owne right. That his Sifter Nitoeris (if Nitoeris were his fifter) was a woman of an high spirit, it appeares by that which Herodotus reports of her, saying that shee was more cunning than Semiramis, as appeared in her magnificent and viefull works about the River of Euphrates, and her fortification of Babylon against the Medes, who had gotten many Townes from the Affyrians, & amongst them Ninuie. Wherfore it were not unreasonable to think, that such a woman, seeing how the Empire went to decay through her brothers milgouernment, vsed practices to get the rule into her owne hands, and afterwards, as a mother, to leave it vnto her vngracious fonne. Other time than this, wherein Nitocris could have raigned, we doe not finde; but we finde in Berofus (as Iofephus hath cited him) that Wigliffar, who got the Kingdom 20 from Euilmerodach, was his fifters busband; which argues this to have beene the same woman. As for Labassardach the some of Niglissar, if at the end of nine Moneths raigne hee were for his lewd conditions flaine by the Nobilitie, as the fame Berofus reporteth, it feems that God p dhereby the way for Nebuchadnezzars restitution (whose terms of punishment was then expired) by raising such troubles as should make him the more desired, both of the Princes and the people. I will not here vie many words to confute that which Berofus hath further let downe of Enilmerodach, telling vs that hee was flaine by his fifters husband: for the plaine words of Scripture, naming the yeere wherein he gaue libertie to Iechonia, do plainly testifie that he out-lived the three or foureand fortieth yeare of his Fathers 20 raigne, which was the last of his life.

This may suffice to shew, that they who are said to have succeeded Euilmerodach in the Kingdome, might indeede haue so done, though not when hee held it in his owne right. Of Balthafar, who was his Sonne and Heire, we finde, that he had such conditions, as God permitteth to be in a King for the ruine of the people. He was from his young yeeres of a mischieuous nature; having in his Fathers time slaine a Noble yong man that should have married his sister, onely for spight and envie to fee him kill two wild beafts in hunting, at which himselfe having throwne his I aucline had missed them. Another great Lord he had gelded, because a Gentlewoman commending his beautie, said it were a happie woman that should be his wife. Such 40 barbarous vilanies caused many which had loued his Father (as a good and gracious, though vnfortunate Prince) to reuolt from him vnto the enemic as soone as he was King. Neither doc I finde that hee performed any thing worthy of record, but as a Coward and a Foole hee lost all; fitting still, and not once daring to give battell to them that daily tooke somewhat from him: Yet carelesly feasting when danger had hemmed him in on euery side, and when death arrested him by the hands of those whom hee had wronged in his Fathers life. So the end of him was base and miserable; for he died as a foole taken in vnexcusable securitie, yet had not that happinesse, such as it is, of a death free from apprehension of seare, but was terrified with a dreadful vision; which had shewed his ruine not many houres before, 50 euen whilest hee was drinking in that wine, which the swords of his insulting encmies drew out of him, together with his latest bloud. It is therefore in this place emough to say of him. That after a dishonourable raigne of seuenteene yeres, he perished like a beast, and was slaine as he deserued. The rest that concerneth him in question of histime, hath beene spoken heretofore; in matter of his affaires, shall be handled among the acts of Cyrius, to whose storie that of Balthazar is but an apnendix.

That the Medes were chiefe actors in the Subucrsion of the Babylonian Empire.

HE Line of Belochus being now extinguished in Balthasar, the Empire of Babylon, and of Assiryned first to that of Media, which then was governed by Cyaxares or Darius Medus, after whom Cyrus became Lord and Monarch, both of Asyria and of

Of the race of Phul Belochus there were ten Kings belides himselfe, and of Arbaces as many are found by Metasthenes. These two Provinciall Governours having cut downe the last branch of Ninus in Sardanapalus, divided betweene them the Easterne Empire.

Craxares (whom the Scriptures call Darius Medus) the last of the race of Arbaces. dying about two yeeres after that the line of Belochus was ended in Balthafar : the Dominions aswell of the Conquerour, as of the conquered, fell to a third Familie. namely, to Cyrus of the house of Achamenes, the Princes of which bloud raigning in Persia, had formerly beene dependants on the Medes, and were of as little power at home, as of fame abroad in the World.

Of the Family of the Achamenes, and Line of the Persian Kings, we shall hereafter finde occasion in due place to intreat.

The Nation of the Medes descended from Madai the third some of Iaphet; that they had Kings soone after the floud, Lactantiss and Diodorus have found record; For Last antius remembreth an ancient King of the Medes called Hydaspes, and Diodor speaketh of Pharnus with his seuen Sonnes, slaine by the Asyrian in the beginning of their Empire.

But of these who succeeded Arbaces the first, that freed his Nation from the Byrians. I take the lift and number from Eusebius, adding Darius Medus: of whom I have spoken in their proper places heretofore; and they are these.

And though the Greekes ascribe the conquest of Babylon to Cyrus alone, yet the Scriptures teach vs that Darius was not onely King of Media, and had the Persians his followers, but that the Armic victorious ouer Baltbazar was his; as the Alyrian and Babylonian Empire also was during his owne life. For wee finde in Daniel. that Darius of the Medes tooke the Kingdome being threefcore and two veres old-And further, what Officers it pleased him to set ouer the Kingdome. And so was it Cap. 13. v. 17.51 prophecied by If ay long before: Behold, I will firre up the Medes against them erc. And by IEREMIE: The Lord hath raised up the Spirit of the King of the Medes: for hispurpose is against Babel to de destroy it; and in the eigth and twentieth Verse, Prepare against her the Nations, with the King of the Medes, the Dukes thereof, the Princes 20 thereof, and all the Land of his Dominion. These Scriptures Iulius Affricanus doth well open, who taking authoritic from Diodor, Castor, Thallus, and others, delivereth that Babylon was taken before Cyrus beganne to raigne, which also agreeth with Strabo, where he faith, That as the Medes were subjugated by the Persians, so before that, both the Babylonians and Asyrians were mastered by the Medes. And therfore the reports of Iustine, and Herodotus, are not to be received, who attribute the taking of Babylon to Cyrus alone.

By what meanes the Empire was translated from the Medes to the Persians.

Ow the Kingdome of the Medes fell into the hands of Cyrus, it is a doubt not sufficiently cleared by Historians, but rather their different relations of his beginnings have bred the former opinion of those who give the conquest of Babel to the Persian only. For some there are who denie that Allyages had any other Successour than Cyrus his Grand-child by Mandane. Whereas Ctesias on the contrarie side affir- 40 meth, that Cyrsus was no way descended from Astrages (whom hee calleth Astigus or Apinia) but onely that having vanquished him in battaile, and confined him to Bactria, hee married his Daughter Amytis. But I finde the relations of Ctesias often cited and feldome followed, and himselfe sometimes very justly reproued of willfull vntruth.

Viginier adiligent and learned Historian of this age, produceth many probable reasons that Astyages had no such sonne as Cyanares, or Darius Medius; and to confirme his opinion, the more he citeth Diodore, Iustine, Strabo, Plato, Aristotle, 1/0crates, and before them Castor, Thallus, and Phlegon, who doe not finde any such Successour. Neither doe Tatianus, Theophilus, Antiochenus, Iulius Affricanus, Clemens 50 Alexandrinus, Iustine Martyr, Lactantius, Eusebius, S. Hierome, or S. Augustine, make report out of any faithfull Author by them read, that hath given other Son or Successour to Astrages than Cyrus.

Yet seeing that this manner of argument ab authoritate negative, doth neuer in-force consent; we may bee the bolder (all this great list of noble Writers by him alleaged notwithstanding) to affirme that either aftyages himselfe must have been Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the course of time; Or Darius of the Medes, which cannot agree with his place in the country of this, of collecting in the country of same whom Daniel calleth Darius. For it is manifest, and without dispute, that the Xen.L.8.Ped. King of the Medes commanded in chiefe, and was absolute Lord of that Conquelt, Cyrus during his life, being no other then the Lieutenant of his Armie, and subject to his authoritie; The strength of both Nations, to wit, the Medes and Persians, with other the Vassalls of Darius, being joyned together to com-10 pound it.

But it is very certaine that the honour of that great victorie ouer Babylon was wholly given to Cyria, who was the instrument preordained and forenamed by God himselte, not onely for his action, but for the deliuerie of his Church: a greater worke in the eies of God, than the subuersion of any State or Monarchie, how powerfull foeuer.

And it may well be thought, that the Souldiers imployed in that service did rather ascribe the glorie to him that was the best man of Warre, than to the Median, who was greatest in riches and power. All which also falling vpon Cyrus by fuccession, and continuing in his posteritie, did much augment the same of his ver-20 tue, which among prophane Historians ouergrew altogether the honour due to Cyaxares, both because he was old, and did nothing in person; as also because hee soone after quitted the world, and left all to Cyrus, who was possest of whatsoeuer belonged to Daries, before the fame of any fuch King or Conquerour was carried farre off.

And for the Greeke Historians, they tooke all things from the relations of the Persians, who gaue to Cyrus all the praise of a most excellent Prince, making none his equall. Only Daniel in the first, fift, and fixt Chapters of his prophecies, makes it plaine, that himselse not onely lived a great Officer vnder King Darius, but that hee continued in that estate to the first of Cyrus; which being the yeere of 30 Daniels death, could not have bene distinguished from the raigne of Darius, if they had begunne together and raigned iountly; Neither can it bee imagined that Darius held the Kingdome by Cyrus permission, considering that Cyrus beganne after him.

3. III.

XENOPHONS relation of the Warre with the Medes and Persians, made with ioynt forces opon the Asyrians, and others.

Hele Testimonies of the Scriptures, which neede no other confirmation, yet made more open to our understanding, by that which Xenophon hath written of these warres: The cause whereof, according to his report, was this.

When the Asyrian had enlarged his Empire with victories, and was become Lord of all Syria, and many other Countries, hee beganne to hope that if the Medes could be brought under his subjection, there should not then be left any Nation adioyning able to make head against him. For the King of the Medes was able to bring into the field threescore thousand foote, and about tenne thousand horse, to which the forces of Persia being joyned, made an exceeding

The Asyrian considering the strength of such a Neighbour, inuited Crasus King of Lydia, a Prince very mightie both in men and treasure, and with him other

Lords of Alia the leffe to his affiliance, alleaging that those Easterne Nations were very powerfull, and so firmely conjoyned by league and many alliances, that it would not bee easie, no not possible, for any one Nation to relist them. With these incitements strengthned with great presents, he drew to himself so many adherents as he compounded an Armie of two hundred thouland foot, and threescore thoufand horse, of which, ten thousand horse, and fortie thousand foote were led by Crass, who had great cause of enmitte with the Medes, in regard of the Warre made by them against his Father slyattes; But this great Armie was by Cyaxares King of the Medes, and by Cyrus generall of the Persian forces, vtterly broken; Vpon which defeat the Affrian King being also slaine, so many of the Affrians re- to uolted, as Babylon it self could not longer be affured without the succours of Mercinaries, waged with great summes of money out of Asia the lesse, Agypt, and elsewhere. Which new gathered forces were also scattered by Cyrus, who following his advantage, possess himselfe of a great part of the lesser Asia, at which time it was, as I take it that Cræ/us himselfe was also made prisoner.

The attempt of Babylon following soone after, the Armie lying before it being paid by Darius, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, and led by Cyrus his fifters sonne, prenailed against Balthasar, as in due time shall be set downe.

Those Persians which followed Cyrus, and by him leuied, are numbred thirtie thousand foot-men, of which a thousand were armed Gentlemen, the rest of the 20 common fort were Archers, or fuch as vsed the Dart and the Sling. So farre Xenophon. Of whom in this argument, as it is true, that he described in Cyrus the paterne of a most Heroicall Prince, with much Poeticall addition: So it cannot be denyed, but that the bulke and groffe of his Narration was founded vpon meere Historicall

Neither can it indeed bee affirmed of any the like Writer, that in every speech and circumstance he hath precisely tyed himself to the phrase of the speaker, or nature of the occasion, but borrowed in each out of his owne invention, appropriating the same to the times and persons of whom he treated. Putting therefore apart the Morall and Politique discourse, and examining but the Historic of things 30 done, it will casily appeare, that Xenophon bath handled his vnder-taken subject in fuch fort, that by beautifying the face thereof, hee hath not in any fort corrupted the bodie.

d. IIII.

The estate of the Medes and Persians in times fore-going this great Warre.

Or it is commonly agreed vpon, that Achamenes the sonne of Perses 40 being Gouernour of Perses, did associate himselfe with Arbaces, who commanded in Media in that rebellion against Sardanapalus, and that each of them after the victorie obtained, held for himselfe the Dominion of those Countries, which he had formerly ruled for the Asyrians; as also that they conveyed over the same honor and power to their posteritie; which in Media was not absolutely Regall, but with some restraint limited, vntill fuch time as Deioces tooke vpon him the full authoritie and maiestic of a King. From the death of Sardanapalus to the raigne of Deioces, are viually accounted about an hundred and forty yeeres, in the last sixtie whereof there raigned in Asyria mightie Princes, namely Salmanaffer and his Successiours, whose great atchiuements in Syria 50 and elsewhere witnesse, that the Medes and Persians found it not for their advantage to vnder-take any offensiue warre against those victorious Kings, it being also probable that the league continued as yet between these the successours of Belochus, and Arbaces, who had formerly shared the Empire.

Now from the beginning of Deioces to the first of Astrages, therepast about ninetie yeeres, in which if Herodotes have written truely, that Phraortes conquered Persia, and how he and other the Kings of Media by many victories greatly enlarged their dominions, and commanded many parts of Asia, it had beene but an vnaduifed enterprise of the Affyrians and Babylonians, to have wasted themselves against the Syrians and Egyptians, leaving so able and victorious a Nation on their backes. But that the Medes had done nothing vpon the South parts of Persia, and that the Persians themselves were not masters of Susiana in Nabuchodonosors time, it is manifest in Daniel, who was then Gouernour for the Babylonian in Susa or Susan. to the chiefe Citie thereof. It is true indeed, that the Medians, either under Cranares or Alliages, or both, had quarrell with Halyattes the father of Crass, which after some fixe yeeres dispute was compounded.

How the affaires of Persia stood in so many ages, I doe not find any memorie. It feemeth that the roughnesse of the mountainous Countrey which they then posfeft, with the confederacie which they continued with the Medes, gaue them more securitie than same: For if their Kings, being the posteritie of Achemenes, had done any memorable acts, the greatnesse which they afterward obtained would not have suffered any forgetfulnesse thereof. But as we find all Xenophons reports, both of these Warres and the state of those Countries to be very conso-20 nant and agreeable to the relation of many other good Authors, so it appeares, that the race of Achemenes held the Principalitie of Persia from father to sonne for many descents. And therefore we may better give credit to Xenophon, who affirmeth. That Cambyfes the father of Cyrus was King of Persia: than to those that make him a meane man, and say, that Aftinges gave him his daughter Mandane in marriage, to the end that her sonne (whose nativitie he feared) might be disabled from any great undertaking by his fathers ignobilitie.

For what cause of griefe could it be to Astiages, that the sonne of his daughter should become Lord of the best part of Asa? No , it was more likely, that voon fuch a Prophecie his loue to his grand-child should have encreased, and his care to beene the greater to have married her to some Prince of Arength and eminent

Yea, the same Herodotus, who is the first Author, and as I thinke the deniser of the mischiese intended against cyrus by his grandfather, doth confesse, That the line of the Achamenida was forenowned, that the great King Xerxes in the height of his prosperitie did thence deriue himselfe, and vaunt of it: which he would neuer haue done, had they beene ignoble, nor had they been the vassals of any other King or Monarch.

of CYRVS his name and first actions.

S touching the name of Cyrus, Strabo fayth, That the same was taken from a River which watereth Persia; this great Prince having Agradatus for his proper name. But the great Cyrus was not the first of that name. Herodotus otherwise; and that Cyrus signifieth Strab.1.13. a father in the Persian Tongue, and therefore so intituled by the people.

It is true that for his Justice and other excellent vertues he was indeed called a Father; but that the name of Cyrus had any such signification, I thinke it be mistaken.

Plutarch hath a third opinion, affirming, That Cyrus is as much to fay as the Plutin vit. Sunne, in the fame Language. How soeuer it be, yet the Prophet Esty, almost two Artan. hundred yeeres before Cyrus was borne, gives him that name, Thus faith the Lord unto CYRVS his Anuinted &c.

Before the Conquest of Babylon, the victories which Cyrus obtained were many and great: among which, the Conquest of Lydia, and other Provinces thereto subiect, together with the taking of Crafus himselfe, are not recounted by Eusebius, Orolius, and others, but placed among his latter atchinements, whose opinion for 30 this difference of time is founded vpontwo reasons; namely, That of the Median there is no mention in that last warre against Crassus: and that the obtaining of Sardis is referred to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad, and the glorious victory which Cyrus had ouer Babylon, to the five and fiftieth Olympiad.

The former of which might have beene vsed (and was by the Greekes) to exclude the Medes from the honour of having wonne Babylon it felfe, which in due place I have answered. The latter seemes to have reference to the second Warre which Cyrus made vpon Lydia, when it rebelled; at which time hee so established his former Conquest, as after that time these Nations never offered to revolt. Wherefore I like better in this particular to beleene with Heredotus, whome the 40 most of Chronologers follow, and finde the enterprise of Sardis to præcede that of Babylon.

Of CROESVS the King of Lydia, who made warre upon CYRVS.

Haue in the last Booke spoken somewhat of Crassus, of his race and predecessors, as also of those Kings which gouerned Lydia in more ancient times: of which the first (to prophane Authors knowne) was Lydus the sonne of Atys: Which familic extinguished, the King-dome was by an Oracle conferred vpon Argon, descended from Her-

And yet this Citie, now called Siras, was not the 30 old Per sepolis; for Alexander, at the request of Thais the Harlot, burnt it.

The first King of Persia to vs knowne, if wee follow the current of Authors interpreting the foureteenth chapter of Genesis, was Chedorlaomer, who lived with Amraphel or Ninias, and iouned with him in the warre against those Arabians, who was afterward ex-

Halyattes the father of Crafus was an undertaking Prince, and after hee had continued a warre against Craxares the Median, a Prince very powerfull, and maintained it fix vecres: a peace was concluded upon equal conditions betweene them.

Astrages, the sonne of Craxares, and grandfather to Cyrus, thought himselfe greatly honoured by obtayning Aryenis, Crafus fifter, whom he married.

But Crass lo farre enlarged his dominions after his fathers death, as he was nothing inferior in territorie to any King or Monarch of that age: Of which, about that time there were foure in effect of equall strength; to wit, the Median, the Babylonian, the Agyptian and the Lydian : onely Nabuchodonofor, after he had iowned Phanicia, Palestina, and Egypt to his Empire, had thence-forward no competitor during his owne life.

But Crass, notwithstanding the men and treasure spent in the quarrel of the Babylonians, he yet mastred £olis, Doris, and Ionia, Provinces possess by the Greekes in Asia the leffe, adjoyning to Lydia; gaue law to the Phrygians, Bithinians, Carians, Mysians, Paphlagonians, and other Nations. And that he also inforst the Ephesians to 20 acknowledge him, notwithstanding they compassed their Citie with Dianaes gir-Atheneus out of Berofus (which also Strabo confirmeth) makes report of a Signall victoric which Crass obtained against the Sacrans, a Nation of the Scythians, in memorie whereof the Babylonians his allies did veerely celebrate a Feast, which they called Sacaa: All which hee performed in

CROESUS his Expedition against CYRVS.

Ercupon Crassus being resolved to stop the course of Cyrus fortunes, 40 if he could, despised all the arguments vsed by Sandanes to the contrarie, who desired him to fore-thinke, That he vrged a Nation inhabiting a barren and mountainous Region, a people not couered with the foft filke of wormes, but with the hard skinnes of beafts;

not fed with fuch meat as they fancied, but content with what they found; drinkers of water, not of wine; and in a word, a Nation warlike, enduring, valiant and prosperous; ouer whom if he became victorious, he could thereby enrich himselfe in nothing but fame, in which he alreadie excelled: and if by them beaten, and subjected, so great would his losse appeare of all things which the world hath in account, as the same could neither hastily be told, nor readily conceined.

Notwithstanding this solide Counsaile, Crassus having prepared a powerfull armie, he led the same towards Media, but in his passage, he was arrested at Pterium, a Citie of great strength in Cappadocia; which while he sought by all meanes to surprise or to force, Cyrus came on, and found the Lydrans encamped before it. That each was inferior to other in strength or opinion, I doe not finde : for out of doubt, Crafus as he excelled any Prince of that age in riches and abilitie; so was hee not under any in territorie and fame that then lived.

But as Cratippus of Mitylene answered Pompey when he complained against the gods, because they fauoured a disturber and vsurper of the Commonweale against him who fought for the Romane libertic, That Kingdomes and Commonweales had their encrease and period from divine Ordinance: so at this time was the Winter of Crafus prosperitie at hand, the leaves of his flourishing fortune ready to fall. and that of Cyrus but in the flower and first spring. The God of all power, and not 10 Admetis Herdman, Apollo, had given date to the one, and a beginning of glory to the

When these two Armies were in view of each other, after the entertainement of diversakirmishes, the Persians and Lydians beganne to joyne in grosse troupes: supplies from both Kings thrust on vpon the falling off, and advauncement of either Nation: and as the Persians had somewhat the better of the day, so when the darke vaile of night had hidden each armie from the others view, Crafus doubting what successe the rising Sunne would bring with it, quitted the field to Cyrus, and with all speede possible retyred, and taking the next way into Lydia, recoursed Sardis his first Citic and Regall Seat, without any pursuite made by Cyrus to retard 20 him. Where being arrived, and nothing suspecting Cyrus approach, or any other warre for that Winter, he dismissed the souldiors, and sent the troupes of his sundry Nations to their owne Prouinces, appointing them to reassemble at the end of five moneths, acquainting his Commaunders with his intents for the renewing of the warre at the time appointed.

Yavs in the following morning finding the Lydians departed, put his armie in order to pursue them, yet not so hastily, and at their heeles, as to be discourred. But having good intelligence of Crassus his proceeding, hee so measured his Marches, as he presented not himselfe before Sardis, till such time as Crass had disposed his armie to their Wintring garrisons: when being altogether vnlooked for, and vnseared, he surrounded Sardis with his Armie: Wherein Crassiss having no other Companies than his Citizens and ordinary Gards, after fourteene dayes siege the same was entred by affault, and all executed that relifted. Crafus having now neither armes to fight, nor wings to flye, Sardis being on all parts strongly encompassed, Incommuni 40 thrust himselse into the heape and miserable multitude of his vassals, and had vn- suamquisque dergone the common fortune of common persons vanquished, had not a sonne of habet sortunant; his, who had beene dumbe all his life (by extremitic of passion and feare enabled) Memoriam mecried out to the fouldiors to spare Crasus. Who thereupon being taken and impri-tus perimit: 12. foned, despoyled of all things but the expectation of death, he was forthwith tied citamentum, in fetters, and fet on the top of a great and high heape of wood, to be confumed to ashes thereon. To which when the fire was set and kindled, remembring the dis- solme-7. coursewhich he had with the Athenian Law-giuer, he thrice cryed out on his name, Solon, Solon: and being demaunded what he meant by that innocation on he first vsed silence: but vrged againe, he told them, That he now found it true 50 which Solon had long fince told him, That many men in the race and courses of their lives might well be accounted fortunate, but no man could difeerne himselfe Homo qui in

Of which answere Cyrus being speedily informed, remembring the changes of tofo miscricors fortune and his owne mortalitie, he commaunded his ministers of Iustice to withdraw the fire with all diligence to faue Crafus, and to conduct him to his presence: Which done, Cyrus demaunded of him, Who it was that had perswaded him? Or what selfe reason had conducted him to inuade his territorie, and to make him of a friend an enemie? To whom he thus answered, It was thy prosperous and my vnprosperous destinie (the Gracian God flattering therewithall my ambition) that were the inverters and conductors of Crafus warre against Cyrus.

Cyrus being pierst with Crassus answere, and bewayling his estate, though victorious ouer it, did not onely spare his life, but entertained him cuer after as a King and his companion, shewing therein a true effect of mercy indeed, Que non causam sed forsunam hectas.

And herein is the reall difference discerned betweene that behauior which wee call Beneficium latronis, & gratiam Principis: A theefe sometime sparing the life of him which is in his power, but vniustly: A King that giveth breath, and a continuance of being to him that was the cause and author of his owne enill.

The report made by Xenophon is, That Cyrus did friendly entertaine Crassus at the first fight, not mentioning that which Herodotus deliuers, and is here already set downe, that hee should have beene burnt alive. It may well bee, that Xenophon pourtraying (in Cyrus) an heroicall Prince, thought an intent so cruell fitter to be forgotten than rehearled, as too much misbeleeming a generous nature. And it is very likely, that necreneffe of alliance might with hold Cyrus (had he beene other- 20 wise vitious) from so cruell a purpose against his grandmothers brother. Howsocuer it was, the Morall part of the Storie hath given credit and reputation to the report of Herodotus (as to many the like it often doth) and made it passe for current. though the trust reposed in Crasus afterwards may seeme to argue, that Cyrus did not vie him inhumanely at the first.

For as Herodotus himselfe telleth vs, when Cyrus past with his armie over Araxes into Seythia, he left Crafus to accompanie and aduise his sonne Cambyses, Gouernour of the Empire in his absence, with whom he lived all the time of cyrus, and did afterward follow Camby ses into Egypt, where he hardly escaped his tyrannous hand.

What his end was I doe not finde.

But in this time the races of three of the greatest Kings in that part of the world tooke end; to wit, of the Babylonians, Medians, and Lydians; in Balthafar, Cyaxares, and Crafus.

How CYRVS wonne Babylon.

Fter this Lydian warre enfined the great Conquest of Babylon, which 40 gaue vnto Cyrus an Empire so large and mighty, that he was instly reputed the greatest Monarch then lining vpon earth. How long time the preparations for this great action tooks vp, it is vnccrtaine; onely it seemes, that tenne whole yeeres did passe betweeene his taking those two Cities of Sardes & Babylon, which neverthelesse I doe not thinke to have beene wholly occupied in provision for the Affyrian warre, but rather to have beene spent in settling the Estate which hee had already purchased. And hereunto perhaps may be referred that which Ctestas hath in his fragments of a warre made by Crrus youn the Seythians, though related as foregoing the victory obtained against Crassus. He telleth vs, That Cyrus invaded Scythia, and being victorious over that 50 Nation, tooke Amorges their King prisoner : but being in a second battaile ouerthrowne by the wife of Amorges, Sparetha, and therein taken, the one King was delinered for the other.

Likewise it may be thought, that no small part of those troubles which arose in the lower Asia, grew soone after the departure of the victorious armie, before the Conquest was fully established.

For after Cyrus was returned out of Asia the lesse, many Nations, conquered formerly by Crafus, and now by Cyrus, revolted from him; against whom he imployed Pattias, and then Harpagus, who first reduced the Phocians under their former obedience: and then the rest of the Greekes inhabiting Asia the lesse, as the Ionians, Carians, Eolians, and Lycians, who resolvedly (according to the strength they had) defended themselves. But in the attempt voon Babylon it selfe it is not to be doubted, that Cyrus employed all his forces, having taken order before hand, that no-10 thing should be able to divert him, or to raise that siege, and make frustrate the worke voon which he did fet all his rest. And great reason there was, that he should bend all his care and frength vinto the taking of that Cities, which believe the fame and reputation that it held, as being head of an Empire thereon depending, was fo strongly fenced with a treble wall of great height, and surrounded with waters vn-poses and power of their besiegers. The onely hope of the Medes and Persians, who despaired of carrying by assault a Citic fo well fortified and manned, was in cutting off all supplies of victuals and o-20 ther necessaries; whereof though the Towne was said to be stored sufficiently for more than twentie yeeres, yet might it well be deemed, that in such a world of people as dwelt within those gates, one great want or other would sooner appeare, and vanquish the resolution of that vnwarlike multitude. In expecting the successe of this course, the beliegers were likely to endure much trauaile, and all in vaine, if they foordable, so plentifully victualled for many yeeres, that the inhabitants were not onely free from all doubt and feare of their chate, but despised and derided all pur-did not keepe straight watch and strong gards vpon all quarters.

This was hard to doe, in regard of the vast circuit of those wals which they were togird in, with numbers neither great enough, nor of men sufficiently assured vnto their Commaunder: The confideration whereof ministred unto the Babylonians matter of good pastime, when they saw the Lydians, Phrygians, Cappadocians, and o- Xenoph. Cros-30 thers, quartered about their Towne to keepe them in, who having beene their pedilib.72 auncient friends and allies, were more likely to joyne with them, if occasion were offered, than to vse much diligence on the behalfe of cyrus, who had, as it were, vesterday laid vpon their neckes the galling yoake of servitude. Whilest the besieged were pleasing themselves in this deceitful gladnesse, that is the ordinarie fore-runner of suddaine calamitie; Cyrus, whom the Ordinance of God made strong, constant, and inuentine, denifed by so many channels and trenches as were sufficient and capable of Euphrates, to draw the same from the wals of Babylon, thereby to make his approach the more facile and affured: which when by the labour of many hands hee had performed, hee flayed the time 40 of his aduantage for the execution : for hee had left certaine bankes or heads vncut, betweene the maine river which surrounded the Citie, and his owne

Now Balthafar, finding neither any want or weakenesse within, nor any possibilla tie of approach for his enemies without, prepared an exceeding sumptuous feast, publike Playes, and other Pastimes, and thereto inuited a thousand of his Princes or Nobilitie, besides his wines, curtizans, and others of that trade. This he did either to let the beliegers know, that his provisions were sufficient, not onely for all needfull vses, but euen for iolitic and excesse: Or because hee hoped that his enemies, under the burthen of many distresses were well neere broken, or in honour of 30 Bel his most reverenced Idoll: Or that it was his birth or coronation day: Or for many or all these respects. And he was not contented with such magnificence as no Prince else could equall, but (vsing Daniels words) he lifted himselfe up against the Lord of Heaven: For hee and his Princes, wives and concubines, made carowfing suppes of the Vessels of God, in contempt of whom he praised his owne puppets, made of filuer and Gold, of Braffe, of Iron, Wood, and Stone, Quanta fuit stultitia in vasibus aureis bibentes ligneos & lapideos Deos laudare; How great a foolishnesse was it (favth S. HIEROME) drinking in golden Cuppes, to praise Gods of Wood and Stone. While Balthafar was in this fort triumphing, and his braines well filled with vapors. he beheld a hand, which by divine power wrote on the wall opposite vnto him certaine words which he vnderstood not: wherewith so great a feare and amazement feized him, as the joynts of his loynes were loofed, and his knees smote one against the other. Which passion when he had in some part recoursed, heecryed out for his Caldeans. Astrologians, and Southsayers, promiting them great rewards, and the third place of honour in the Kingdome to him that could reade and expound the 10 writing; but it exceeded their art. In this disturbance and assonishment the Queene hearing what had past, and of the Kings amazement, after reuerence done vsed this Speech: There is a maninthy Kingdome, in whom is the spirit of the holy Gods, and in the dayes of thy father light, and under standing and wildome, like the wildome of the Gods, was found in him, whom the King NABVCHODONOSOR thy father, the King (I fay) thy father made chiefe of the Inchanters, Astrologians, Chaldeans, and Southsayers, because a more excellent Birst, and knowledge and understanding . &c. were found in him, even in DANIEL, erc. Nowlet DANIEL be called, and he will declare the interpretation.

Orie. & Theod.

Dan.5.0.18,

This Queene, Iolephus takes for the grandmother; Origen and Theodoret for the mother of Balthafar; either of which may be true: for it appeareth, that shee was 20 not any of the Kings wives, because absent from the feast; and being past the age of dauncing and banquetting, she came in vpon the bruit of the miracle, and to comfort the King in his distraction: and whereas Daniel was forgotten and neglected by others of younger yeeres and times, this old Queene remembred well what he had done in the dayes of Nabuchodonofor, grandfather to this Balthafar, and kept in mind both his religion and divine gifts.

When Daniel was brought to the Kings presence, who acknowledged those excellent graces wherwith God had enriched him, he prayed him, together with promises of reward and honour, to reade and interprete those words miraculously written; to whom Daniel made answere in a farre different style from that he vsed 30 towards his grandfather: for the cuill which he foretold Wabuchodonofor, he wished that the same might befall his enemies, but to this King (whose neglect of God and vice he hated) he answered in these words, Keepe thyrewards to thy selfe, and give thy gifts to another, yet will I reade the writing onto the King, and shew him the interpretation: Which before he had performed, he gave him first the cause of Gods just judgement against him, and the reason of this terrible sentence; whereof the King and all his Wisemen were vtterly ignorant: Which being written at large in Daniel, hath this effect, That forgetting Gods goodnesse to his father, whom all Nations feared and obeyed, and that for his pride and neglect of those benefits, as he deprined him of his estate and understanding ; so upon the acknowledgement of Gods infinite 40 power he restored him to both. This King not with standing lifted himselfe vp against the same God, and presumed both to abuse those vessels, dedicated to holy vses, and neglecting the Lord of all power, prayfed and worshipped the dead Idols of Gold, Siluer, Brasse, Iron, Stone, and Wood: and therefore those wordes, from the Oracle of a true God delivered, (to wit) Mene Tekel, V phraifin, gaue the King knowledge, that God had numbred the time of his Kingdome, and finished it: That he was weighed in the ballance of Gods justice, and found too light; and that his Empire was divided and given to the Medes and Persians.

The very evening or night of this day, wherein Balthafar feasted and perished, Cyrus either by his espiall, according to Xenophon, or inspired by God himselfe, 50 wose ensigne he followed in this warre, found the time and opportunitie to inuite him: and therefore while the Kings head, and the heads of his Nobilitie were no lesse filled with the vapours of wine, than their hearts were with the feare of Gods judgement, he caused all the bankes and heads of his trenches to be opened and cut down with that diligence, as by them he drew the great River of Euphrates drie for the present, by whose channell running, his armie made their entrance, finding none to disturbe them. All the Townelay buried (as the Poet faith) in sleepe and wine: fuch as came in the Persians way, were put to the sword, vnlesse they saucd themselves by flight, as some did, who ranne away crying, and filling the tireets with an vncertaine tumult.

Such Assirian Lords as had revolted from Balthazar, and betaken themselves to the partie of Cyrus, did now conduct a selected companie to the Kings Palace; which having eafily forced, they rushed into the chamber where the King with his Princes were banqueting, flew both him and them without any mercie, who ftrugled in vaine to keepe those lives which God had newly threatned to take away. And now was the prophecie of Ieremie fulfilled, & that of E/ay, two hundred veeres Ier.c. 27. before this subuerlion, who in his three & fortieth Chapter, and elsewhere, writerh Esa. 6.47. this destruction so feelingly and lively, as if he had beene present both at the terrible flaughter committed, and had seene the great and vnfeared change and calamitie of this great Empire; yea, and had also heard the sorrowes and bewailings of every surviving soule thereunto subject. His prophesic of this place he beginneth inthese words: Come downe, and sit in the dust, O virgine daughter of Babel: sit on the ground, there is no throne, &c. And againe, Sit still and get thee into darknesse, O daugh-20 ter of the Chaldaans, for thou shalt no more be called the Ladie of Kingdomes. For though it cannot be doubted, that God vled Nabacho dono for & the Chaldeans, to punish the idolatrie of the Iudeans, yet Efay teacheth vs in this place, That he did not vet forget, that the execution of his judgements was mixt with a rigorous extremitic. For (faith Efay) in the person of God, I was wroth with my people, I have polluted mine in- Cap. 47. heritance, and given them into thine hand: thou didft shew them no mercie, but thou didft lay thy very heavie yoke vpon the ancient. I will rife up against them, saith the Lord of Holts, 1/al. 14. and will cut off from Babel the name and the remnant, and the sonne and the nephew. And To wit, Enilin the thirteenth, Every one that is found, sall be firicken thorow: and who foeuer ioy - merodate and Balibafar. neth himselfe, shall fall by the sword, their children also shall be broken in pieces before their 30 eyes, their houses spoyled, and their wines ranished. So as there is no Historian who was either present at this victorie of Eyrus, or that received the report from others truely as it was, that could better leave the same to posteritie after it happened, than E-

The greatnesse and magnificence of Babylon, were it not by divers grave Authors fet downe, might feeme altogether fabulous : for besides the reports of Saint Heirome, Solinus, and Orofius, Ariftotle in the third of his Politikes, the fecond Chapter, received the report for true, That one part of the Citic knew not that the rest was taken three daies after. Which is not impossible, if the testimonie of 49 Diodarus Siculus may be taken; who findes the compaffe thereof at three hundred Diod.13. and threefcore Stadia or Furlongs, which makes fine and fortie miles: the walls whereof had so great a breadth, as fixe chariots might passe in front thereon. And ofheight, according to Ctesias and Clitracus, three hundred threescore and fine foot, garnished with an hundred and fiftie Towers. Strabo in the beginning of his fixteenth Booke of Geographic gives it a greater circuit, adding five and twentie furlongs more to the former compasse, reckoning the same at three hundred fourescore and fine furlongs, which makes eight and fortie myle and one furlong: but findes the wall farre under that which Diodor reports: and so doth Curtius measure their thicknesse but at two and thirtie foot, and their height at an hun-50 dred cubits; which is also very much: every cubite containing a foot and halfe of the large measure, though to the whole circuit of the Citic hee gives the same nesse of the wall he measures at fiftie cubits, and the height at two hundred of the fame regall cubit. For entrance it had an hundred gates of Braffe, with posts and hookes to hang them on of the same metall: and therefore did the Prophet Elay rightly intitle Babylon, The Princesse and glorie of Kingdomes.

But when Cyrus had wonne her, he stript her out of her princely Robes, and made her a slaue, dividing not onely all her goodly houses, and her whole Territorie, with all the riches therein contained, among his fouldiers : but bestowing the inhabitants themselues as bondslaues vpon those that had taken possession of their goods. Touching the raigne of Cyrus, and the time which he enioyed in rest and plea- 10 fure, I can fay no more of it, than that it is generally agreed by all Chronologers to have lasted onely scuen yeeres: in which time he made such Constitutions, as differ little from the Ordinances of all wife Kings that are defirous to establish a Roval power in themselues and their posteritie.

d. VI. The end of CYRVS.

He last warre, and the end of this great King Cyrus, is diversly written. Herodotus and Iustine deliver, That after the Conquest of Asia the lesse Cyrus invaded the Mallagetes. a very warlike Nation of the Septhians Cyrus inuaded the Massagetes, a very warlike Nation of the Scythians, gouerned by Tomyris their Queene : and that in an incounter betweene the Persians and these Northerne Nomades, Tomyris loft her Armie, and her Sonne Spargapifes, that commanded it: In reuenge whereof, this Queene making new leuies of men of warre, and following the warre against Cyrus, in a second battaile beat the Persian armie, and taking Cyrus prisoner, cut off his head from his body, and cast the same into a boule of bloud, vsing these wordes 3. Thou that hast all thy lifetime thirsted for blond, now drinke thy fill, and sati-30 ate thy felfe. It should hereby sceme, that Cyrus knowing the strength and multitude of those frozen Nations, was perswaded to abate their furie by some forcible invasion and depopulation, because in the time of Syaxares, father to Altyages, those Scythians inuaded Media and Asia the leffe, and held the same in a service subjection eight and

This warre which Metasthenes calleth Tomyrique, lasted (saith he) fixe veeres. and tooke end at the death of Cyrus.

But in this particular I beleeue with Viginer, that this Seythian warre was rather the same which Cyrus made against the Sacians, before the Conquest of Lydia, ac- 40 cording to Ctessas before cited, who calleth Tomyris, Sparetha, though he deliuer the successe of that warre otherwise then Herodetus doth: The rather (faith Viginer) because Strabo in his eleuenth booke reciteth, That Cyrus surprised the Sacians by the same stratageme by which Instine saith, he deseated the sonne of Tomyris. And the same Ctesias also reporteth, That the last warre which Cyrus made was against Amorrhaus, King of the Derbicians a Nation (as the rest) of Scythia; whom though he ouercame, yet he then received the wound of his death, which he suffered three dayes after.

Strabo also affirmeth, That he was buried in his owne Citie of Pasagardes, which himselfe had built, and where his Epitaph was to be read in his time; which is faid to have beene this: O vir quicunque es, or undecunque advenis, neque enim te adventurum ignoraui: Ego sum Cxxvs qui Perus imperium constitui, pusillum bocterra quo meum tegitur sorpus mihi ne inuideas; O thou man, who seeuer thou art, or whence seeuer thou commest; for I was not ignorant that thou shouldest come: I am CYRVS that founded the Persian Empire, doe not enuie unto me this little earth, with which my bodie is co-

This Tombe was opened by Alexander, as Qu. Curtius reporteth, either vpon Queut.l. hope of treasure, supposed to have beene buried with him, or vpon defire to honour his dead body with certaine ceremonies; in which there was found an olde rotten Target, two Scythian Bowes, and a Sword. The Coffin wherein his bodie lav, Alexander cansed to be couered with his owne garment, and a Crowne of gold to be set vponit. These things well considered, as they give credit to the reports of 10 Xenophon and Zonaras, fothey derogate much from Herodotus, who leaves his bodie Xen. ped. 8. in the hands of Tomyris.

And furely, had Cyrus loft the Armie of Persia in Scythia, it is not likely, that his sonne would so soone have transported all his remaining forces into Agypt, so far off from that quarter: the Scythian Nation then victorious, and bordering Media; neither had Cambyfes beene able in such haste to have undertaken and performed fo great a Conquest. Wherefore I rather beleeve Xenophon, faying, That Cyrus died aged and in peace: and that finding in himselfe, that hee could not long eniov the world, hee called vnto him his Nobilitie, with his two sonnes, Cambyses and Smerdis; or after Xenophon, Tanaoxares: and after a long Oration, wherein he 20 assured himselfe, and taught others, of the immortalitie of the Soule, and of the punishments and rewards following the good and ill deserving of every, man in this life; he exhorted his sonnes by the strongest arguments hee had, to a perpetuall concord and agreement. Many other things hee vttered, which make it probable, that hee received the knowledge of the true God from Daniel, when hee gouerned Sufa in Perfia; and that Cyrus himfelfe had read the prophecie of Esay, wherein hee was expressely named, and by God (for the deliuerie of his people) præordained. Which act of delivering the Iewes from their Captinitie, and of restoring the holy Temple and Citie of Hierusalem, was in true consideration the noblest worke that euer Cyrus performed. For in other actions he was an instrument 30 of Gods power, vsed for the chastifing of many Nations, and the establishing of a Gouernement in those parts of the world, which was not long to continue. But herein he had the grace to be an instrument of Gods goodnesse, and a willing aduancer of his Kingdome vpon earth; which must last for cuer, though heaven and earth shall perish.

Of CYRVS bis decree for building the Temple of God in Ierusalem.

Auing therefore spoken of his great victories, mentioned by fundry Historians, theglory of all which was as a reward of this his feruice done vnto him that was Author of them and of all goodnesse: I hold it meete at length to speake of the Decree made in the first of his Raigne, being perhaps the first that ever he made, after his posseffion of the Babylonian Empire: That the captive Iewes should return againe into their owne Territoric, and re-build the House of Go Din Ierusalem, having now endured and finished the threescore and tenne yeeres captinitie, by the Pro-50 Phets foretold. For the accomplishing whereof, hee gaue order to his Treasurers to furnish them with all things necessarie and wanting. Hee also restored vnto them fine thousand four ehundred threescore and nine Vessels of Gold and Silver. whereof Nabuchodonofor, the grandfather of Balthafar, had formerly robbed the Temple.

The number of the lewes which returned out of Chaldea under their leader Zorobabel, the some of Salathiel, and nephew to King Jecomas, and Jesus or Josua the fonne of lofadak, were about fiftie thousand; where, as soone as they arrived, they built an Altar to the lining God, and facrificed thereon, according to their owne Law, and afterward bethought themselves how to prepare materials for the rebuilding of the Temple.

But no fooner did the Tewes begin to lay any one stone, than the Samaritanes and other idolatrous Nations adioyning gaue all the impediment they could. And therefore it is true, that the Iewes themselues affirme as it written in the second of Iohn, That the Temple was fixe and fortie yeeres in fetting vp, having received so many hinderances from the first foundation to the second of Darius. And if wee seeke the naturall and politique causes which moved Cambyses to withstand his fathers decree, as well while he gouerned vnder him, as when himselfe became sole and soueraigne Monarch, we shall finde them in that Epistle remembred by Efdras, written by Belemus, Mithridates, and the rest, Presidents and Counsellors in Phanicia, wherein they complaine, that the Iewes were euermore rebellious & troublers of Kings; that their Citie being once built, they would then refuse to pay Tribute, and fall from the obcdience of the Empire, as they had formerly done in the times of other Kings.

But that which for that present seemed the most forcible impediment was, that Camby (es, having it in his resolution to invade Agypt, and that it was a commono. 30 pinion, That the lewes were descended of those Nations, because they issued thence vnder Moses, when they conquered Iudea; their Citie being once repaired and fortified, they might returne to their old vomit, and give the same disturbance to Cambyfes Conquest, which they did to Senacherib, Nabuchodonofor, and other Kings of Babylen. For as it is written in EZEKIEL, Agypt was the confidence of the house of ISRAEL.

But it is to be vnderstood, as Codoman and others have observed, that Artaxerxes, to whom the Counsellors & Gouernors of Phanicia complained against the Ienes, did not præcede, but succeed Darius Hystaspes, as in the sixt and seventh chapters of Esdras it is made plaine: and also that those Gouernors (whose Epistle sheweth as 40 much) did not withfland the building of the Temple, but the fortifying and inclofing of the Citie, as by the reasons given in the said Epistle, and by the Kings answer, it is euident.

Also in the fixt of Ezra, the foureteenth verse, the Kings are named in order as they gouerned, and Artaxerxes written after Darius ; as : And they built and finishedit (to wit, the Temple) by the appointment of the God of Ifrael, and by the commandement of CYRVS and DARIVS, and ARTAHSHASTE King of Persia. Lastly, in the seuenteenth of Ezrait is written; Now after these things, in the raigne of ARTAH-SHASTE King of Persia: which was as much to say as after the sinishing of the Temple in Darius time. And therefore Artaxerxes in the second of Esdras is there named by anticipation, not in his owne time and place.

And thus much concerning the rebuilding of the Citic and Temple of Hierufakm. Which action though prospered by the hand of God, was very flowly pursued by the men whom it most concerned, but first set on foot by Cyrus. The other ordinances of Cyrus, with his forme and manner of government, are to be found in Xenophon. At his death he bequeathed the Empire vnto his eldelt sonne Cambyles. appointing Smerdis or Tanaoxares his younger sonne to be Satrapa or Lieutenant of Media, Armenia, and Cadusia, and then died, after he had raigned (faith Herodotus) one and thirtie veeres, or (according to Justine) but thirtie.

of Cyrvs his issue: and whether A Toss A were his daughter, or (as some thinke) were the same with Queene HESTER.

CHAP.3. S.8.

YR vs had iffue two fonnes, Camby fes and Smerdis, with three daughters, Atolla, Meroe, and Artystona: Ctesias addeth to these, Amytis. Atoffa and Meroe their brother Cambyles married; Artyftona, Darius Hy/taspes obtained; so did he Atossa, Cambyses being dead: who (as some Writers have supposed) inflamed both her husbands Darius,&

Xerxes after him, to inuade Greece, to be auenged of the whole Nation for the cruell 20 intent that Aman (whom the old translation calleth a Macadonian) had against the lewes though the opinion of Iolephus be more probable, who findes Amen to be an Amalekite. But it is hard to bee vnderstood, how Atoffa, the daughter of Cyrus, should have beene Esther; whose Historic seemes rather to appertaine to the time of Artaxerxes Longimanus, than of Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, or of Xerxes. The desire of Atossa to have Greece brought under the yoke of Persia, was partly grounded vpon the honour which thereby shee thought her husband might obtaine. partly vpon a feminine humor of getting many braue Dames, Corinthians, Athenians, and others of that Nation to be her bond-women. Wherefore I cannot give affent to the opinion of Codoman, who vpon the neere found of the two names, 30 Atossa and Hadassa (by the latter of which Esther was also called) makes them to have beene one person. For though it be true, that Esther concerning her parentage a while, might be taken for a great Ladie; yet Codomans inference is nothing probable, that she should therefore, and for the great affection which the King bare vnto her, be thought the daughter of Cyrus. Certaine it is, that Efther did at length discouer her Kindred and Nation; whereby if Hystories could not be kept free from this error, yet the people, and especially the Nobilitie, must needs have vnderstood the truth: who neverthelesse did so well know the parentage of Atolla, that for her lake, as being daughter of Cyrus, her sonne Xerxes was preferred to the Kingdome before his elder brother, against whom also he could haue pretended a very weake clayme.

But of these things more hereafter in fitter place.

the successors of Cyrus, and the continuance of the Persian Empire, there are many opinions; As that of Metasthenes, who hath numbred the Persian Kings and their times, as followeth.

To which Philo agreeth; which number of yeeres added, make in all an hundred ninetie and one. But in this Catalogue Metasthenes hath left out Camby les and Xerxes, and names Artaxerxes Assures for the immediate successor of Cyrus; in place (faith Melanethon) of Darius the sonne of Hyftaspes: for Metasthenes, as Melanethon coniectureth, doth not account Cambyfes in the Catalogue, because his 30 raigne was confounded with that of Cyrus:

There is a second opinion, though ridiculous, of Seder Olam, who finds but source

Persian Kings from the beginning to the end of that Empire.

Genebrard, Schubert, and Beroaldus hauc also a differing account from the Greekes; whom neuerthelesse Eusebius and most of the Latines follow, and so doth Krentzheim, who hath fully answered, and as I take it, refuted all the former Authors va-Chron. Krentz. rying from that account: For in this fort doe the Greekes marshall the Persian Kings with the times of their raignes.

This account (as I have faid) the most Chronologers and the best learned approuc. These Persian Princes being all warranted by the authoritie of the Scriptures, as Peucer in his historicall Animaduersions hath gathered the places; finding first Cyrus in the second of Chronicles, chap. 36. verf. 22, 23. Ezra 1. chap. 1. verf. 1. and often elfewhere.

Secondly Camby les in the 1 1th of Daniel, who may indeed be well esteemed for one of those three Kings in the second verse named, and so the marginall Commentor vpon the Geneua vnderstands that place; but, vnder correction, mistakes the matter greatly, when he faith in the same note, that Darius Hystaspes was an enemic to the people of God, and flood against them; his great fauour and liberalitie to the Iewes being elsewhere proued.

Thirdly, is Darius Hystaspes found in Ezrathe first, c. 4. v. 5 who in the sixt verse is 10 also named Abassuerus.

CHAP.4.S.I.

Fourthly, in the eleuenth of Daniel verse the second, Xerxes is plainely foretold and described, and the great warre which hee should make against the Greekes by Daniel remembred.

Fiftly, Artaxerxes Longimanus in Ezrathe fourth, verse seuen, who is also called Arthafasta,c.4. I.lib. Ezra v. 7. and cap. 7. v. 7.

Sixtly, Darius Nothus, Ezra cap. 4. vers. 24. and sap. 5. vers. 6. Nehem. cap. 12.

Seventhly, Artaxerxes Minemon in Nehele 2.v.1. who was father to Artaxerxes Ochus, and Arfames: for Darius the last he was of another Familie, the Line of Crrus 20 the Great ending in Ochus, who descended from Xerxes the sonne of Atossa, Cyrus his Daughter; and the iffue male of Cyrus failing with his owne Sonnes.

But to proceede. Eusebius with the Latines, following the Greekes, apply the beginnings and ends of curry Persian King with their Acts, to some certaine Olympiad; As the war of Astrages (Cyrus his maternall Grand-father) and Alyattes (Crassus his father) to the nine and fortieth Olympiad; The beginning of Cyrus raigne to the beginning of the fine and fiftieth Olympiad; The taking of Sardis by Cyrus to the eight and fiftieth Olympiad; The invalion of Egypt by Camby ses to the third veere of the threescore and third Olympiad, and so of the rest. Which reference with good agreement betweene feuerall formes of computation adde the more 30 credit vrito both.

Againe, this historicall demonstration is confirmed by the Astronomicall com. Ptol. in Alm. putation of Ptolomie, who refers the death of Alexander the Great, who died the 12. lib.3.cap. 8: of Nouember, in the beginning of the hundred and fortieth Olympiad, to the foure hundred and foure & twentieth yeere after Nabonassar. And the Era of Nabonassar beganne on the fixe and twentieth of Februarie: which conferred with the Olympiad, was in the ninth Moneth of the first yeers of the eighth Olympiad; So that whether we follow the accompt of the Olympiads, as doc the Greeke Historians, or that of Nationassar with Ptolomie, we shall finde every memorable accident to fall out right with each computation. 40 For Ptolomie reckons the time answerable to two hundred and foure and twentie Iulian yeeres, and an hundred and fortie daies from Nabonassar, to the fixteenth of Iulie in the fenenth veere of Cambyfes.

The Greekes, and namely Diodorus Siculus, place the taking of Agypt by Cambyfes in the second or third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, and the beginning of Cambyfes feuenth yeere in the first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad: which first of the threescore and fourth Olympiad runnes along with part of the two and twentieth of Nabonassar. The like agreement is consequently found about the beginning and end of Cyrus.

Likewise the twentieth of Darius, who succeeded Cambyses, is according to Ptolo-50 mie the two hundred and fixe and fortieth of Nabonassar, which (observing the differences of Nabonassars Ara and the Olympiad, viz. eight and twentie yeeres) it agrees with the third of the threescore and ninth Olympiad, wherein it is placed by the Greekes. In this Iosephus agrees with the Greekes throughout, saving that he iova neth Darius Medus, whom Xenophon calleth Cyaxares, with Cyrus, in the destruction

Lastly, the disagreements and confused accompts of those that follow the other Catalogue of the Persian Kings formerly rehearled, doth give the greater credit to this of the Greekes, which being constant in it selfe, accordethalso with the computation of other Historians, and Astronomers, and likewise with the holy Scriptures.

ð. II.

Of CAMBYSES, and the conquering of Ægypt by him.

E will therefore according to the truth give the Empire of Persia to Cambyles, the sonne of Cyrus, though degenerate in all things, saving the desire to increase the greatnesse of his Empire: whereof hee was possest in his Fathers time while Cyrus made warre in the North. Ctefias with others give him a longer raigne than agreeth with the Gracian accompt before receiued.

In the fifth yeere of his sole raigne, and in the third yeere of the threescore and third Olympiad, according to Diodor and Eusebius, he invaded Egypt, and having overthrowne the King thereof, Plammenitus, he not only caused him to bee slaine, Her. 13, pag. 83. but also did put to death all his kindred and dependants, with the most of his children.

Herodotus and Ctesias give for cause of this Warre (being no other indeede than the Ambition of Camby (es) that when he sent to Amasis King of Egypt, to have his daughter in marriage, Amasis presented him with Nitetis the daughter of Apries his predecessour, which Cambyses disdained.

Howfoeuerit were; true it is, that Cambyfes gathered an Armie fit for fuch an enterprise, and caused the same to march. But before they entred Ægypt, Amasis 30 died and left Psammenitus, whom Ctesius called Amyrteus, his successiour; who inioyed Egypt after his father (according to the best copies of Herodotus) but sixe Moneths, though other Chronologers give him fixe yeeres.

But how long socuer he held the Crowne, in one battaile heefost it, and was

It is faid that Camby ses following therein the example of Cyrus, did not only spare life to the conquered King, but that hee also trusted him with the gouernement of Ægypt, and that vpon some revolt, or the suspition thereof, hee caused him to bee flaughtered. But the race of this King was not so extirpated, if wee may beleeue Herodotus and Thucydides, but that he left a Sonne called Inarus, who caused the Agyptian to reuolt both from Xerxes and Artaxerxes.

That Pfammenitus was at the first entreated gently by Cambyfes, I hold it very improbable, if it be true which is also written of him, That he so much hated Amafis the King of Ægypt, who died before his arrivall, that hee caused his body to be drawne out of the graue, and after divers indignities vsed, commanded the same to bee burnt, contrarie to the custome both of the Egyptians and Persians. For the Agyptians y sed to powder their dead bodies with falt, and other drugges, to the * Neither did end the wormes might not deuoure them. ## The rest of CAMBYSES his acts.

Fter this victorie obtained in Egypt, Camby ses sent an Armicinto Cyprus, and constrained Eucliben King therot to acknowledge him, who before held that Iland of the Egyptians.

While Cambyses yet busied himselfe in Agypt, he so much detested the Idolatry of that Nation, as he caused the Images themselves, with 10 the Temples wherein they were worshipped, to bectorne downcand defaced. That done, he directed a part of his Armie into Lybia, to ouer-turne the Temple of Impiter Ammon; but the Deuill in defence of his Oratorie raised such a tempelt of Strab. & Infi. Sand, wherewith the greatest part of that Countrey is couered, as the Persians were L.s. there-with choked and ouer-whelmed.

Notwithstanding which misaduenture, Herodotus and Senceareport, that disday-Herder, Sendas ning to be resisted, he prepared the rest of his Armie, which himselfe meant to conduct into those parts, but that finding a beginning of those incommodities, which his first-sent troupe had tried, hee changed his purpose. For though conquering Kings have power over men, yet the Elements doe not obey them, according to 20 that old English prouerbe, Goe, faith the King. Stay, Saith the Tide. After his returne from the attempt of Æthiepia, hee caused Apis the Ægyptian Bull, worshipped by that Nation as God, to be slaine: a deed very commendable, had it proceeded from true zeale, and beene executed as in feruice of him that only is, and liueth. But soone afterwards, when in a dreame it seemed vnto him that Smerdis did sit in the royall Throne of Persia (which apparition was verified in Smerdis the Magus) heegaue it in charge to his fauourite Praxaspes, to murther Smerdis his brother. And having married his owne fifters, contrarie to the Persian Lawes, hee committed a most causelesse and most detestable murder vpon the one of them, called Meroe, then by himselfe with child, because shee bewailed the death

30 ofher brother Smerdis. I find it written of this Camby fes, That because his Predeces- Her. pag. 89.50 fors observed religiously the ordinances of their Empire, he assembled his Judges and enquired of them, whether there were any law among the Persians that did permit the brother to marry his owne fister : it being his owne intent so to doe. The Iudges (who had alwaies either lawes or distinctions in store to satisfic Kings and times) made answere, that there was not any thing written allowing any such coniunction, but they notwithstanding found it in their customes, that it was alwaiesleft to the will of the Persian Kings to doe what best pleased themselves; and fo, as Nauclerus termes it, inuenerunt occasionem: That is as much to fay, as the Judges found a shift to please the King, and to secure themselves. And yet, where it con-40 cerned not the Kings private latisfaction, he caused Sifamnus one of his Judges, and perchanceone of those which fauoured his incestuous match, to be flayed a-line for an vniust indgement ginen, and the same his hide to bee hung vpouer the indgement feate. After which bestowing the fathers Office on his sonne, hee willed him to remember, that the same partialitie descrued the same punishment. Among other his cruelties, that which he exercised against the senne of his beloued Praxaspes was very strange and vngratefull. For when he desired to bee truely informed by him what the Persians thought of his conditions, Praxaspes answered, That his vertues were followed with abundant praise from all men; only it was by many observed, that he tooke more than vsuall delight in the taste of Wine. With 50 which taxation inflamed, heevied this replication: And are the Perfians doubletongued, who also tell me that I have in all things excelled my Father Cyrus? thou Praxaspes shalt then witnesse, whether in this report they have done mee right : for if at the first shot I piercethy sonnes heart with an arrow, then is it salse that hath beene spoken; but if I missethe marke, I am then pleased that the same be accounted true, and my subjects beleeved. This being spoken, hee directed an arrow towards the innocentchild, who falling dead with the ftroke, Camby fes commanded his body to be opened, and his heart being broched on the arrow, this monstrous T yrant greatly rejoycing, shewed it to the Father with this faying, in stead of an Epitaph. Now PRAXASPES, thou maiest resolue thy selfe that I have not lost my wits with Wine. but the Persians theirs, who make such report.

Many other barbarous cruelties hee exercised, till at the last, according to the phrase of our Law, he became felon de soy. For when he was informed that Patizites. and Smerdis the Magi, (Cearenus writeth them Sphendanes and Cimerdius) Ministers of his domeRicall affaires, taking advantage of the great refemblance betweene 10 Smerdis the Kings brother, and Smerdis the Magus, possess themselves of the Empire he made all haste towards Persia, and in mounting hastily on horsebacke, his fword dif-sheathing pierced his owne thigh, where-with deadly wounded, falling into an ouer-late and remedilesse repentance of the slaughter which hee had executed voon his owne brother, he soone after gaue vp his wicked ghost, when hee had raigned eight yeeres, accounting therein those seven Moneths in which the Magi gouerned, while he was absent.

In Camby fes the Male line of Cyrus failed. For he had no iffue either by Atoffa or Zonaras Com.3. Meroe: yet Zonaras out of Hierome gives him a Daughter called Pantaptes, and a fonne called Orontes, who being drowned in the River Ophites by Antioch, the same 20 was afterward in memorie of the Princes death called Orontes.

He built the Citie of Babylon in Agypt, in the place where Latopolis was formerly feated, and that of Meroe in the Iland of Nilus, calling it by the name of his fifter

Y & v s and his two sonnes beeing now dead, and the Kingdome in the possession of one of the Magi, the counterfait of Smerdis, the Princes, or Satrapes, or Provinciall Governours of the Empire (to wit, Otanes, Intaphernes, Gobrias, Megabylus, Alphatines, Hidarnes, and Darius, who were all descended from Achamenes the first Persian

King, having discovered the fraud of this imposture, joyned their forcestogether. furprised and rooted out the Conspirator with his Companions, and assistants. In which action (faith Infline) Intaphernes and Asphalines were flaine; but Herodotus Otherwise, that they were only wounded, for he answeth, that all the seuen Princes 40 were present at the election following.

For the Empire being now without a Gouernour, these Princes grew into confultation how the same might be ordered from thence-forth. Otanes one of the seuen did not fancie any election of Kings, but that the Nobilitie and Cities should confederate, and by iust lawes defend their liberty in equality, giving divers reasons for his opinion, being as it seemed greatly terrified by the cruelties of Cambyles; As first, that it was not safe to give all power to any one, seeing greatnesse it selfe, euen in good men, doth often insect the minde with many vices, and the libertie and freedome in all things is most apt to infult, & to commit all manner of wicked outrage. Againe, that tyrants do commonly vie the feruices of wicked men, and fauour 50 them most; they vsurpe vpon the lawes of their Countrey; take other mens wives by force, and deftroy whom they please without judgement.

Megabysus was of another opinion, affirming that the tyrannie of a multitude was thrice more intolerable, than that of one. For the multitude doe all things without judgement runne into bulinesse and affaires with precipitation, like raging and ouer bearing flouds.

He therefore thought it fafeft to make election of a few, and those of the best wiselt, and most vertuous; because it is euer found, that excellent Counsailes are euer had from excellent men.

Darius gaue the third judgement, who perswaded the creation of a King, because even among few diuturnitie of concord is seldome found, and in great Empires it doth euer happen that the discord of many Rulers hath inforst the election of one Supreme. It were therefore, faith Darius, farre fafer to observe the Lawes of our 10 Countrie, by which Kingly gouernement hath beene ordained.

The other foure Princes adhered to Darius, and agreed to continue the same Imperiall gouernement by God established, and made prosperous. And to avoide partialitie, it was accorded, that the morning following these seven Princes should mount on Horse-back, and on him the Kingdome should be conferred, whose horse after the Sunne-rifing should first ney or bray. In the euening after this appoint- Her. 1.3.9.100. ment was made, it is faid that Darius confulted with the Master of his horse Oebarus. who in the Suburbs of the Citie when the election was refolued of caused the same Horse, whereon in the morning Darius was mounted, to couer a Mare, who as soone as he came into the same place was the first borse that brayed. Whereupon the o-20 ther fixe Princes descended from their horses, and acknowledged Darius for their Lord and King.

Plato in the third of his Lawes affirmeth, that in memorie of the scuen Princes. whereof Darius himselfe was one, that delivered the Empire from the vsurpation of the Mage, hee divided the whole into feuen gouernements; Herodotus faith into twentic Satrapies.

Of DARIVS his Linage.

ARIVS was descended of the ancient Persian Kings, to wit, of the Achamenida, of which, Cyrus the Great was the lineall Successiour. For in this fort Herodotus deriues him as before.

Cyrus the first, who had Tei/pius, who begat Ariaramnes, who was father of Arfammes, the father of Hystaspes, the father of Darius, furnamed Celes, the father of Xerxes,

Hystaspes accompanied Cyrus the Great in the warres against the Scythians, at which time Cyrus being made jelous of Darius by a dreame of his owne, caused him to be sent into Persia, others say to be imprisoned, from whence by the death of Cyrus he was deliuered, and made Gouernor of the Persian Magi. He afterward followed Cambyfes into Egypt; he then joyned with the rest of the Princes against the Magi, and either by the neying of his horse, or, as others affirme, by strong hand * 300 Pag. 237. he obtained the Empire, which he the more affured to himselfe by taking two of Cyrus Daughters, and as many of his Necces for his wives. .

Hystaspes, according to * Herodotus, had besides Darius thesethree sonnes, who were great Commanders in the warre which Darius made in Afia the leffe, Thrace, Macedon, and Greece; Atarnes, Artaphernes; and Artabanus, who diffwaded Kernes from the second Gracian warre. Hystaspes had also a Daughter married to Gobryss the Father of Mardonius, who commanded the Armie of Darius in Macedon, and married the Daughter of Darius, Artozostre his Cosen germaine.

Reineccius giues to Hystaspes fine sonnes, Darius who succeeded Cambyses, Artabaniss, Artaphernes, Otanes, and Atarnes, with two daughters.

Of DARIVS his Government, and suppressing the rebellion of Babylon.

A R 1 vs deuised equal lawes whereby all his subjects might be gouerned, the same being formerly promised by Cyrus. He gaire accessed to all his subjects; and behaved himselfe so mildly to all men, that many Nations desired and offered themselves to become his Vassalls. Only hee laied divers payments and taxes on the people, which had not beene accustomed in Cyrus time, to the value of source thousand five hundred and threescore talents, saith Herodotus,

The warre which Cambyses made a farre off in Agypt, and the contention betweene the Magi, and the Princes of Persia, for the Empire, gaue heart to the Babylonians to recouer their libertie, and to shake off the Persian yoke, wher of Darius be- 30 ing aduertised, he prepared an Armie to recourt that Citie and State revolted. But finding the same a difficult worke, he vsed the service of Zopirus, who for the love he bare Darius, did cut off his owne Eares and Nose, and with other wounds yet fresh bleeding, he seemed to flie to the Babylonians for succour, to whom he accused the cruelty of Darius: who, for having given him advice to give over the fiege of their Citie, had in this fort dismembred and deformed him; whereupon the Babylonians gaue him that credit, as they trusted him with the disposition & commandement of their greatest forces: which when Zopirus had obtained, after some small colourable ouer throwes given to the Persians vpon fallies, hee delivered the Citie into Darius his hands, who had lyen before it twentie Moneths.

φ. III. Of DARIVS his fauour to the Iewes in building the Temple.

N the second yeere of Darius, he gave order that the building of the Temple at Hierusalem should goe on, and commanded that the same , should be finished at his own charge, and out of the reuennues of the Crowne. And whereas the Gouernors of those Provinces which are 50 fituate betweene Euphrates, and the Phanician, and mid-land Sea,

(whom Ezracalleth the Captaines beyond the River) had hindred the worke in Cambyfes his time, Darius gaue commandement that they should not thence-forth come neere vnto Ierusalem, to give any impediment to the building, but that they should with-draw themselves, and get them farre off till all were finished and at an end. In the old Latine it is written, Procul recedite ab ilis; With-draw your felues farre from them; In our English, Be yee farre from thence, to wit, from the Citie and Temple, now in building.

Hee also made a decree, which concerned his owne Subjects, That who so ever Ex.6.11. should thenceforth hinder the setting vp of the Temple of God, that his house should be torne downe, and the disturber hanged on a Gallowes made of the Timber thereof. He also in the same decree maketh inuocation to God, That hath caused his name to dwellthere, (to) destroy all Kings and People that put their hands to alter, and 10 to deftroy this house of God which is in Ierusalem, or. In four yeeres after which decree (the lewes being really furnished with money and all things necessarie from Darius) the Temple was in all finished, to wit, in the beginning of the Spring, in the sixth yeere of Dariso Hyflaspes, and in the two and fortieth after their first returne.

Fter the recourrie of Bibylon he inuaded the Seythians, whose King Her.l.4. Instine calleth Lauthinus; and saith, that Darius vnder-tooke this warre against him, because he refused him his Daughter in marriage. The better to conuoy his Armie into Scythia, hee built a Bridge of small Vessels ouer the River Ister or Danubius, and gave the custodie of the fame in charge (among others of Asia the lesse) to the Ionians, and Eolians, among whom was Miltiades, who perswaded the Asian Gracians to breake downe the bridge, to the end Dartus might not returne thereby, and if by any other way, then not without great difficultie; but the same was resisted by Histiam Prince of Milet. a Citie of Ionia, which Nation being a Colonie of the Greekes, Diodorus calleth Traitors to their Countrie, because they joyned themselves to Darius. But the Soythians piedditto

30 more elegantly termed them good flaues, for as much as they would not runne away from their Master, but were more mindfull of doing their duties, than of shaking off their bondage, when they were prefented with as faire an occasion of libertie as could have been defired. For the great Armie of Darius entring the defart Countrie called Bestarabia, found in it neither people to result them, nor any sustenance to relieue them. For the Scythians were then, as are the Chrim Tartars, their posteritie, at this day, all horse-men, vsing the Bow and Sword. They were not Plough-men, but Grafiers, driving their Heards from one place to another as onportunitie of pasture led them. Standing Townes they had none, but vsed for Houses the Waggons wherein they carried their wives and children. These Wag-40 gons they place at enery Station in very good order, making Streets and Lanes in the manner of a great Towne, remoueable at their pleasure. Neither hath the Emperour himselfe, called now the great Chrim, any other Citie than such an Agora, (as they name it) or Towne of Carts. When as therefore Darius had wearied himselfe, and wasted his provision in those desolate Regions, wherein he found neither waies to direct him, victualls to refresh him, nor any houses, fruitfull trees, or living creatures, nor any thing at all, which either hee himfelfe might make vie of, or by destroying it might gricue his enemies; he beganne to perceive his owne folly, and the danger into which he had brought him. Yet fetting a good face vpon a badde game, he fent braue messages to the Scythian, bidding him to cease his slight, and ei-50 ther to make triall of his valour and fortune in plaine battaile, Or if he acknowledged himselfe the weaker, then to yeeld by faire meanes, and become his Subject, giuing him Earth and Water, which the Persians vsed to demand as a signe, that all was yeelded vnto them. To this challenge the Soythian returned an Hieroglyphicall answere; sending a Bird, a Frog, a Mouse, and fine Arrowes: which dumbe shew Ecee Darine

Darius interpreting by his owne wish, thought that heedid yeeld all the Elements wherein those creatures line, and his weapons with all into his hands. But Gobress. one of the seuen Princes, who had slaine the Magi, construed their meaning a-right. which was thus; O yee Persians, get yee wings like Birds, or dine under the water, or creepe into holes in the earth, for else yee shall not escape our arrowes. And this interpretation was soone verified by the Seythians themselves, who affailed the Persian camp. draue the horse-men into the trenches, and vexing the Armie with continual Alarums day and night, were so fearelesse of this great Monarch, and so little regarded him, that within his hearing, and euen in his fight, they did not forbeare the passime of coursing a Hare, which they had started by chance. By this boldnesse of 10 theirs, Darius was fo discouraged, that he for sook his Camp by night, making many fires, and leaving all that were ficke and weake behinde him, and so with all speede marched away towal is the River Ister. He was pursued hardly by the Scythians who milt him, yet arriving at the Bridge before him, perswaded the Ionians to depart, affuring them that the Persian King should neuer more be able to doe them either good or harme. Which words had certainely beene proued true, had not Hylliaus the Milesian prevailed with his people, to attend the comming of Darius, whom the Seythians did likewise faile to meete, when they returned from Ister to fecke him out.

Warre ).

ARIV shauing thus escaped out of Scythia, determined the invasion of Thrace and Macedon, in which Warre hee imployed Megabasin, who mastered the Paonians, and transplanted them, & possest Perinthus, Chalcedon, Bizantium, and other places, being also soone after subiceted, and added to the Persian Empire by Otanes, the sonne of 30

Sysamnes, whom Camby ses had excoriated for false judgement. So were the Cities of "A maritimate * Selybria and a Cardia likewise taken in for the Persian, who having now reduced vader his obeysance the best part of Thrace, did send his Embassadours to Amintas King of Macedon adioyning, demanding of him by the Earth & Water, the Soueraignetie ouer that Kingdome. Amintas doubting his owne strength, entertained the Embassadours with gentle wordes, and afterward inniting them to a solemne and magnificent feast, the Persians greatly desired that the Macedonian Ladies might bee present: which being granted, the Embassadours who were well filled with wine, and prefumed vpon their greatnesse, and many victories, beganne to vse such imbracings, and other lascinious behaviour towards those Noble Ladies, as Alexan-40 der the Kings Sonne, great Grand-father to Alexander the Great, discaining the Persians barbarous presumption, besought his father to with draw himselfe from the affembly, continuing notwithstanding all honourable respect towards the Embaffadours, whom withall hee entreated that the Ladies might refresh themselves for a while; promifing their speedy returne. This being obtained, Alexander caufed the like number of well-fauoured yong-men to clothe themselves in the same garments, & to vie the same attires which the Ladies had worne at the feast, giving them in charge, That when the Persians offered to abuse them, they should forthwith transpierce them with their long kniues, of which they were prouided for that purpose, which was accordingly performed. Charge was soone after given by Da-50 rius for a seuere reuenge of this murder. But Alexander, somewhat before the death of Amintas, gaue his fifter Gygea in marriage to Bubaris, a principal! Commander of Darius forces on that side, who perswading her husband how helpfull the Alliance of Macedon would proue for the invalion of Attica intended, so prevailed, as Alexanwarre of Asia the leffe, called Ionick, falling out at the same time.

The first occasion of the warre which DARIVS made upon Greece, with archearfall of the government in Athens, whence the the quarrell grew.

Ow the better to understand the reason and motives of that great Warre, which followed soone after, betweene the Persians and Gracians, it is necessarie to make a short repetition of the state of Athens, which Citic indured the hardest and worst brint of Darius inuasion on that side the Sea with admirable successe. Weither doe I hold it any importinencie, to be large in vnfolding every circumstance of so great a busineffe as gaue fire to those warres, which never could be throughly quenched, untill in the ruine of this great Persian Monarchie, Persepolis the capitall Citie of the Empire, was at the request of an Athenian Harlot consumed with a flame, as dreadfull as in the pride of their greatnesse, the Persians had raised in Athens.

Now therefore as out of the former bookes it may be gathered, how Athens, and other parts of Greece, were anciently gouerned, the same being alreadic set downe, though scatteringly, and in seucrall times, among other the Contemporarie occurrents of the Easterne Emperors, and the Kings of Indea; so I thought it very pertinent in this place to remember agains the two last changes in the State of Athens. As for the Lacedemonians, they maintained still their ancient policie under Kings, though these also after some fifteene descents bridled by the Ephori.

Codrus King of the Athenians in the former bookes remembred, who willingly died for the safetie of his people, was therefore so honored by them, as (thinking none worthy to succeed him) they changed their former government from Mo-30 narchical to Princes for terme of life, of which Medon the fonne of Codrus was the first, after whom they were called Medontide; and of these there were twelve Geveerely change.

Solon, and others, who are the leffe to bee regarded, by reason of the

This Solon being a man of excellent wisdome, gaue lawes to the Athenians, which were published according to Gellius, in the three and thirtieth veere of Tarquinius Priseus, and were in after-ages derined vnto the Romanes, and by the Decemviri (Magistrates in Rome created for that purpose) reduced into twelue Tables, 20 which were the ground of the Romane lawes. But these goodly ordinances of Solon, were in his owne daies violated, and for a while almost quite extinguished. For whereas they were framed vnto the practice and maintenance of a popular gouernement; the estate of Athens was very soone changed into a Monarchie by Pisistratus the son of Hippocrates: who finding the Citizens distracted into two factions, whereof Megacles and Lycurgus two Citizens of noble Families were become the heads, tookeoccasion by their contention and infolencie to raise a third faction more powerfull than theother two, and more plaufible, for that he feemed a Protector of the Citizens in generall. Hauing by this meanes obtained loue and credit, he wounded himselse, and faining that by malice of his enemies he had like to haue 20 beene flaine for his love to the good Citizens, he procured a guard for his defence, and with that band of men surprising the State-house, or Cittadell of Athens, hee made himselse Lord of the Towne; Hegesistratus being then Gouernour. But the Citizens, who in every change of government had fought to remove themselves further and further from the forme of a Monarchic, could so ill brooke this vsurpation of Pilistratus, that he was drinen for lack of helpe to flie the Towne, as soone as Megacles and Lyeurgus ioyning their forces attempted his expulsion. Yet as the building of his tyranny founded upon the diffension of the Citizens, was ruined by their good agreement; so was it soone after well reedified by the new breaking out of the old factions. For when Megaeles found the power of Lycurgus to grow 40 greater than his owne, he did (as is the vsuall practice of the weaker side) call in the common enemic Pisisfratue, to whom he gaue his Daughter in marriage; by which 'alliance the Familie of the Alemsonida, whereof Megaeles was chiefe, became very powerfull, yet so that Pissifratus by their power was made Master both of them and all the rest. But this agreement held not long; the Alemaonida, and especially Megaeles being incensed against Pisssfratus for his misdemeanour towards his Wife. Wherefore they practifed with the Souldiers of the Towne, proceeding in their treason so secretly, and so farre, that Pissfratus vpon the first discoueric of their intent, perceiued no other remedie for his affaires, than to with-draw himselfe to Eretria, where he remained eleuen yeeres. Which time being expired, hauing hired 50 Souldiers out of many parts of Greece, hee againe recourred the principalitie of Athens: after which third obtaining his estate, hee gouerned Athens seuenteene Heracia Apud Elian page 262. But Thucidides affirmeth, that Thucidides. 12. heedied very old, leaving for his Successiours his two Sonnes Hippias and Hipparchus, who gouerned the Athenians with fuch moderation, as they rather feemed the Lineall successors of a naturall Prince than of a Tyrant. But in the end, and fome three yeeres before Hippias was expelled out of Athens, his brother Hipparthus was murdered by Harmodius and Ariftogiton. The cause why, and the manner how performed, Thucidides hath written at large. And though Hipparchus were charged with vnnaturall lust after Harmodius, yet Plato in his Dialogue, intituled 10 Hipparchus, doth greatly magnifie him, affirming that hee was a Prince of as many eminent vertues as that Age had any, altogether condemning the murderers and authors of that scandall. Hippias scaring that this enterprise vpon his brother had more and deeper rootes than were apparent, first sought to discover the further intents of Harmodius and Arillogiton, by a Harlot of their scalled Lemnia: who because shee would not reuease her Companions, did cut out her owne tongue. Then did Hippias, the better to strengthen himselfe, enter into a frait amitie with Lantides, Tyrant of the Citie Lampfacus, whom he knew to bee Lampfacus a cigreatly fauoured by Darius, to whose some Hypotlushee gaue one of his Daugh-on the Helle-

But some three yeeres after the death of his brother, doubting spont. 20 I know not what strong practice against himselfe, hee beganne to viethe Citizens Thucid. 6.c.t. with great severitie, which neither Pissftratus the Father, nor Hippias himselfe had euer exercised during their vsurpations till this time. And therefore the Athenians fearing lest that this disease might rather increase, than diminish in Hippias, they stirred vp Clistines one of the noblest and best able of their Citie, to practise their deliuerie : who calling to his affistance the banished Alemanida, together with an Armie of the Lacedamonians, ledde by Cleomenes their King, fo affrighted Hippias, as by composition he gaue ouer his estate, and the possession of Athens, and from thence imbarking himselfe tooke land at * Sigeum, whence hee went to Lampfacus * sigeum a proin Mysta gouerned by Eartides, who presented him to Darius. Of the Ionian Rebellion, which was the principall cause of the warres ensuing betweene Greece and

Nother, and a fittong motine to this expedition, was the lonick warres breaking out in Asia about the same time. The Colonies transported out of Greece into Asia, which occupied the greatest part of the Scaout of Greece into Alea, which occupied the greatest part of the Sca-coast, having enjoyed their libertic about 500, yeares, even from the linich migration, to the time of Coasta was by this feet. the Ionick, migration, to the time of Crafus, were by this Lydian King made Tributaries, and afterwards as parcell of his Dominions, were taken in by

But as it is the custome of Nations halfe conquered (witnesse Ireland) to rebell againe vpon energy advantage and opportunitie: so did the Ionians, and other Gracians, both in Cyrus his life, and after him, seeke by all meanes possible to free themselves.

At this time they found such men readic to spurre them into Rebellion, as had by the Persian been given vnto them for bridles to hold them in subjection. Euery one of those Towneshad a Lord to ruleit, whom they (abhorring the gouernment of one man) called their Tyrants. These Lords were very true to the Persian, by whose onely might they held the people in subjection. And this their dutifull af- 10 fection they had well declared, when, Darins being in great extremitie, they vsed all meanes to deliuer him and his Armie (that otherwise had beene loft) out of the Scythians hand. Of this great piece of service Histraus the tyrant of Miletus expected the chiefe thankes, as having beene chiefe Author of their expecting Darius. when the rest, either perswaded by the Scythians, or carried away with their owne desires, were readic to have abandoned him. But it came so to passe, that Darius being more fearefull of the harme that Histiaus (being powerfull and craftie) might doe to him in the future, than mindfull of the good which he had alreadic received at his hand, found meanes to carry him a-long to Sufa, where hee detained him with all kind vlage of a friend, yet kept such good espiall vpon him, as an enemie, 20 he could not startaway. Histiaus had subtiltie enough to discouer the Kings purpole; which ill agreed with his owne desires. For he thought it more pleasant, and more honourable to rule as Prince in one faire Citic, having a smal Territorie, than to fit and feast at the great Kings table, and heare the counsailes by which a large Empire was menaged; being himtelfe an idle beholder, and enjoying with much restraint of libertie, none other pleasures than a private man might bestow vpon

Wherefore he bethought himselse of raising of some tumults in the lower Asia, to pacific which is he might be sent, as one that had great experience and authoritie in those quarters, it would afterwards be in his power to stay at home, and either satisfie the King with excuses, or deale as occasion shall require. Resolving upon this course, he sent very secret instructions to Aristagoras his kinsman, whom he had left his Deputic at Miletus, aduising him to stirre up some Rebellion. These directions came seasonably to Aristagoras, who having failed in an enterprise upon the solvent stay of the seasonably to Aristagoras, who having failed in an enterprise upon the state of the season of the seas fled the Kings treasures to no good purpose.

Therefore he readily embraced the counfaile and the better to draw the whole Countrie of Ionia into the same course which he determined to runne, hee abandoned his tyrannic, and did set Miletus at libertic. This plausible beginning wanne 40 vnto him the hearts of the Milesians: and his proceeding with other Ionian Tyrants (of whom some he tooke and sold as slaues to their citizens, others he chased away) caused the whole Nation to becat his command. The Persian fleet, whereof hee lately had beene Admirallin the enterprise of Naxos, hee had surprised in his first breaking out, together with the principall Officers, and Captaines, fo that now hee thought himselfe able to deale with the great Kings forces, lying thereabout, either by Land or Sea. But likely it was that the power of all Asia would shortly be vpon his neck, and crush both him and his affistants to pieces, vnlesse that he were able to raife an Armie that might hold the field, which the lonians alone were insufficient to performe. Therefore he tooke a journey to Sparta, where having affayed in vaine 50 with many arguments, and the offer of fiftile talents, to win to his partie Cleomenes King of the Lacedemonians: hee went from thence to Athens, and with better fuccesse besought the people to led him their assistance. The Athenian Embassadors which had been fent to the Persian Kings Lieutenants in the lower Afia, desiring them not to giue countenance to Hippias, now a banished man, and lately their Tyrant, were a while before this returned with ill answeres, having found very churlish entertainement. So that the euill which they were to expect in all likely hood from the Persian, made them willing to begin with him. To which purpose, their consanguinitie with the Ionians, and the perswasions of Arishagoras, drew them on apace, if perhaps his treasure were not helping. Twentie shippes the Athenians surnished for this voyage; to which the Eratrians added sue more, in regard of ancient kindnesse that had passed between the Ionians and them. With these and their owne forces joyned, the Ionians entred the River Caistrus, which falleth into the Sea by Ephelus; by which advantage they surprised Sardis when no enemic was heard of or suspected; infomuch, as Artaphernes, who ruled as Vice-roy in those parts, had no other hope of sastie, than by retreating himself into the Castle; which the Gracians could not force: from whence he beheld the slaughter of the Citizens, and the Citie slaming.

The Persiansat length, mixt with the Burgers, began to encourage them to defence, and recovered the Market place, firengthened by the River Pactolus, which ran through it, and borrowing courage from desperation, they both defended themselves, and charged their enemies; who well advising themselves, made all the baste they could toward the Scasside. But Artaphernes having gathered all the strength he could, pursued the Gracians, and sound them neere Ephelus; where setting resolvedly vpon them, he slaughtered a great part of their Armie; the rest saving themselves in Ephelus. In this sight Evaluates, Captaine of the Erstrians, perished: but his same and memorie was by that excellent Poet Simonies preserved. After this overthrow, the Athenians, which were sent to Aristagorus and to the tomans, could by no arguments of theirs, no not by their teares, be perswaded to make any second triall of their fortunes, on that side the Sea.

Yet the burning of Sardis made a greater noyse in the world, than the good successe which the Perstans had in one or two skirmishes, could rayse. Wherefore the Ionians brauely proceeding, woon a great part of Caria; and sending their Fleet into 30 the Hellespont, got Bizantium and other Townes into their hands. Yea, the Cyprians, lately subdued by Cambyses, beganne hereupon to take heart and entring into consederacie with the Ionians, who were able to give them aide by sea, rebelled against the Perstans.

These newes comming to the care of Darius, filled him with great indignation, and with an extreme hatted of the Athenians, voon whome hee vowed to take sharpe reuenge. As for the Jonans, his contempt of them, and their knowledge of his power, made him to thinke, that they would not have dared to attempt such things, but by the instigation of those, to whom their ignorance of his great might had affoorded the courage to prouoke him. This was the maine ground of the Warre commenced by Darius, and pursued by Xerxes against Athens: To which, the solicitation of Hippias, before remembred, gave onely some forme and affishance: the businesse, when once it was thus farre on foot, being like ynough to have proceeded, though he had perished cre it were advanced any further.

Some other occurrents in this Ionian commotion extended the quarrell of Darius against many of the Ilanders, if not against the whole Nation of the Greekes; for all of them gaue to his Rebels free harbour; the Ilanders moreouer did helpe to furnish our a Nauie of three hundred and fixtie saile against him. These prouocations did rather breede in him a desire to abate their pride, than any feare of harmethat they were like to doe him. For what they had done at Sardis, was but by surprise. In enery fight they were beaten by the Persians, who had not yet lost the fruits of their discipline, wherein Cyrus had trained them, nor all their ancient Captaines. In one sea-fight by the Isle of Cyprus, the Ionians indeed had the vaper hand; but they were Phanicians, Egyptians, and Cilicians, whom they vanquished in neither was that victoric of any vie to them; the Cyprians, in whose aid they came, being veterly beaten by the Persian Armie at Land, and reduced into their old subjection. So had the Persians likewise by open warre and faire force ouerthrowne the Carians in two battailes, and reclaimed that Nation; as also they had recovered the Townes vpon Hellespont, with some Lolian & Ionian Cities : when Aristagoras with his friends quitting Miletus, fled into Thrace, desirous to seat himselfe in Amphipolis, a Colonic of the Athenians. But the Edonians, on whose Territorie belike he landed, ouerthrew him, and cut his troupes in pieces.

About the same time, Histiau the first mouer of this insurrection came downe into those quarters; who having vndertaken the performance of great matters to Darius, was glad to flye from his Lieutenants, by whome his double dealing was 10 detected.

But this cuasion preserved him not long. For after many vaine attempts that he made, hee was taken in fight by the Persians, and hastily beheaded, lest the King should pardon him vpon remembrance of old good turnes; as it seemes that hee would have done, by the buriall which he commanded to be given to his dead body that was crucified, and by his heavie taking of his death.

Histraus had sought to put himselfe into Miletus; but the Citizens doubting his condition, chose rather to keepe him out, and make shift for themselves, without his helpe. The strength of their Citie by land, which had in old time with stood the Lydian Kings, and their good Fleet which promised vnto them the libertie of 20 an open sea, emboldened them to trie the vttermost, when very sew friends were lest voon that Continent to take their part. But their Nauie was broken as much by threatnings as by force; many of their companions and fellow-rebels for saking them vpon hope of pardon; and many being daunted with the causelesse flight of those that should have affisted them. Neither was it long before the Towne it selfe being affaulted both by Land and Sca, was taken by force, the Citizens slaine, their wives and children made flaues, and their goods a bootie to the Persians, whome for fixe yeeres space they had put to so much trouble."

δ. VIII.

The Warre which DARIVS made upon Greece, with the battaile of MARATHON, and DARIV shis death.

His warre with good successe finished by the Persians, and some attempts made on Europe side with variable successe; Darius obstinate in the enterprise and conquest of Greece (though at first he pretended to make the warre but against the Athenians and Eritrasns, who jointly affifted the Ionians against him, and burnt Sardis in Lydis) did now by 40 his embassadours demaund an acknowledgement from them all: among whome, fome of them not so well resolued as the rest, submitted themselues; as the Æginets and others. Against these, the Athenians being inflamed (by the assistance of the Lacedemonians) after divers encounters for ft them to give pledges, and to relinquish Ido notknow: the partie of the Persians. Cleomenes led the Lacedamonians in this warre, and caused but those bor- his companion King Demantus to be deposed: who thereupon fied to Darius, farre the more confident of victorie, by reason of these discords, alienations, and civill warres among the Greekes. He therefore gaue order to Hippagaras to prepare a Fleet of shippes fit to transport his Armie ouer the Hellesport: the same consisting of an hundred thousand foot, and tenne thousand horse. The charge in chiefe of his Armie he committed to Datio, accompanied and affisted by Hippias, the sonne of Pisson fratus, expelled out of Athens twentie yeres before, and by Artaphernes his brother, Gouernour of Sardis, and the Sea-coaft of Afia the leffe. These Commaunders hation degea. Luie 32-13.000 uing their Companies brought downe to the Sea-fide, imbarked themselues in fixe

There is called Æginihundred Gallies and other Veffels; and first of all attempted the Islands called Cyclades, which lay in the mid-way betweene Asia the lesse, and Greece. For (obtaining those places) the Persians had then nothing to hinder the transportation of their forces over the Agean Sea; but on the contrarie they might alwayes both relieve themselues in their passage, and shrowd themselues from all suddaine tempests and

To this end they first possess themselves of Samos, secondly, they attempted Naxos: Which Island, the inhabitants despairing of their owne forces, abandoned. So did the people of Delos, of which Apollo was native: Which Island Daring did not onely forbeare to facke, but recalling the inhabitants, he gave order to beautifie the places and Altars of Sacrifice, to Apollo erected. And having recovered these and other Islands, the Persians directed their course for Eretria in Eubara: for that Citie in Herod. (as already hath beene shewed) had affisted the Ionians at the taking and firing of Sardis. In this Island the Persians tooke ground, and besieged Eretria very straitly, and after fixe dayes affault, partly by force, and in part by the treason of Euphabus and Philagius; they tooke it, fackt it, and burnt it to the ground. Thus farre the winds of prosperous fortune filled their sayles. From Eubwa the Persians past their Armie into Attica, conducted and guided by Hippias, late Prince of Athens, and marching towards it, they encamped at Marathon, in the way from the Sea, where

CHAP.5. S.8.

The Athenians finding the time arrived, wherein they were to dispute with their owne vertue against Fortune, and to cast lots for their libertie, for their wives, their children, and their lines, put themselves in the best order they could to make resiflance, and withall fent away with speed to the Lasedamonians for succour, imploying in that Negotiation one Phidippides; who paffing through Areadia, encountred in the way a familiar Diuell, which he supposed to be Pan, who willed him to affure the Athenians of victorie, promising that some one of the Gods should be present at the battaile to affift them and defend them against the multitude of their enemies. Phidippides at his returne feeing he could not bring with him any present succours 20 from Sparta, yet he thought it greatly auailing to bring newes from the Gods, and promise of affistance from Heaven, which no doubt (though the device was likely to be his owne) yet it greatly encouraged the multitude and common people, who in all ages have beene more stirred vp with fond Prophecies and other like superstitious fooleries, than by any just cause or solid reason. The Athenians being now left to themselves, with one thousand onely of the Plateans (who having beene formerly defended by the Athenians against the Thebans, did in this extremitie witnesse their thankefulnesse and gratefull disposition) began to dispute, Whether it were most for their advantage to defend the wals of Athens, or to put themselves into the field with such forces as they had, the same consisting of tenne thousand Athenians, 40 and one thousand of the Plateans. In the end, and after great diversitie of opinions, Miltiades, who perswaded the trial by battaile prenailed. The Armies being now in view, and within a myle of each other, the Athenians disposed themselues into three troupes: two wings or hornes, as they tearme them, and the body of a battaile. The Persians, when they perceived so small a Troope advancing towards them, thought the Athenians rather disposses to their understanding, than possess with the resolution whereof they made hew. So invincible and resistlesse the Persians esteemed their owne numbers to be, and that small troupe of their enemies then in view, rather to be despised than to be fought withall: But in conclusion, the victory being doubtfully ballanced for a while, fometime the vertue of the Gracians, and 50 sometimes the number of the Persians prevailing, the Gracians fighting for all that they had, the Persians for that they needed not, the legreat forces of Darius were disordered and put in rout; the Athenians following their victorie even to the Scashore; where the Persians, so many of them as lost not their wits with their courage,

The Perlian Armie confifted of an hundred thousand foot and tenne thousand horse; of which there were slaine in the place fixe thousand three hundred, and of the Grecians an hundred fourescore and twelve. For howsoever it came to passe, either by strange visions, which were afterward called Panici terrores, or by some other affright, it seemeth, that the inuading Armie, after the first encounter, fought with their backes towards their enemie, and lost that number, by Herodotus set downe . in their disorderly retreat, or rather in their flat running away. As for 14flines report. That two hundred thousand of the Persian Armie were slaine, the fame hath no apparance nor possibilitie of truth. In this fight Hippias the perswader of the enterprise was flaine, fayth Iustine and Cicero, but Suidas tels vs, That he esca- 10 ped and died most miserably in Lemnos.

The greatest honour of this victory was cast vpon Miltiades, who both perswaded the triall by battaile, and behaued himselfe therein answerably to the counsell which he gaue. Themistocles had his first reputation in this fight, being but young and of the first beard. Those of the Gracians, of marke and commandement, that fell in the first encounter, were Callimachus and Stesileus. It is also said, That Cynegrus following the Persians to their embarking, layd hands on one of their Gallies, to have held it from putting off the shore, and having his right hand cut off, he vet offered to arrest it with his left; of which being also deprined, he tooke hold of it with his teeth. This encounter happened in the first yeere of the threescore and 20 twelfth Olympiad, about the time of the Warre made by Coriolanus against his fellow-Romanes: Alexander the sonne of Amintas being then King of Macedon. and Phanippus then Gouernour of Athens, according to Plutarch; or Hybilides, af-

This great fray thus parted, and the Persians returned backe into the leffer Asia, Wiltiades lought and obtained an imployment against the Ilanders of Pares. one of the cyclades, and passing over his Companies in threescore and tenne Gallies, after fixe and twentie dayes affault he brake his thigh, in feeking to enter it by the Temple of Ceres, wherewith himselfe being made vnable, and his companies discouraged, he returned to Athens; where those vngratefull Citizens forget- 30 ting all his services past, and that of all other the most renowned at the battaile of Marathon, did by the perswasion of Xantippus, the father of Pericles (who enuied his fame) cast him into prison, and set on him a fine of fiftie Talents; where his weake and wounded body being notable to endure the one, nor his effate to pay the other, he after a few dayes ended his life.

Which enuie of the better fort to each other, with their private Factions, affifted by the vnthankfull and witleffe people, brought them, not many vecres after, from a victorious and famous Nation, to base subjection and slauerie. Miltiades left behind him one fonne called Cymon, begotten on Hegisipila, daughter of Olorus King of Thrace, who (faith Plutarch) was neither inferior to his father in valour, nor to 40 Themsflocles in vnderstanding, but exceeded them both in justice and good go-

Now Darius taking greater care how to recouer his honour, than forrow for the losse received in Greece, gave order for new levies of men, and all other warlike prouisions. But the Agyptians revolting from his obedience (a Kingdome of great strength and revenue) greatly distracted his resolution for the reinvasion of Greece. The diffensionalso among his sonnes; of whom, the yonger being borne after he was King, and by so great a mother as Atosa, disdained to give place to his elder brother, borne before Darius obtained the Empire, greatly vexed him. And lastly, death, who hath no respect of any mans affaires, gaue end to all his consultations 50 and enterprises, and joyned him to the earth of his auncestors, about a veere after the battaile of Marathon, and after that he had raigned fixe and thirty yeres. He left behind him fine sonnes, namely Artabasanes, born before heobtained the kingdome, Kernes who succeeded him, Achemenes gouernor of Ægypt, Massles and Anabignes.

CHAP. 6. S.I.

ERXES received from his father, as hereditaric, a double Warre; one to be made against the Agyptians, which he finished so speedily, that there is nothing remaining in writing how the same was performed: the other against the Gracians; of which it is hard to judge, whether the preparations were more terrible, or the successe ridiculous. In the confultation for the profecution of this Warre, which was chiefely bent against the Athenians, the Princes of Persia were divided in opinion. Mardonius, who had formerly commaunded in Thrace and Macedon, under Darius, and had also Hylaspes for his grandfather, as Xerxes had, and married Xerxes his fifter Artozoftres, perswaded by many arguments the European warre. But Artabanus, brother to the late Darius, and vncle to Xerxes, maintained the contrarie counfell, laying before Xerxes the lamentable and ridiculous successe of the two late invalions, which Darius had made contrarie to his counsell: The one in person voon the Sevthians, the other by his Lieutenants voon the Greekes; in each of which Darius left to his enemies both his Armie and his honour.

Hetherefore besought Xerxes to be right well aduised before he did too farre imbarke himfelfe in this bufineffe. For whatfoeuer vndertaking hath deliberate and found counfell for conductor, though the fuccesse doe not alwayes answere the probabilitie, yet hath Fortune nothing else thereof to vaunt, than the variablenesse of her owne nature, which only the divine Providence, and not any humane power, can constraine.

But so obstinate was the resolution of Xernes in prosecution of his former intent. that Artabanus, whether terrified by Visions (as it is written of him) or fearing the Kings hatred, which hee made knowne to all those that opposed his desire to this Warre (changing opinion & counsell) affisted the Gracian Expedition with all the 40 power he had.

After the Warre of £grpt was ended, fourc yeeres were confumed in describing and gathering an Armie for this inualion : which being compounded of all Nations subject to the Persian Empire, consisted of seventeene hundred thousand foot, Her. in: and eightie thousand horsemen, besides Chariots, Camels, and other Beasts for Carriage, if we may beleeve Herodotius: for of this multitude, Trogus findes the numberleffe by scuen hundred thousand footmen.

The Commaunders of the scucrall Nations were the Princes of the bloud of Persia, either by marriage in the Kings house, or otherwise: for to these were all commaundements of this nature given, some few people excepted, who had of 50 their owne leaders.

The charge of the whole Armie was bestowed on Mardonius, the sonne of Gobryas by a fifter of Darius, to whom were joyned some others of Xerxes his neerest kindred, as Generals ouer all; fauing that the charge of tenne thouland select Persandicalled the immortall Regiment (because if any one of the whole number died or were flaine, there was another presently chosen in his stead) was given to Hydarnes; the eighty thousand horsemen were led by the sonnes of Datis, who commaunded the late Armie of Darius in Greece.

The Fleet of Gallies were two thousand two hundred and eight, furnished by the Phanicians, who had Commaunders of their owne Nation, and by the Cypriotes. Cilicians, Pamphilians, Lycians, Dorians, Carians, Ionians, Eolians, and Hellespontines; who were trufted with the furnishing of their owne Vessels, though commaunded by the Princes of Persia, as by Ariabignes the sonne of Darius, and others. The rest of the Vessels for transportation were three thousand. There were also certaine Gallies furnished by Artemisia, the daughter of Lygdames, Princesse of Halycarnassus, 10 and the Islands adioyning, which her selfe commaunded. Those Gallies by her prepared and furnished, exceeded all the rest of the Fleet, excepting those of Zidon, in which Xerxes himselfe was imbarked.

XERXES Armie entertained by PYTHIVS: His cutting off Mount Athos from the Continent : his bridge of Boates over the Hellespont : and the discourse betweene him and ARTABANVSUR. on the view of his Armie.

Hen this world of an Armie was throughly furnished, he caused all the Nations of which it was compounded, to make their Rendez-vous and repaire at Sardis in Lydia. And when hee had affembled to the number of seventeene hundred thousand foot, as he entred the body of Celenas, he was by one Pythius the Lydian entertained, who out of his Flocks and Heards of Cattell gaue food to Xerxes and his whole Armie. The Feast ended, hee also presented him with two thousand Talents of silver, and in Gold foure Millions, wanting seuen thousand of the Persian Darici, which make so many of our markes.

The King ouercome with the exceeding liberalitie of Pythus, did not only refuse his treasure offered, but commaunded that seuen thousand Dariei should be gipen him to make up his foure Millions; of which, so many thousands were wanting when he made the present. But soone after, when Pyrbius besought him to spare one of his five sonnes from his attendance into Greece (because himselfe was old, and had none whom he could so well trust as his owne sonne) Xerxes most barbaroufly caused the young man, for whom his father sought exemption, to be sundered into two parts, commaunding, that the one halfe of his carkaffe should be layed on the right, and the other halfe on the left hand of the common way by which the Armie marched.

Two things he commanded to be done before he came to the Sea side. The one was a passage for Gallies to be cut behind Mount Athos, making the same (which the halfe Island or Headland, whereon it stood) to be an entire Island, sundring thereby from the Continent of Thrace five Cities, besides the Mountaine and the Chersonesus or Necke of Land it selfe a worke of more offentation than of vse, and yet an enterprise of no great wonder, the Valley which held it to the Continent having but twelve furlongs (which make about a mile and halfe) to cut through, and the ditch being broad enough onely for two Gallies to passe in front. The Cities so seuered from the maine, were Dion, Olophyxus, Acrothoon, Thy (us, and Cleona.

He also gave order, that a Bridge vpon Boats should be made over the Hellesont 50 betweene Abidus and Seflos, the Sea there having am yle of breadth, wanting an eight part; which after the finishing, was by a Tempest torne as under and diffeuered: wherewith Xerxes being more enraged than discouraged, commaunded those to be flaine that were masters of the worke, and caused fixe hundred threescore and fourteene Gallies to be coupled together, thereon to frame a new Bridge; which by the art and industry of the Phanicians was so well anchored to resist both windes blowing into and from the Euxine Sea, as the same being well boorded and rayled. the whole Armie of seventeene hundred thousand foot, and fourescore thousand Horse, with all the Moyles and Carriages, past ouer it into Europe in seuen daies and feuen nights, without intermission. This transportation of Armies did Celar afterward vie. And Caligula that mad Emperour, in imitation of Xernes his Bridge, did build the like.

The Bridge finished, and the Armie brought nevre to the Sea side, Xerxes tooke 10 a view of all his Troupes, affembled in the Plaines of Abidus, being carried vp. and feated on a place ouer-topping the Land round about it, and the Sea adioyning: and after he had gloried in his owne happinesse, to behold and commaund so many Nations, and so powerfull an Armic and Fleet, he suddenly (notwithstanding) burst out into teares, moued with this contemplation, That in one hundred yeeres there should not any one survive of that maruellous multitude; the cause of which sudden change of pathon when he vttered to Artabanus his vncle, Artabanus spake to the King to this effect. That which is more lamentable than the diffolition of this great Troupe within that number of yeeres by the King remembred, is, That the life it felfe which we enjoy is yet more miferable than the end thereof: for in 20 those few daies given vs in the world, there is no man among all these, nor elsewhere, that ever found himselfe so accompanied with happinesse, but that he oftentimes pleafed himfelfe better with the defire and hope of death, than of living: the incident calamities, diseases, and forrowes whereto mankind is subject, being so many and ineuitable, that the shortest life doth oftentimes appeare vnto vs ouerlong; to avoide all which, there is neither refuge nor rest but in desired death

With this melancholy discourse, Xerxes being not much pleased, prayed Artabanus not to ouer-cast those ioyes which they had now in pursuit with sad remembrances. And holding stil a doubtful conceit, that Artabanus vtterly condemned the 20 invasion of Greece, against which he had formerly given many strong reasons, desired him to deale freely with him, Whether he were returned to his first resolution, that the enterprise of Greece could not be prosperous? Or whether, according to the change of mind put into him by his late Vision, he was confident of good succeffe? Artabanus, notwithstanding that he affured himselfe of the Kings resolution togo on, and dared not by any new Arguments to batter the great purpose it selfe, yet he told the King, That there were two things which maruelloully affrighted him, and which the King should finde, as he feared, to be most aduerse; to wit, the Seaand the Land: The Sea, because it had no where in that part of the world any Port capable of fo great a Fleete: infomuch, as if any tempest should arise, all 40 the Continent of Greece could hardly receive them, nor all the Hauens thereof affoord them any fafetic: and therefore when fuch shelter shall be wanting vnto them, he prayed him to understand, that in such a case of extremitie, men are left to the will and disposition of Fortune, and not Fortune to the will and disposition of men. The Land, besides other incommodities, will be found by so much the more an enemie, by how much the vnfatiate defire of man to obtain more and more thereof doth leadehim forward: for were there no man found to give refissance, yet the want of meanes to feede fuch an Army, and the Famine, which cannot bee preuented, will without any other violence offered difinable and confume it. By these Arguments Artabanus hoped to have diverted Xernes, not daring perchance 50 to vtter what indeed he most feared; to wit, the ouerthrow of the Armie it selfe both by Sea and Land, which soone after followed. These Cautions were exceeding weightie, if Xerxes his obstinacie had not misprised them. For to inuade by Sea vpon a perillous Coast, being neither in possession of any Port, nor succored by any party, may better fit a Prince profuming on his fortune, than enriched with vn62.

derilanding. Such was the enterprise of Philip the second upon England in the veere 1588, who had belike neuer heard of this Counfell of Artabanus to Xerxes, or forgotten it.

Now concerning the second point, it was vericlikely, that Xerxes his Armie. which could not have leffe in it than two millions of Soules, befides his beaftes for Service and Carriage, should after a few dayes suffer famine, and vsing Machianels words, Mourire sans cousteo; die without a knife. For it was impossible for Greece, being a ragged, strait and mountainous Countrey, to yeeld food (besides what serued them (clues) for twenty hundred thou fand strangers, whom they never means to entertaine but with the sharpened points of their weapons, destroying withall 10 what socuer they could not well inclose and defend. Nay, if we may believe Heradotus, the Armic of Xerxes, being reviewed at Thermopyla, confifted of five millions, two hundred eightie three thousand, two hundred twentic men, besides Laundresfes, Harlots and Horses, and was therefore likely to endure a speedy famine.

The effect of xerxes his answere was, That it was impossible to prouide for all things; and that who focuer should enterprise any great matter, if he gaue the hearing to all that could be objected of accidentall inconveniences, hee should never pursue the same farther, than the dispute and consultation: which if his Predecesfors, the Persian Kings, had done, they had never growne to that greatnesse, or posfest so many Kingdomes and Nations as now they did, and therefore concluded, That great enterprises were neuer undertaken without great perils. Which resolu- 20 tion of Xerxes was not to be condemned, if any necessity had enforst him to that warre. But seeing the many Nations newly conquered, which hee already commaunded, were more than could be constrained to obedience any longer than the powerfull prosperity of the Persians endured, and that Greece was separated by the Sea from the rest of Xerxes Dominions (of whose resolution his father Darius had made a deare experience) the fruit of this warre was answerable to the plantation. and the successe and end ab Weable to the weake counsell whereon it was grounded. Furthermore, those millions of men which he transported, and yet in his owne iudgement not sufficient (for he gathered in marching on, all the strength of Thrace 30 and Macedon) were an argument, that he rather hoped to feare the Greekes by the fame of his numbers, than that he had any confidence in their valour and resolution, whom he conducted. For it is wifely faid of those vncountable multitudes: Non vires habent sed pondus, & impedimenta potius sunt quam auxilium. They are great in bulke, but weake in force, and rather a luggage than an aide.

Besides, as it was impossible to marshal such a world of men in one Armic, so the divers Nations, speaking divers languages, bred the same confusion among the Perfian commaunders when they came to fight, as it did to the builders of Babel, when they came to worke. Whereas if Xerxes had of his five millions compounded tenne Armies of fiftie thousand chosen souldiors in each, and sent them yeerely into 40 Greece well victualed and furnished, he had evther prevayled by the sword, or forst them to forfake their territorie, or brought them in obedience by necessity and famine, which cannot be relified. But while Xerxes, resoluted to cut down the bankes of Greece, and to let in a sea of men vpon them, he was deceived both in his owne hopes, and in their hearts whom he imployed, and beaten by the Greekes, both by Land and Sea; yea, he himselfe, conducted by his feare, fled shamefully into Asia. A great part of his Armie was buried in Greece: the remainder wherof, which wintred in Thessalie, and led by Mardonius, who perswaded the Enterprise, was in the Summer following vtterly defeated, and himselfe slaine.

ð. III. Of the fights at Thermopyla and Artemisium.

CHAP.6. S.3.

Fter such time as Xerxes had transported his Armie over the Hellefont, and landed in Thrace, (leaving the description of his passage a. longst that Coast, and how the River of Liffus was drunke drie by his multitudes, and the Lake neere to Piffyrus by his cattell, with other accidents in his marches towards Greece) I will speake of the encounters he had, and the shamefull and incredible ouerthrowes which he received: As first at Thermopyla, a narrow passage of halfe an acre of ground, lying betweene the Mountaines which divide Thessalie from Greece, where sometime the Phocians had rayled a wall with gates, which was then forthe most part ruined. At this entrance Leonidas, one of the Kings of Sparta, with three hundred Lacedamonians, affifted with one thousand Tegeate and Mantineans, one thousand Arcadians, and other Peloponnesians, to the number of three thousand one hundred in the whole, besides one thousand Phocians, foure hundred Thebans, seven hundred Thespians, and all the forces (fuch as they were ) of the bordering Locrium, defended the passage two whole daies together against that huge Armie of the Persians. The valour of the 20 Greekes appeared fo excellent in this defence, that in the first dayes fight, Xerxes is faid to have three times leaped out of his Throne, fearing the destruction of his Armie by one handfull of those men, whom not long before he had veterly despised : and when the second dayes attempt vpon the Greekes had prooued vaine . hee was altogether ignorant how to proceede further, and so might have continued. had not a run agate Gracian taught him a secret way, by which part of his Armie might ascend the ledge of Mountaines, and set vpon the backs of those who kept the Straits. But when the most valiant of the Persian Armie had almost inclosed the small forces of the Greekes, then did Leonidas, King of the Lacedamonians, with his three hundred, and seuen hundred Thespians, which were all that abode by him, 20 refuse to quit the place which they had vindertaken to make good, and with admirable courage not onely relift that world of men which charged them on all fides: but iffuing out of their strength, made so great a slaughter of their enemies, that they might well bee called vanquishers, though all of them were slaine vpon the place. Xerxes having lost in this last fight, together with twentic thousand other Souldiers and Captaines, two of his owne brethren, began to doubt what inconuenience might befall him by the vertue of fuch as had not beene present at these battailes, with whome hee knew that hee shortly was to deale. Especially of the Spartans he stood in great feare, whose manhood had appeared singular in this tryall, which caused him very carefully to enquire what numbers they could bring in-40 to the field. It is reported of Dieneces the Spartan, that when one thought to haue terrified him by faying, That the flight of the Persian arrowes was so thicke as would hide the Sunne: he answered thus; It is very good newes: for then shall we fight in the coole shade.

Such notable resolution having as freely beene expressed in deedes, as it was vttered in words, caused the Persian to stand in great doubt, when he heard that the Citie of Sparta could arme well-nigh eight thousand men of the like temper, and that the other Lacedemonians, though inferiour to those, were very valiant men. Wherefore he asked counsell of Demaratus, a banished King of the Spartans, who had alwaies well aduised and instructed him in the things of Greece, what course 50 were fittest to bee taken in his further proceedings. The opinion of Demaratus was, That all the Land-forces would affemble together to defend the Isthmus, that ftraight necke of ground which joyneth Peloponne fus to the Continent. For which cause he aduised, That three hundred shippes well manned should be sent unto the Coast of Laconia, to spoyle the Countrie, and to hold the Lacedamonians and their neighbours busied at home; whileit Xerxes at his leasure having subdued the rest, might afterward bring his whole power vponthem, who remaining destitute of succour, would be too weak alone to make resistance. To this purpose also the same Demaratus further aduised, that the said fleet of three hundred ships should seize vpon the Iland then called Cythera, now Cerigo, which lying neere to the Coast of L'aconia, might serue as a fit place of Rendez vous vpon all occasions either of their own defence or endamaging the enemie: whereby that ancient speech of Chilon the Lacedemonian should be verified, that it were better for his Countrie-men to have that Ile drowned in the sea, than stand so inconveniently as for them it did. What effect this counsell might have taken had it been followed it is not easie to 10 guesse. But a contrarie opinion of Achemenes brother to King Xerxes was preferred as the fafer. For the Persian fleet had bin forely vexed with a gricuous tempest which continued three whole dayes together, wherein were lost vpon the coast of Magnesia foure hundred ships of war, besides other vessels innumerable, accordingly as Artabanus had foreseene, that if any such calamity should ouertake them, there would not be found any Harbor wide enough to give them succour. Therefore Achemenes perswaded his brother not to disperse his fleet; for if (laid he) after the losse of foure hundred thippes we shall fend away other three hundred to seeke aduentures, then will the Greekes be strong enough by sea to encounter the rest of the Nauie, which holding altogether is inuincible. To this counsel Xerxes yeelded, hoping that his Land-armie and fleet should each of them stand the other in good 20 ftead, whilest both held one course, and lay not farre asunder. But herein he was farre deceived; for about the same time that his armie had felt the valour of the Greekes by Land, his Nauie likewise made a sorrowfull proofe of their skill and courage at Sea. The Grecian fleetlay at that time at Artemissium in the straits of Eu. baa, wherethe Persians thinking to incompasse them, sent two hundred sayle about the Iland to fall voon them behind, vling a like strategem to that which their King did practife against Leonidas in a case not vnlike, but with far different successe. For that narrow channell of the sea which divideth Eubera from the maine, was in the same sort held by a Nauy of two hundred threescore and eleuen saile against the 30 huge Persian Armada, as the straits of Thermopyla had formerly been maintained by Leonidas, till he was so circumuented as this Nauie might haue been, but was not. The departure of those two hundred ships that were sent about the Iland, and the cause of their voiage, was too well knowne in the Persian fleete, and soone enough disclosed to the Greekes, who setting faile by night, met them with a counter-sur-

the Greekes, who readily did present them battell at Artemisium. The fight endured from noone till night, and ended with equall loffe to both parts. For though more of the Persians ships were sunke and taken, yet the lesser loffe fell altogether as heavie vpon the Greekifb fleet, which being small could worse beare it. Herein onely the Barbarians may seeme to have had the worse, that they for sooke the place of fight, leaving the wracke and spoyles to the enemic, who neuerthelesse were faine to abandon presently even the passage which they had vn- 50 dertaken to defend, both for that many of their ships were forely crusht in the battaile, and especially because they had received advertisement of the death of Leonidas at Thermopyle. Before they waied anchors, Themislosles general of the Athenians engraved vpon stone at the watering place an exhortation to the Ionians, that either prise, taking and finking thirtie veffels, inforcing the rest to take the Sca, where being ouertaken with foule weather, they were driven vpon the rocks & call alaway.

Gontrariwise, the Nauie of the Greekes was increased by the arrival of fiftie three Athenian ships, and one Lemnian, which came to their partie in the last fight. As red up the other to redeeme their losse with some notable exploit. Wherefore setting aside their vnfortunate policie, they resolved in plaine fight to repaire their honour, and casting themselves into the forme of a Crescent, thought so to inclose these new forces incouraged the one side : so the feare of Xerxes his displaying fire fir-40

they should reuolt vnto the Greekes or stand neutrall; which perswasion, he hoped would either take some place with them, or at the least make them suspected by the Persians.

ð. IIII.

The attempt of XERXES upon APOLLOE's temple: and his taking of Athens.

Hen Xerxes had passed the straites of Thermopyla, he wasted the country of the Phocians, and the regions adioyning: as for the inhabitants, they chose rather to flie, and reserve themselves to a day of battell, than to adventure their lives into his hands, vpon hope of fauing their wealth by making proffer vnto him of their service. Part of his armie he sent to spoile the temple of Delphi; which was exceeding rich by meanes of many offerings that had there beene made by diners Kings and great personages; Of all which riches it was thought that Xerxes had a better Inuentorie than of the goods left in his owne Palace. To make relation of a great affondhment that fell vpon the companies which arised at the Temple to have sacked it, and of two 20 Rocks, that breaking from the mount Parnaffus, ouerwhelmed many of the Barbarians, it were peraduenture somewhat superstitious. Yet Herodotus, who lived not long after, faith, That the broken Rocks remained euen to his memorie in the Temple of Minerua, whither they rowled in their fall. And furely this attempt of Xerxes was impious; for seeing hee beleeved that Apollo was a god, hee should not haue dated to entertaine a couetous desire of inriching himselfe by committing sacriledge vpon his Temple. Wherefore it may possibly be true, that licence to chastife his impietie, in such manner as is reported, was granted vnto the Divel, by that Holy one, who faith, Will aman (poile his gods? and elsewhere; Hath any nation chan- Malace, ; v.8. ged their gods, which yet are no gods? Go to the Iles of Kittim, and behold, and fend to Ke- Ierum. c. 2. v.9, 30 dar, and take diligent heed, and see whether there be any such things. Now this impietie of 6 10, Xerxes was the more inexculable, for that the Persians alleadged the burning of Cybeles Temple by the Athemans, when they fet fire on the Citie of Sardis in Asia, to be the ground and cause of the waite which they made in burnings of Cities and Temples in Greece. Whereas indeed, in the enterprise against Delphos, this Vizzor of holy and zealous reuenge falling off, discouered the face of couctousnesses on much the more velie, by how much the more themselves had protessed a detestation of the offence which the Athenians had committed in that kind by meere mischance.

The remainder of that which Kerxes did, may be expressed briefly thus: He came to Athens, which finding for saken, he took & burnt the Cittadel & temple which was there-40 in. The Cittadel indeed was defended a while by some of more courage than wisedome, who litterally interpreting Apollo's Oracle; that Athens should be safein woodden walls, had fortified that place with boords and Palissadoes: too weake to hold out long, though by their desperate valour so well maintained at the first affault, that they might have yeelded it vpon tolerable conditions, had they not vainely relied vpon the prophecie: whereof (being somewhat obscure) it was wisely done of Themistocles, to make discretion the interpreter, applying rather the words to the present neede, than fashioning the businesse to words.

Q. V.

How THEMISTOCLES the Athenian drew the Greekes to fight at Salamis.

He Athenians had, before the comming of Xerxes, remooued their wiues and children into Træzene, Ægina,& Salamis, not so highly prizing their houses and lands, as their freedome, and the common libertie of Greece. Neuertheleffe, this great zeale, which the Athenians did 10 the of the generall good of their Countrie, was ill requited by the other Greekes, who with much labour were hardly intreated to stay for them at Salamis, whilest they remooued their wives and children out of the Citie. But when the Citic of Athens was taken, it was presently resoluted vpon, that they should forfake the Ile of Salamis, and with-draw the fleet to Isthmus: which neck of land they did purpose to fortifie against the Persians, and so to defend Peloponnessus by Land, and Sea, leaving the rest of Greece, as indefensible, to the furie of the enemic. So should the Ilands of Salamis and Agina have been abandoned, and the Families of the Athenians (which were there bestowed as in places of securitie) have beene giuen ouer into mercilesse bondage. Against this resolution Themissocles, Admirall 20 of the Athenian fleet, very strongly made opposition; but in vaine. For the Pelaponnesians were so possessed with searc of losing their owne, which they would not hazard, that no perswasions could obtaine of them, to regard the estate of their distreffed friends and Allies. Many remonstrances Themistocles made vnto them, to allure them to abide the enemie at Salamis; As first in private vnto Eurybiades the Lacedamonian, Admirall of the whole fleet; That the selfe same feare which made them for sake those coasts of Greece, vpon which they then anchored, would afterward (if it found no check at the first) cause them also to dissener the fleet, and every one of the Confederates to with-draw himselfe to the desence of his owne Citie and estate: Then to the Councell of Warre which Eurybiades vpon this motion 39 did call together (forbearing to obiect what want of courage might worke in them hereaster) he shewed that the fight at Ishmus would be in an open Sea, whereas it was more expedient for them, having the fewer ships, to determine the matter in the straights; and that, besides the safeguard of Agina, Megara, and Salamis, they should by abiding, where they then were, sufficiently defend is thouse, which the Barbarians should not so much as once looke vpon, if the Greekes obtained victorie by sea; which they could not so well hope for else where, as in that present place which gaue them fo good advantage. All this would not ferue to retaine the Peloponnessans, of whom one, unworthic of memoric, upbraided Themistocles with the loffe of Athens, blaming Eurybiades for fuffering one to speake in the Councell, that 40 had no Countrie of his owne to inhabite. A baseand shamefull objection it was, to lay as a reprochthat loffe, which being voluntarily sustained for the common good, was in true estimation by so much the more honourable, by how much it was the greater. But this indignitie did exasperate Themistocles, and put into his mouth a reply so sharpe, as availed more than all his former perswasions. Hee told them all plainely, That the Athenians wanted not a fairer Citie, than any Nation of Greece could boaft of; having well-neere two hundred good ships of Warre, the better part of the Gracian fleet, with which it was casse for them to transport their Families and substance into any part of the World, and settle themselues in a more secure habitation, leaving those to shift as well as they might, who in their extremitie 50 had refused to stand by them. Herewithall he mentioned a towne in Italie belonging of old to the State of Athens, of which townshee faid an Oracle had fore-told, That the Athenians in processe of time should build it a new, and there (quoth he) will we plant our sclues, leaving vnto you a sorrowful remembrance of my words, and of your owne vnthankfulnesse. The Peloponnessans hearing thus much began to enter into better consideration of the Athenians, whose affaires depended not, as they well perceived, vpon so weake termes, that they should bee driven to crouch to others; but rather were fuch, as might inforce the rest to yeeld to them, and condescend even to the vttermost of their owne demands.

For the Athenians, when they first embraced that Heroical resolution of leaning their grounds and houses to fire and ruine, if necessitie should inforce them so far, for the preservation of their libertie; did imploy the most of their private wealth. and all the common treafure, in building a great Nauie. By these meanes they ho-12 ped (which accordingly fell out) that no fuch calamitie should be fall them by land, as might not well be counterpoised be great advantages at sea: Knowing well, that a firong fleet would either procure victorie at home, or a secure passage to any other Countries. The other States of Greece held it sufficient, if building a few new ships, they did somewhat amend their Nauic. Whereby it came to passe, that, had they been vanquished, they could not have expected any other fortune than either present death, or perpetuals sauerie; neither could they hope to be victorious without the affishance of the Athenians, whose forces by sea did equal all theirs together; the whole confisting of more than three hundred and fourescore bottomes. Wherefore these Peloponnesians beginning to suspect their owne condition, which 20 would have stood vpondesperate points, if the fleet of Athens had for saken them; were fome perswaded, by the greater searc of such a bad euent, to forget the leffer. which they had conceived of the Persians; and laying aside their insolent brauerie. they weelded to that most profitable counsaile of abiding at Salamis. Palose Hill

How the Persians consulted about giving battaile: and how THEMISTO-CLES by policie held the Greekes to their resolution; with the victorie at Salamis thereupon enfuing.

N the meane season the Persians had entred into consultation, whether it were convenient to offer battell to the Greekes, or no. The rest of the Captains giving such aduice as they thought would best please the King their Master, had soon agreed upon the sight: but Artemista Queene of Halicarnassia, who followed Xerxes to this war in person, was of contrarie opinion. Her Counfell was, that the King himselfe directly should march toward Peloponnesus, whereby it would come to passe, that the Greeke Nauic (vnable otherwise to continue long at Salamis for want of prouision) should pre-40 fently be diffeuered, and enery one feeking to preserve his owne Citieand goods, they should, being divided, proue vnable to resist him, who had wonne so far vpon them when they held together. And as the profit will bee great in forbearing to giue battell; so on the other side, the danger will bee more (said shee) which wee shall vnder-goe, than any need requireth vs to adventure vpon; and the losse in case it fall vpon vs, greater than the profit of the victory which we defire. For if we compell the enemies to flie, it is more than they would have done, we fitting still : but if they, as better Sea-men than ours, put vs to the worst, the journey to Peloponnefus is viterly dasht, and many that now declare for vs. will soone revolt vnto the Greekes. Mardonius, whom Xerxes had fent for that purpose to the fleet, related vn-50 to his Master the common consent of the other Captaines, & withall this disagreeing opinion of Artemisia. The King well pleased with her aduice, yet resolved vpon following the more generall, but farre-worse counsaile of the rest; which would questionlesse have beene the same which Artemisis gave, had not feare and flatterie made all the Captaines vtter that, as out of their owne judgement, which they thought most conformable to their Princes determination. So it was indeede that Xerxes had entertained a vaine persuasion of much good, that his owne prefence vpon the shore to behold the conflict, would worke among the Souldiers. Therefore he incamped upon the Sea-side, pitching his owne Tent on the mount Agaleus, which is opposite vnto the He of Salamis, whence at ease hee might safely view all which might happen in that action, having Scribes about him to writ: downe the acts and behaviour of every Captaine. The necre approch of the Barbarians, together with the newes of that timorous diligence, which their Countrimen shewed in fortifying the Isthmus, and of a Persian Armie, marching a-pace thither, did now againe fo terrifie and amaze the Peloponnesians, that no intreatie, nor 10 contestation would suffice to hold them together. For they thought it meere madnesset o fight for a Countrey alreadie lost, when they rather should endeuour to faue that which remained vinconquered; propounding chiefly to themselues what miserie would befall them, if losing the victorie, they should be driven into Salamis.

there to be shut vp, and besieged round in a poore desolate Iland. Hereupon they resolued forth-with to set saile for Isthmus: which had presently beene done, if the wisedome of Themistocles had not preuented it. For he perceiving what a violent feare had stopt vp their eares against all good counsaile, did practise another course, & forth-with labour to preuent the execution of this vnwholsome decree; not suffering the very houre of performance to find him busic in wrangling 20 altercation. As soone as the Councell brake up, hee dispatched secretly a truffie Gentleman to the Persian Captaines, informing them truely of the intended flight, and exhorting them to fend part of their Nauie about the Iland, which incomparfing the Greekes, might preuent their escape; guing them withall a false hope of his affiltance. The Perstans no sooner heard than beleeued these good newes, well knowing that the victoric was their owne affured, if the Athenian fleet io yned with them; which they might easily hope, considering what abilitie their Master had to recompence for so doing, both the Captaines with rich rewards, and the People with restitution of their Citic, and Territories. By these meanes it fell out, that when the Greekes very early in the morning were about to waigh Anchor, they 30 found themselues inclosed round with Persians, who had laboured hard all night, fending many of their ships about the Ile of Salamis, to charge the enemic in reare, and landing many of their men in the Isle of Pfyttalea, which lyeth ouer-against &alamis, to faue such of their owne, and kill such of the Gracian partie, as by any misfortune should be cast vpon the shore. Thus did meere necessitie enforce the Gracians to undertake the battaile in the Straights of Salamis, where they obtained a memorable victorie, stemming the formost of their enemies, and chasing the rest, who falling foule one vpon another, could neither conveniently fight nor flie. I do not finde any particular occurrances in this great battaile to be much remarkable. Sure it is that the Scribes of Xerxes had a wearisome taske of writing downe many 40 disasters that befell the Persian fleet, which ill acquited it selfe that day, doing no one peece of seruice worthic the presence of their King, or the registring of his Notaries. As for the Greekes, they might wel seeme to have wrought out that victorie with equal courage, were it not that the principall honour of that day was ascribed to those of Azina, and to the Athenians, of whom it is recorded, That when the Barbarians did flie towards Phalerus, where the Land-armie of Xerxes lay, the ships of Agina having possessed the Straights, did sinke or take them, whilest the Athenians did valiantly give charge vpon those that kept the Sea, and made any countenance of relifting. 50

 Of things following after the battaile of Salamis: and of the flight of XERXES.

Fter this victorie, the Greekes intending by way of secutinic, to determine which of the Captaines had best merited of them, in all this great fernice; cuery Captaine, being amottous of task and the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place as the first place write downe his owne name, but in the second place as best deserving next vnto himselfe, almost every Suffrage did concur vpon Themislocles. Thus private affection yeelded vnto vertue, assoon as her own turne was ferued. The Persian King, as not amazed with this calamitie, began to make new preparation for continuance of warre; but in such tashion, that they which were best acquainted with his temper, might easily discerne his faint heart, through his painted lookes. Especially Mardonius, Author of the warre, began to cast a warie eye vpon his Master, searing lest his counsell should be rewarded according to the euent. Wherefore purpoling rather to adventure his life in pursuite of the victorie, than to cast it away by vnder-going his Princes indignation; he aduised the King to leave vnto him three hundred thousand men, with which forces he promised to reduce all Greece under the subjection of the Persian Scepter. Herewithall he forgot not to footh Xerxes with many faire words; telling him, that the cowardise of those Egyptians, Phanicians, and Cilitians, with others of the like mectall, nothing better than flaues, who had so ill be haved themselves in the late Seaferuice, did not concerne his honour, who had alwaies been victorious, and had alreadie subdued the better part of Greece, yeataken Athens it selfe, against which the Warre was principally intended. These words found very good acceptance in the Kings eare, who presently betooke himselfe to his journey homewards, making the more hafte, for that he vnderstood, how the Greekes had a purpose to saile to Hellespont, and there to breake downe his bridge, and intercept his passage. True it was that the Greekes had no such intent, but rather wished his hastie departure, knowing that hee would leave his Armie not so strong, as it should have beene, had 30 hein person remained with it. And for this cause did Eurybiades give counsel, that by no meanes they should attempt the breaking of that bridge, lest necessitie should inforce the Persians to take courage, and rather to fight like men, than die like beasts. Wherefore Themistocles did, under pretence of friendship, send a false advertisement to this timorous Prince, advising him to convay himselfe into Asia with all speed, before his bridge were dissoluted: which counsell Xerxes tooke verie kindly, and hastily followed, as before is shewed. Whether it were so that hee found the bridge whole, and thereby repassed into Asia; or whether it were torne in sunder by tempests, and he thereby driven to imbarke himselfe in some obscure vessel, 40 it is not greatly materiall; though the Greekes did most willingly imbrace the later of these reports. How soener it were, this flight of his did well case the Countrie; that was therby disburdened of that huge throng of people, which, as Locusts, had before ouerwhelmedit.

The negotiations betweene MARDONIVS and the Athenians, as also betweene the Athenians and Lacedamonians; after the flight of XERXES.

ARDONIVS with his three hundred thouland had withdrawn himfelfe into Thessaler, whence he sent Alexander, the sonne of Amyntas King of Macedon, as Embassadour to the Athenians, with promise of large amends for all their losses received; and of extending their Territories as farre as their owne defires; allowing them to retaine their their libertie and lawes, if they would make peace with Xerxes, and affift him in that

The Athenians had now reentred their Citie, but not as yet brought backe their wines and children; for as much as they well perceined that the place could not be secure, till the Armie of Mardonius were broken and defeated. Wherefore the Lacedemonians, understanding what faire conditions this Embassadour would propound, were perplexed with very great feare, lest bee should finde good and ready acceptance. Hercupon, they likewise very speedily dispatched their Embassadours for Athens, who arriving, before the Macedonian had audience, vied the best of their perswasion to retaine the Athenians firme. They alleadged, that neither Xerxes 10 nor Darius had any pretence of Warre against the rest of Greece, but had onely threatned the subuersion of Athens, till they and all their Confederates arming themselves in defence of that Citie, were drawne into the quarrell, wherein the Athenians without much crueltie of injustice could not leave them. Weeknow, said they, that yee haue indured great calamities, losing the fruit of the grounds, and being driuen to forsake the Towne, the houses whereof beeruined, and vnfit for your habitation; in regard whereof, we undertake to maintaine as our owne, your wines and children amongst vs, as long as the war shall continue, hoping that yee, who have alwaies procured libertie to others, will not now goe about to bring all Greece into flauerie and bondage. As for the Barbarians, their promiles are large, but their words and oathes are of no affurance. It was needleffe to vie many argu- 20 ments to the Athenians, who gave answere to Alexander in presence of the Spartan Embassadours; That whilest the Sunne continued his course, they would be enemies to Xerxes, regarding neither gold nor any riches, with which he might feek to make purchase of their libertie. Concerning the maintenance of their wines and children, it was a burden which they promised to sustaine themselues, only desiring the Lacedemonians, that with all speede they would cause their Armie to march, for as much as it was not likely, that Mardonius would long fit still in Thessalie, having once received such a peremptorie answere. In this their opinion of Mardonius his readinesse to inuade Attica, they found themselves nothing deceived. For hee, as 20 foone as Alexander had returned their obstinate purpose of resistance, did foorthwith leade his Armie towards them, and their Citie: they having now the second time quitted it, and conueyed themselues into places of more securitie abroad in the Countrie, where they expected the arrivall of their Confederates.

From Athens he sent his Agent vnto them with instructions, not only to perswade them to acceptance of the conditions before to them propounded, but with great promises to allure the principall of them to his partie. His hope was that either the people, wearied with forfaking their houses so often, would be desirous to presente them from fire, and to have those which were alreadie laid waste, reedified at the Kings charges: Or if this affection took no place with them, but that needes they 40 would relie vpon their old Consederates, whose succours did very slowly advance forwards, yet perhaps the Leaders might bee wonne with great rewards, to draw them to this purpose; all which projects if they should faile, the destruction of Athens would be a good meane to please his Master, King Xerxes, who must thereby needes understand, that Mardonius kept his ground, and feared not to confront the whole power of Greece, in the strongest part of their owne Countrie. But his expectation was beguiled in all these. For the Athenians so little regarded his offers, that when one Lycidas, or (as Demosthenes calls him) Cyrcilus, aduised the Senate to accept the conditions, and propound them to the people; all the Senators, and as many as abiding without the Counsaile-house heard what he had said, immediate 50 ly set vpon him, and stoned him to death; not examining whether it were searcor money, that had mooued him to vtter such a vile sentence. Yea, the women of Athens, in the Ile of Salamis, hearing of his bad counsaile, and bad end, assembling together, did enter his house there, & put his wife and children to the like execution.

All this brauerie notwithstanding, when they perceyued the slacknesse of the Pelaponnesians in giuing them aide, they were faine to betake themselves to Salamis againe, the old place of their securitie. Remaining there, and seeing little forward. nesse in those whom it most concerned to affish them, they sent verie seuere messages to Sparta, complaining of their flacknes, & threatning withal, to take such course as might stand best with their owne good, seeing that the common estate of all was fo little regarded. These messensers were at the first entertained with dilatorie anfweres, which every day grew colder, when as the Peloponne stan Wall, builded athwart the Ishmus, was almost finished. But as the Lacedamonians waxed carelesse 10 and dull, so the Athenians hotely pressed them to a quicke resolution, giving them plainely to vinderstand, that if they should hold on in those dilatorie courses, it would not be long ere the Citie of Athens tooke a new course, that should little please them. All this while the Persian fleet lay vpon the coast of Asia, not daring todraw neerer vnto Greece, as being now too weake at Sea. Likewise the Greekish Nauie contained it selfe within the Harbours vpon Europe side; both to doe service where neede should require at home; and withall to shunne the danger which might have befallen any part of it, that being distracted from the rest, had adventured ouer far. So mutuall feare preserved in quiet the Ilands lying in the niddest of the Ægean Seas. But it was well and seasonably observed by a Counseirous of 20 Sparta, that the wall vpon Isthmus would serue to little purpose for the defence of Peloponnesus, if once the Athenians gauc eare to Mardonius : considering that many dores would be opened into that Demic-Iland, as soone as the Enemic should by winning the friendship of Athens, become the Master of the Seas about it. The Lacedamonians upon this admonition, making better perufall of their own dangers. were very careful to give satisfaction to the Athenian Embassadors, who not brooking their delaies, were vpon point of taking leaue, yea as it seemed, of renouncing their alliance. Wherefore dispatching away fine thousand Spartans in the enening, vnder conduct of Paufanias; they gave audience the next day to the Embassadours, whose complaints they answered with vehement protestations of their readinesses. 20 deeply swearing that the Armie of Sparta was already farre upon the journey; and adiovning to follow after them: The Athenians, though distasting such want of gravitie, in a matter so important, were neuerthelesse contented with the finall conclusion; and leaving the number appointed of Lacedamonian Souldiers, made what haste they could to incampe in Attica. The other Gracians were nothing flacke in fending forth Companies, whose neere approch caused Mardonius to forsake Attica as a rough Country, and therefore of much disaduantage to Horse, wherein consisted the best of his power. Before his departure he busnt the Citie of Athens, beating downe the wals of it, and rui-40 ning all that had formerly escaped the fury of Warre.

The great battaile of Platea.

T were too long a rehearfall to shew all that hapned in many skirmilhes betweene the Greekes and him, in the Countrie of Bactia, which Mardonius had chosen to bee the seate of that Warre. Much which Mardonius had chosen to bee the leate or that warre. Much time was spent before the quarrell was decided by trial of one maine battaile: for both parties did stand vpon their guard, each expecting when the other should assaile them.

The Armie of Mardonius contained about three hundred thousand, which were by him chosen out of Xerxes his Armie; to whom were adio yied the forces of Thebes, Macedonie, The sfalie, and other parts of Greece, that now siding with the Persian, furnished furnished his Campe with tiftie thouland men. Against these the Lacedamonians, Athenians, and their Confederates, had leavied an Armie of one hundred and ten thousand, of which fortie thousand were waightily armed, the rest were only affifants to these fortiethousand, being armed more slightly, as rather to make excurfions and give chase, than to sustaine any strong charges.

These two Armies having eleven daies confronted one the other, without performing any memorable piece of seruice; Mardonius, whose victualls beganne to faile, resolued to begin the fray. The Greekes were promised victorie by an Oracle, if they fought in the Land of the Athenians, and in the plaine of Ceres & Proferpina, making prayers vnto certaine gods, Demi-gods, and Nymphs. But it was hard to 10 finde the certaine place which the Oracle deligned. For the plaine of Ceres was indeede in the Territorie of Athens; but there was also an old Temple of Ceres and Proferpina, necrevnto the place where they lay at that time encamped, as likewife the memorialls of those Nymphs, and Demi-gods, were in the same place, vpon Mount Citheren, and the ground ferued well for foot-men against horse; onely the Land belonged vnto the Plateans, and not vnto the Athenians.

Whilest the Greekes were perplexed about the interpretation of this doubtfull Oracle; the Plateans, to make all cleere, did freely bestow their land on that side the Towne vpon the Athenians.

This magnificence of the Plateans caused Alexander the Great, many ages after, to reedifie their Citic, which was ruined in the Peloponnesian warres.

All things being readie for battaile; the Lacedamonian Generall thought it most mecte, that the Athenians should stand opposite that day to the Medes and Persians, whom they had formerly vanquished at Marathon; and that he, with his Spartans, should entertaine the Thebans and other Greekes which followed Mardonius, as better acquainted with their fight, and having beaten them often-times before. This being agreed upon, the Athenians changed place with the Lacedamonians; which Mardonius vnderstanding (whether fearing the Athenians, of whose valour the Medes and Persians had felt heavie proofe, or desiring to encounter the Spartans, as thinking them the braueft Souldiers of Greece) hee did also change the order of his 30 battaile, and oppose himselfe to Pausanias. All the Greekes might well perceive how the Enemie did shift his wings, and Paulanias thereupon returned to his former Station; which Mardonius noting, did also the like. So one whole day was spent in changing to and fro. Some attempt the Persians made that day with their Archers on horse-back, who did so molest the Greekes at their watering place, that they were faine to enter into consultation of retiring; because they could not without much losse to themselues, and none to the enemie, lie neere to that Fountaine which did serue all the Camp. Having therefore concluded among themselves to dislodge; and part of the Armie being sent away before day-light: Mar donius perceiued their departure in the morning, and thereupon being encouraged by their flight, (which 40 to him seemed to proceede out of meere cowardise) he charged them in reare with great violence. It may well be recorded as a notable example of patient valor, That the Lacedamonians being ouer-taken by the Enemies horse, and ouer-whelmed with great flights of Arrowes, did quietly fit stil, not making any relistance or defence, til the Sacrifices for victory were happily ended, though many of them were hurt and slaine, and some of especiall marke lost, before any signe of good successe appeared in the entrailes.

But as soone as Pausanias had found in the Sacrifice those tokens, which the superflition of that Age and Countrie accounted fortunate; hee gaue the Signall of battaile: and therevpon the Souldiers, who till then did sit vpon the ground, as was 10 their manner, arose altogether, and with excellent courage received the charge of the Barbarians, that came thronging vpon them without any feare of such notable relistance. The rest of the Greeke Armie that was in march, being renoked by Pau-Sanias, came in a-pace to succour the Lacedamonians : onely that part of the Armie which was led by the Athenians, could not arrive vnto the place of the great battaile, because the Thebans, and other Greeks confederated with the Perfions, gaue them checke by the way. Neuertheleffe, the Spartans with other their Affiflants, did fo well acquite themselves, that the Persians were vanquished, and Mardonius with many thousands more flaine in the field; the rest fledde into the Campe, which they had fortified with woodden walls, and there defended themselves with such courage as desperate necessitie inforced them vnto, holding out the longer, because the Lecedemonians were not acquainted with the manner of asfaulting Fortresses, and Walls. In the meane season, the Athenians having found to firong opposition of the Thebans and The falians, did with much labour and courage obtaine victorie, which having not long pursued, they came to helpe the Lasedamonians, whom they found wearily bufied in affaulting the Campe, with more valour than skill. Wherefore they them selves under-tooke it, and in short space forced a passage through the Wall, at which breach first, and then on all sides, the Greekes entred with such furie, and just defire of vengeance, that of three hundred thoufand they are faid not to have left three thouland alive, excepting those who fled away with Artabazus, when the Persian Armie first fell to rout.

If the execution were so great, as is reported, an especiall cause of it was the foolish retrait, or rather flight into the Campe. For though it were so, that the 20 place was well fortified, and the number of those who call themselves into it, greaterthan of the Assailants; yet they being of seuerall Nations and Languages, and having lost their Generall with other principall Commanders, it was vnpossible that they in such a terrour and astonishment should make good that piece of ground, lying in the heart of an Enemie Countrie, against an Armic of men, farre more valiant then themselves, and enflamed with present victorie. Therefore the fame wall which for a few houres had preserved their lives, by holding out the Enemie, did now impale them, and leave them to the flaughtering furie of vnpittifull Victors. Artabazus fled into Thrace, telling the people of Thessalie, and other Countries in his way, that hee was fent by Mardonius vpon some piece of scruice: 30 For hee well knew, that had they vnderstood any thing of that great discomfiture, all places would have been hostile vnto him, and sought with his ruine to purchase fauour of the vanquishers. Therefore making so large marches, that many of his Souldiers being feeble were left behinde and loft, hee came to Byzantium, whence hee shipped his men ouer into Asia. Such was the end of the vaine-glorious expedition, vnder-taken by Xerxes against the Greekes, vpon hope of honour, and great Conquest, though sorting otherwise, accordingly as Artabazus had fore-seene, and rather worse, for as much as it began the quarrell, which never ended, before the ruine of the Persian Empire was effected by that Nation of the Greekes, despised and fought to have beene brought into flauerie. Hereby it may feeme, that the vi-49 from appearing to Xerxes, was from God himselfe, who had formerly disposed of those things, ordaining the subuersion of the Persian Monarchie by the Greekes, who, thus prouoked, entred into greater confideration of their owne strength, and the weakenesse of their Enemics.

The battaile of Mycale, with a strange accident that fell out in the beginning of it: and examples of the

He same day on which the battaile was fought at Platae, there was another battaile fought at Mycale, a Promontorie, or Head-land in Asia, where the Persian fleet rode.

Leutychides the Spartan, with Xantippus the Athenian, Admiralls of 10 the Greeke Nauic, at the request of some Handers and Ionians, did faile into those parts, to deliuer the Samians, and procure the Ionians to reuolt from the Persian. Xerxes himselfe at this time lay at Sardis, a Citie in Lydia, not farre from the Sca-fide having left threefcore thou fand under the command of Tieranes for desence of Ionia and the Sea-coast. Therefore when Artayntes and Ithramitres, Admiralls of the Persian fleet, vnderstood that the Greekes bent their course towards them; they did forth-with draw their ships a-ground, fortifying with Palissadoes and otherwise, as much ground as did seem needfull for the encamping of al their Land and Sea-forces. Leutychides at his arrivall, perceiving that they meant to keepe within their strength, and resoluing to force them out of it, rowed with his Gallie 20 close aboord the shore, and called vpon the Ionians (who more for scare then good wil were encamped among the Persians) exhorting them in the Greeke tongue to remember libertic, and vie the faire occasion which they now had to recouer it. Herein he did imitate Themistocles, who had done the like at Eubæa; trusting that either these perswasions would preuaile; or if the Persians did happen to understand them, that it would breed some ielousie in them, causing them to fight in seare of their owne Companions. It neede not seeme strange, that this very same stratageme, which little or nothing availed Themistocles, did now very happily succeede. For Xerxes being in his full strength, it was a matter of much difficultie, to perswade those Inhabitants of Asia to revolt; who now, in his declining estate, gauca willing 20 eare to the sweet found of libertie. The Persians likewise, who in their former brauerie, little regarded and leffe feared any treason, to be contriued by their Subjects, were now so warie, that from the Samians which were amongst them, they tooke away their armes; the Milesians, whom they did suspect, but would not seeme to mistrust, they placed farre from them, as it were for defence of the straight passages of Mycale; pretending that these Milesians did best of all others know those places. But these devices little availed them. For the Samians perceiving that they were held as Traitors, tooke courage in the heate of the fight, and laying hold vpon such weapons as came to hand, affailed the Persians manfully within the Campe; which example the Ionians presently followed, being very glad to have found some that 40 durst beginne. It is said that while the Greeks were yet in a march towards the Encmies campe, a rumour suddenly ranne in the Armie, that Mardonius was ouerthrowne in Greece, which (though perhaps it was given out by the Captaines to encourage the Souldiers) was very true. For the battaile of Plataa was fought in the morning, and this of Mycale in the evening of the same day.

The like report of that great battaile, wherein Paulus Amylius ouerthrew Perleus the last king of Macedon, was brought to Rome in foure daics, as Liuie with others doe record. And Plutarch hath many other examples of this kinde. As that of the battaile by the River Sagra in Italie, which was heard of the same day in Peloponnesus: That of the battaile against the Tarquinians and the Latines, presently 50 noised at Rome: And (which is most remarkable) the victorie obtained against Lucins Antonius, who was Rebell to Domitian the Emperour. This Lucius Antonius being Lieutenant of the higher Germanie, had corrupted his Armie with gifts and promifes, promifes, drawing the barbarous people to follow him, with great hope to make himselfe Emperour; which newes much troubling the Citie of Rome, with feare of a dangerous Warre; it was fuddainely reported that Antonius was flaine, and his

Armie defeated. Hereupon many did offer facrifice to the gods, and shew all manner of publique iov, as in luch cases was accultomed. But when better inquirie was made, and the Author of these tidings could not be found; the Emperour Domitian betooke himselfe to his journey against the Rebell; and being with his Armie in march, hee receiued aduertisement by Poste, of the Victorie obtained, and the death of An-10 tonius: whereupon remembring the rumour noised before in Rome, of the selfesame victorie, hee found that the report and victorie were borne vpon one day. though twentie thousand furlongs (which make about five and twenty hundred miles) a-funder. It is truely faid of Plutarch, that this last example gives credit vnto many the like. And indeede it were very strange, if among so many rumours. begotten by forgerie or mistakings, and fostered by credulous imagination. there should not be found (as happens in dreames among many thousand vaine and friuolous) a fewe precisely true. Howbeit wee may finde, that God himselfe doth fometimes vse to terrifie those who presume vpon their owne strength, by these light meanes of tumultuous noises; as hee raised the siege of Samaria, by causing a 20 found of Horses and Chariots to affright the Aramites; and as he threatned Senacherib, faying: Behold, I will fend a blast upon him, and hee shall heare a noise, and re- Esay.c.37.v.j. turne to his owne Land. Wherefore it may well have beene true, that God was pleafed by fuch a meane as this, to animate the Greekes; who (as Herodotus notes) went towards the Enemies with heavie hearts, being in great feare, lest their owne aduenture should by no meanes fall out well; considering in what danger they had left their Countrie of Greece, which was readie to be subdued by Mardonius, whilest they went wandring to seeke out enemies a far-off, vpon the coast of Asia. But the fame of the battaile fought at Platee being noised among them; every man defired that his owne valour in the present fight, might be some helpe to worke out the 30 full deliverance of Greece. In this alacritic of spirit, they divided themselves into two Battalions, whereof the Athenians led the one, by the way of the plaine, directlytowards the enemies campe; the Lacedemonians conducted the other, by the Mountaines and straight passages, to winne the higher ground. The Athenians did first fet vpon the Campe (ere the Lacedamonians could arrise on the other part) and being desirous to get all the honour of the day to themselves, did so forcibly affaultit, that they brake way through the Palissadoes and Gabions, and made themselues Masters of the place, slaying all that could not saue themselues by flight. In this fight the Samians did good service, as is formerly mentioned.

But the Miletians, who vpon the like icaloulie, were placed by the Persians on 40 the tops of Mycale, to defend the passages; did now (as if they had beene set of purpose to keepe them from running away) put as many to the sword as fell into their hands, letting none escape, except a very few, that fled through by-pathes. The Lucedamonians that day did little service, for the businesse was dispatched ere they came in: Only they broke fuch companies as retyred in whole troups; making them flie dispersed in very much disorder, whereby the Milesians were enabled to doe the greater execution vpon them. This was the last fight of that huge Armie leavied against Greece, which was now vtterly broken, and had no meanes left to make offensiue Warre.

Of the barbarous qualitie of XERXES: with a transition from the Persian affaires to matters of Greece, which from this time grew more worthic of regard.

ERXES lay at Sardis, not farre from the place of this battaile; but little minde had hee to reuenge either this or other his great loffes, to being wholly given over to the love of his Brothers Wife: with whom when he could not preuaile by intreatie, nor would obtaine his desire by force, because he respected much his Brother her husband, hee thought it best to make a match betweene his owne Sonne Darius, and the Daughter of this Woman; hoping by that meanes to finde occasion of such familiaritie as might worke out his desire. But whether it were so, that the chastitic of the Mother did still reiech him, or the beauty of her Daughter allure him; he soone after fell in loue with his owne Sonnes wife, being a vicious Prince, and as illable to gouerne himselse in peace, as to guide his Armie in Warre. This yong Ladie hauing once desired the King to give her the Garment which hee 20 then wore, being wrought by his owne Wife; caused the Queene thereby to perceiucher husbands conuersation with her, which shee imputed not so much to the beautie of her Daughter-in-law, as to the cunning of the Mother, against whom thereupon shee conceived extreme hatred. Therefore at a Royall feast, wherein the custome was that the King should grant their request, shee craued that the Wife of Massiles, her husbands Brother, the yong Ladies Mother, might bee giuen into her disposition. The barbarous King, who might either have reformed the abuse of such a custome, or have deluded the importunate crueltie of his Wife, by threatning her selfe with the like, to whatsoener shee should inflict upon the innocent Ladie, granted the request; and sending for 30 his brother, perswaded him to put away the Wife which he had, and take one of his Daughters in her stead. Hereby it seemes, that hee vnderstood how villainously that poore Ladie should be intreated, whom hee knew to bee vertuous, and whom himselfe had loued. Massifes refused to put her away; alleaging his owneloue, herdeseruing, and their common Children, one of which was married to the Kings Sonne, as reasons important to mooue him to keepe her. But in most wicked manner Xerxes reuiled him; faying, That hee now should neither keepe the Wife which hee had, nor have his Daughter whom hee had promised vnto him. Massistes was much grieued with these wordes, but much more, when returning home, hee found his Wife most butcherly mangled by 40 the Queene Amestris, who had caused her Nose, Lippes, Eares, and Tongue to be cut off, and her Brests in like manner, which were cast vnto Dogges. Mais enraged with this vilanie, tooke his way with his children, and some Friends, towards Bactria, of which Province hee was Governour, intending to rebell and auenge himselse. But Xerxes vnderstanding his purpose, caused an Armie to bee leavied, which cut him off by the way, putting him and all his Company to the fword. Such was the Tyrannicall condition of the Persian Government; and such are generally the effects of Luxurie, when it is ioyned with absolute

Yet of Xerxes it is noted, that he was a Prince of much vertue. And therefore 50 Alexander the Great, finding an Image of his over-throwne, and lying vpon the ground, said, That hee doubted, whether in regard of his vertue, hee should again erect it, or, for the mischiese done by him to Greec, should let it lie.

But furely whatfocuer his other good qualities were, he was foolith, and was a coward, and confequently mercileffe.

Therefore wee may firmely beleeue, that the vertue of Cyrus was very great, vpon which the foundation of the Persian Empire was so surely laid, that all the wickednesse and vanities of Xerxes, and other worse Princes, could not ouerth ow it, vntill it was broken by a vertue almost equall to that which did establish it. In warres against the Asyptians, the fortune of Xerxes did continue, as at the first it had beene very good; but against the generall estate of Greece, neither hee, nor any of his posteritie, did euer make offensiue warre, but received many losses in Asa, to which the last at Mycale served but as an introduction; teaching the Greekes, and especially the Athenians, that the Persian was no better Souldier at his owne dores, than in a forraine Countrie: whereofgood triall was made forth-with, and much better proofe as soone as the affaires of Athens were quietly settled and assured.

From this time forward I will therefore pursue the Historic of Greece, taking in the matters of Persia, as also the estate of other Countries, collaterally, when the order of time shall present them. True it is, that the Persian estate continued in her greatnesse, many Ages following, in such wise that the knowne parts of the World had no other Kingdome, representing the Maicstie of a great Empire.

Dut this greatnesse depended only upon the riches and power that had formerly been eacquired, yeelding few actions or none that were worthy of remembrance, excepting some Tragedies of the Court, and examples of that excessive Luxurie, where-with both it, and all, or the most of Empires that ever were, have been encruated, made unweldie, and (as it were) fattened for the hungrie swords of poore and hardie Enemies. Hereby it came to passe, that xernes and his successors were faine to defend their Crownes with money and base policies; very seldome or never (unlesse it were with great advantage) daring to adventure the triall of plaine battaile with that little Nation of Greece, which would soone have ruined the foundations laid by Cyrus, had not private malice and ielousie urged every

Citic to enuie the height of her Neighbours walls, and thereby diuerted the fwords of the Greekes into their owne bowels, which after the departure of Xerxes beganne very well, and might better haue continued, to hew out the way of conquest, on the side of

How Athens was rebuilt and fortified.

TER that the Medes and Persians had received their last blow, and were vtterly beaten at Mycale: Leotychides, who then commanded the Gracian Armie, leauing the pursuit of the warre to the Athenians, affisted by the revolted Iones, returned with the Lacedamonians and other Peloponnesians to Sparta and 0- 20 ther places, out of which they had been leavied. The Athenians in the meane while belieged Seftos, a Citie on the strait of the Hellespont, betweene which and Abydus, Xerxes had lately fastned his Bridge of Boats: where the inhabitants, desperate of succour, did not long dispute the defence thereof, but quitted it to the Greekes, who entertained themselues the Winter sollowing on that side the Hellespont. In the Spring they drew homeward, and having left their wives and children, fince the invasion of Attica, and the abandoning of Athens, in divers Islands, and at Troezen, they now found them out, and returned with them to their owne places.

And though the most part of all their houses in Athens were burnt and broken downe, and the walls of the Citic ouer-turned, yet they resolved first on their common defence, and to fortifie their City, before they cared to couer themselues, their wives and children, with any private buildings: Whereof the Lacedamonians being aduertised, and misliking the fortifying of Athens, both in respect that their owne Citic of Sparta was vnwalled, as also because the Athenians were growne more powerfull by Sea, than either themselues, or any other State of Greece, they dispatched messengers to the Athenians to dissi wade them; not acknowledging any privat mislike or iclousie, but pretending, that if the Persians should returne to inuade Greece a third time, the Athenians being in no better state to defend themselves than 40 heretofore, the same would serue to receiue their enemies, and to bee made a Seate for the Warre, as Thebes had lately beene. To this the Athenians promifed to give them facisfaction by their owne Embassadors very speedily. But being resolued to goe on with their workes by the aduice of Themistocles, they held the Lacedamonians in hope of the contrarie, till they had rayled their wals to that height, as they cared not for their mislikes, nor doubted their disturbance; and therefore (to gaine time) they dispatched Themistocles towards Lacedamon, giving him for excuse, that he could not deliuer the Athenians resolutions, till the arrivall of his fellow-Commissioners, who were of purpose retarded. But after a while, the Lacedamonians expectation being converted into ielousie (for by the arrivall of divers persons out of Attica, they were told for certaine, That the walls of Athens were speedily growne vp beyond expectation) Themistocles prayed them not to beleeue reports and vaine rumors, but that they would be pleased to send some of their own trustie Citizens to Athens, from whose relation they might resolue themselues, and determine accordingly. Which request being graunted, and Commissioners sent, Themistocles dispatched one of his owne, by whome hee aduised the Athenians, first to entertaine the Lacedamonians with some such discourse as might retaine them a few dayes, and in conclusion to hold them among them, till him lefte and the other -thenian Embassadors, then at Sparta, had their libertie also to returne. Which done. and being also assured by his associates and Aristides, that Athens was already defensible on all parts, Themestoeles demaunding audience, made the Lacedamonians know. That it was true that the wals of Athens were now ray fed to that height, as the Athenians doubted not the defence of their Citie; praying the Lacedemonians to beleeue, That when societ pleased them to treat with the Athenians, they would know them for fuch, as right well vnderstood what appertained to a Commonweale and their owne fafetic, without direction and advice from any other: That they had in the warre of Xerxes abandoned their Citie, and committed themselves to the woodden wals of their shippes, from the resolution of their owne counsels and courage, and not thereto taught or perswaded by others: and sinally, in all that perillous warre against the Persians they found their owne judgements and the execution thereof in nothing inferior, or leffe fortunate, than that of any other Nation, State, or Commonweale among the Greekes; And therefore concluded, that they determined to be Masters and Judges of their owne affaires, and thought it good 20 reason, that either all the Cities confedered within Greece should be left open, or else that the wals of Athens thould be finished and maintained.

The Lacedemonians finding the time vnfit for quarrell, diffembled their millike, both of the fortifying of Athens, and of the division, and so suffered the Athenians to depart, and received backe from them their owne Embassadors.

The wals of Athens finished, they also fortified the Port Pyreus, by which they might under couert imbarke themselues upon all occasions.

ð. II.

The beginning of the Athenian greatnesse, and prosperous warres made by that State upon the Persian.

He Athenians having settled things in good order at home, prepared thirtie Gallies for the pursuit of the warre against the Persians, to which the Lacedamonians added other twentie; and with this Fleet, strengthened by the rest of the Cities of Greece confederated, they fet fayle for Cypres, under the conduct of Paufanias the Lacedemonian;

where after their landing having possess themselves of many principall places, they imbarked the Armie againe, and tooke land in Thrace, recouring from the Persians 49 by force the Citie Bizantium, now Constantinople: from whence Pausanias, behaving himselse more like a Tyrant than a Captaine, especially towards the Ionians lately revolted from Xerxes, was called backe by the counfell of Lacedemon, and not onely accused of many insolent behauiors, but of intelligence with the Medes, and Treafon against his Countrey. In his stead they imployed Docres, who either gaue the same cause of offence; or else the Athenians, who affected the first commaundement in that warre, practifed the fouldiors to complaine, though indeed the wife and vertuous behauior of Aristides, Generall of the Athenian forces, a man of rare and incomparable sinceritie, had beeneable to make a good Commaunder seeme ill in comparison of himselfe; and therfore was much more availeable, in rendring those 50 detelled, whose vices affoorded little matter of excuse. Howsocuer it were, the Lacedamonians being no leffe wearie of the warre, than the Athenians were eagre to pursue it, the one obtained their ease, and the other the execution and honor which they defired: for all the Greekes (those of Peloponnesus excepted) willingly subjected themselues to the commandement of the Athenians, which was both the beginning of their greatnesse in that present age, and of their ruine in the next succeeding. For the charge of the warre being now committed vnto them, they began to rate the confederated Cities, they appointed Receivers and Treasurers, and beganne to leuie money, according to their discretion, for the maintenance of the generall detence of Greece, and for the recovering of those places on Europe side, in Alia the leffe, and the Islands, from the Persians. This tribute (the first that was ever payed by the Greekes) amounted to foure hundred and threefcore Talents; which was rayled easily by the honest care of that just man Aristides, to whose discretion all the confederates referred themselves, and no one man found occasion to complaine of him. But as the vertue of Ariftides, and other worthy Citizens, brought vnto 10 the Athenians great commodities so the desire which they conceived of encreasing their commoditie, corrupted their vertue, and robbing them of the generall love, which had made them powerfull, abandoned their Citie to the defence of her treafure, which with her in the next age perished. For it was not long cre these foure hundred & threescore Talents were raysed to fixe hundred, nor long, after that, ere their conctous Tyrannie had connerted their followers into slaves, and extorted from them yeerely thirteene hundred Talents. The Isle of Delos was at the first appointed for the Treasure-house wherein these summes were layd vp; and where, at the generall affemblie, the Captaines of those forces, sent by the confederates. were for forme sake called to consultation. But the Athenians, who were stronger 20 by sea than all Greece besides, had lockt vp the common treasure in an Island, under their owne protection, from whence they might transport it at their pleasure, as afterward they did.

The generall Commaunder in this Warre was Cimon, the sonne of Miltiades, who first tooke Eiona, vpon the River Strimon; then the Isle of Sciros, inhabited by the Dolopes: they maftered the Cariffy, and brought into servitude the Naxy, contrarie to the forme of the confederacie: So did they other the inbabitants of Greece, if at any time they fayled of their contribution, or disobeyed their commaundements, taking vpon them and vsurping a kind of soueraigne authority ouer the rest: which they exercised the more assuredly, because they were now become 20 Lords of the Sea, and could not be relisted. For many of the confederated Cities and Nations, wearie of the warre in their owne persons, and given vp altogether to their ease, made choise rather to pay their parts in money, than either in men of warre, or in shippes; leaving the provision of both to the Athenians. Heereby the one grew weake in all their Sea-defences, and in the exercise of the Warres; the other greatly strengthened their Nauie and their experiences, being alwayes armed and imployed in honourable Seruices, at the cost of those, who having lifted them into their Saddles, were now enforced to become their footmen. Yet was the Tribute-money, leuied vpon these their consederates, employed so well by the Athenians at the first (as ill proceedings are often founded vpon good be- 40 ginnings) that no great cause of repining was given. For they rigged out a great Fleet of Gallies, very well manned, wherewith cimon the Admirall scouring the Asiaticke Seas, tooke in the Citie of Phaselis; which baying formerly pretended neutralitie, and refuled to relieue, or any way affilt the Greekes, were enforced to pay tenne Talents for a fine, and so to become followers of the athenians, paying yeerely contribution.

From thence hee fet fayle for the Riner Eurymedon in Pamphylia, where the Persian Fleet rode, being of sixe hundred sayle, or (according to the most sparing report) three hundred and fiftie, and having a great Land-Armic, encamped vpon the shoare; all which forces having beene prouded for advauncing the Kings af 50 faires in Greece, were vtterly defeated in one day, and two hundred thippes taken by the Athenians, the rest being broken to pieces, or sunke, ere ever they had fwomme in the Greekish Seas. Cimon having in one day obtained two great victories, the one by the Sea, and the other by Land, was very soone presented with a third. For fourescore layle of Phanicians (who were the best of all Sea men, vnder the Persian commaund) thinking to have joyned themselves with the Fleet before destroyed, arrived vpon the same Coast, ignorant of what had passed, and searing nothing leffe than what enfued. Vpon the first notice of their approach.Cimon weighed anchor, & meeting them at an head-Land, called Hydra, did fo amaze them, that they only fought to runne themselves on ground; by which meane preferuing few of their men, they loft all their shippes. These losses did so breake the courage of the Persian, that, omitting all hope of prenailing vpon Greece, he condifcended to what focuer Articles it pleased the Athenians to propound, graunting li-10 berrie vnto all the Greekes inhabiting Asia; and further covenanting. That none of his shippes of Warre should sayle to the Westward of the Isles, called Cyanea and

This was the most honourable peace that ever the Greekes made; neither did they in effect, after this time, make any warre that redounded to the profit or glory of the whole Nation, till fuch time as, vnder Alexander, they overthrew the Empire of Persia; in which Warrefew, or perhaps none of them, had any place of great commaund, but ferued altogether under the Macedonians.

The death of XERXES by the treason of ARTABANVS.

Esides these losses, which could not easily have been erepaired, the troubles of the Empire were at this time fuch, as gaue just cause to the Persian of seeking peace vpon any tearmes not altogether into-lerable. For Artabanus, the process of versions and seeking peace vpon any tearmes not altogether into-King his mafter did eafily take small occasions to shead the bloud of fuch, as in kindred or place were neere vnto him, beganne to repose lesse hope of 20 fafetic in remaining faithfull, than of obtaining the Soueraignetic, by destroying a Prince that was so hated for his crueltie, and despised for his cowardise and misfortunes. Having conceived this Treason, he found meanes to execute it by Mithridates an Eunuch, in such close manner, that (as if he himselfe had beene innocent) he accused Darius the sonne of Xerxes, and caused him to suffer death as a Parricide. Whether it be true, that by this great wickednesse he got the Kingdome, and held it feuen moneths; or whether intending the like euill to Artaxerxes the sonne of xerxes, he was by him presented and surprised, it were hard to affirme any certainetie. But all Writers agree vpon this, That taken he was, and with his whole familie put to death by extreme torments, according to the fentence, whereof the 40 truth is more anneient than the Verse.

ð. IIII.

The banifoment of THEMISTOCLES: His flight to ARTAXERXES newly raigning in Persia; and his death.

R TAXERXES being established in his Kingdome, and having so Compounded with the Athenians, as the present necessitie of his affaires required, began to conceive new hopes of better fortune against the Greekes, than he or his predecessors had ever hitherto found. For 10 the people of Athens, when the Persians were chased out of Greece, did so highly value their owne merites in that service, that they not onely thought it fit for themselves to become the Commanders over many Townes and Islands of the Greekes, but, euen within their owne wals, they would admit none other forme of Gouernment than meerely Democraticall. Herein they were fo insolent. that no integritic nor good defert was able to preserve the estate of any such as had borne great office, longer than, by flattering the rafcall multitude, he was contented to frame all his words and deedes to their good liking.

This their intolerable demeanour much offended Themistocles; who, though in former times he had layed the foundations of his greatnesse vpon popularitie, yet 20 now prefuming upon his good feruices done to the State, hee thought that with great reason they might graunt him the libertie to checke their inordinate proceedings. But contrariwife, they were so highly offended with his often rehearling the benefits which they had received from him, that they layed vpon him the punishment of Ostracisme, whereby he was banished for tenne yeeres, as a man ouer-burthensome to the Commonwealth.

Before the time of his returne was halfe expired, a new accusation was brought against him by the Lacedamonians, who charged him of consulting with Paulanias, about betraying the whole Countrey of Greece vnto Xerxes. Heercupon Themi-Rocles finding no place of fecuritie against the malice of two such mightic Cities, was 30 driven, after many troublesome flights, and dangerous removings, to adventure himselfe into Persia; where he found Artaxerxes newly settled, and was by him very honourably entertained. But the great hope which Artaxerxes had conceived of advauncing his affaires by the counsell and affistance of Themistocles, proved altogether fruitlesse. For when the Athenians, in fauour of Inarus the Lybian, (who infested £gypt, causing it to rebell against the Persian) had sent a Fleet to Sea, landing an Armie in Egypt, and scowring those Easterne Seas, to the great hinderance of Artaxerxes, and (for ought that I can understand) to the manifest breach of that peace, which to their great honour they had concluded with xerxes; then did the King fend his Letters to Themistocles, requiring him to make good the hopes which 40 he had given, of affuring the Persian estate against the Greekes.

But whether Themistocles perceiued much vnlikelinesse of good successe, in leading a great Armie of dastardly Persians against the warlike people of Greece; or else (as in favour of his vertue it is more commonly reported) the loue of his Countrey would not permit him to feeke honour by the ruine of it : fureit is othat being appointed by Artaxerxes to vindertake the conductiof great forces against the Athenians, hee decided the great conflict betweene thankfulnesse to his well-deserving Prince, and naturall affection to his owneill-descruing people, by finishing his life with a cup of poyfon. 50

How the Athenians, breaking the peace, which to their great honour they had made with the Persian, were shamefully beaten in Agypt.

Hen was Artaxerxes driven to vie the service of his owne Captaines in the Agyptian warre, wherein it appeared well, That a just cause is a good defence against a strong enemic. An Athenian Fleet of two hundred faile strong was fent forth under Cimon, to take in the Isle of Cyprus: which conquest seemed easie both to make and to maintaine.

the Persian being vtterly broken at Sea, and thereby vnable to relieve the Island. Now although it were so, that a peace had been concluded, which was likely to have beene kept fincerely by the Persian, who had made so good proofe of the Gracian valour, that he was nothing desirous to build any shippes of Warre (without which the Greekes could receive no harme from him) whereof if any one should be found fayling towards Greece, the peace was immediately broken, and if not, his whole efface; yet all the Sea-coast (no small part of his Dominions) exposed to the waste of an enemie too farre ouer-matching him. Yet whether the Athenians were 20 in doubt, lest the league which in his owne worser fortunes hee had made with them, he would breake in theirs; and therefore fought to get fuch affurance into their hands, as might veterly disable him from attempting ought against them; or whether the increase of their revenues and power, by adding that rich and great Iland to their Empire, caused them to measure honour by profit; they thought it the wifest way, to take whilest they might, whatsoener they were able to get and hold, and he vnable to defend.

The 1le of Cypres lying in the bottome of the straights betweene Cilicia, Syria and Ægypt, is very fitly seated for any Prince of State, that being mighty at Sea, doth either seeke to enrich himselse by trade with those Countries, or to infest one or 30 more of them when they are his enemies. And this being the purpose of the Athenians, their Ambition which had already denoured, in conceir, this Iland, was on the sodaine well-nigh choaked with a greater morsell, to smatch at which, they let Cyprus alone, which they might easily have swallowed and digested. For Inaries King of the Lybians confining Egypt, having found how greatly the Country was exhausted by the late warres, and how weakely defended by very slender Persian garrifons, conceived rightly, that if fuch small forces as the Satrapa or Viceroy could make on the fodaine of his owne Gardes, or leuic out of the ordinarie Garrifons, were by him defeated; the naturalls of the Countrey, not long fince oppressed by Cambys, and after a repolt very lately subdued by Xerxes, would soone breake faith with him who had no other title to that kingdome than a good fword. Further, he perfwaded himselfe that the people, vnable to defend themselves against the Persians without his affiftance; would eafily be drawne to accept him, the author of their deliuerance for king. Neither did this hope deceive him. For having taken and cruelly flaine Achamenes the Viceroy; divers Cities forthwith declared themselves for him, and proclayming him king, shewed the most of their endcuour for profecution of the warre. But hee confidering his owne weakenesse, and that the meanes of the Agyptians his adherents were not answerable to their desires, perceived wel, thatto relist the power of Artaxernes, farre greater forces than his and theirs were to be procured, at what price focuer he obtained them. Therefore hearing of the 30 great Athenian fleete, and knowing well the vertue of the fouldiers therein embarqued; he inuited the Commaunders to thate with him the kingdome of £gypt, as a farre greater reward of their adventure, than such an addition as that of Cyprus could be to their estate. Whether hee orthey (if things had wholy sorted according to their expectation) would have beene contented with an equal share, and not have tallen out in the partition, were perhaps a divination vnnecessarie. Hee was possessed of the peoples love, they were of most power. But the issue of those affaires was such as left them nothing to comunicate but mistortunes, which they thared somewhat equally. Yet had the beginnings of their enterprise very good and hopefull successe: For they entred the Land as farre as to Memphis, the principall Citie; and of the Citie it selfe they tooke two parts: to the thard part, which was called the White wall, they layd such hard siege, that neither those forces of the Persians, which then were in Agype, were strong enough to remove them; neither could Artaxerxes wel denile what meanes to vie for the recovery of that which was loft, or for the preservation of the remainder. The best of his hope was by to fetting the Lacedamonians upon Athens, to enforce the Athenians to looke homewards to their owne defence. This was the first time that the Persian sought to procure alhitance of the Greekes one against the other, by stirring them vp with gold to the entertainement of private quarrels, for the good of their common enemie. To this purpose he sent Megahazus to Sparta with much Treasure; who, after great expence, finding that the Lacedamonians were nothing forward in imploying their whole force against the Athenians, whome in many conflicts of great importance they had found to be their matches, not with flanding the absence of their Armie in £gypt; he thought it his wifest way to imploy the rest of his money & meanes to their reliefe, who had now the space of fixe yeeres defended his malters right in 20 Agypt. Therefore he hastily dispatched another of his name, the sonne of Zopyrus, who arriving in Egypt, was first encountred by the revolted people: over whome he obtained a victoric, which made him master of the Countrey, whilest the Athenians lay busied about Memphis the great Citie. It cannot be doubted, that long abode in a strange ayre, and want of supply, had much enseebled the Athenis ans: sure it is, that when Megabazus, having reduced the Countrey to obedience, attempted the Citie it selfe, whether his former successe had amended the courage of the Persians, or want of necessaries made the Athenians inferior to themselues, he chased them out of Memphis, and pursued them so neere, as they were forst to fortifie themselves in the Isle of Prosopites, where Megabazus, after eighteene 30 moneths siege, turning away one part of the River by divers Trenches, assaulted the Athenian without impediment of waters, tooke their Gallies, and put all to the fword, saue a few that saued themselves by flight into Lybia; the same entertainement had fiftie other Gallies which they sent to the succour of the first two hunwillis, between the out-let cal- dred. For those Athenians having heard nothing that their Fleet and Armie was consumed, entred by the branch of Nilus, called Mendesium, and fell vnawares among the Phanician Gallies and the Persian Armie; so as the Persians recoucred all of Nilus, called Agypt, but that part held by Amyrtem, and Inarus the King of Lybis, being by them taken and hanged. This was the end of the Athenians fixe yeeres warre in Egypt, the Sea by the and the reward of their vanitie and indifferetion to vndertake many enterprises at 40

Of other Warres made by the Athenians for the most part with good successe, about the same time.

Otwithstanding these overthrowes in Agnot, yet the Athenians in their home-warres waded through many difficulties, and held thereputation of their forces against the Lacedamonians, Corinthians, and 50 others, rather to their advantage than otherwise. For as they were beaten neere unto Halia by the Corinthians & Epidaurians, so they obtained two great victories soone after; the one ouer the Peloponnesians, neere vnto Cecryphalia; the other ouer the Aginets, neere vnto Agina; where they funke and carried away threefcore and ten Gallies of their Enemies. Furthermore, they landed their forces on the suddaine, and besieged Egina, from whence they could not be moved, notwithstanding that the Corinthians, to divert them, invaded Megara: where, after a great fight, with equall loffe, the Corinthians, when they returned againe to fet vp their Trophie, as Victors in the former battaile, were vtterly broken and flaughtered by the Athenian Garrisons, and Megarians, to their great loffe and dishonour.

Againe, as the Athenians were discomfitted neere to Tanagra, by the Lacedemonians, who returned from the fuccour of the Dorians against the Phocians, (at which 10 time the The Salian horse-men turned from their Allies the Athenians, and fought against them) so about threescore daies after, the Athenians entred Buotia vnder the conduct of Myronides, where beating that Nation, they wanne Phocis on the gulfe Ceteus, and euened the walls of Tanagra to the ground. Finally, they enforced Agins to render upon most base conditions; as to beat downe the walls of their Citie, and to give them hostages for Tribute; the siege whereof they had continued, norwithfianding all their other brabbles and attempts elsewhere. Besides these victories they fackt and spoiled many places upon the Sea-coast of Peleponnesis, belonging to the Laced amonians; wan vpon the Corenthians, and overthrew the Sicronians that came to their fuccour. These were the vindertakings of the Athenians, and 20 their Allies, during the time of those fixe yeeres that a part of their forces made warre in Agypt. In the end whereof they attempted Theffalte, perswaded thereunto by Ozefles, but were refifted by th. King Pharfalus, who had chased Ozefles out of his Dominions. They also landed in Segonia, and had victorie ouer those that resifled, after which they made truce with the Peloponnesians for flue vecres, and sent Cimon into Cyprus with two hundred theps, but they were againe allured by Amyr. tem one of the race of their former Kings, who held the Marish & Wooddie parts of Agypt from the Persians, to whom they sent sixtic of their ships. The rest of their Armie failing in their enterprise of Cyprus, and their fortunate and victorious Leader Cymon dying there, as they coasted the Hand, incountred a fleet of the Pho-30 nicians and Cilicians, oner both which Nations they returned victorious into Greece: as also those returned lafe which were sent into Azypt.

Of ARTAXERNES LONGIMANUS, that he was AHASHVEROSH the husband of Queene HESTER.

Hele Agyptian troubles being ended, the raigne of Artaxernes continued peaceable, wherof the length is by some restrained into twentie yeeres, but the more and better Authors gine him fortie, fome allow voto him foure and fortie. He was a Prince of much humanitie, and noted for many examples of gentlenesse. His fauour was exceeding great to the lewes, as appeareth by the Histories of Esdras and Nehemias, which

To proue that this was the King who gave countenance and aide to that great worke of building the Temple, it were a needeleffe trauaile; confidering that all the late Divines have taken very much paine, to shew that those two Prophets were licenfed by him, and fuccoured in that building, in fuch fort as appeares in 50 their writings.

This was likewise that King Abasbueros who married Hester. Wherof if it be needfull to give proofe, it may suffice. That Abashueroshlived in Susa, raigning from India to Athiopia, and therefore must have beene a Persian; That he lived in peace, as appeares by the circumstances of the Historie, and vsed the counsaile of the seuen Hhhh Princes, the authoritie of which Princes beganne under Darits, the sonne of Hyllas. pes, wherefore he could be neither Cyrus nor Cambyfes.

The continual Warres which exercised King Darius the sonne of Hystaspes, together with the certainety of his marriages with fundry wives, from none of whom he was divorced, but left his first wife Atoffa, the daughter of Cyrus, alive in great honour, thee being mother to Xerxes the succeeding King; doe manifestly proone that Hester was not his. Whereunto is added by Philo the Iew, That at the perswafion of Mardochaus, Joiachim the high Priest the sonne of Jesus, caused the feast of Purim to be instituted in memoric of that deliuerance. Now the time of Iotachim was in the raigne of Artaxerxes, at the comming of Efdras, and Nehemias: Iefua his to father dying about the end of Darius.

The same continuance of warres, with other his furious and tragical loues. wherewith Xerxes did confume fuch little time, as hee had free from warre, are cnough to proue, that the floric of Hester pertained not vnto the time of Xerxes, who lived but one and twentie veeres, whereas the two & thirtieth of Abaluerus or Artasastha is expressed by Nehemias. Againe, it is well knowne, that Xerxes in the seuenth yeere of his raigne (wherein this marriage must have been celebrated) came not neere to Sufa. Of the Princes that succeeded Artaxerxes Longimanus, to proone that none of them could be Abalbuerolb, it is enough to fay, that Mardockaus hauing beene carried from Hierusalem captine, with Iechonia, by Nebuchadnezzar, was 20 vnlikely to have lived vnto their times.

But of this Artaxerxes it is true, that he lived in Sufa, raigned from India to Athiopia, liued in peace, was contemporarie with Ioiakim the high Priest; and further he had happily by his Lieutenants reclaimed the rebellious Agyptians in that seuenth veere of his raigne; which good fortune might well give occasion to such a Royall feast, as is described in the beginning of the booke of Hester. This is the fumme of the arguments, brought to proue the age of Heffers storic by the learned and diligent Krentzhemius, who addes the authorities of Issephus, affirming the fame, and of Philo, giving to Mardochaus eighteene yeeres more than Isaac the Patriarch lived, namely, one hundred fourescore and eighteene yeers in all, which ex- 20 pire in the five and thirtieth of yeere of this Artaxerxes, if we suppose him to have beene carried away captine, being a Boy of ten yeeres old.

Of the troubles in Greece, foregoing the Peloponnesian Warre.

> Vt it is fit that we now returne to the affaires of the Greekes, who from this time forward, more vehemently profecuting their civill warres, fuffered the Persians for many ages to rest in peace: this £ gyptian ex- 40 2 pedition being come to nought. Soone after this, the Laced amonians vndertooke the warre called, Sacred, reconered the Temple and Ile of

Delphos, and deliuered both to the inhabitants; but the Athenians regained the fame, and gaue it in charge to the Phocians. In the meane while the banished Baotians reentred their owne Land, and mastred two of their owne Townes possess by the Athenians, which they soone recourred againe from them; but in their returne towards Athens, the Baetians, Eubaans, and Locreans, (Nations oppress by the Athenians) fet vpon them with fuch resolution, as the Athenians were in that fight all flaine or taken, whereby the Bæstians recovered their former libertie, restoring to the Athenians their prisoners. The llanders of Eubaa tooke such courage vpon this, 70 that they revolted wholly from the Athenians, whom when Pericles intended to reconquer, he was aducrtifed that the Megarians, (who first left the Lacedamonians, and submitted themselves to Athens) being now wearie of their yoke, had slaine the Athenian Garrisons, and joyned themselves with the Corinthians, Sicyonians, and Epidaurians. These newes hastened Pericles homeward with all possible speede : but ere he could recouer Attica, the Pelaponnesians, led by Plistoanax, the sonne of Paufanias, had inuaded it, pillaged, and burnt many parts thereof; after whose returne Pericles went on with his first intentand recovered Eubwa. Finally, the Athenians beganne to treat of peace with the Peloponne fians, and yeelded to deliner up all the places which they held in the Country of Peloponne [w: and this truce was made for thirtie yeeres. After fixe of these yeeres were expired, the Athenians (fauouring the Mylesians against the Samians) inuaded Samos by Pericles, and after many repulses. and some great losses, both by Sea and Land, the citizens were fore't to yeeld them-10 selues vpon most lamentable conditions; Namely, to deliuer vp all their ships, to breakedowne their own walls, to pay the charge of the warre, and to reflore whatfoeuer had beene taken by themselues, or by their practice, from the Athenians. In the necke of which followed that long and cruell Peleponnesian Warre, whereof I have gathered this briefe following: the same contention taking beginning fiftie veeres after the flight of Xerxes out of Greece. But because there was no Citie there. of which either in the beginning of this warre, or in the continuance of it, was not drawne into the quarrell: I hold it convenient now at the first to show briefly the effate of the Countrie at that time, and especially the condition of those two great Cities, Athens, and Sparta, upon which all the rest had most dependance.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Peloponnesian Warre.

ò. I.

Vpon what termes the two principal Cities of Greece, Athens and Sparta, flood, at the beginning of the Peloponnesian Warre.

R BECE was never united under the governement of any one Prince or Effate; vntill Philip of Macedon, and after him Alexander, brought them rather to a Vnion and League against the Persian, whereof they were Captaines, than into any absolute subjection. For euery Estate held their owne, and were gouerned by Lawes farre different, and by their owne Magistrates, notwithstanding the power of the Macedonians, to whom they did yeld obedience no otherwise than as to fuch, who were (perforce) their leaders in the Perfi-an warre (deemed the General quarrell of Greece) and tooke the profit and honor of the victorie, to their owne vseand increase of greatnesse. But the Kings which afterwards raigned in Macedonia, did so farre enlarge their authoritie, that all Greece was by them brought vnder fuch obedience, as differed little from feruitude; verv for few excepted, who could hardly, sometimes with armes, and sometimes with gifts, prescrue their liberty; of whom the Lacedamonians and Athenians were chiefe: which two people deserved best the plague of tyrannie, having first given occasion thereunto, by their great ambition, which wearied and weakened all the Countrie by perpetuall Warre. For vntill these two Cities of Athens and Sparta distracted all Greece, drawing enery State into the quarrell, on the one or other fide, and so gaue beginning to the Peloponnesian warre (the effects whereof in true estimation ceased not, before the time that Philip had ouer-mastred all, forasmuch as every conclusion of one warre afforded hencesoorth matter to some new distraction of the whole Countrie) the warres, commenced between one Citie of Greece and an other, were neither great, nor of long continuance. All controversies were soone decided, either by the authoritie of the Amphistiones, who were the generall Councel of Greece; or by the power of the Lacedemonians, whose aide was commonly held as good as the assurance of victorie.

These Lacademonians had lived about foure hundred yeeres under one forme of 10 Gouernment, when the Peloponnesian warre beganne. Their education was onely to practile feates of Armes; wherein they so excelled, that a very few of them were thought equall to very great numbers of any other people. They were poore, and cared not much for wealth; every one had an equall portion of the common field, which sufficed to maintaine him in such manner of life as they vscd. For brauery they had none, and curious building or apparell they regarded not. Their diet was simple, their feasts and ordinarie meales being in common Halls, where all fared alike. They vsed money of yron, whereof they could not be couetous nor great hoarders. Briefly, they lived Vtopian-like, faue that they vsed no other occupation than Warre, placing all their felicitie in the glory of 20 their valour. Heereby it came to passe that in all enterprises, whereof they were partakers, the leading and high command was granted to them, and all Greece followed their conduct. But the Athenians were in all points contrarie to this. For they fought wealth, and measured the honors of their victories by the profit; they vsed mercenarie Souldiers in their warres, and exacted great tribute of their Subiects, which were for the most part Ilanders, compelled to obey them, because the Athenian fleet was great.

As in forme of policy, and in course of life, so in conditions naturall, the difference betweene these two people was very much. The Athenians were eager and violent, suddaine in their conclusions, and as hastic in the execution; The Lacede- 30 monians very flow in their deliberations, full of grauitic, but very resolute, and such as would in cold bloud performe what the Athenians did viually in flagrant. Wherby it came to passe, that the Lacedamonians had all the Estates of Greece depending vpon them, as on men firme and affured, that fought honour and not riches; wheras the Athenians were followed by such as obeyed them perforce, being held in straight subjection. But the Signorie of the Athenians was nothing large, vntill such time as the Persian Xerxes had inusded Greece, pretending onely a quarrel to Athens: For then the Citizens perceiuing well, that the Towne of Athens could not be defended against his great Armie of seuenteene hundred thousand men, bestowed all their wealth upon a Nauie, and (affisted by the other Grecians) ouerthrew the fleet 40 of xernes, whose Land-forces were soone after discomfitted by them, and the Greekes, who all served under conduct of the Spartans. After these victories, the Athenians being now very mightie in fleet, reduced al the Ilands of the Greekilb Seas under their obedience; imposing upon them a hard tribute, for maintenance (as they pretended) of warre against the Persian; though indeede they imploied their forces chiefly, to the conquest of such Ilands, and hauen-Townes, of their owne Countrimen, as food out against them. All which was easily suffered by the Lacedemonians, who were In-landers, and menthat delighted not in expeditions to be made farre from home. But afterwards perceiving the power of the Athenians to grow great, they held them in muchiclousie, and were very apt to quarrell with 50 them; but much more willing to breed contention betweene them and other Estates. Wherefore at such time as the Thebans would have oppressed the Plataans, when they of Platea repaired to Sparta for succour, they found there no other aide, than this aduice, That they should seeke helpe at Athens. Hereby it was was thought, that the Athenians should be intangled in a long and tedious Warre, with their neighbours of Thebes. But it produced otherwise; for their force was now so great, that all such occasions did onely serue to increase their honour and puissance.

ø./ II.

How Sparta and Athens entred into warre.

Euerthelesse many Estates of Greece were very ill affected to Athens, because that Citie grew very insolent vpon suddaine prosperitie, and maintaining the weaker Townes against the stronger, incroched a pacevpon their Neighbours, taking their dependants from them. Especially the Corinthians were much inraged, because the people of the Iland Coreyra, their Colonie which had rebelled against them, and given them agreat ouerthrow by Sea, was by the Athenians (who desired to increase their sleet by adioyning that of Coreyra vnto it) taken into protection, and the Corinthians thereby impeached of that revenge which else they would have taken. Now how-looked in the stronger of the Athenians were not directly against the conditions of peace agreed vpon among the Greekes, yet were the complaints made at Sparta so vehement, that (though with much a-doe) they concluded to redresse by warre the iniuries done to their Allies.

First therefore seeking religious pretences, they required the Athenians to expiate certaine offences committed against the gods; whereto having for answere, That they themseliues should expiate other the like offences, committed in Sparta; they beganne to deale plainely, and required that the people of some Townes, oppressed by the Estate of Athens, should be set at libertie; and that a decree made against those of Megara, whereby they were forbidden to enter any Port of the 30 Athenians, should be reversed. This last point they so earnessly pressed, that if they might obtaine it, they promised to absist from their purpose of making Warre.

This they desired, not as a matter of any great importance (for it was a trifle) but only that by seeming to have obtained somewhat, they might preserve their reputation without entring into a warre, which threatned them with greater difficulties apparent, than they were very willing to vnder-goc.

But the Athenians would yeeld to nothing; for it was their whole defire that all Greece (hould take notice, how farrethey were from feare of any other Citie. Hereupon they prepared on both fides verie strongly, all that was needfull to the Warre; wherein the Lacedamonians were Superiour, both in number and qualitie, 40 being assisted by most of the Cities in Greece; and having the general sauour, as men that pretended to set at libertie such as were oppressed: but the Athenians did as farre exceede them in all provisions of Money, Shipping, Engines, and absolute power of command among their Subjects; which they held; and afterward sound of greater vse in such neede, than the willing readinesse of friends, who some grow wearie, and are not easily assembled.

à. III.

ò. III.

The beginning of the Peloponnesian warre.

He first and second yeeres expedition was very grieuous to the Citie of Athens. For the fields were wasted, the Trees cut downe; the Countrie people driuen to flie, with Wittes, Children, and Cattaile, into the Towne; whereby a most furious pestilence grew in the Citic, the revolt of the Mytilenians, in the lie of Lesbos, and the fiege of Plataatheir con- 10 federated Citie, which they durst not aduenture to raise, besides some small overthrowes received. The Lacedemonians aftembling as great forces as they could raile out of Peloponne [us, did in the beginning of Summer enter the Countric of Attica, and therein abide, vntill victuals beganne to faile, washing and destroying all things round about: The Gouernours of the Athenians would not suffer the people to iffue into the field against them; for they knew the valour of their Enemies: but vsed to send a fleet into Peloponnesius, which wasted as fast all the Sea-coast of their Enemics, whilest they were making warre in Attica. So the Peloponnessans being the stronger by Land, wannethe Towne of Platea, which wanted rescue; the Athenians likewise being more mightie by Sea, did subdue Mytilene which had re- 20 belled, but could not be succoured from Sparta. By these proceedings in that warre. the Lacedamonians beganne to perceiue how vnfit they were to deale with fuch enemies. For after that Attica was throughly wasted, it lay not greatly in their power to doe any offence equall to such harme as they themselves might, and did receive. Their Confederates beganne to set forward very flowly in their expeditions into Attica; perceiuing well that Athens was plentifully relicued with all necessaries, which came by the Sea from the Ilands that were subject vnto that Estate; and thereforetheseinuaders tooke small pleasure in beholding the walls of that mightie Citie, or in washing a forsaken field, which was to them a patterne of the calamities, with which their owne Territorie was the whilest afflicted. Wherefore they 30 beganne to set their care to build a strong Nauie, wherein they had little good successe, being easily vanquished by the Athenians, who both had more and better ships, and were so skilfull in Sea-fights, that a few Vessels of theirs durst undertake a great number of the Peloponnesians.

d. IIII.

Of the great losse which the Spartans received at Pylus.

Mong other losses which the Spartans had felt by Sea; they received 40 at Pylus a verie fore blow, that compelled them to sue for peace. A fleet of Athenian ships bound for Corcyra, wasting in that passage, as their manner was, the coast of Laconia, and all the halfe lie of Peloponnesus, was by contrarie windes detained at Pylus, which is a ragged Promontoric, joyning to the maine, by a strange necke of Land. Before it there lies a small barren Handof lesse than two miles compasse, and within that a creeke, which is a good harbour for ships, the force of weather being borne off by the head Land and Isle. This Promontorie the Athenians fortified, as well as in haste they might; and what was wanting in their artificiall fortification, was supplied by the naturall firength and fite of the place. By holding this piece of ground, 70 and hauen, they in reason expected many advantages against their enemies. For the Countrie adioyning was inhabited by the Messenians, who in ancient time had held very strong and cruell warre with Sparta; and (though quite subdued) they were held in straight subjection, yet was not the old hatred so extinguished, that by the necre neighbourhood and affiftance of the Athenians, it might not be excuiued. Furthermore it was thought, that many ill-willers to the Lacedamonians, and as many of their bond flaues as could escape from them, would repaire to Pylus. and from thence make daily excursions into Laconia, which was not farre off: Or it other hopes failed, yet would the benefit of this hauen, lying almost in the midway betweene them and Coreyra, make them able to fur-round all Peloponne wand walte it at their pleasure. The newes of these doings at Pylus, drew the Peloponnesians thither in all half out of Attica, which they had entred a few daies before with their whole Armie: but now they brought not only their Land-forces, but all their Nato vie to recover this piece, which how bad a neighbour it might prove in time, they well forefaw, little tearing the grieuous losse at hand, which they there in few daies received. For when they in vaine made a general lassalt on all sides, both by Sea and Land; finding that finall Garrison which the Athenians had left, very resolute in the defence: they occupied the hauen, placing fourehundred and twentie choice men all of them, Citizens of Sparta, in the Iland before mentioned, at each end whereof is a channell, that leades into the Port; but so narrow, that only two ships in front could enter betweene the Isle and Pylus; likewife but feuen or eight ships could enter at once by the further channell, betweene the Hand and the Maine. Hauing thus taken order to shut up this new Towne by Sea, they fent part of their

20 fleet to fetch wood, and other stuffe, where with to fortific round about, and blocke up the piece on all sides. But in the meane season, the Athenian fleet, hearing of their danger that were left at Pylus, returned thither, and with great courage entring the hauen, did breake and finke many of their Enemies veifels; tooke fine, and inforced the refidue to runne themselves a ground.

Now was the Towne secure, and the Spartans abiding in the Iland as good as loft. Wherefore the Magistrates were sent from Sparta to the camp (as was their custome ingreat dangers) to aduife what where best for the publike safetie; who when they did perceiue that there was no other way to rescue their Citizens out of the Ile, then by composition with their enemies, they agreed to entreat with the Athenians 30 about peace, taking truce in the meane while with the Captaines at Pylus. The conditions of the truce were, That the Lacedamonians should deliuer vp all the ships which were in the coast, and that they should attempt nothing against the Towne. nor the Athenians against the camp: That a certaine quantitie of Bread, Wine, and Flesh, should be daily carried into the Isle, but that no ships should passe into the Iland secretly: That the Athenians should carrie the Lacedemonian Embassadors to Athens, there to treat of peace, and should bring them backe, at whose returne the truce should end, which if in the meane time it were broken in any one point, should be held veterly void in all: That when the truce was expired, the Athenians should restore the Pelapannesian ships, in as good case as they received them. The 40 Embassadors comming to Athens, were of opinion, that as they themselves had begunne the warre, so might they end it when they pleased. Wherefore they told the Athenians how great an honour it was that the Lacedamonians did fue to them for peace, aduiting them to make an end of warre, whileft with fuch reputation they might. But they found all contrarie to their expectation: For in stead of concluding vpon euen termes, or desiring of meete recompence for losse sustained; the Athenians demanded certaine Cities to bee restored to them, which had beene taken from them by the Lacedamonians long before this warre beganne, refuling likewife to continue the treatic of peace, vnleffe the Spartans which were in the Ile, were first rendred vnto them as prisoners. Thus were the Embassago dours returned without effect; at which time the truce being ended, it was defired from the Athenian Captaines, that they should, according to their couenant, reflore the ships, which had been put into their handes. Whereto answere was made, that the condition of the truce was, That if any one article were broken, all should be held void now (said the Athenians) yee have affaulted our Garrisons, and thereby are we acquited of our promise to restore the ships. This and the like friuolous allegations which they made, were but meere shifts; yet profit so farre ouer-weighed honour, that better answere none could be got. Then were the Lacedemonians driuen to vie many hard meanes, for conuciance of victuals into the Isle; which finally was taken by force, and the men that were in it carried prisoners to Athens, where it was decreed, that when the Peloponnesians next inuaded Attica, these prisoners should all be slaine. Whether fearing the death of these men, or with held by the troubles, which (according to the Athenians hope) fell vpon them: the Lacedamonians were now fo farre from wasting Attica, that they suffered their owne Countrie to be continually ouer-runne, both by the Athenians, who landed 10 on all parts of their coast, and by those which issued out of Pylus; which became the Rendeuous of all that were ill-affected vnto them.

How the Lacedemonians hardly, and to their great disaduantage, obtained a peace, that was not well kept.

Herefore they indeuoured greatly to obtaine peace; which the Athenians would not harken vnto. For they were so puffed vp with the 20 continuance of good successe, that having senta few bands of men into Sicilie, to hold vp a faction there, and make what profit they might of the Sicilians quarrells; when afterward they heard that the differences in that Ile were taken away, and their bands returned without either gaine or losse, they banished the Captaines, as if it had beene meerely through their default, that the He of Sicilie was not conquered; which (besides the longer distance) was in power to offend others, or defend it selfe, no whit inferiour vnto Peloponnefus. Yet was this their ouer-weening much abated shortly after, by some disasters received, especially in Thrace, where in a battaile which they loft at Amphipelis, Cleon, and Brasidas, Generalls of the Athenian and Lacedamonian forces, were both 30 flaine; which two had most been eaduersaries to the peace. As the Atheniane by their losses were taught moderation; so the Lacedemonians, who not only felt the like wounds, but through the great Nauie which they had received at Pylus, were faine to proceede lamely in the warre, against such as, through commoditie of their good fleet, had all advantage that could be found in expedition, were feruently defirous to conclude the businesse, ere Fortune by any new fauour should reviue the insolence, which was at this time well mortified in their Enemies. Neither was it only a consideration of their present estate, that vrged them to bring the treatie of peace to good and speedy effect; but other dangers hanging over their heads, and ready to fall on them, which vnlesse they compounded with the Athenians, they 40 knew not how to avoide. The estate of Argos, which had ancient enmitte with them, was now, after a truce of thirtie yeeres well-nigh expired, ready to take the benefit of their present troubles, by joyning with those who alone found them worke enough. Arges was a rich and strong Citie, which though inseriour to Sparta in valour, yet was not so vnwarlike, nor held such ill correspondence with the neighbouring Estates, that the Lacedemonians could ever farre prevaile vpon it, when they had little else to doe. This was a thing that in the beginning of this Warre had not been eregarded. For it was then thought, that by wasting the Territoric of Athens with sword and fire, the quarrell should easily and in short time haue beene ended, whereby not only the Athenians should haue beene brought to 50 good order, but the Corinthians and others, for whose sake the warre was vnder-taken, have beene so firmely knit to the Lacedamonians, that they should for love of them have abandoned the Argines, to their owne fortunes. But now the vanitie of those hopes appeared, in that the Athenians abounding in ready money, and meanes

to raise more, were able to secure themselves by a strong fleet, from any great harme, that the Peloponnesians wanting wherewith to maintaine a Nauie, could doe vnto them, yea as Masters of the Sea, to wearie them out, as in effect alreadic they had done. As for the Confederates of Sparta, they could now endure neither warre nor peace; their daily trauailes, and many losses had so wearied and incensed them. Wherefore the Lacedamonians were glad to vse the occasion, which the inclination of their enemies did then afford, of making a finall peace, which with much a-doe they procured, as seemed equal and easie; but were indeede impossible to be performed, and therefore all their travaile was little effectuall. The restitution of prisoners and places taken being agreed vpon; it fell out by lot, that the Lacedamonians should restore first. These had won more townes upon the continent from the Athenians, than the Athenians had from them; but what they had wonne, they had not won absolutely. For they had restored some Towns to fuch of their Allies, from whom the State of Athens had taken them; some, and those the most, they had set at libertie (as reason required) which had opened their gates vnto them, as to their friends and delinerers, & not compelled them to breake in as Enemies. Now concerning the Townes which were not in their owne hands. but had beene rendred vnto their Confederates, the Spartans found meanes to give some satisfaction, by permitting the Athenians to retain others, which they had got-20 teninthe warre; as for the rest, they promised more than afterwards they could performe. The Cities which they had taken into protection, could not endure to heare of being abandoned, neither would they by any meanes yeeld themselues into the hands of their old Lords the Athenians, whom they had offended by revolting, notwithstanding whatsoeuer articles were drawne', and concluded, for their fecuritie, and betterance in time to come. This dull performance of conditions on the side of the Spartans, made the Athenians become as backward in doing those things which on their part were required; fo that restoring only the prisoners which they had, they deferred the reft, vntill fuch time as they might receive the full satisfaction, according to the agreement. But before such time as these difficul-20 ties brake out into matter of open quarrell, the Lacedamonians entred into a more straight alliance with the Athenians; making a league offensive and defensive with them. Hereunto they were moued by the backwardnesse of the Argines, who being(as they thought) likely to have fued for peace at their hands, as foone as things were once compounded betweene Athens and Sparta; did shew themselves plainly vnwilling to give eare to any fuch motion. Thinking therefore, that by cutting from Argos all hope of Athenian fuccour, they should make sure worke, the Spartans regarded nor the affections of other States, whom they had either bound vnto them by well-deserving in the late warre, or found so troublesome, that their enmitie (if perhaps they durft let it appeare) were little worse than friendship. It bred great 40 jelousie in all the Cities of Greece, to perceive such a conjunction betweene two so powerfull Signories: especially one clause threatning enery one, that was any thing apt to feare, with a fecret intent that might be harboured in their proud conceints. offubduing the whole Countrie, and taking each what they could lay holdon. For belides the other articles, it was agreed, That they might by mutuall consent adde new conditions, or alter the old at their owne pleasures. This impression wrought fo frongly in the Corinthians, Thebans, & other ancient Confederates of Sparta, that the hate which they had borne to the Athenians their professed Enemies, was violently throwne vpon the Lacedamonians their vnjust friends: whereby it came to passe, that they who had lately borne chiefe sway in Greece, might have beene abanso doned to the discretion of their Enemies, as alreadie in effect they were, had the Enemies wisely vsed the aduantage.

CHAP.8. S.6.

ð. V I.

Of the negotiations, and practices, held betweene many States of Greece, by occasion of the peace that was concluded.

He admiration wherein all Greece held the valour of Sparta as vnrefiftable, and able to make way through all impediments, had beene so excessive, that when by some sinister accidents, that Citie was compelled to take and seeke peace, vpon termes not sounding very to honourable, this common opinion was not only abated, but (as happens vsually in things extreme) was changed into much contempt. For it was neuer thought that any Lacedamonian would have endured to lay downe his weapons and yeeld himselfe prisoner, northat any misfortune could have beene so great, as should have drawne that Citie to relieue it selfe otherwise than by force of Armes. But when onceit had appeared that many of their Citizens, among whom were fome of especiall marke, being ouer-laied by enemies, in the lland before Pylus, had rather chosen to live in captivitie, than to die in fight; and that Pylow it selfe, flicking as a thorne in the foot of Laconia, had bred fuch anguish in that Estate, as vtterly wearying the accustomed Spartan resolution, had made it sit downe, and 20 seeke to refresh it selfe by dishonourable ease: then did not only the Corinthians and Thebans beginne to conceiue basely of those men which were vertuous, though vnfortunate; but other lesser Cities joyning with these in the same opinion, did cast their eies vpon the rich and great Citie of Arges, of whose abilitie, to doe much, they conceived a strong beliefe, because of long time it had done nothing. Such is the base condition, which through foolish enuie is become almost naturall in the greater part of mankinde. We curiously search into their vices, in whom, had they kept some distance, we should have discerned only the vertues; and comparing injuriously our best parts with their worst, are justly plagued with a false opinion of that good in strangers which we know to be wanting to our selues.

The first that published their dislike of Sparta were the Corinthians, at whose vehement entreaty (though moued rather by enuic at the greatnesse of Athens dayly encreasing) the Lacedamonians had entred into the present warre. But these Corinthians did only murmure at the peace, alleadging as grieuances, that some townes of theirs were left in the Athenians hands. The Mantingans, who during the time of warre, had procured some part of the Arcadians to become their followers, and forfake their dependency vpon the State of Sparta, did more freely & readily discouer themselues; seare of revenge to come working more effectually, than indignation at things already past. The Argines feeling the gale of prosperous Fortune that began to fill their failes, prepared themselves to take as much of it as they could stand vn. 40 der; giving for that purpose vnto twelve of their citizens, a full and absolute commission to make alliance betweene them and any freecities of Greece (Athens and Sparta excepted) without any further trouble of propounding every particular bufinesse to the multitude. When the gates of Argos were set thus open to all commers ; the Mantineans began to lead the way, and many Cities of Peloponnesses following them entred into this new confederacy; some incited by private respects, others thinking it the wifest way to doe as the most did. What inconvenience might arise to them by these courses, the Lacedamonians easily discerned, and therefore sent Embassadors to stoppe the matter at Corinth, where they well perceived that the mischiese had beene hatched. These Embassadors found in the Corinthians a very 50 rough disposition, with a gravity expressing the opinion which they had conceived of their present advantage over Sparta. They had caused all Cities which had not entred yet into the alliance with Argos, to fend their Agents to them, in whose presence they gaue audience to the Lacedamonians; the purport of whose Embassie was this: That the Corinthians, without breach of their oath, could not for fake the alliance, which they had long fince made with Sparta, and that reason did as well binde them to hold themselves contented with the peace lately made, as religion enforced them to continue in their auncient confederacy, for asmuch as it had bin agreed betweene the Spartans and their affociates, that the confent of the greater part, (which had yeelded vnto peace with Athens) should binde the leffer number to performe what was concluded, if no Dinine impediment with flood them. Heereunto the Corinthians made answere, that the Spartans had first begun to do them open wrong, in concluding the warre wherein they had lost many places, without 10 provision of restitution; & that the very clause, alledged by the Embassadors, did acquite them from any necessity of subscribing to the late peace, for a smuch as the had fworne vnto those people whom they perswaded to rebell against Athens, that they would neuer abandon them, nor willingly suffer them to fall agains into the tyrannous hands of the Athenians. Wherefore they held themselues bound both in reason and religion to vse all meanes of vpholding those, whom by common confent they had taken into protection; for that an oth was no leffe to be accounted a Dinine impediment, than were pestilence, tempest, or any the like accident, hindering the performance of things vndertaken. As for the alliance with Argos, they faid that they would doe as they should finde cause. Having dismissed the Embassadors 20 with this answere, they made all hast to joyne themselves with Argos, and caused on ther States to doe the like; fo that Sparta and Athens were in a manner left to themselves, the Thebans and Megarians being also vpon the point to have entred into this new confederacie. But as the affections were divers, which caused this hastie confluence of fudden friends to Argos, it so likewise came to passe that the friendthip it felfe, such as it was, had much diversitie both of sinceritie & of continuance. For some there were that hated or scared the Lacedamonians: as the Mantingans and Eleans: these did-firmly betake themselves to the Argines, in whom they knew the fame affection to be inuctorate; others did only hate the peace concluded; & these would rather have followed the Spartans than the Argines in warre, yetrather the 30 Argines in war than the Lacedamonians in peace. Of this number were the Corinthians, who knowing that the Thebans were affected like vnto themselves, dealt with them to enter into the focietie of the Argues, as they had done: but the different formes of government, vsed in Thebes and Argos, caused the Thebanes to hold rather with Sparta, that was ruled by the principall men, than to incurre the danger of innouation, by joyning with fuch as committed the whole rule to the multitude.

This businesse having ill succeeded, the Corinthians beganne to bethinke themsclues of their owne danger, who had not so much as any truce with Athens, and yet were unprepared for warre. They fought therefore to come to some temporarie agreement with the Athenians, and hardly obtained it. For the Athenians, who had 40 dealt with all Greece at one time, did not greatly care to come to any appointment, with one citie that shewed against them more stomach than force; but gaue them tounderstand that they might be safe enough from them, if they would claime the benefit of that alliance, which Athens had lately made with Sparta and her dependants; vet finally they granted vnto these Corinthians (which were loth to acknowledge themselves dependants of Sparta) the truce that they desired; but into private confederacie they would not admit them, it being an article of the league betweene them and the Spartans, That the one should not make peace nor warre

Heerein, as in many other passages, may clearely be seene the great advantage 50 which absolute Lords have as well in peace as in warre, ouer such as are served by voluntaries. We shall hardly finde any one Signorie, that hath beene so constantly followed as Sparta was by so many States, and some of them little inferior to it self, being all as free: whereas contrariwife, the Athenians had lately, and by compulfine meanes gotten their Dominion, wherein they demeaned themselues as Tyrants.

But in performance of conditions agreed vpon, the Athenians were able to make their wordes good, by excluding any State out of their Confederacie, and giving vp such places as were agreed vpon: of which the Lacedemonians could doe neither the one nor the other. For such Townes as their old Allies had gotten by their meanes in the late warre, could not be restored without their consent, which had them in present possession; and particularly the Towne of Panalle, which the Thebans held, could by no meanes be obtained from them by the Lacedemonians (who earnessly desired it; that by restitution thereof vnto the Athenians, ascernessly demanding it, them so like the such the such that the such that be contrarie to the last agreement betweene them and Athens.

The Lacedemonians having broken one article of the league made between them and the Athenians, that by so doing they might enable themselues to the performance of another, were shamefully disappointed of their hopes by the Thebans, who did not giue vp the Towne of Panatte, till first they had vtterly demolished it. and made it of no worth to the Athenians. This was fought to have beene excused by the Lacedemonian Embassadours, who comming to Athens (whither they bed fent home all prisoners that had beene detained at Thebes) hoped with gentle words to salue the matter; saying, That from henceforth no enemie to Athens should nessle in Panacte, for it was destroied. But these Embassadours had not to deale with 20 tame fooles. For the Athenians told them in plaine termes, That of three principall conditions agreed vpon in their late League, they had not performed any one, but yled fuch bate collusion as stood not with their honour: having made private alliavec with the Thebans; having destroiced a Towne that they should have restored; and not nating forced their dependants by warre, to make good the couenants of the late concluded peace. Hereupon they dismissed the Embassadors with rough words, meaning with as rough deedes to anger those that sent them.

There were at that time, both in Athens and Sparta, many that were ill-contented with the peace: among whom were the Ephori, chosen for that yeere, in Sparta: and Alcibiades a powerfull yong Gentleman in Athens. But the Ephori, though de- 30 firing to renew the warre, yet wished that first they might get from the Athenians as much as was to beerendred to them by couenant, especially Pylus that had so forely troubled them. Aleibiades, whose Nobilitie, riches, and fauour, with the people, made him desire warre, as the meanes, whereby himselfe might procure some honourable emploiment, vsed all meanes to set the quarrell on foot, whilest the Athenians had yet both advantage enough, as not having rendred ought faue their prisoners, and pretence enough to vie that advantage of breaking the peace, by reafon that the Lacedamonians (though indeede against their wills) had broken all couenants with them. Now the State of Athens had fully determined to retaine Fylus, and to performe nothing that the Lacedamonians should, and might require, vittil 40 they had first, without any longer halting, fulfilled all articles wherunto they were bound, even to the vtmost point. This was enough to make them sweat, who hauing already done the most that they could, had as yet got nothing in recompence, except the deliueric of their Citizens, which were prisoners. But Alcibiades wishing derstand how fitly the time served for them to affociate themselves with Athens, which was enough to give them securitie against all Enemies.

The Argines vpon the first confluence of many Estates unto their societie, had embraced great hopes of working wonders, as if they should have had the condust of all Greece against the Athenians, to being Sparta of that honour, as having ill used 50 it, and thereby leaving their old enemies in case of much contempt and disabilitie. But these suddained apprehensions of vaine 100, were suddained y changed into as vaine scare; which ill agreed with the great opinion that had lately been conceiused of Argos. For when the Thebans had resused their alliance; when the Corin-

a speedie beginning of open warre, sent privily to the Argines, and gave them to vo-

thians had fought fecuritie from Athens; and when a fallerumour was noised a-broad, Ashens, Thebes, and Sparta, were come to a full agreement upon all points of difference; then beganne the Argines to let fall their crefts, and sue for peace unto the Lacedamonians, who needing it as much as they, or more, yet held their grauity, and were not outer hastie to accept it. At this time, and in this perturbation, the message of Aisibiades came very welcome to the Argines, which were not now confining how to become the chiefe of all others, but how to saue themselves. Wherefore they sent away presently to Athens, their owne Embassadours, accompanied with the Mantineans and Eleans, to make a league offensive, and defensive, between 10 their Estates and the Athenians.

Of this bulinesse the Lacedamonians knew not what to thinke: for well they saw, that fach a combination tended to their great hurt, and therefore were desirous to present it ; but to keepe the love of the Athenians, the new Ephori thought that more was alreadic done, than flood with their honour, or profit; others held it the wifen way, buting done so much, not to slick vpon a little more, but rather by giuing full latisfaction, to retaine the friendship of that State, which was more to bee valued then all the rest of Greece. This resolution preuailing, they sent away such of their Citizens as were best affected to the peace, who comming to Athens with full commission to make an end of all controuersies, did carnestly labour in the Coun-20 cell-house, to make the truth of things appeare, saying; that their Confederacie with the Thebans had tended to none other end than the reconerie of Panaste: concerning which Towne, or any other businesse, that it much grieued the Lacedamomans, to fee things fall out in fuch wife as might give to the Athenians cause of dis pleasure; but that all should be done which in reason might bee required for making matters even betweene them; to which purpose they shewed that themselves had absolute commission. Wherefore they defired that Pylus might be restored visto them, and especially for the present, that the negotiation with the Argines might becalled a-lide. Fanourable audience was given to this proposition, the rather because they which promised amends, had power to make their words good. But all 30 this faire likelihood of good agreement was dasht on the suddaine, by the practice of Alcibiades, who, secretly dealing with the Lacedamonian Embassadours, perswaded them well of his friendship towards their Citic, and aduised them to take all care that their absolute power to conclude what they pleased in the name of Sparta, might not be knowne to the Communaltie of Athens, lest the insolenn multitude should thereupon grow peremptoric and yeelde to nothing, vnlesse they could draw them to vnreasonable conditions. The Embassadours beleeved him, and falhioned their tale in the affembly of the people, as hee had aduised them. Hereupon the same Alcibiades taking presently the advantage, which their double dealing affoorded, inneighed openly against them, as men of no sinceritie, that were 40 come to Athens for none other purpose, than to hinder the people from thengthning themselves with friends, meaning to draw the Argines and their Artherents to their owne alliance, as (contrarie to their oath) already they had the Thebans. The people of Athens, whom a pleasing errand would hardly have satisfied, or brought into a good opinion of the Lacedamonians, (whose honest meanings had so ill beene feconded with good performance) were now so incensed with the double dealing of the Embassadours, and the strong perswasions of Aleibiades; that little wanted of concluding the league with Arges, Yet for the present so farredid Wieins, an honourable Citizen, and great friend to the peace, prevaile with them, that the businesse was put off, till he himselfe with other Embassadours might fetch a 50 better answere from Sparta.

It may seeme a great wonder, how so poore a tricke of Altibiades was able to carrie a matter of such importance, when the Spartan Embassadours might have cast the loade vpon his owne shoulders, by discouring the truth:

But the gravitie which was vivally found in the Lacedamonians, hindred them (perhaps) from playing their game handsomely against so nimble a wit; and they might wel haue been thought vntrusty men, had they professed themselues such as would fay and vn-fay for their most aduantage.

Nicias and his Companions had a fowre meffage to deliuer at Sparta, being peremptorily to require performance of all conditions, and among the rest, that the Lacedamonians should take the paines to rebuild Panacte, and should immediately renounce their alliance made with the Thebans; letting them vnderstand that otherwise the Athenians, without further delay, would enter into confederacie with the Argines, and their Adherents. The Ephori at Sparta had no minde to for fake the to Thebans, assured friends to their State; but wrought so hard, that the anger of the Athenians was suffered to breake out what way it could, which to mitigate, they would doe no more, than only (at the requell of Micias their honourable friend, who would not seeme to have effected nothing) swearea new to keepe the articles of the league betweene them and Athens. Immediately therefore vpon returne of the Embassadours, a new league was made between the Atbenians, Argines, Mantinaans, & Eleans, with veric ample prouision for holding the same common friends and enemies; wherein, though the Lacedamonians were passed ouer with silence, yet was it manifest that the whole intent of this confederacy did bend it selfechiefly against them, as in short while after was proued by effect.

At this time the Lacedamonians were in ill case, who having restored all that they could vnto the Athenians, and procured others to doe the like, had themselues recouered nothing of their owne (prisoners excepted) for default of restoring all that they should. But that which did most of all disable them, was the losse of reputation, which they had not more impaired in the late warre by misfortunes, than in fundrie passages betweene them and the Athenians: to procure and keepe whose Amitie, they had left fundrie of their old friends to shift for themselues. Contrariwise the Athenians, by the treatie of peace, had recourred the most of that which they loft in warre; all their gettings they had retained; and were frengthned by the accesse of new Consederates.

How the peace betweene Athens and Sparta was ill kept, though not openly broken.

T was not long ere the Argines and their fellowes had found busines wherewith to let the Athenians on worke, and make vie of this coniunction. For presuming vpon the strength of their side, they began to meddle with the Epidaurians, whom it concerned the State of Spar- 40 bato defend. So, many acts of hostilitie were committed, wherein Athens and Sparts did (as principals) intest each the other, but came in collaterally, as to the aide of their feuerall friends.

By these occasions the Corinthians, Baotians, Phocians, Lecrians, and other people of Greece, beganne a-new to range themselves under the Lacedamonians, and follow their ensignes. One victorie which the Lacedamonians obtained by their meere valour in a set battaile, neere to Mantinaa, against the Argine-side, helped well to repaire their decaied reputation, though otherwise it yeelded them no great profit.

The civill diffension arising shortly after within Argos it selfe, betweene the principall Citizens and the Commons, had almost throwne downe the whole frame of 50 the new combination. For the chiefe Citizens getting the vpper hand, made a league with Sparta, wherein they proceeded fo farre as to renounce the amity of the Athenians in expresse words, and forced the Mantineans to the like. But in short foace of time the multitude prenailing, renerfed all this, and having chafed away their ambitious Nobilitie, applied themselves to the Athenians as closely as be-of the Historie of the World.

CHAP. 8. S. 8.

Beside these vprores in Peloponnesus, many assaies were made to raise vp troubles in all parts of Greece, and likewise in Macedon, to the Athenians; whose forces and readinesse for execution, preuented some things, reuenged other, and requited all with some prosperous attempts. Finally, the Athenians wanting matter of quarrell; and the Lacedamonians growing wearie, they beganne to be quiet, retaining still that enmitie in their hearts, which they had sufficiently discovered in effects, though not to as yet breaking out into termes of open warre.

ð. VIII.

The Athenians fending two fleets to facke Siracufe, are put to flight and vtterly discomfited.

Vring this intermiffion of open warre, the Athenians re-intertained their hopes of subduing Sicil, whither they sent a sleet so mighty as neuer was fet forth by Greece in any Age before or after. This fleet was very well manned, and furnished with all necessaries to so great an expedition. All which came to nought; partly by the factions in Athens, whence Alcibiades Author of that voyage, & one of the Generalls of their fleet, was driven to banish himselfe, for feare of such judgement, as elfe he was like to have vnder-gone, among the incenfed people; partly by the inuation which the Lacedamonians made vpon Attica, whilest the forces of that State were fo farre from home. Hereunto was added the aide of the King of Persia, who supplied the Peloponnesians with money.

Neither was the successe of things in Sicilia such, as without helpe from Athens. could give any likelyhood of a good end in that warre. For although in the begin-30 ning, the enterprise had so well succeeded, that they besieged Siracuse, the chiefe Citie of the Iland, and one of the fairest Townes which the Greekes inhabited, obtavning the better in fundry battailes by Land and Sea; yet when the Towne was relieued with strong aide from Peloponnesus, it came to passe that the Athenians were put to the worse on all sides, in such wise that their flect was shut vp into the hauen of Stracufe, and could not iffue out.

As the Albenian affaires went very ill in Sicil, so did they at home stand upon hard termes for that the Lacedamonians, who had beene formerly accustomed to make wearisome yeerely iournies into Attica, which having pilled and foraged, they returned home; did now by counfell of Alcibiades, (who seeking revenge vpon his 40 owne Citizens was fled vnto them) fortifie the Towne of Decelea, which was neere to Athens, whence they ceased not with daily excursions to harricall the Countrie round about, and sometimes give alarme vnto the Citie it selfe.

In these extremities, the peruerse obstinacie of the Athenians was very strange; who leaning at their backes, and at their owne doores, an enemie little leffe mighty than themselves, did yet send forth another sect into Sicil, to inuade a people no lesse puissant, which neuer had offended them.

It often happens, that prosperous event makes foolish counsaile seeme wiser than it was, which came to passe many times among the Athenians, whose vaine conceits Pallas was faid to turn vnto the best. But where vnsound aduice, finding bad proofe. 50 is obstinately pursued, neither Pallas nor Fortune can be justly blamed for a miserableiffne. This fecond fleet of the Athenians, which better might have ferued to convey home the former, that was defeated; after some attempts made to small purpo!e against the Siracusans, was finally (together with the other part of the Nauie, which was there before) quite vanquished, and bard vp into the hauen of Siraeuse, whereby the campe of the Athenians, vtterly deprived of all benefit by Sea, either for succour or departure, was driven to breake vp, and flie away by Land, in which flight they were over-taken routed, and quite overthrown in such wise that scarce any man escaped.

This mischiese well deserved sell vpon the Athenians, who had wickedly condemned into exile Sophoeles and Pthiodorus Generalls, formerly sentinto that Ile, pretending that they had taken money for making peace in Sieil, whereas indeede there was not any meanes or possibilitie to have made warre. Hereby it came to passe, that Nieius, who had the chiese command in this vnhappie enterprise, did rather choose to hazard theruine of his Countrie by the losse of that Armie, wherin to consisted little lesse then all the power of Athens; then to adventure his owne estate, his life, and his honour, vpon the tongues of shamelesse accusers, and the sentence of Judges before his trial resolued to condemne him, by retiring from Syracuse, when wisdome and necessitie required it. For (said he) they shall give sentence upon us, who know not the reason of our doings, nor would give eare to any that would speak in our behalfe, but altogether barken to suspicious and vainer umours that shall be brought against us, yea these our Souldiers who now are so desirous to returne in safetie, with in our danger be well contented to frame their tales to the pleasure of the lewel and insolent multi-

This resolution of Nicias, though it cannot be commended (for it is the part of 20 an honest and valiant man to doe what reason willeth, not what opinion expecteth, and to measure honour or dishonour by the assurance of his well-informed conscience, rather than by the malicious report and censure of others) yet it may bee excused; fince he had before his eies the iniustice of his people; and had well vnderflood that a wicked fentence is infinitely worfe than a wicked fact, as being held a president and patterne, whereby oppression beginning vpon one, is extended as warrantable vpon all. Therefore his feare of wrongfull condemnation was such, as a constant man could not easily have ouer-mastered; but when afterwards the Armie having no other expectation of fafetie then the faint hope of a fecret flight, he was foterrified with an Eclipse of the Moone, happening when they were about to 30 dislodge, that he would not consent to have the camp break vp till seven and twentie daies were past. His timorousnesse was even as foolish and ridiculous, as the issue of it was lamentable. For he should not have thought that the power of the Heauens, & the course of Nature, would be as vninst as his Athenians, or might pretend leffe euill to the flothfull, than to fuch as did their best. Neither doe I thinke that any Astrologer can alleage this Eclipse, as either a cause or prognostication of that Armies destruction, otherwise then as the follie of men did, by application, turne it to their owne confusion. Had C. Cassus the Roman, he, who slew Iulius Casar, imitated this superstition of Nicias, he had surely found the same fortune in a case very like. But when, he retyring, the broken remainder of Crassus his Armie defeated by 40 the Parthian Archers was adulfed, upon fuch an accident as this, to continue where he then was, till the Sunne were past the signe of Scorpio; he made answere that hee flood not in such feare of Scorpio, as of Sagittarius. So adventuring rather to abide the frowning of the Heauens, then the neerer danger of Enemies vpon earth, hee made such a safe and honourable retrait, as did both shew his noble resolution, and give a faire example to that good rule;

Thus we see that God, who ordinarily works by a concatenation of meanes, deprives the Gouernours of vnderstanding, when he intends euill to the multitude; and that the wickednesse of vniust men is the readie meane to weaken the vertue of those who might have done them good.

ð. IX.

Of the troubles where-into the State of Athens fell, after the great losse of the Fleet, and Armie, in Sicilia.

He losse of this Armie was the ruine of the Athenian Dominion, and may bee well accompted a very little leffe calamitie to that Estate, than was the subuersion of the walls, when the Citic about seuen yeeresafter was taken by Lysander. For now began the subjects of the Athenian Estate to rebell, of whom, some they reduced under their of the subjects of the subject of bedience; others held out; some for feare of greater inconvenience were let at libertie, promifing only to be their good friends, as formerly they had beene their Subjects; others having a kind of libertie offered by the Athenians, were not therewith contented, but obtained a true and perfect libertie by force. Among these troubles it fell out very vnscasonably, that the principall men of Athens being wearied with the peoples insolencie, tooke vpon them to change the forme of that Eflate, and bring the gouernement into the hands of a few. To which purpose conspiring with the Captaines which were abroad, they caused them to set up the forme of an Aristocratic in the Townes of their Confederates; and in the meane time, some that were most likely to withstand this innovation, being slaine at Athens, the Commonaltie were so dismaid, that none durst speake against the Conspirators, whose number they knew not, but cuerie man was afraid of his Neighbour, lest he should be a member of the league. In this generall feare the Maiestic of Athens was viurped by 400. men, who observing in shew the ancient forme of proceeding, did causeal matters to be propounded vnto the people, and concluded vpon by the greater part of voices: but the things propounded were onely fuch as were first allowed in private among themselves; neither had the Commonaltie any other libertie, than only to approue and give consent: for who foeuer presumed any 20 further, was quickly dispatched out of the way, and no inquirie made of the murder. By these meanes were many decrees made, all tending to the chablishment of this new Authoritie, which neuerthelesse indured not long. For the Fleet and Armie which then was at the Ile of Samos, did altogether detelt thete dealings of the fourehundred vsurpers, and held them as Enemies; whereupon they revoked Alcibiades out of banishment, & by his affistance procured that the supplies which the Persian King had promised vnto the Lacedamonians, were by Tissaphernes his Lieutenant, made vnprofitable, through the flow and bad performance. Alcibiades had at the first beene very well entertained in Sparta, whilest his service done to that State was not growne to be the obiect of enuie. But when it appeared that in coun-40 faile and good peformance he fo farre excelled all the Lacedamonians, that all their good successe was ascribed to his wit and valour, then were all the principal! Gitizens wearie of his vertue; especially Agis one of their Kings, whose wife had so far yeelded her selfe to the loue of this Athenian, that among her inward friends shee could not forbeare to call her yong child by his name. Hercupon order was taken, that Alcibiades should be killed out of the way. But he discouring the Spartan trecheric, conveighed himselfe vnto Tissaphernes, whom he so bewitched with his great beautie, sweet conversation, and sound wit, that he soone became the Master of that barbarous Vice-roics affections, who had free power to dispose the great Kings trefures and forces in those parts. Then beganne he to aduise Tessaphernes, not so farre foorth to affift the Lacedamonians, that they should quite overthrow the State of Athens, but rather to helpe the weaker side, & let them one consume another, whereby all should fall at length into the hands of the Persian. By this counsaile he made way to other practices, wherein by strength of his reputation (as the only favourite of so great a Potentate) hee played his owne game, procuring his restitution. Ar length his banilhment being repealed by the Armic, but not by the Citizens (who then were oppressed by the source hundred) hee laboured greatly to reconcile the Souldiers to the Gouernors; or at least to divert their heat another way, and turne it youn the Common Enemie. Some of the foure hundred approved his motion, as being wearie of the tyrannie wherof they were partakers, partly because they saw it could not long endure, & partly for that themselues, being lesse regarded by the rest of their companions, than stood with their good liking, sought to acquit them-selucs of it as honestly as they might. But the most of that Faction laboured to obthoritie, and the greatnesse of their Citie, if they might but if this could not be, they did rather wish to preserue their owne power, or safetie at least, then the good Eflate of the Common-wealth. Therefore they made fundrie ouertures of peace to the Lacedamonians, desiring to compound in as good termes as they might, and affirming that they were fitter to be trusted than the wavering multitude; especially considering that the City of Sparta was gouerned by an Aristocratie, to which form they had now reduced Athens. All these passages betweene the source hundred (or the most and chiefe of them) and the Lacedemonians, were kept as secret as might be.

For the Citic of Athens, hoping, without any great cause, to repaire their losses, was much more auerfe, trufting well that the discord of the Athenians (not vnknowne abroad) might yeeld some faire opportunitie to the destruction of it selfe, which in effect (though not then presently) came to passe. And vpon this hope King Agis did fometimes bring his forces from Develeato Athens, where doing no good, hee received some small losses. Likewise the Nauie of Peloponnesus made shew of attempting the Citie, but seeing no likelihood of successe, they bent their course from thence to other places, where they obtained victories, which in the better Fortune of the Athenians might more lightly have beene regarded, then in this their decaied done more good then could be received from the Fleet or Armie without, which

The foure hundred, by meanes of these troubles, were faine to resigne their autho-ritie, which they could not now hold, when the people having taken armes to repel forraigne enemies, would not lay them downe, till they had freed themselves from

How ALCIBIADES wanne many important victories for the Athenians; was recalled from exile; made their Generall, and againe deposed.

His establishment of things in the Citic, was accompanied with some good successe in the warres. For the Lacedamonians were about the same time overthrowne at Sea, in a great battaile, by the Athenian fleet, which had remained at Samos, to which Alcibiades afterwards joyning fuch forces as he could raife, obtained many victories. Before the Towne of Abydus, his arrivall with eighteene ships, gaue the honour of a great battaile to the Athenians; he ouerthrew and vtterly destroyed the fleet of the Lacedamonians, commanded by Mindarus, tooke the Townes of Cyzicus, and Perinthus. made the Selymbrians ranfome their Citie, and fortified Crysopolis. Hercupon letters were fent to Sparta, which the Athenians, intercepting, found to containe the distresse of the Armie in these few words: All is lost; MINDARVS is flaine; the Souldiers want victualls; we know not what to doe.

20 Shortly after this, Alcibiades overthrew the Lacedamonians in fight by Land at Chalcedon, tooke Selymbria, besieged and wanne Byzantium, now called Constantinople, which even in those dayes was a goodly, rich, and very strong Citic. Hereupon he returned home with very great welcome, and was made high Admirall of all the

But this his honour continued not long; for it was taken from him, and he driuen to banish himselse againe; only because his Lieutenant, contrarie to the expreffecommand of Alcibiades, fighting with the enemies in his absence, had lost a great part of the fleet.

The second banishment of Alcibiades was to the Athenians more harmeful than 30 the first; and the losse which thereupon they received, was (though more heavie to them, wet) leffe to be pittied of others, than that which enfued voon his former exile. For whereas at the first, he had sought reuenge vpon his owne Citie; now, as inured to aduersitie, he rather pittied their furie, who in time of such danger had cast out him that should have repaired their weake estate, than sought by procuring or beholding the calamitie of his people, to comfort himselfe after injurie receined. Before they, who were instituted in the place of Alcibiades, arrived at the fleet, he presented battaile to Lysander the Lacedamonian Admirall, who was not so confident vpon his former victorie, as to vndertake Alcibiades himselfe, bringing ships more in number (not withstanding the former losse of sisteene) than his ene-40 mics had, and better ordered than they had beene under his Lieutenant. But when the decree of the people was published in the Nauie, then did Alcibiades with-draw himselse to a Towne vpon Hellespont, called Bizanthe, where hee had built a Caftle.

X I.

The battaile at Arginusa, and condemnation of the victorious Athenian Captaines by the people.

Fter this time, the Athenians receiving many losses & discomfitures. were driuen to flie into the Hauen of Mytelene, where they were straightly besieged both by Land and Sea. For the raising of this siege necessity inforced them to man all their Vessells, and to put the vttermost of their forces into the hazzard of one battaile. This battaile was fought at Arginula, where Callieraditas, Admirall of the Laced amonians, losing the honor of the day, preserued his owner eputation by dying valia ntly inthefight. It might well haue beene expected, that the ten Captaines, who jo yntly had command in chiefe ouer the Athenian fleet, should for that good daies service, and so happy a victorie, haue receiued great honour of their Citizens. But contrariwise they were forth-with called home, and accused, as if wiltully they had suffered many of the Citizens, whose ships were broken and sunke, to be cast away, when by appointing some Vessels to take them vp, they might have saved them from being drowned. Hereto the Captaines readily made a very just answere; That they purfuing the victorie, had left part of the fleet, under fufficient men, to faue those that 10 were wrackt; which if it were not well accomplished, it was, because a tempest arifing about the end of the fight, had hindred the performance of that, and other their intendments. This excuse anailed not: For a lewd fellow was brought forth, who faid, That he himselfe escaping in a meale-tubbe, had beene intreated by those who were in perill of drowning, to defire of the people reuenge of their deaths upon the Captaines. It was very itrange, that vpon fuch an acculation maintained with fo slender quidence, men that had well deserued of their Countrie should bee ouerthrowne. But their enemies had so incensed the rascall multitude, that no man durst absolue them, sauc only Socrates the wise and vertuous Philosopher, whose voice in this judgement was not regarded. Sixe of them were put to death, of whom one 20 had hardly escaped drowning, and was with much a-doe relicued by other vessells in the storme : but the Captaines which were absentescaped; for when the furie of the people was ouer-past, this judgement was reversed, and the accusers called into question for having deceined and peruerted the Citizens. Thus the Athenians went about to free themselves from the infamic of injustice; but the divine justice was not a-sleepe, nor would be so deluded.

The battaile at Agos- Potamos, wherein the whole State of Athens was ruined; with the end of the Peloponnesian Warre.

He Peloponnesian fleet under Lysander, the yeere next following, hauing scowred the Egean Seas, entred Hellespont, where (landing Souldiers) it besieged and tooke the Towne of Lampsacus. Hereupon all the Nauie of Athens, being an hundred and fourescore saile, made thither in haste, but finding Lampfacus taken before their com-

ming, they put in at Seffos, where having refreshed themselves, they sailed to the 40 River called, Egos-Potamos, which is (as we might name it) Goates-brooke, or the River of the Goate; being on the Continent, opposite to Lampfacus: and therethey cast Anchors, not one whole league off from Lysander, who rode at Lamplacus in the harbour. The next day after their arrivall they presented fight vnto the Peloponnefians, who refused it, whereupon the Athenians returned againe to Agos-Potamos, and thus they continued five dayes, braving every day the Enemie, and returning to their owne harbour when it drew towards euening.

The Castle of Alcibiades was not farre from the Nauie, and his power in those places was such as might have greatly availed his Countrimen, if they could have made vie of it. For he had waged Mercinaries, and making warre in his owne name to wpon some people of the Thracians, had gathered much wealth, and obtained much reputation among them. He perceiving the disorderly course of the Athenian Commanders, repaired vnto them, and shewed what great inconvenience might grow, if they did not soone fore-see and prevent it. For they lay in a roade subject to every weather, neither neere enough to any Towne where they might furnish themselues with necessarie, nor so farre off as had beene more expedient. Sestus was the next Market-Towne; thither both Souldiers and Mariners reforted, flocking away from the Nauie cuerie day, as soone as they were returned from brauing the Enemie. Therefore Alcibiades willed them either to lie at Seffus, which was not farre off, or at the least to consider better how neere their enemie was, whose feare proceeded rather from obedience to his Generall, than from any cowardife. This admonition was so farre despised, that some of the Commanders willed him to meddle with his owne matters, and to remember that his authoritie was out of to date. Had it not beene for these opprobrious words, hee could (as hee told his familiars) have compelled the Lacedamonians, either to fight vpon vnequall rermes, or vectly to quit their Fleet. And like enough it was that hee might fo have done by transporting the light-armed Thracians his Confederates, and others his Followers ouer the Straights, who affaulting the Peloponnesians by Land, would either haue compelled them to put to Sea, or else to leave their ships to the mercy of the Athenians. But finding their acceptance of his good counsaile no better than hath beene rehearfed, he left them to their fortune, which how cuill it would be he did prognosticate,

of the Historie of the World.

Lylander all this while defending himselfe by the advantage of his Hauen, was 20 not carelesse in looking into the demeanour of the Athenians. When they departed, his manner was to fend forth some of his swiftest Vessels after them, who obferring their doings, related vnto him what they had feene. Therefore vnderstanding in what carelesse fashion they romed vp and downe the Countrie; he kept all his men a-boord after their departure, and the fift day gaue especial charge to his Scouts. That when they perceived the Athenians, dilembarking, as their custome was, and walking towards Sestos, they should forth with returne, and hang vp a brazen shield in the Prow, as a token for him to weigh Anchor.

The Scouts performed their charge, and Lyfander being in a readinesse; made all speed that strength of Oares could give, to Agos. Potamos, where he found ve-30 ry few of his enemies a-boord their Ships, not many neere them, and all in great confusion upon the newes of his approch.

Infomuch that the greatest industrie which the Athenians then shewed, was in the escape of eight or nine ships, which knowing how much that losse imported. gaue over Athens as desperate, and made along flight vnto the Ile of Cyprus, all the rest were taken, and such of the Souldiers as came in to the rescue cut in pieces. Thus was the warre which had lasted seuen and twentie yeeres, with variable succeffe concluded in one houre, and the glory of Athens in such wise eclipsed, that the neuer afterward shone in her perfect light.

Immediately upon this victoric Ly fander, having taken such Townes as readily 40 did yeeld vpon the first fame of his exploit, set sayle for Athens, and ioyning his forces with those of Agus and Paulanias, Kings of Sparta, summoned the Citie, which finding too stubborne to yeeld, and too strong to bee wonne on the sudden, hee put forth agains to Sea, and rather by terrour than violence, compelling all the Ilands, and such Townes of the Ionians, as had formerly held of the Athenians, to submit themselues to Sparta, hee did thereby cut off all provision of vichuals, and other necessaries, from the Citie, and inforced the people by meere famine to yeeld to these conditions: That the long walles, leading from the Towne to the Port, should bee throwne downe; That all Cities subject to their Estate, should be set at libertie; That the Athenians should bee Masters only of 50 their owne Territories, and the fields adiovning to their Towne, And that thev should keepe no more then twelve Ships; That they should hold as Friends or Enemies, the same, whom the Lacedamonians did, and follow the Lacedamonians as

How the affaires of Persia flood in these times.

VRING the times of this Peloponnesian Warre, and those other lesse expeditions foregoing it, Artaxerxes Longimanus, having peaceably injoyed along raigne oner the Persians, left it by his death either to Darius, who was called Darius Nothus, or the Bastard, whom the Greeke Historians (lightly passing over Xerxes the second, and Sogdianus, as Vsurpers, and for their short raigne little to be regarded) place next vnto him, or to Xerxes the second, who, and his brother Sogdianus after him seeming to have benethe sonnes of Hester) held the Kingdome but one yeere betweene them, theyonger succeeding his elder brother. It is not my purpose (as I have said before) to pursue the Historie of the Persians from henceforth, by rehearfall of all the particulars, otherwise then as they shall be incident to the affaires of Greece. It may therefore fuffice to fay, That Xerxes the second, being a vicious Prince, did perilhafter a moneth or two, if not by furfeit, then by treachery of his as riotous bro-30 ther Sog dianus. Likewise of Sog dianus it is found, that being as ill as his brother, and more cruell, he flew vnjustly Bagorazus a principall Eunuch, and would have done as much to his brother Darius the Bastard, had not hee foreseene it, and by raising a ftronger Armie than this hated King Sog dianus could leavie, seized at once vpon the King and Kingdome. Darius having flaine his brother, held the Empire fineteene veeres. Ampriaus of Sais an Egyptian rebelled against him, and having partly flaine, partly chased out of the Land the Persian Garrisons, allied himselfe so firmely with the Greekes, that by their aide he maintained the Kingdome, and deliuered it ouer to his posteritie, who (notwithstanding the furie of their civill Warres) maintained it against the Persian, all the daies of this Darius, and of his sonne Artaxerxes 40 Mnemon. Likewise Amorges, a subject of his owncand of the Roiall bloud, being Lieutenant of Caria, rebelled against him; confederating himselfe with the Athenians. But the great calamitie, before spoken of, which fell vpon the Athenians in Sicil, having put new life into the Spartans, and given courage to the Ilanders and others, subject to the State of Athens, to shake off the yoke of their long continued bondage: It fell out well for Darius, that the Lacedamonians being destitute of money, wherewith to defray the charge of a great Nauie, without which it was imposfible to advance the warre against the State of Athens, that remained powerfull by Sca, were driven to crave his affiftance, which he granted vnto them, first vpon what conditions best pleased himselfe, though afterwards the articles of the league 50 betweene him and them were fet downe in more precise termes ; wherein it was concluded, That he and they should make warre joyntly vpon the Athenians, and vpon all that should rebell from either of them, and (which was highly to the Kings honour and profit) that all the Cities of Asia, which had formerly beene his, or his Predecessours, should returne to his obedience. By this Treatie, and the warreen-joycing of those who had borne displeasure to Athens; and not without some consultation of destroying the Citie, and laying waste the Land about it. Which aduice, although it was not entertained, yet were thirtie Gouernours, or rather crucili Tyrants, appointed ouer the people, who recompensed their former insolencie, and injustice ouer their Captaines, by oppressing them with all base and intolerable slauerie.

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades

These articles being agreed upon, the walls were throwne downe with great re-

The only small hope then remaining to the Athenians, was, that Alcibiades might perhaps repaire what their owne folly had ruined. But the thirtie Tyrants perceiving this, advertised the Lacedamonians thereof, who contribed, and (as to nowe domineering in every quarter) soone effected his suddaine death.

Such end had the Peloponnesian Warre. After which the Lacedamonians abufing the reputation, and great power, which therein they had obtained, grew very odious to all Greece, and by Combination of many Cities again them, were dispossessed of their high authoritic, euen in that very Age, in which they had subdued Athens. The greatest foile that they tooke was of the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, under whom Philip of Macedon, Father to Alexander the Great, had the best of his education. By these Thebans, the Citie of Sparta (besides other great losses received) was sundrie times in danger of being taken. But these haughtie attempts of the Thebans came finally to nothing; for the severall Estates and Si-20 gnories of Greece, were growne fo jealous one of anothers greatnesse, that the Lasedamonians, Athenians, Argiues, and Thebans, which were the mightiest associating themselves with the weaker partie, did so counterpoize the stronger, that no one Citie could extend the limits of her jurisdiction so farre as might make her terrible to her Neighbours. And thus all parts of the Countrie remained rather euenly ballanced, than well agreeing, till fuch time as Philip, and after him Alexander, Kings of Macedon, (whose forefathers had beene dependants, and followers, yea almost meere Vassalls to the Estates of Athens and Sparts) found meanes, by making yee of their factions, to bring them all into feruitude, from which they never could be free, till the Romanes presenting them with a shew of libertie, did themselves in-

fuing (of which I have already spoken) he recovered all that his Grand-father and Father had lost in Asia. Likewise by assistance of the Lacedamonians be got Amoroes a-line into his hands, who was taken in the Citic of Iafus; the Athenians wanting either force or courage to succour him. Neuerthelesse Agypt still held out against him the cause whereof cannot beethe emploiment of the Persian forces on the parts of Greece, for he abounded in men, of whom he had enough for all occasions. but they wanted manhood, which caused him to fight with gold, which effected for him by Souldiers of other Nations, and his natural lenemies, what the valour of his owne Subjects was insufficient to performe. Darius had in marriage Parylatis his owne fifter, who bare vnto him (besides other children) Artaxerxes called Mne- 10 mon, that is to say, the Mindfull, or the Rememberer, who succeeded him in the Kingdome; and Cyrus the yonger; a Prince of fingular vertue, and accounted by all that knew him, the most excellent man that ever Persia bred after Cyrus the Great. But the old King Darius, intending to leave vnto his elder sonne Artaxerxes the inheritance of that great Empire, did cast a jealous eye vpon the doings of yong Cyrus, who being Lieutenant of the lower Asia, tooke more vpon him than befitted a Subject: for which cause his father sent for him, with intent to have taken some verv sharpe course with him, had not his owne death prevented the comming of his vonger sonne, and placed the elder in his Throne. Of the warre betweene these brethren, and summarily of Artaxerxes, we shall have occasion to speake somewhat 20 in more convenient place.

How the thirtie Tyrants got their Dominion in Athens.

Hold it in this place most convenient to shew the proceedings of the Greekes, after the subuersion of the walls of Athens, which gaue end to that warre called the Peloponnesian warre, but could not free the vnhappy Countricof Greece from civill broiles. The thirtie Gouer-30 nours, commonly called the thirtie Tyrants of Athens, were chosen at the first by the people to compile a body of their Law, and make a collection of fuch ancient Statutes, as were meeteft to be put in practice: the condition of the Citie standing as it did in that so sodaine alteration. To this charge was annexed the Supreme authoritie, either as a recompence of their labours, or because the necessitie of the times did so require it, wherein the Law being vncertaine, it was fit that fuch men should give judgement in particular causes, to whose judgement the Lawes themselues, by which the Citie was to bee ordered, were become subject. But these thirtie having so great power in their hands, were more carefull to hold it, than to descrue it, by faithfull execution of that which was committed to them 40 in truft.

Therefore apprehending such troublesome fellowes, as were odious to the citie, though not punishable therefore by law, they condemned them to death; which proceeding was by all men highly approved, who colidered their lewd conditions, but did not withall bethinke themselves, how easie a thing it would be vnto these thirtie men, to take away the lines of Innocents, by calling them perturbers of the peace, or what elfe they lifted, when condemnation without due triall and proofe had been conce well allowed. Having thus plaufibly entred into a wicked course of gonernement, they thought it best to fortisie themselves with a sure guard, ere they brake out into those disorders, which they must needes commit for the esta- 50 blishing of their authoritie. Wherefore dispatching two of their owne companie to Sparta, they informed the Lacedamonians, that it was the full intent of the thirtie, to keepe the City free from all rebellious motions, to which purpose it behoued them to cut off such as were seditious; and therefore desired the Lacedamenians to send them a Garrison, which they promised at their owne cost to maintaine. This motion was well approued, and a guard fent, the Captaine of which was to well entermined by the thirtie, that none of their mildeedes could want his high commendations at Sparta. Hereupon the Tyrants beganne to take heart, and looking no more after base and detested persons, inuaded the principall men of the City, lending armed men from Houseto House, who drew out such as were of great reputation, and likely or able to make any head against this wicked forme of government: whereby there was such effusion of bloud, as to Theramenes (one of the thirtie) scemed very horrible, and vnable to escape vengeance. His dislike of their proceedings being openly discouered, caused his fellowes to bethinke themselves, and provide for their owne fecurity, and his destruction, lest he should make himselfe a Captaine of the discontented (which were almost the whole Citie) and redeeme his owne peace with their ruine. Wherefore they selected three thousand of the Citizens. whom they thought meetelt, and gaue vnto them some part of publike authority, the rest they disarmed; and having thus increased their owne strength, and weakened their opposites, they began a fresh to shead the bloud, not only of their prinat enemies, but of fuch whose money, or goods, might inrich them, and enable them for the paiment of their guard. And to this purpose they concluded, that every one of them should name one man, vpon whose goods he should seize, putting the ow-20 ner to death. But when Theramenes vttered his detestation of so wicked intent; then did Critias, who of all the thirtie was most tyrannicall, accuse him to the Councell, as a treacherous man, and (whereas one maine priniledge of the three thouland was that none of them should suffer death at the appointment of the thirtie, but have the accustomed trial) he took vpon him to strike out of that number the name of Theramenes, and so reduced him under the triall and sentence of that order. It was well alleaged by Theramenes, that his name was not more cassie to be blotted out of the Catalogue, than any other mans, vpon which confideration, he adulfed them all to conceive no otherwise of his case, than as of their owne, who were liable to the fame forme of proceeding; but (enery man choosing rather to presente his owne 30 life by filence, than prefently to draw vpon him felfe the danger, which as yet concerned him little, and perhaps would never come neere him) the Tyrants interpreting filence as confent, condemned him forthwith, and compelled him to drinke poylon.

ð. I II.

The conspiracie against the thirtie Tyrants, and their deposition.

Fter the death of Theramenes, the thirtie began to vie such outrage, as excelled their former villanies. For having three thouland (as they thought) firme vinto them, they robbed all others without feare or shame, despoiling them of lands and goods, and causing them to flie into banishment, for safeguard of their lines. This flight of the Citizens procured their libertie, and the generall good of the City. For the banished Citizens, who were fled to Thebes, entred into confultation, and resoluted to hazard their lines in setting free the Citic of Athens. The very thought of such a practice had been treason at home, which had no other danger abroad, than might be found in the execution. Seventie men, or thereabout, were the first vndertakers, who with their Captaine Thrasphalus tooke Phyla, a place of strength in the Territoric of 30 Athens. No fooner did the thirtie heare of their exploit, than fecke meanes to preuent further danger; affembling the three thouland, and their Lacedamonian guald, with which force they attempted Phyla, but were with some losse of their men repelled. Finding the place too firong to be taken by affault, they intended to beliege it; which purpose came to nought by meanes of snow that fell, and other stormie weather against which they had not made prouision. Retiring therefore to the Ci tie, which about all they were to make good, they left the most of their guard and two companies of Horse, to wearie out them which lay in Phyla, with a flying siege. But it was not long ere the followers of Thrafybulus were encreased from seventy to feuen hundred, which aduentured to giue charge vpon thologuards, of whom they cut off aboue an hundred & twenty. These small, but prosperous beginnings, added more to the number of those in Phyla, who now with a thousand mengot entrance into Piraus, the suburbe of Athens, lying on the Port. Before their comming, the thirtie had resolved to fortifie the Towne of Eleusine, to their owne vse, whereinto they might make an eafie retrait, and faue themselves from any sudden perill. It 10 may well feeme strange, that whereas their barbarous manner of government had brought them into such danger, they were so farre from seeking to obtaine mens good wil, that contrariwife, to affure themselves of Eleusine, they got al of the place who could beare armes into their hands by a traine, and wickedly (though vnder forme of iustice) murthered them all. But, Sceleribus tutum per scelera est iter, the mischiefes which they had alreadie done were such, as left them no hope of going backward, nor any other apparant likelihood of fafetic, than by extending their crueltie vnto all, seeing few or none were left, whom they could trust. When Thra-Tybulus and his fellowes, who as yet were termed conspirates, had taken the Pireus. then were the three thousand armed againe by the Tyrants, and brought to affanic 20 it: but in this enterprise Thrasybulus had the better, and repelled his enemies, of whom although there were flaine to the number of seventie, onely yet the victory feemed the greater, because Criticas, & one other of the thirty, perished in that fight. The death of Critics, and the flout defence of Piraus, together with some exhortations yfed by Thrafybulus to the Citizens, wrought such effect, that the thirtie were deposed. Neuerthelesse there were so many of the three thousand, who having communicated with the thirty in their misdeeds, feared to be called to a sharpe account, that no peace, nor quiet forme of gouernement could be established. For Embassadors were sent to Sparta, who craving aide against Thrasybulus, and his followers, had fauourable audience, and a power sent to their affishance, both by Land 30 and Sea, under the conduct of Lyfander, and his Brother; whom Paufanias the Spartan King did follow, railing an Armie of the Cities confederate with the Lacedamoneans. And here appeared first the icalousie, wherein some people held the State of Sparta. The Bactians, and Corinthians, who in the late warres had been the most bitter enemies to Athens, refused to follow Pausanias in this expedition; alleaging that it flood not with their othes, to make warre against that people, who had not hitherto broken any one article of the league: but fearing, indeede, lest the Lacedemonians should annexe the Territorie of Athens to their owne Demaines. It is not to bee doubted, that Paufanias tooke this answere in good part. For it was not his purpose to destroy those against whom he went, but only to crosse the proceedings 40 of Lylander, whom he enuied. Therefore having in some small skirmishes against them of Thrafybulus his party, made a shew of warre, finally wrought such meanes, that all things were compounded quietly: the thirtie men, and fuch others, as were like to give cause of tumult, being sent to Sparta. The remainder of that tyrannicall faction, having with drawne themselves to Eleusine, were shortly after found to attempt some innountion; wherevoon the whole City rising against them, took their Captaines, as they were comming to Parlie, and flew them: which done, to avoide further inconvenience, a law was made, that all injuries past should be forgotten, and no man called into question for wrongs committed. By which order, wisely made and carefully observed the Citie returned to her former quietnesse.

HE matters of Greece now standing upon such termes, that no one Estate durit oppose it selfe against that of Lacademon; young Cyrus, brother to Astaxernes, King of Persia, having in his fathers life time very carefully profecuted the warre against Athens, did fend his mesfengers to Sparta, requesting that their love might appeare no leffe to him, than that which he had shewed towards them in their dangerous warre against the Athenians. To this request, being generall, the Laccdamonians gaue a futable answere, commanding their Admirall to performe vnto Cyrus all feruice that hee should require of him. If Cyrus had plainely discouered himselfe, and the Lacedamonians bent their whole power to his affiftance, very like it is, that either the Kingdome of Persia should have been the recompense of his deserts, or that he perishing in battaile, as after he did, the subversion of that Empire had forth with ensued. But it pleased God, rather to shew vnto the Greekes the waies, which vnder the Macedomian Enfigues, the victorious foot fteps of their posteritie should measure, and ope-30 ning vnto them the riches, and withall the weakenesse of the Persian, to kindle in them both defire and hope of that conquest, which he reserved to another generation; than to give into their hands that mightie Kingdome, whose houre was not vet come. The love which Parylatis, the Oucene-Mother of Perfiz bare vnto Cyrus her yonger fonne, being feconded by the carnest fauour of the people, and ready defires of many principall men, had moued this yong Prince, in his fathers old age, to aspireaster the succession. But being sent for by his Father (as bath before beene shewed) whose meaning was to curbe this ambitious youth; hee found his elder brother Artaxerxes established so furely by the old Kings fauour, that it were not fase to attempt any meanes of displanting him, by whose disfauour, himself might 40 easily lose the place of a Viceroy, which he held in Asia the lesse, and hardly bee able to maintaine his owne life. The neerest neighbour to Cyrus of all the Kings Deputies in the lower Asia, was Tissaphernes, a man compounded of cowardise, trecherie craft, and all vices which accustomably branch out of these. This man accompanied Cyrus to his Father, vling by the way all faire shewes of friendship, as to a Prince, for whom it might well be thought, that Queene Pary fatis had obtained the inheritance of that mightie Empire. And it was very true, that Pary fatis had vfed the best of her endeuour to that purpose, alleaging that (which in former ages had bin much availeable to Xerxes, in the like disceptation with his elder brother) Artaxerxes was borne whilest his father was a private man, but Cyrus, when he was 50 acrowned King. All which not fufficing; when the most that could bee obtained for Cyrus, was the pardon of some presumptuous demeanour, and confirmation of his place in Lydia, and the parts adjoyning: then did this Tiffaphernes discover his nature, and accuse his friend Cyrus to the new King Artaverses, of a dangerous treafon intended against his person. Vpon this accusation, whether true or false, very eafily beleeued, Cyrus was arrefted, and by the most vehement intreatie of his Mother very hardly deliuered, and sent back into his owne Prouince.

٥. II.

The preparations of Cyrvs, and his first entrie into the Warre.

He forme of gouernement which the Persian Lieutenants vsed in their several Provinces, was in many points almost Regall. For they made Warre and Peace, as they thought it meete, not onely for the Kings 10 behoofe, but for their owne reputation; vsually indeede with the Kings enemies, yet sometimes one with another: which was the nore cally tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings plea-

Kings enemies, yet fometimes one with another: which was the more casily tolerated, because their owne heads were held only at the Kings pleafure, which caused them to frame all their doings to his will, what soeuer it were, or they could coniccture it to be. Cyrus therefore being settled in Lydia, began to consider with himselfe, the interest that he had in the Kingdome; the small assurance of his brothers loue, held only by his Mothers intercession; the disgrace endured by his late imprisonment; and the meanes which he had by loue of his owne people, and that good neighbourhood of the Lacedamonians, whom he had bound vnto him, to obtaine the Crowne for himselfe. Neither was it expedient that he should 20 long sitidle, as waighting till occasion should present it selfe: but rather enterprise somewhat whilest yet his Mother lined, who could procure a good interpretation to all his actions, if they were no worse than only questionable. Hereupon he first beganne to quarrell with Tiffaphernes, and seized vpon many Townes of his iurisdiction, annexing them to his owne Pronince; which displeased not Artaxerxes at all, who (besides that hee was of condition somewhat simple) being truly paid by Cyrus the accustomable Tributes out of those places, was well contented to see his brothers hot spirit exercised in private quarrels. But Tiffaphernes, whose base conditions were hated, & cowardife despised, although he durst not adventure to take armes against Cyrus, yet perceiuing that the Milesians were about to give vp them- 30 selues into the hands of that yong Prince, as many other townes of the Ionians had done, thought by terrour to preserve his reputation, and keepe the Towne in his owne hands. Wherefore he flew many, and many he banished, who flying to Cyrus, were gently entertained, as bringing faire occasion to take armes, which was no small part of his desire. In leuying Souldiers he vsed great policie; for he took not only the men of his owne Province, or of the Countries adioyning, whose lives were readie at his will 3 but fecretly he furnished some Gracian Captaines with money, who being very good men of warre, entertained Souldiers therewith, some of them warring in Thrace, others in Thessalie, others elsewhere in Greece; but all of them ready to crosse the Seas, at the first call of Cyrus, till which time they had se- 40 cret instructions to prolong their seuerall warres, that the Souldiers might bee held in continuall exercise, and readic in armes vpon the sudden. Cyrus having sent a power of men to beliege Miletus, forthwith summoned these bands of the Greekes, who very readily came ouer to his affistance, being thirtcene thousand very firme Souldiers, and able to make head (which is almost incredible) against the whole power of Artaxerxes. With this Armie, and that which he had leuied before, hee could very easily have forced Miletus, and chased away Tissaphernes out of Asia the lesse: but his purpose was not so to lose time in small matters, that was to be imploied in the accomplishment of higher designes. Pretending therefore that the Pisidians, a people of Asia the lesse, not subject to the Persian, had inuaded his Terri- to torie, heraifed the fiege of Miletus, and with all speed marched Eastward, leaving Tissaphernes much amazed, who had no leifure to reioyce that Cyrus had left him to himselfe, when he considered, that so great an Army, and so strong, was never levied against the Rouers of Pisidia, but rather against the great King his Master. For which caule taking a band of five hundred horse, hee posted away to carrie tidings to the Court, of this great preparation.

ð. III.

How Cyrvs tooke his iourney into the higher Asia, and came up close to his Brother.

He tumult which his comming brought was very great, and great the exclamations of the Queen Statira, against Pary (atis, the Queene-Mother, whom the called the Author and occasioner of the warre. But whilest the King in great feare was arming the high Countries in his defence, the danger hastned vpon him very fast. For Cyrus made great marches, having his numbers much increased, by the repaire of his Countrimen, though most strengthned by the accesse of seue hundred Greeks, and of other source hundred of the same Nation, who revolted vnto him from the King. How terribie the Greekes were to the Barbarians, he found by triall in a Muster, which (to please the Queene of Cilicia, who had brought him aide) he made in Phrygia; where the Greekes by his direction making offer of a charge vpon the rest of his Armie, which 20 contained a hundred thousand men, the whole Campe (not perceiuing that this was but a braucric) fled a-maine, the victuallers and baggagers for faking their cabbins, and running all away for very feare. This was to Cyrus a joyfull spectacle, who knew very well, that his brother was followed by men of the fame temper. and the more vnlikely to make relistance, because they were prest to the warre against their will and dispositions, whereas his Armie was drawne a-long by meere affection and good will. Neuerthelesse he found it a very hard matter to perswade the Greekes to passe the River of Euphrates. For the very length of the way which they had troden, wearied them with conceit of the tedious returne, Therefore he was driven, being yet in Cilicia, to feeke excuses, telling them, that Abrocomas, one of 30 the Kings principall Captaines, and his owne great enemy, lay by the River, against whom he requested them to affist him. By such devices, and excessive promise of reward, he brought them to Euphrates, where some of the Greekes considering, That whoso passed the River first, should have the most thankes, and might safely returneif the rest should refuse to follow them, they entred the Foords, whereby were all finally perswaded to doe as some had begunne, and being allured by great hopes, they resolved to seeke out Artaxernes, wheresoever he was to be found. The King in the meane time having raifed an army of nine hundred thou fand men, was not so confident upon this huge multitude, as to aduenture them in triall of a plaine battaile. Abrocomas, who with three hundred thousand men, had vnder-taken to 40 make good the Straights of Syria, which were very narrow, and fortified with a strong wall, and other defences of nature, and art, which made the place to seeme impregnable, had quitted the passage, and retired himself toward the Kings forces, not daring to look Cyrus in the face, who despairing to finde any way by Land, had procured the Lacedemonian fleete, by the benefit whereof to have transported his Armie. I doe not finde that this cowardise of Abrocomas, or of his Souldiers, who arrived not at the Campe, till fine daies were past after the battaile, received either punishment, or disgrace; for they, toward whom he with-drew himselfe, were all made of the same metall.

Therefore Artaxerxes was upon the point of retiring to the uttermost bounds of 50 his Kingdom, untill by Teribazus, one of his Captaines, he was persuaded not to abandon so many goodly Provinces to the Enemie, who would thereby have gathered addition of strength, and (which in the sharpe disputation of Titleto a Kingdome is most availeable) would have growne superior in reputation. By such advice, the King resolved upon meeting with his brother, who now began to be a secure, being fully perswaded, that Artaxerxes would neuer dare to abide him in the field. For the King hauing cast vpa Trench of almost fortie miles in length, about thirtie foot broad, and eighteene soote deepe, intended there to have encamped: but his courage failing him, he abandoned that place, thinking nothing so safe, as to be farre distant from his enemies.

۵. IIII.

The battaile betweene CyRVS and ARTAXERXES.

He Armie of Cyrus hauing ouercome many difficulties of cuil waies, and scarcitic of victuals, was much encouraged by perceiuing this great scare of Artaxerxes, & being patt this trench, marched carelelly in great disorder, hauing bestowed their Armes in Carts, and vpon Beafts of carriage; when on the sudden one of their Vaunt-currors, brought newes of the Kings approch. Hereupon with great tumuit they armed themselves, and had ranged their battailes in good order vpon the side of the River Euphrates, where they waited for the coming of their enemies, whom they saw not till it was after noone. But when they saw the cloud of dust raised by the seete of that huge multitude, which the King drew after him, and perceived by their neere 20 approch how well they were marshalled, comming on very orderly, in silence, whereas it had beene expected, that rushing violently with loude clamours, they should have spent all their force vpon the first brunt; and when it appeared that the fronts of the two Armies were so vnequall in distent, being all embattailed in one bodie and square, that Cyrus taking his place (as was the Persian maner) in the middest of his owne, did not with the corner, and vtmost point therof, reach to the halfe breadth of Artaxerxes his battaile, who carried a front proportionable to his number exceeding nine times that of Cyrus: then did the Greekes begin to distrust their owne manhood, which was not accustomed to make proofe of it self, vpon such exceffine oddes. It was almost incredible, that so great an Armie should bee so easily 30 chased. Neuerthelesse, it quickly appeared, that these Persians, having learned (contrary to their custome) to giue charge vpon their enemies with silence; had not learned (for it was contrary to their nature) to receive a strong charge with courage. Vpon the very first offer of on-set, made by the Greekes, all that beastly rabble of cowards fled amaine, without abiding the stroke, or staying till they were within reach of a Dart. The Chariots armed with hookes and fithes (whereof Artaxerxes had two hundred, and Cyrus not twentie) did small hurt that day, because the drivers of them leaping downe, fled away on foot. This base demeanour of his encmies gaue so much confidence to Cyrus, and his Followers, that such as were about him forth-with adored him as King. And certaintly, the Title had beene assured 40 vnto him that day, had not he fought how to declare himselfe worthy of it, ere yet he had obtained it. For, perceiuing that Artaxerxes, who found that part of the field which lay before him voide, was about to encompasse the Greeks, and to set vpon them in the reare, he advanced with fixe hundred Horse, and gaue so valiant a charge vpon a squadron of fixe thousand, which lay before the King, that he brake it, flaying the Captaine thereof, Artager fes, with his owne hands, and putting all the rest to flight. Hereupon his whole companie of sixe hundred, very sew excepted, began to follow the chase, leaving Cyrus too ill attended, who perceiving where the King stood in troupe, vncertaine whether to fight, or leave the field, could not containe himselfe, but said; I fee the man: and presently with a small handfull of 50 men about him ranne vpon his brother, whom he strake through the Curace, and wounded in the breft. Hauing given this stroke, which was his last, he received immediately the fatall blow, which gaue period at once to his ambition and life, being wounded under the eye with a dart, throwne by a base-fellow, where with assonied, he fell dead from his horse, or so hurt, that it was unpossible to have recovered him, though all which were with him, did their best for his safety; not caring afterwards for their owne lines, when once they perceived that Cyrus their Master was flaine. Artaxerxes caused the head and right hand of his brother to bee forthwith fricken off, and shewed to his people, who now pursuing them, fled apace, calling youn the name of Cyrus, and deliring him to pardon them. But when this great accident had breathed new courage into the Kings troupes, & vtterly difmaied fuch Persian Captaines, as were now, even in their owne eies, no better than rebels; it was not long ere the Campe of Cyrus was taken, being quite abandoned, from whence Astaxerxes, making all speede, arrived quickly at the quarter of the Greekes, which was about three miles from the place where Cyrus fell. There hee met with Tiffaphernes, who having made way through the battaile of the Greekes, was readie now to joyne with his Master in spoiling their Tents. Had not the newes, which Artaxerxes brought with him of his brothers death, beene sufficient to counternaile all disasters received; the exploit of Tissaphernes in breaking through the Greekes would have veelded little comfort. For Tiffaphernes had not flaine any one man of the Greekes, but contrariwife, when he gaue vpon them, they opening their battaile, draue him with great flaughter through them, in such wise, that he rather escaped as out of an hard passage, than forced his way through the squadron of the 20 Greekes. Hereof the King being informed by him, and that the Greekes, as Masters of the field, gave chase to all that came in their fight; they ranged their Companies into good order, and followed after these Greekes, intending to set vpon them in reare. But these good Souldiers perceiuing the Kings approch, turned their faces, and made head against him; who not intending to seeke honour with danger of his life, wheeled about and fled, being purfued vnto a certaine Village, that lay vnder a Hill, on the top whereof he made a stand, rather in a brauerie, than with purpose to attempt vpon these bold-fellowes any further. For he knew well that his brothers death had secured his estate, whom he would seeme to have slaine with his owne hand, thinking that fact alone sufficient to give reputation to his valour; and this 30 reputation he thought that he might now preserve wel enough, by shewing a manly looke, halfe a mile off. On the top of this Hill therefore he advanced his Standard, a golden Eagle displaied on the top of a Speare. This ensigne might have encouraged his people, had not some of the Greekes espied it, who not meaning that he should abide so neere them, with all their power marched toward him. The King discouering their approch, fled vpon the spurre; so that none remained in the place of battaile, sauc only the Greeke, who had lost that day not one man, nor taken any other harme, than that one of them was hurt with an arrow. Much they wondred that they heard no newes of Cyrus, but thinking that hee was pursuing the Armie, they thought it was fittest for them, having that day done enough, to returne to 40 their quarter, and take their Supper, to which they had good appetite, because the expectation of the Kings comming had given them no leifure to dine.

δ. V.

The hard estate of the Greekes after the sight; and how ARTAXERXES in vaine fought to have made them yeeld wnto him.

T was now about the fetting of the Sunne, and they bringing home darke night with them, found their Campe spoiled, little, or nothing being left, that might serve for sood: so that wanting victuals to satisfie their hunger, they refreshed their wearie bodies with sleepe. In the meane season Artaxerxes returning to his Camp, which he entred by Torch-light, could not enjoy the pleasure of his good fortune entire, because he perceived perceined that the basenesse of his people, and weakenesse of his Empire, was now plainely discouered to the Greekes: which gaue him affurance, that if any of these who had beheld the shamefull demeanor of his Armie, should line to carry tidings home, it would not be long, ere with greater forces they disputed with him for his whole Signoric. Wherefore hee resolued, to trie all meanes, whereby hee might bring them to destruction, and not let one escape to carrie tidings of that which he had seene: to which purpose hee sent them a braue message the next morning; Charging them to deliuer vp their Armes, and come to his Gate, to awaite there voon his Mercie. It seemes that he was in good hope to have found their high courages broken, vpon report of his brothers death: but he was greatly deceived in that 10 thought. For the Greekes being aduertised that morning from Ariaus, a principall Comander under Cyrus, that his Master being slaine, he had retired himselfe to the place of their last encamping, about eight miles from them, whence intending to returne into Ionia, his meaning was to dislodge the next day, awaiting for them so long if they would joyne with him, but resoluing to stay no longer: they sent an-Swere back to Arians, that having beaten the King out of the field, and finding none that durst relist them, they would place Arians himselfe in the Kings Throne, if he would joyne with them, and pursue the victorie. Before they received any reply to this answere, the Messengers of Artaxerxes arrived at the Campe, whose crrand seemed to the Captaines very insolent: One told them that it was not for the 20 Vanquishers to yeeld their Weapons; another, that he would die ere hee yeelded to such a motion; athird asked, whether the King, as having the victoric, required their Weapons; if so, why did he not fetch them? or, whether he desired them in way of friendship; for then would they first know, with what courtesie hee meant to requite their kindnesse. To this question Phalinus a Gracian, waiting upon Tillaphernes, answered; That the King having slaine Cyrus, knew no man that could pretend any Title to his Kingdome, in the middest whereof he held them fast enclosed with great Rivers, being able to bring against them such numbers of men, as they wanted frength to kill if they would hold up their throats, for which cause he accounted them his prisoners. These words, to them, who knew themselves to 30 be free, were nothing pleasant. Therefore, one told Phalinus, that having nothing left, but their Armes & Valour, whilest they kept their Armes, their Valour would be scruiceable, but should they yeeld them, it was to be doubted, that their bodies would not long remaine their owne. Hereat Phalinus laughed, saying; This yongman did seeme a Philosopher, and made a pretty speech; but that his deepe speculation shewed his wits to be very shallow, if he thought with his Armes, and his Valour, to preuaile against the great King. It seemes that Phalinus being a Courtier, and imploied in a businesse of importance, thought himself too prosound a Statesman, to be checkt in his Embassage by a bookish discourser. But his wisdome hereinfailed him. For what soeuer he himselse was (of whom no more is knowne than 40 that he brought an vnhonest message to his owne Countrimen, perswading them basely to surrender their Weapons, & Liues, to the mercilesse Barbarians) this yong Scholler by him despised, was that great Xenophon, who, when all the principall Commanders were surprised by treacherie of the Persians, being a private Gentleman, and having neuer seene the warres before, vnder-tooke the conduct of the Armie, which he brought safe into Greece, freeing it from all those, and from greater dangers than Phalinus could propound. Some there were who promifed to be faithfull to the King, as they had beene to Cyrus, offering their service in Agypt, where they thought Artaxerxes might have vie of them. But the finall answere was, That without Weapons they could neither doe the Kinggood as Friends, nor defend 50 themselues from him as Enemies. Hereupon Phalinus deliuered the Kings further pleasure, which was to grant them Truce, whilest they abode where they the were, denouncing Warre if they stirred thence, Whereunto hee required their answere. Clearchus the Generall told him, they liked it. How (faith Phalinus) must I vnderCHAP.10.S.6. of the Historie of the World.

fland you? as choosing peace if we stay, otherwise warre, said Clearchus. But whether warre or peace? quoth this politique Embassadour. To whom Clearchus (not willing to acquaint him with their purpose,) Let our doings tell you; and so dismissed him, no wifer than he came. All that day the Greekes were saine to seede vpontheir Horses, Asses, and other Beass, which they rolled with arrowes, darts, and woodden targets, throwne away by the Enemies.

è. VI.

How the Greekes beganne to returne home-wards.

T night they tooke their way towards Arians, to whom they came at mid night; being forfaken by foure hundred foot, and forty horse, all Thracians, who fled ouer the King, by whom how they were entertained, I doe not finde. Like enough it is that they were cut in pieces, for had they been kindly vsed, it may well bee thought that some of them should have accompanied Tissaphernes, and served as Stales to draw in the rest. Ariem being of too base a temper, and birth, to thinke upon seeking the King-20 dome for himselfe, with such affishance as might have given it unto Cyrus, was very well pleased to make couenant with them for mutuall affishance unto the last: Wherunto both parts having sworne, he advised them to take another way homeward, which should bee somewhat longer, yet safer and sitter to relieue them with vistuals, than that by which they came. The next day, having made a wearisome march, and tired the Souldiers, they found the Kings Armie which had coasted them, lodged in certaine Villages, where they purposed themselves to have encamped: towards which Clearchus made directly, because hee would not seeme by declining them to shew seare, or weakenesse. That the Kings men were contented to remove, and give place to their betters, it cannot be strange to any that hath con-

30 sidered their former behauiour; Nor strange, that the Gracians being wearie and hungrie, and lying among enemies in an vnknowne Countrie, should be very fearefull; but it is almost past beliefe, that the noise which was heard of these poore men, calling one to another tumultuously, as the present condition inforced them to doe, should make the Persians slic out of their Campe, and so affright the great King, that in stead of demanding their Armes, he should craue peace of them. The next day very early, came messengers from Arraxernes, desiring free accesses for Embassiadours, to entreat of peace. Were it not that such particulars doe best open the qualitie of the persons, by whom things were managed, I should hold it fitter, to runne ouer the general passages of those times, than to dwel among circumstances.

4º But furely it is a point very remarkeable, That when Clearchus had willed the Meffengers to bid the King prepare for battaile, because the Greekes (as he said) wanting whereupon to dine, could not endure to heare of truce till their bellies were full; Artaxeries dissembling the indignitie, was contented sweetly to swallow downe this pill, sending them guides, who conducted them to a place where was plentie of victuals to relieue them.

Ither to the Greekes, relying vpon their owne vertue, had rather aduanced their affaires, than brought the selicities into any straights or termes of disaduantage. But now came vnto them the subtile Fox Tissaphernes, who circumuenting the chiefe Commanders by fine sleights, did mischicuously entrappethem, to the extreme danger of the Armie, 10

He told them, that his Province, lying neere vnto Greece, had caused him greatly to desire, that their delinerance might be wrought by his procurement; knowing well that in time to come, both they, and their Countrimen at home, would not be vnthankefull for fuch a benefit. Herewithall hee forgot not to rehearfe the great feruice that he had done to his Master, being the first that advertised him of Cyrus his intent, and having not only brought him a good frength of men, but in the day of battaile shewed his face to the Greekes, when all others turned their backs: that he, together with the King, did enter their Campe, and gaue chase to the Barbarians that flood on the part of Cyrus. All this (quoth hee) did I alledge to the King, entreating that he would give me leave to conduct you fafe into Greece; in which fuite 20 I have good hope to speede, if you will send a milde answere to him, who hath willed me to aske you, for what cause yee haue borne Armes against him. The Captaines hearing this, were contented to give gentlewords, which Tiffaphernes relating to the King, procured (though very hardly as he faid) that peace should be granted: the conditions whereof were; That they should passe freely through all the Kings Dominions, paying for what they tooke, and committing no spoile: yet that it should be lawfull for them to take victuals by force, in any place that refused to affoord them an open Market. Hereunto both parties having sworne, the League was concluded, and Tiffaphernes returning to the King to take leave, and end all bufineste, came vnto them againe after twentie daics, and then they fet forward. This 30 interim oftwenty dales, which Tiffaphernes did spend at the Court, ministred great occasion of miltrust to his new Confederates. For belides his long absence, which alone sufficed to breede doubt; the Brethren, and Kindred of Arieus, repairing daily to him, and other Persians to his Souldiers, did work him and them so with assurance of pardon, and other allurements, that hee daily grew more strange to the Greekes, than formerly he had beene. This caused many to aduise Clearchus, rather to paffe forward as well as he might, than to relie vpon couenants, and fit ftill whileft the King laied mares to entrap them. But he on the contrarie per swaded them, to rest contented whilest they were well, and not to cast themselves againe into those difficulties, out of which they were newly freed by the late Treatie; reciting 40 withall their owne wants, and the Kings meanes, but especially the Oathes mutually gluen and taken, wherewith hee faw no reason why the chemic should have clogged himselfe if hee meant milebiefe, having power enough to doe them harme by a faire and open Warrei

Tissaphernes was a very honourable Man (if honour may bee valued by greatnesse and place in Court) which caused his Oath to bee the more esteemed; for as much as no inforcement, or base respect, was like to have drawne it from him.
But his falshood was such, both in substance and in successive may fitly expound that saying, which proceeded from the sountaine of Trust, I hate a rich man alyar.
Alye may finde excuse when it growes out of search for that passion hath his originals from weakenesse. But when Power, which is a Charaster of the Almightie, shall be made the supporter of vntruth, the salshood is most abominable; for the offender, like proud Lucifer, advancing his owne strength against the divine Iustice, doth commit that sinne with an high hand, which commonly producech same table effects, and is followed with fure vengeance. It was not long ere Tiffaphernes found meanes to destroy all the Captaines, whom hee subtilly got into his power by a traine; making the Generall Clearchus himselfe the meane to draw in all the reft. The businesse was contriued thus: Having travailed some dates together in fuch wife, that the Persians did not encampe with the Greekes, who were very jealous of the great familiaritie, appearing betweene Tiffaphernes, and Arieus; Clearchus thought it convenient to roote out of Tiffaphernes his braines all causes of distrust. whereof many had growne in that short time. To which purpose obtaining private conference with him, he rehearfed the oath of Confederacie, which had past betweene them, shewing how religiously he meant to keepe it, and repeating the benefits, which the Greekes did receive by the helpe of Tiffaphernes, he promifed that their love should appeare to him not unfruitful, if he would make vie of their service against the Mysians or Pissdians, who were accustomed to infest his Province, or against the Agyptians, who were then Rebels to the great King. For which cause he defired him, that whereas al divine and humane respects had linked them together, he would not give place to any close accusation or suspition, whereby might grow fudden inconvenience to either of them, vpon no just ground. The faithleffe Perfian was very much delighted with this speech, which ministred faire occasion to the execution of his purpose. Therefore he told Clemehus, that all this was by him 20 wifely confidered, wishing him further to call to minde how many waies hee could have vsed to bring them to confusion, without perill to himselfe, especially by burning the Countrie, through which they were to passe, whereby they must needes have perished by meere famine. For which cause hee said that it had beene great folly to feeke by perjurie, odious to God and Man, the destruction of such as were alreadic in his hands; But the truth was, that his owne loue to them had moued him to worke their fafetie, not onely for those ends which Clearchus had recounted. of pleasures that might redound to himselfe, and the King, by their assistance: but for that he might by their friendship, hope to obtaine what Cyrus had mist. Finally, he inuited the credulous Gentleman to Supper, and sent him away so well assured 30 of his good will, that he promised to bring all the Captaines with him to the same place, where, in presence of them all, Tiffaphernes likewise promised to tell openly, which of them had by fecret information fought to raise diffension between them. Clearchus himselfe being thus deceived, with great importunitie drew all the chiefe Commanders, and many of the inferiour Leaders, to repaire with him to the camp of Tislaphernes, whither followed them about two hundred of the common Souldiers as it had beene to some common Faire. But being there arrived, Clearchus with other the flue principall Coronels, were called into the Tent, the rest staying without, where they had not waited long ere a figne was given, vpon which they within were apprehended, and the refidue flaine. Forthwith certaine bands of Per-40 fian Horse-men scoured the field, killing as many Greekes as they met, and riding vp to the very Campe of the Gracians, who wondred much at the tumult, whereof they knew not the cause, till one, escaping sorely wounded, informed them of all that had beene done. Hercupon the Greekes took Armes in haste, thinking that the enemy would forthwith have affailed their Campe. Anon they might perceive the Embassadours of Tissaphernes, among whom were his owne brother, and Arieus; followed with three hundred Horse, who called for the principall men in the Armie, faying, that they brought a meffage from the King, which Arieus deliuered to this effect. That Clearchus having broken his faith, and the league made, was justly rewarded with death; that Menon and Proxenus, two other of the fine Co-50 ronels, for detecting his treacherie, were highly honoured; and finally, that the King required them to furrender their Armes, which were due to him, as having belonged unto his feruant Cyrus. When some altercation had followed upon this message, Xenophon told the Embassadours, that if Clearchus had in such fort offended, it was well that he was in such fort punished; but he willed them to fend back

CHAP. 10: $.7.

Menon and Proxenus, whom they had lo greatly honoured, that by them, as by common friends to both Nations, the Greekes might be aduited how to answere the Persian. Hereunto the Embassadours knew not how to frame any reply, and therefore departed without speaking one word more. Clearchus, and the other foure were sent to Artaxerxes, by whose commandement their heads were striken off. I hold it not amisse to preuent the order of time, annexing to this persidiousnesse of Tiffaphernes, the reward which he afterward received. He saw his Province wasted by the Greekes, against whom receiving from his Master convenient aide of men and money, hee did so ill manage his affaires, that neither subtiltie, nor perjurie (to which he failed not to haue recourse) auailing him; finally, the King was jealous of to his cunning head, and sent a new Lieutenant into those parts, who tooke it from his shoulders. Such was the recompense of his treacherie, which made him so mistrusted at home, that the service which he could not doe, he was thought vpon priuate ends to neglect; and so hated abroad, that he knew not which way to flye from the stroke, all the world being shut against him. But now let vs returne to the prosperitie, wherein hee triumphed without great cause, having betrayed braver men than himselfe, and intending to bring the like mischiese vpon the whole Armie.

Q. VIII.

How XENOPHON heartened the Greekes, and in despisht of TISSA-PHERNES went off (afely.

R cat was the heaninesse of the Souldiers, being now destitute of Leaders, and no lesse their searc of the cuill hanging ouer their heads, which they knew not how to auoide. Among the rest, Xenophon, whose learning supplied his want of experience, finding the deepe fadnesse of the whole Armie to be such as hindred them from taking any course of preuenting the danger at hand, began to admise the vnder-Officers of Proxenus his companies, whose familiar friend he had beene, to bethinke them- 30 felues of fome meane, whereby their fafetie might be wrought, and the Souldiers encouraged: fetting before their eyes what socuer might serue to give them hope, and aboue al perswading them in no wise to yeeld to the mercy of their barbarous

Hereupon they defired him to take vpon him the charge of that Regiment; and fo together with him, the same night calling vp such as were remaining of any account, they made choice of the fittest men to succeede in the places of those who were flaine, or taken. This being done, and order fet downe for disburdening the Armie of all superfluous impediments, they easily comforted themselves for the loffe of Tiffaphernes his affiftance, hoping to take victuals by force better cheap than 40 he had beene wont to fell them; To which purpose they intended to take vp their lodging two or three miles further, among some plentifull Villages, and so to proceede, marching towards the heads of those great Rivers, which lay in their way, and to passe them where they were foordable. Many attempts were made vpon them by Tiffaphernes, whom they, scruing alon foot, were not able to requite for the harme which they received by the Persian Archers, who shot at a farther distance than the Greekes could reach. For this cause did Xenor hon prouide slings, wherewith he ouer-reached the enemy; and finding some Horses sit for service, that were imployed among the carriages, he fet men vpon them; training likewise his Archers to shoote compasse, who had beene accustomed to the point blanke. By these 50 meanes did hee beare off the Persians who assailed him; and sometimes gave them chace with that band of fiftie Horse, which being well backt, with a firme bodie of footmen, and seconded with rroupes of the light-armed-shot and slingers, compelled the enemie to lie a-loofe. Tiffaphernes not daring to come to handie gripes with these resolute men, did possesse the tops of Mountaines, and places of advantage, by which they were to passe. But finally, when their valour made way through all fuch difficulties, he betooke himselfe to that course, which was indeede the surest, of burning the Countrie. With great forrow did the Greekes behold the Villages on fire, and thereby all hope of victuals cut off. Some adulfed to defend the Countrie, as granted by the enemie himselfe to be theirs; others to make more fires, if so perhaps the Persians might be ashamed to doe that which were the desire of such as made passage in hostile manner; But these were faint comforts. The best counsaile was, that being neere vnto the Carduchi, a people enemie to the Persian, they should 10 enter into their Countrie passing over some high Mountaines which lay betweene them. This course they followed, which could not have availed them, if Tissapherneshad begunne sooner to cut off their victuals, rather then to seeke to force, or to circumuent them by his fine wit.

ø. IX.

The difficulties which the Greeke Armie found in passing through the Land of the Carduchi.

Ntring vpon the Land of the Carduchi, they were encountred with many difficulties of waies, but much more afflicted by the fierce Inhabitants, who, accustomed by force to defend themselues against the huge Armies of the Persian, were no way inferiour to the Greekes in daring, but only in the Art of warre. They were verie light of foot, skilfull Archers; and vsed the Sling well; which weapons in that mountainous Countrie were of much vse against these poore trauailers, afflicting them in seven daies which they spent in that passage, farre more than all the power of the great King had done. Betweene the Territorie of the carduchi, and the parts of Armemis confining them, ranne Centrites a great River, vpon which the Greekes refreshed 30 themselves one day, rejoyeing that they had so well escaped these dangers, and hoping that the remainder would proue easie. But the next morning they saw certainetroupes of Horse, that lay to forbid their passage. These were leavied by the Kings Deputies in those parts; Tiffaphernes and his Companies having taken their way towards Ionia. The River was broade and deepe, so that it was not possible for such as would enter it, to make resistance against those which kept the opposite bankes. To increase these dangers the Carduchi following vpon them, lay on the side of a Mountaine, within lesse than a mile of the water. But it was their good hap to discouer a Foord, by which the greater number of them passing ouer, did easily chase away the Subjects of the Persian, and then sending backe the most expedite 40 men, gaue fuccour to the Reare-ward, against which the Carduchi being slightly armed, could not on plaine ground make refistance hand to hand. These Carduchi sceme to have inhabited the Mountaines of Niphates, which are not farre from the Spring of Tygris; though Ptolomie place them far more to the East vpon the River of Cyrus in Media, wherein he differs much from Xenophon, whose relation being grounded vpon his owne knowledge, doth best in this case deserve credit. Of the River Centrites (as of many other Rivers, Townes, and Places, mentioned by Xenophon) I will not labour to make a coniecture, which may endure the scueritie of a Critick. For Ptolomie, and the whole Nation of Geographers, adde small light to this expedition: only of this last, I thinke it the same which falleth into Tieris, not 50 much aboue Artafigarta springing out of Niphates, and running by the Towne of Sardena in Gordene, a Province of Armenia the Great, wherein the Greekes having passed Centrites did arrive.

How TERIBAZVS Gouernour of Armenia, feeking to entrap the Greekes with termes of fained peace, was disappointed and Chamefully beaten.

He Armie finding in Armenia good provision, marched without any disturbance about listic or three icore mines to the mean of the Tigris, and passing ouer them, travialed as farre further without redisturbance about fiftie or threescore miles to the heads of the River filtance, till they were encountred by Teribazus at the River Teleboa, 10 which Xenophon commends as a goodly water, though small; but Ptolomie and others omit it. Teribazus gouerned that Countrie for the Persian, and was in great fauour with Artaxerxes, whole Court may sceme to have beene a Schoole where the Art of falshood was taught as wildome. He desired peace of the Greeks, which was made vpon this condition; that they should take what they pleased, but not burne downe the Townes and Villages in their way. As foone as he had made this league, he leavied an Armie, & besetting the Straights of certaine Mountaines which they were to passe, hoped wel to make such benefit of their security, as might giue him the commendation of being no lesse crastily dishonest than Tissaphernes. Yet his cunning failed of successe. For a great snow fell, which caused the Greekes 20 to make many fires, and scatter themselves abroad in the Villages. Teribazus also made many fires, and some of his men wandred about seeking reliefe. By the fires he was discovered, and by a Souldier of his that was taken prisoner, the whole plot was reucaled. Hecreupon the Greekes, taking this captine with them for a guide, fought him out; and comming vpon his Campe, did so affright him, that before the whole Armie could arrive there, the shout which was raised by the Vaunt-currors, chased him away. They tooke his Pauilion, wherein (besides many slaues, that were Artificers of voluptuousnesse) verie rich furniture was lest by the treacherous coward, who returned no more to challenge it. From hence the Armic went northward, and passing Euprates, not far below the springs thereof, travailed with much 30 difficulty through deepe fnow, being followed aloofe by the enemy, who durft not approach them, but did cut off such as they found stragling behinde. The Inhabitants of the Countrie, through which they marched, had their wintring houses vnder ground, wherein was found great plentie of victuals, and of cattaile, which likewise did winter in the same Cellars with the owners. Having refreshed themselves in those parts, and taken sufficient case after the miserable journey, which had confumed many of them with extreme cold; they departed, leading with them many bond flaues, and taking away (belides other Horses and Cattaile) some Colts that were bred vp for the great King.

The passage of the Armie to Trabizonde, through the Countries bordering upon the River of Phasis, and other ob-Cure Nations.

O without impediment they came to the River Phass, neere where-vnto the people called Phasiani Tankhi and Ch. L. I. Nations io yned together, and occupying the tops of a ledge of Mountaines, which the Greekes were to passe, made countenance of warre: but some companies being sent by night to seize vpon a place of cquall height to that whereon the enemies lay, making good the piece of ground which they had taken, secured the ascent of the rest; which caused these people to Aic, encry one retyring to the defence of his owne. The first vpon whose Countrie

the Greekes did enter were the Taochi, who convaying all their provision of victuals into ftrong holds, brought the Armie into much want, vntill with hard labour one place was forced, wherein great flore of cattaile were taken; the people, to avoide captinitie, threw themselves head-long downe the rocks, the very women throwing downe first their owne children, and then casting themselues vpon them. Here was taken a great bootic of Cattaile, which served to feed them, travailing through the land of the Chalybes, of whom they got nothing but strokes. The Chalybes were a very front Nation, well armed at all points, and exceeding fierce. They encountred the Greekes hand to hand, killing as many as they tooke prisoners, and cutting 10 off their heads, which they carried away, finging and dancing, to the great griefe of their companions living; who were glad, when after feuen daies iourney they efeaped from those continuall skirmishes, where with they had been vexed by these Barbarians, Hence travailing through a good corne-Countrie, inhabited by an obscure Nation called the Seythini, they came to a rich Towne, the Lord wherof, and of the Region adioyning, vsed them friendly, and promised to guide them to a Mountaine, whence they might discouer the Euxine-Sea. From Gymnias (which was the name of his Towne) he led them through the Territorie of his enemies, defiring them to waste it with sword and fire. After five daies march, they came to a Mountaine called Teches, being (as I thinke) a part of the Mountaines called Mo-30 Schiei, whence their guide shewed them the Sea; towards which they bent their course, and passing friendly through the Region of the Macrones, (with whom by meanes of an interpreter, found among themselves, who borne in that place had Trabifords beene fold into Greece, they made a good peace) they arrived in the Land of Colches, Colonie of the wherein stands the Citie of * Trabifond, called then Trapezus, a Colonie of the Greekes, Situate Greekes. The Colchi entertaining them with hostilitie, were requited with the like; in the bottome for the Armie haning now good leifure to repose themselves among their friends Sea. the Trapezuntians, did spoile the Countrie thirtie daies together, for bearing onely the Borderers vpon Trabizonde, at the Citizens request.

How the Armie beganne at Trabizond to prouide a Fleet, wherewith to returne home by Sea: how it came into the Territorie of Sinope, and there prosequited the same purpose.

Auing now found an Hauen Towne, the Souldiers were desirous to take (hipping, and change their tedious Land-iournies into an easie Nauigation. To which purpose Cherisophus a Lacedemonian, one of Natigation. 10 winer purpose certifying a factorism of Anaxibias the the principall Commanders, promifed by meanes of Anaxibias the Lacedamonian Admirall, who was his friend, that he would prouide

Vessels to embarkethem. Hauing thus concluded, they likewise tooke order for the staying of such ships as should passe that way, meaning to vie them for their nauigation. Lest all this prouision should be found insufficient for the transportation of the whole Armie, Xenophon perswaded the Cities adioyning to cleare the waies, and make an easic passage for them by Land, whereunto the Souldiers were vtterly vnwilling to giue care, being desirous to returne by Sea, but the Countrie fearing what inconvenience might grow by their long stay, did readily condescend to Xensphons request. Two ships they borrowed of the Trapezuntians, which they manned and sent to Sea: the one of them failed directly into Greece, for faking their Companions, who had putthem in trust to bring ships into the Port of Trabifonde: the other tooke Merchants and passengers, whose goods were safely kept for the owners, but the Vessels were staied to increase the fleet. After long abode, when victuals beganne to faile, by reason that all the Land of the Colchi, neere vnto the Campe was alreadic quite wasted, they were faine to embarke their sickmen, with Lill 2

the women, children, and fuch of the baggage as might belt be foured, in those few thips which they had already prouided. The rest of the Armie tooke their way by Land to Cerafus, a Greeke Towne, where the fleet likewise arrived. Here the Armie being multered, was found to confift of eight thousand and six hundred men From hence they passed through the Countrie of the a Mosynaci, who were divided into tus Cappadocieus factions. The stronger partie, despising their friendship, caused them to ioyne with the weaker, whom they left Masters of all.

The next place of their abode was b Cotyora, a Greeke Townelikewise, and a Colonie of the Sinopians, as Trapezus and Cerasus were; but the entertainement which here they found was very churlish, having neither an open Market affoorded to 10 them, nor the fick-men that were among them admitted into any house. Hereupon the Souldiers entred the Towne by force, and (committing no outrage) beltowed those which were sicke in convenient lodgings, taking into their owne hands the custody of the Gates. Prouision for the Armie they made by strong hand, partly out of the Territoric of the Paphlagonians, partly out of the Lands belonging to the Towne. These newes were vnwelcome to sinope, whence Embassadours were fent to the Camp, who complaining of these dealings, and threatning to joyne with the Paphlagonians, if redresse could not otherwise be had, were roundly answered by Xenophon, That mecre necessitie had enforced the Armie to teach those of cotrora good manners in so bad a methode : letting them know, that he feared not to deale 20 with them and the Paphlagonian at once; though perhaps the Paphlagonian would be glad to take Sinope it felfe, to which, if cause were given, they would lend affistance. Vpon this answere the Embassadors grew better adulfed, promising all friendship that the State of Sinope could shew, and commanding the Towns of Cotyora to relieue the Souldiers as well as they might. Further, they promifed to affift them with shipping, letting them understand how difficult the passage by Land would prone, in regard of the many and great Rivers, as Thermodon, Iris, Halys, and Parthenius, which croffed their way. This good counsaile, and the faire promises accompanying it, were kindly accepted by the Armie, which well perceived, that the Citie of Sinope would spare for no cost, to be freed from such a neighbourhood. It 20 was therefore decreed that they would passe the rest of the way by Sea; provided that if there should want such number of Vessels as might serue to embarke energy one man of them, then would they not put from the shore.

d. XIII.

Of diffension which arose in the Armie; and how it was embarked.

Itherto the danger oftenemics, and mileries of weather & wants, had kept the companie in firme vnitie; which now beganne to dissolue 40 and to thaw, by the neighbouring aire of Greece, warming their heads with private respects to their severall ends and purposes. Whilest they, who were fent as Agents from the Campe, remained at Sinope;

Xenophon considering the strength and valour of his men, and the opportunitie of the coast wheron they lay, thought it would be an honorable worke to build a Citie in those parts, which were soone like to proue great and wealthie, in regard both of their owne puissance, and of the great repaire of the Greekes into that quarter. For this cause he made sacrifice, according to the superstition of his time and Countrie, divining of his successe by the entrailes of beasts. The Sooth-sayer whom hee imployed had received a great reward of Cyrus, for coniecturing aright, that Ar- 50 taxerxes would not give battaile in ten daies: hee therefore, having preserved his money carefully, was desirous to be soone at home, that he might freely enjoy his gettings. By him the purpole of Xenophon was disulged, which was interpreted according to the diversitie of mens opinions; some approving the motion, but the greater part rejecting it. They of Sinope and Heracles, being informed of this confultation, were fore afraide, left the poucrtie of the Souldiers, who had not wherewith to maintaine themselves at home, should give successe to the project. Which to prevent, they promifed to supply the Armie with a sufficient fleet, and likewise offered money to some of the Captaines, who thereupon vnder-tooke to give the Souldiers pay, if they would presently set faile for Greece. One of these Captaines being a banished man, desired them to follow him into Treas; another offered to leade them into Cherronesus. Xenophon who desired only the common good, was pleased greatly with these propositions and professed openly that hee would have to them to let forward, and hold together in any case, punishing him as a Traitor that should for sake the Armie, before such time as they were arrived at their journies end. Silanus the Sooth-layer, who had vttered Xenophons purpose, was heereby flaied from outrunning his fellowes, and driven to abide with his wealth among poore men, longer than stood with his good liking. Also the other Captaines were much troubled and afraid, when they perceived, that thips were prepared fufficient for their Nauigation, but that the money promifed to them, and by them to the Souldiers, came not. For the people of Sinope, and Heracles, knowing that the Atmie was now resolved for the voiage, & that Aenophon, whom they scared, had perswaded them to this resolution; thought it the wisest way to furnish them with a Nauy 20 whilest they were in good readinesse to depart, but to keepe the money to themselues. The Captaines therefore who being disappointed by these Townes, found themselues in great danger of their men, whom they had deceived with fair hopes, repented much of their hastic offers, & fignifying as much to Xenophon, praied him to make proposition to the Armic, of taking the ships, and sayling to Phasis, where they might seize vpon Lands, & plant themselves in such wife as should stand best with their good liking. But finding him cold in the businesse, they began to worke the principall of their own followers, hoping by them to draw in all the rest. These newes becomming publike, bred a suspition of Xenophon, as if he had wonne the rest of the Captaine to his purpose, and meant now to carrie the Armie quite another 30 way from their owne home. Wherefore affembling the Companies, he gaue them fatisfaction, and withail complained of some disorders which he caused them to redreffe. A generall inquisition was likewise made of offences committed since the death of Cyrus; which being punished, all things were in quiet. Shortly after came Embassadours from Corylas, Lord of the Paphlagonians, who sending presents desired peace of the Greekes: the Embassadours were friendly entertained, and peace concluded, which needed not to have been fought, for that the Greekes having now their fleet in a readinesse, did soone weigh Anchors, and set saile for Harmene the Port of Sinope, whither Cherisophus came, bringing with him a few Gallies from the Admirall Anaxibius, who promised to give the Armie pay as soone, as they came 49 into the parts of Greece.

¿. XIIII.

Another great diffension and distraction of the Armie. How the muti-, ners were beaten by the Barbarians, and refcued by XENOPHON.

Hencerer that they approched to Greece, the greater was their desire to make provision for themselves, that they might not returne home emptic-handed. Wherefore trufting well that if the charge of the Armie were absolutely committed to one sufficient man, hee might the more conveniently procure the good of them all, they determi-1.111 2

ned to make Xenophon fole Commander of all, in whose fauour as well the Captains as the common Souldiers were very earnest and violent. But he, either fearing to displease the Lacedamonians, who were lealous of him already (being incensed by that fugitive who for fooke the Armie at Trabizond, flying with one of their two thips or moved by fome tokens appearing to him in the entrails that threatned ill successe to his gouernment, procured with vehement contention, that this honour was laied vpon Cherisophus a Lacedamonian. It seemes that Xenophon, considering the vexations incident to the conduct of a voluntarie Army, wanting pay, did wiscly in veelding to fuch tokens as forbad him to accept it:especially, knowing so well their defire, which was by right or by wrong to get wealth wherefocuer it might bee to found, without all regard of Friend or of Foc. Cherisophus had beene Generall but fixe or feuen daies, when he was deposed, for having been vn willing to robbe the Towne of Heraclea which had fent presents to the Campe, and beene very beneficiall vnto them in lending thips for their transportation. Two daies they had failed by the coast of Asa, when being past those great Rivers, which would have given impediment to their journey by Land, they touched at Heraclea, where consulting how to take their way on wards, whether by Land or Sea, one feditious man began to put them in minde of feeking to get fomewhat for themselves; telling them that all their provision would be spent in three daies, and that being now come out of the enemies Countrie, victuals and other necessaries could not bee had without 20 money; for which cause he gave advice to send messengers into the Towne of Heraclea, giving the Citizens to understand what their wants were, and demanding of them three thousand pieces of money, called Cyzicens, which summe amounteth to two thousand and five hundred pound starling, or thereabout. This motion was greatly applauded, and the fumme raised to tenne thousand Cyzicens at least: which to require, they thought Cherisophus, as being Generall, the fittest man; others had more defire to fend Xenophon: but in vaine, for they both refused it, and renounced the action as dishonest. Lest therefore either of these should faile in managing the businesse which agreed not with his disposition, others of more impudencie and leffe discretion were sent, who in such wife deliuered their insolent mes- 20 fage; that the Citizens taking time to deliberate vpon their request, brought what they could out of the fields into the Towne, and shutting the Gates, did forthwith man the walls. When the Souldiers perceived themselves to be disappointed of their cauenous purpose, they fel to mutiny, saying, That their Leaders had betraied them: and being for the more part of them Arcadians, and Achaens, they for sooke immediately Cherisophus and Xenophon, choosing new Leaders out of their owne number. Aboue foure thousand and five hundred they were, all heavily armed, who electing ten Captaines, failed into the Port of Calphas, which is in the mid-way betweene Heraclea and Bizantium, with purpose to assaile the Bythinians on the suddaine. With Cheriforhus there abode two thousand and one hundred, of whom one 40 thousand and source hundred were armed weightily: Xenophon had two thousand foor, three hundred whereof were lightly armed, and fortie horse, which smal band had done good feruice alreadie, and could not have beene spared now. Cherisophus had agreed with Cleander Governour of Bizantium, to meet him at the mouth of the River Calphas, whither Cleander promited to bring some Gallies to convey him ouer into Greece; for which cause he tooke his way thither by Land, leaving to xenopbon such shipping as he had, who passing some part of the way by Sea, landed ypon the Confines of Heraclea, and Thracia Afiatica, intending to make a cut through the mid-land Countrie to the Propont. The Mutiners, who had landed at Calpas by night, with purpose to take spoiles in Bythinia, divided themselves into ten Compa- 50 nies, euery Captaine leading his owne Regiment into some Village, fine or sixe miles from the Sea, in the greater Townes were two Regiments quartered; and fo was that part of the countrie surprised on the suddaine, & sacked all at one time.

The place of Rendeuous was an high pecce of ground, where some of them arriued finding no disturbance; others, not without much trouble and danger; two Companies were broken and defeated, only eight men escaping, the rest were all put to the fword. For the Thracians which had flipt at first out of the Souldiers hands, did raife the Countrie, and finding the Greekes loden with bootie, tooke the aduantage of their disorder, cutting in pieces those two Regiments: which done, they attempted the rest, encompassing the hill whereon they encamped. One great advantage the Thraceans had, that being all light armed, they could at pleasure make retrait from these Areadians, & Acheans: who wanting the affiltance of horse. to and having neither Archers nor Slingers among them, were driven to fland meerely vpon their defence, bearing off with great danger, and many wounds received. the Darts and Arrowes of the Barbarians, till finally they were driven from their watering place, and enforced to craue parly. What foeuer the articles of composition were, the Thracians yeelded to all; but pledges for affurance they would give none, without which the Greekes well knew, that all promifes of fuch people, especially fo incenfed, were nothing worth. In the meane time Xenophon holding his way quietly through the In-land Region, did enquire of some Travailers, whether they knew ought of any Gracian Armie, passing along those parts; and receiving by them true information of the desperate case into which these Gallants had foolishly 20 throwne themselves, he marched directly towards the place where they lay, taking with him for guides them who gaue him the intelligence. His horse-men hee sent before to discouer, and to scowre the waies; the light-armed foot-men tooke the hill-tops on either hand, all of them fetting fire on what soener they found combustible, whereby the whole Countrie seemed to be on a light-flame, to the great terrour of the enemies, who thought that some huge Armie had approched. That night he encamped on a Hill, within fine mile of the Arcadians, encreasing fill the number of his fires, which hee caused hastily to be quenched soone after Supper. The enemies perceiving this, thought certainely that hee would have fallen vpon them in the darke, which caused them in all haste to dislodge. Early the next mor-30 ning Xenophon comming thither in very good order, to have given battaile, found that his deuice, to affright the Thracians, had taken full effect; but hee maruailed that the Greekes were also departed, concerning whom he learned by enquirie, that they removed at breake of day, and perceived by fignes that they had taken the way to the Port of Capas, in which journey hee ouertooke them. They embraced Him. and His, with great joy: Confessing that they themselves had thought the same which the enemies did, looking that hee should have come by night, wherein finding themselves deceived, they were afraid lest he had forsaken them, and therefore hastened a way, to ouertake him, and joyne with him. So they arrived at the Hauen of Calpas, where it was decreed, That who locuer from thenceforth made a-40 ny motion to disioyne the Armie, should suffer death.

There was also Timber for building and shipping, and a very convenient sea for a great Citie. All which commodities, that might have allu ed the Souldiers to stay there, and to plant, caused them to haste away, fearing lest Xenophon should sinde some device to have settled himselse and them in that place. For the greater part of them had good meanes to live at home, neither did they so much for hope of gaine follow Cyrus in that Warre, as in regard of his Honour, and the loue which they bare vnto him: the poorer fort were luch as left the Parents, Wives, and Children, to whom (though failing of the riches which they had hoped to purchase) they were now desirous to returne. But whether it were so that Xenophon found advantage by their owne superstition, to make them stay, which they greatly suspected; or whether the signes appearing in the entrailes, did indeede forbid their departure: follong they were inforced to abide in the place till victualls failed, neither would to the Captaines leade them forth to forrage the Countrie, untill the Sacrifices should promise good successe. Cherisophus was dead of an Ague, and his ships were gone, being returned to the Heracleans, of whom they were borrowed. His followers were joyned to the rest of the Armie, which the greater it was, the more prouision it needed, and the sooner felt want. For which cause, he that was chosen Coronell into the place of Cherisophus, would needs adventure to gratifie the Souldiers with the spoile of some Villages that stood necre at hand; in which enterprise he found ill successe, the whole Countrie lying in waite to entrap him, and an Armie of Horse being sent by Pharnabazus the Satrapa, or Vice-roy of Phrygia, to the assistance of these Bythiman Thracians, which troupes falling vpon the Greekes that were scat- 20 tered abroade in seeking bootie, slew five hundred of them, and chased the rest to a certaine Mountaine thereby. The newes of this ouerthrow comming to Xenephen, heled forth a part of the Armieto therefcue of those that survived, and brought them safe to the Campe; vpon which the Bythinians made an offer that night, and breaking a Corps du garde, flew some, pursuing the rest to the very Tents. This new courage of the enemie, together with the present condition of the Armic, so disheartened and vnfurnished of necessaries, caused the Greekes to remoue their Campe to a place of more strength; which having intrenched, and committed to the defence of fuch as were least able to indure travaile, Xenophon with the firmest and best able men went forth, both to burie those which were lately slaine, and to 30 abate the pride of the Thracians, and their Affistants. In this journey his demeanour was very Honourable. For having given buriall to the dead, the Enemie was discouered, lying on the tops of the Hills adjoyning, to whom (notwithstanding that the way was very rough, and troublesome, so that some thought it a matter of too great danger, to leave at their backes a wood scarce passeable) hee marched directly, telling his men plainely, that hee had rather follow the enemie with halfe the number, than turne his back to them with twice as many, and letting them further know, that if they did not charge the Barbarian, hee would not faile with the greater resolution to pursue them; from whom if they could safely retire to the campe, yet what should they doe there, wanting victualls to sustaine 40 them in the place, and ships, to carrie them away? wherefore hee willed them rather to fight well that day, having eaten their dinners, than an other day fasting; and norto regard the vneasie returne, which might serue to stay Cowards from running away, but to wish vnto the Énemie a faire and casie way, by which hee might flie from them. These persuasions were followed with so valiant execution, that both Persians and Bythinians being chased out of the field, abandoned the Countrie forthwith, remouing their Families, and leaving all that could not fodainely becconveighed away, to the discretion of the Greekes, who at good leisure gathered the harvest of these bad Neighbours fields. This was the last fight which they had on the fide of Afia. For they were not only suffered quietly 50 to enjoy the spoile of the Countrie, but when the opinion grew common in those parts, that it was the intent of Xenophon to plant a Colonic on the Port of Calpas, Embassadours were sent from the Neighbour people, to desire friendship, and make offer of their best affistance. But the Souldiers had no minde to stay. Wherfore entring further into Bythinia, they tooke a great bootie, which they carried away to Chrysopolis, a Citic neere vnto Chalcedon, where they sold it. Pharnabazus, Lieutenant in Phrygia to Artaxerxes, did greatly feare, left their long stay in that Countrie might breede in them a defire to visite his Province, where they might have found great wealth, and little power to guard it. Therefore he fent to the Lacedamonian Admirall, entreating him with much inflance and large promifes to wast them ouer into Europe; to whom Anaxibius the Admirall condescending. promifed to give the Souldiers pay, as foon as they arrived at Bizantium. So were to they carried out of Asia at the intreatic of the Persian, who in the height of his pride had thought them so surely imprisoned with mighty Rivers, that he not only denied to permit their quiet departure, but willed them to surrender their Armes into his hands, and so to yeeld their lives to his discretion. How discourteoully they were intreated by Anaxibins, and how to requite his injurious dealings. they seized vpon Bizantium, which by Xenophons persuasion they forbare to sacke. I hold it superfluous to relate. For the relidue of their doings appertaine little to the generall course of things. But this expedition, as in all ages it was glorious, so did it both discover the secrets of Asa, and stirre vp the Greekes to thinke vpon greater enterprises, than ever their forefathers had undertaken. Likewiseit was the only remarkable action which the time affoorded. For the Roman warres did hitherto extend no further than to the next neighbouring Townes of Italie; and in Greece all things were quiet, the Lacedamonians ruling infolently, but without diflurbance. True it is, that the seedes of the Warre shortly following, which the Lasedamonians made vpon Artaxerxes, were already fowne, before thele companies returned out of the high Countries of Asia. For the Townes of Ionia, which had fided with yong Cyrus against Tiffaphernes, if not against the great King, prepared to rebell, which they thought fafer, than to fall into the hands of Tiffaphernes, who was now appointed Licutenant, both of his old Prouince, and of all that had belonged to Cyrus. Wherefore the Ionians belought the Lacedamonians to fend them aide, whereby to recouer 30 their libertie; and obtained their

CHAP. XI.

Of the affaires of Greece, whilest they were managed by the Lacedamonians.

How the Lacedamonians tooke courage by example of X ENOPHONS Armie, to make Warre upon ARTAXERXES.

T seemes that the Lacedamonians did well perceive in how ill part Artaxerxes tooke their fauour shewed unto his brother, and yet were timorous in beginning an open warre against him, thinking it sufficient 20 to take all care that no advantage might flip, which could serue to strengthen their estate, by finding the Persian worke beyond the Sea. But when Xenophons Armie had reuealed the basenesse of those effeminate Asiatiques, and rehearsed the many victories which they themselues had gotten, vpon termes of extreme difaduantage; then was all Greece filled with defire of vndertaking vpon this huge vnweldie Empire, thinking it no hard matter for the joynt-forces of that whole Nation, to hew out the way to Sufa, whereof one handfull had opened the passage to Babylon, and further, finding no power that was able 30 to give them resistance, in all that long journey of foure and thirty thousand two hundred and fifty fine furlongs, spent in going and returning, which make of English miles about foure thousand two hundred foure score and one, a very painefull march of one yeere and three moneths. Neuerthelesse the civill distraction wherewith Greece was miserably torne, and especially that hot fire of the Theban Warre, which, kindled with Persian gold, brake forth sodainly into a great flame, drew backe out of Asia the power of the Lacedamonians, to the defence of their owne estate; leauing it questionable whether Agesilaus, hauing both the same, and farre greater forces, could have wrought proportionable effects. Sure it is, that in the whole space of two yeeres, which he spent in Asia, his deedes procured more commenda- 40 tion of magnanimitie and faire behauiour, than of flout courage, and great, or profitable atchieuements. For how highly so cuer it pleased Xenophon, who was his friend, and follower in this, and in other warres, to extoll his vertue; his exploits being only a few incursions into the Countries lying neere the Sea, carry no proportion to Xenophons owne journey, which I know not whether any Age hath paralleled: the famous retrait of Conon the Briton with fix thousand men from Aquileia, to his owne Countrie, through all the breadth of Italie, and length of France, in despite of the Emperor Theodofius, being rather like it than equall. But of Agefilaus and his warres in Asia and Greece, we shall speake more in due place. 50

HIMBRO receiving Xenophons men, beganne to take in Townes, and to entertaine all fuch as were willing to repolt from the Persian, who were many, and some of them such, as had beene highly beholding to the King; who seeme to have had no other cause of discontent, than that they were to live vnder the government of Tissaphernes,

10 whom all others did as vehemently hate as the King his Master did love him. The managing of the warre begunne by Thimbro, was for his oppressions taken out of his hands, and committed to Dercyllidas a Spartan, who behaued himselfe as a good man of Warre, and a wife Commander. For whereas the rule of the low-Countries of Alia was divided betweene Pharnabazus and Tillaphernes, who did ill agree, Pharnabazus being the worthier man, but the other by his Princes favour the greater, and having the chiefe command in those warres against the Greekes; Dercyllidas who did beare a private hatred to Pharnabazus (knowing well that Tissaphernes was of a mischieuous nature, and would not be forry to see his Corrivall throughly beaten, though to the Kings loffe) made an appointment with Tiffaphernes, and forth-20 with entred Adis, which was under the jurisdiction of Pharnabazus, which Pro-

nince, in few daies, he brought into his owne power. That Countrie of Folis had about the same time suffered a violent alteration. which gave easie successe to the attempts of Dercyllidas. Zenis a Dardanian had beene Deputie to Pharnabazus in those parts; after whose death his wife Mania procured his Office, wherein thee behaued herfelfe fo well, that thee not only was beloued of the people vnder her gouernement: but enlarged her Territorie, by the conquest ofcertaine Townes adjoyning; and fundry times gaue affistance to Pharnabazus in his warres against the Mysians and Persians. For sheehad in pay some Companies of Greekes, whose valour by her good vsage did her great service. But somewhat be-30 fore the arrivall of Dercyllidas in those parts, a Sonne-in-law of hers, called Midias, whom sheetrusted and loued much, being blinded with ambition, found meanes to stifle her, and kill her sonne of seuenteene yeeres old; which done, he seized vpon two of her principall Townes, wherein her treasure lay, hoping to have beene admitted into possession of her whole estate. Being denied entrance by her Souldiers, that lay in Garrison, he sent Messengers with presents to Pharnabazus, desiring him to make him Gouernour in the place of Mania. His presents were not only rejected by Pharnabazus, but revenge of his foule treason threatned, whereby the wicked villaine was driven into tearmes of almost vtter desperation. In the meane time came Dercyllidas, to whom the Townes of Mania, that held against Midias; 40 did quickly open their Gates. One only Towne flood out foure daics (against the will of the Citizens, who were couctous of libertie) the Gouernour striuing in vaine to have kept it to the vse of Pharnabazus. Now remained only two Cities Gergethe and Seepsis, which the Traitour held, who scaring all men, as being loued of none, sent Embassadours to Dercyllidas, desiring leave to speake with him, and pledges for his securitie: vpon the deliuerie of which hee issued out of Scepsis, and comming into the Campe, made offer to joyne with the Greekes vpon such condition ons as might seeme reasonable. But he was plainely told by Dercyllidas, that other condition there was none, than to set the Citizens freely at libertie. And presently vpon these words they marched toward Scepsis. When Midias perceived that it 50 was in vaine to firiue against the Armie, and the Townessmen, who were all of one minde; hee quietly went along with Dercyllidas; who remaining but a few houres in the Citie, did a facrifice to Minerua, and then leading away the Garrison of Midias; heleft the Citie free, and departed toward Gergethe. Midie did not for lake his Companie, but followed him, carneftly intreating that hee might be suffered to retaine Gergethe: but comming to the Gates, he was bidden to command his Souldiers that they should be opened, for (quoth Dercyllidas) I must here likewise doe a sacrifice to Minerua. The Traitor not daring to make deniall, caused his Mercinaries to open the Gates, whereby Dercyllidas, taking possession of the place, tendred pay to the Garrison, who did not refuse to serue under his Ensignes. This done, all the goods of Mania were seized vpon, as belonging to one that had beene subject to Pharnabazus, who was enemie to the Greekes: and so the murderous wretch was sent away naked, not knowing in what part of the World hee might finde any place to hide his detefted head. Dercytlidas, having in eight daiestaken nine Cities, purposed for the case of his Confederates to winter in Bythinia, to which end hee tooke to Truce with Pharnabazus, who had not any desire of Warre. That Winter; and the Sommer ensuing, the Truce being recontinued held; in which time, besides the wasting of Bythinia, the neck of Land joyning Cherronea to the Maine, was fortified. being foure or fine miles in breadth, by which meanes eleuen Townes with much good Land belonging to them, were freed from the incursions of the wild Thractans and made fit and able to victuall the Campe. Likewise the Citie of Atarne was taken, which was of great strength, and very well stored with prouision. After this, Dercyllidas had command from Sparta, to divert the warre into Caria, where was the seate of Tissaphernes; for that hereby it was thought not vncasse to recouer all the Townes of Ionia: Pharax the Admirall of the fleet (which was a yeerely Office) 20 being appointed to joyne with him. Though it was manifest that This aphernes had neglected Pharnabazus in time of necessity, yet was he not in his owne danger requited with the like. For Pharnabazus having respect to the Kings service, came to asfift his private enemie Tiffaphernes, & so passing into Carea, they thrust Garrisons into all places of strength; which done, they marched towards Ionia, hoping to finde the Townes ill manned for resistance. As these Persians were desirous to keepe the warre from their owne dores, so was Dercyllidas willing to free his Confederates the Ionians from the spoile and danger of the warre, by transferring it into Carta. For which cause he passed the River of Meander, and not looking to have bin so soone encountered, marched carelessy through the Countrie: when on the very sodaine 30 the whole Armie of Tiffaphernes and Pharnabazus was discourred, confishing of Perfians, Carians, and some Mercinarie Greekes, who were all marshalled in very good order to present battaile. The oddes was too apparent, both in numbers of men, and in readinesse, as also in advantage of ground: for the Persian had a great multitude of Horse, the Greeke very few and seeble, being to fight in an open plaine. Therefore all the Ionians, together with the Ilanders and others, of fuch places as bordered voon the Kings Dominions, did either betake themselves to present flight; or abiding a while for shame, did plainely discouer by their lookes, that they meant not to be more bold than wife. Only Dercyllidas with his Peloponnesians regarding their honor, prepared to endure the fight: which must needs have brought 40 them to destruction, if the counsaile of Pharnabazus had beene followed, who perceining the opportunitie of so great a victorie, was not willing to let it slip. But Tissaphernes, who naturally was a coward, seeing that countenance of relistance was made, beganne to confider what strange defence the Souldiers of Xenophon had shewed, and thinking that all the Greekes were of the like resolution, held it the wifest way to craue parly; the conclusion of which was, That a truce should be made, to last vntill Tiffaphernes might receive answere from the King, and Dercyllidas from Sparta, concerning the demands propounded in the Treatie, which were on the one part, that all the Greekes in Alia might enjoy their owne libertie and lawes, but contrariwise on the other side, that the Lacedemonians should depart Asia, and leave the 50 Townes to the Kings pleasure. This Treatie was of none effect; only it served to free the Greekes from the present danger, and to gaine time vnto Tissaphernes, who defired to avoide the warre by procrastination, which he durst not adventure to sinish by triall of a battaile.

How the Lacedamonians tooke reuenge upon the Eleans for old displeasure. The discontents of the Corinthians and Thebans, conceived against the State of Sparta.

Nthe meane feafon the Lacedamonians, who found none able to withfrand them in Greece, beganne to call the Eleans to accompt for some disgraces received by them during the late warres, when leisure was wanting to the requital of such pettic injuries. These Eleans being Presidents of the Olympiaque games, had set a fine vpon the Citic of Sparta, for Non-paiment of which, they forbade them to come to the folemnitie; and publiquely whipt one of them, that was a man of note, for prefuming to contend against their decree. Likewise they hindred Agis King of Sparta, from doing facrifice to Iupiter; and in all points vied great contempt toward the Spartans, who now had no businesse that could hinder them from taking reuenge; and therefore fent a peremptoric message to the Eleans, commanding them to set at libertie the Cities which they held in subjection. This was the vsuall pretence which they made the ground of all their warres: though little they cared for the libertie of fuch Townes, which they caused afterwards to become followers, and little better than meere Vassals of the Lacedamonians. In their late warres with Athens, the strong oppolition which they found, caused this goodly Title of libertie to worke verice flowly: but having now to doe with a State of great spirit and small force, it gave present successe to their desires. Two yeeres together they sent an Armie into the Countrie of the Eleans: the first yeere an earthquake (held in those times a prodigious figne, and which did alwaies forbid the profecution of any enterprise in hand) caused them to retire: the second yeere, all the Townes of the Eleans did hastily reuolt, and the Citie it selfe was driven to submission; consenting both to suffer their old subjects freely to enjoy their libertie, and to have her owne walls throwne 30 downe. Only the Presidentship of the Olympian games was lest vnto them, which, it was not to be doubted that they would in time comming vie modefly, finding themselves to stand at the mercy of Sparta. In this expedition all the Greekes were affiliant to the Lacedamonians, excepting the Corinthians and Bastians, whose aide having been of as much importance in the late Peloponnesian Warre, as the force of Spartait selfe, they could not smoother their dislike of their vnequall division following the victoric; which gaue to Sparta the command of al Greece, to Thebes, and Corinth, only fecuritie against Athens, but such a securitie as was worse than the danger. For when the equallereatnesse of two mightie Estates did counterpoise each the other, it was in the power of these Neutral Common-weales to adhere to 40 either, as the condition of their affaires required; but when to revenge injuries, they had by mortall hatred profecuted the warre to extremitie, leaving the one Citie naked of power and friends, the other mightily encreased in both, it was then (if not necessarie to obey the greatnesse which themselves had made yet) foolish and dangerous to prouoke it. Neuerthelesse, it was not the purpose of the Spartans to take occasion of any quarrell, which they could not finish at pleasure, till such time as they had by victorie or composition made some good end with the Persian, toward whom they bent all their care and forces.

The passage of AGESILAVS into Alia. His warre with TISSAPHERNES. How Tissapher nes was put to death, and the warre diverted into another Province, through perswasion and gifts of TITHRAVSTES bis successor. How carlesse the Persian Lieutenants were of the Kings good.

GESIL AVS newly made king of Sparta; was defirous to haue the honour of the victory, which not without cause, he expected vpon those 10 of Asia; and therefore procuring a great Armie to loyne with that of Dercyllidas, he tooke his way in great pompe to Aulis in Baotia, a Hauen, lying opposite to the Iland of Eubaa, in which place Agamemnon

(leading the power of all Greece to the warre against Trey, many Ages before) had embarked his men. In imitation of Agamemnon hee meant also to do sacrifice in Aulis, which the Thebans, Lords of that Countrie, would not permit, but faying that the performance of such ceremonies in that place, belonged vnto their Officers, they were so vnable to conceale their malice, that sending some Companies of horse, they threw downe his sacrifice from the Altar. It was not then convenient time for Agestlaus to entangle himselfe and his Countrie in any new warre; there- 20 fore waiting better opportunitie of reuenge, he quietly swallowed the contumelie, and followed his maine intendment. Having landed his men at Ephefu, he was entertained by Tiffaphernes with a Treatie of peace, wherein Agefilaus peremptorily requiring that the Persian should restore to liberty all the Greek Townes in Asia, was promised that the King, being first informed of his demand, should send answere to his good liking, if he would in the meane while make truce. Truce was therfore made, which Tiffaphernes had fought, onely to winne time of making prouision for the warre, and getting supply of men and money from Artaxerxes; whilest Agestlaws was busie in setling the Estates of his confederate Cities on that side of the Sca. The end of this long vacation from warre was at the comming down of these for-30 ces which Artaxerxes had fent: at what time Agefilaus received a plain message from Tissaphernes, that either he must forth-with depart out of Asia, or make good his aboade by firong hand. Agefilaus returning word, that hee was glad to heare that his enemics had by periurie descrued vengeance from Heauen, prepared to inuade them; and fending word to all the Townes which lay betweene him, and Caria, that they should prouide victuals and other necessaries for his Armie, did easily make Tissaphernes beleeve, that his intent was to invade that Province wherein Tissaphernes Saphernes dwelt, and which was vnfit for Horse, in which part of his forces the Perfiam had most confidence. Therefore Tiffaphernes bestowing all his Companies of foot in Caria, entred with his horse into the plaines of Maander, hoping thereby to 40 ftoppe the passage of a heavie foot-Armic, not suffering them to passe into that Countrie which was fittest for their service. But the Greekes left him waiting there in vaine, and marched directly into Phrygia, where they tooke great spoile without resistance, till such time as the Horse men of Pharnabazus met him, who in a small skirmish having the better of the Greekes, were the occasion that Agesilaus returned to Ephefus. Although in this last fight onely twelve men were lost, yet Agesilaus perceiuing by that triall how hard it would be to preuaile, and hold the masterie of the field, without a greater strength of Horse, tooke all possible care to encrease that part of his forces. By which meanes having enabled himselfe, whilest winter lasted hee entred vpon the Countrie of Tiffaphernes, as soone as the season of co the yeere would permit, and not onely tooke a great bootie, but finding the Horse-men of Tissaphernes in the plaine of Meander, without assistance of their infanterie, hee gaue them battaile, and had a great victorie, taking their Campe in which hee found great riches. The blame of this losse fell heavie vpon Tistaphernes

Tissaphernes, who either upon cowardise had absented himselfe from the battaile. or following some other bulinesse, was then at Sardes. For which cause his Master having him in distrust, and thinking that peace might be the sooner had, which he much defired, if the man, so odious to the whole Nation of the Greekes, were taken out of the way, he sent into those parts Tithraustes a Persian, to cut off the head of Tillaphernes, and succeede him in the gouernment. Such was the end of this base and cowardly Politician, who little caring to offend Heauen, when by periurie he could advance his purposes on Earth, failed at the last through too much ouer-weening of his owne wisdome, even in that part of cunning, wherein he thought himro selfemost perfect, for supposing, that by his great skill in subtile negotiation hee should one way or other circumuent the Greekes, and make them weary of Alia; he did not seeke to finish the warre, and according to his Masters wish, bring all things speedily to quiet, but rather to temporize, till he might finde some opportunitie of making fuch end as best might stand with the Kings honour and his own. Wherein it feemes that he much mistooke his Princes disposition, who though he had highly rewarded him for the aide which he did bring in his time of danger, yet would hee much more gladly have taken it, if he could have found fuch meanes whereby the danger it sefe might have been avoided: as not louing to have warre, whilest by any conditions (honourable or not) he might obtaine peace. And this appeared well 20 by the course which Tethraustes tooke at his first possession of the low-Countries. For he fent Embassadours to Agesilaw, in very friendly fort, letting him know, that the man who had beene Author of the warre, was now taken out of the way; and that it was the Kings pleasure to let the Greekes enjoy their owne lawes and libertie, vpon condition, that they should pay him the tribute accustomed, and the Armie be forthwith dismissed. The answere to this proposition, was by Agesilaus referred to the Councell of Sparta; in the meane season he was content to transferre the warre into the Prouince of Pharnabazus, at the request of Tithraustes, who bought his departure with thirtie Talents.

This was a strange manner of Warre, both on the offensive and on the defen-30 fine part. For Agesilaus having entertained great hopes of vanquishing the great King, was contented to forbeare his seuerall Provinces, at the entreatie of the Lieutenants: and those Lieutenants being emploied by the King to maintaine his Eflates against all enemies (wherein if they failed, they knew that their heads might easily bee taken from their shoulders) were little offended at any losse that fell on their next Neighbour-Prouinces, which were subject likewise to the same Crowne of Persia, so long as their own government could be preserved free from waste and danger. The cause of this disorder on the Persian side, I can ascribe to nothing so descruedly, as to the corrupted estate of the Court, wherein Eunuches, Concubines, and Ministers of pleasure, were able by partial construction to countenance, or dis-49 grace, the actions of fuch as had the managing of things abroade; and to that foo-lift manner of the Kings (which was so vsuall that it might be called a rule) to reward or punish the Provinciall Governour, according to the benefit or losse, which the Countrie given in charge vnto each of them received, during the time of his rule. Whereby it came to passe, that as every one was desirous to make his owne Territorie veeld a large increase to the Kings treasure; so no man was carefull to affift his borderers, if loffeor danger might thereby grow to himfelfeand his; but fate fill as an idle beholder, when perhaps by joyning their forces, it had not beene vneasie to recompence the spoile of one Countrie, by conquering another, or defending a third from farre greater miseries.

The Warre and Treatic betweene AGESILAVS and PHARNABAZVS.

GESILAVS having thus compounded with Tithraustes, entred Phrygia, burning and wasting the Countrie without resistance. Hee tooke the Palace of Pharnabazus, and by his Lieutenant draue him out of his Campe. These actions, together with his honourable behaviour, which added much to their lustre, were more glorious then profitable. For he did not winne Cities and Places of strength, which might have encreafed his power, and given affurance to the rest of his proceedings: but purchased fame and high reputation, by which he drew vnto him some that were disontented and flood vpon bad termes with the great King, whom he loft againe as eafily, by meanes of some slight iniuric done to them by his vnder-Captaines. Pharnabazus did not enclose himselfe in any Towne for seare of being besieged, but kept the field, lying as necre as he could fafely to the enemies, with whom it was not his purpose to fight, but to make some good end by composition, which he found not vncasie to doe. For the pleasures, by him formerly done to the State of Sparta, in the times of their most necessitie, had beene so great, that when hee (obtaining parlie) 20 did set before their eies his bountie towards them, and his loue (which had beene fuch, that besides many other hazards of his person, he had for the rescue of their fleet when it was driven to runne a-shore at Abydus, adventured to ride into the Sea as farre as he could finde any ground, and fight on horse-backe against the Athenians) together with his faith which had neuer beene violated in word or deede: they knew not how to excuse their ingratinde, otherwise then by telling him, That having warre with his Master, they were inforced, against their will, to offend him. Agesilaus did make a faire offer to him, that if he would revolt from the King to them; they would maintaine him against the Persian, and establish him free Prince of the Countrie wherein hee was at that time onely Deputie to Artaxerxes. But 39 Pharnabazus told him plainely, That if the King his Master did put him in trust to make warre against them, he would not faile to doe the best that he could as their enemie; if the charge were taken out of his hand, and he commanded to obey an other, he would then shift side, and betake himselfe to their alliance. The issue of this parlie was, That the Armie should no longer abide in Phrygia, nor againe returne into it, whilest emploiment could be found elsewhere. The excuse made by Agesilaus, and the withdrawing of his forces out of those parts, were not sufficient to appeale Pharnabazus, whom he had not invaded for want of more necessarie bufinesse elsewhere; but because his Countrie would yeeld great bootie; and for the hire of thirtie Talents. By this meanes the Lacedemonians changed an honourable 40 Friend into a hot Enemie, who afterwards requited their vnthankefulnesse with full reuenge.

V I.

The great commotions raised in Greece by the Thebans and others, that were byred with gold from the Persian.

N the meane while Tithraustes, perceiving that Agestiaus meant nothing less them to returne into Greece, and let Artamermes rest quietly 50 in Asia, tooke a wise course whereby the Citic of Sparta was not only driven to looke to her owne, and give over her great hopes of subverting the Empire, but was beaten out of all that had beene gotten by many late victories, and saw her Dominion restrained vnto the narrow bounds of her her owne Territorie. Hee sent into Greece fiftie talents of silver, to be imploved in railing warre against the Lacedamonians; which treasure was, by the subtile practice of him that was put in trust with it, in such wise dispersed, among the principall men of the Thebans, Argines, & Corinthians, that all those Estates having formerly borne fecret hate to that of Sparta, were now desirous of nothing so much as of open war. And lest this great heate of the incensed multitude should, for want of present exercife, begin to faint, and vanish away in idle wordes, occasion was found out to thrust the Lacedamonians into Armes, that they themselves might seeme Authours of the quarrell. Some land there was in the tenure of the Locrians, to which the 10 Thebans had in former time laid claime; but the Phocians either having the better title, or finding the greater fauour, had it adjudged vnto them, and received veerly money for it. This money the Locrians were either hired or perswaded to pay now to the Thebans, who readily accepted it. The Phocians not meaning so to lose their Rent, made a distresse by strong hand, recourring agreat deale more than their owne; which the Thebans (as in protection of their new Tenants) requited with an inuation made vpon Phocis, wasting that Countrie in the manner of open warre. Such were the beginnings of professed hostilitie betweene Thebes and Sparta, and the first breaking out of their close enmitie, that had long time, though hardly been concealed. For when the Phocian Embaffadours came to Sparta, complaining of the 20 violence done by the Thebans, and requesting succour, they had very fauourable audience, and readie consent to their suite; it being the manner of the Lacedamonians, to deferre the acknowledgement of injuries received, vntil occasion of reuenge were offered, and then to discover their indignation in cold bloud. At this time they had very good opportunitie to worke their owne wills, hauing no other war to disturbe them in Greece, and hearing out of Asia no newes, that could offend or trouble them. Whereforethey fent Ly fander to raise all the Countries about Phocis, and with such forces as he could leavie, to attend the comming of Paufanias King of Sparta (for Sparta, as hath beene shewed before, had two Kings) who should follow him with the strength of Peloponnesus. Lysander did as he was appointed, and being of great 30 reputation in those parts, he drew the Orchomenians to revolt from Thebes. Paulanias likewise raised all Peloponnesus, except the Corinthians, (who resused to assist him in that enterprise) meaning to joine with Lysander, and make a speedie end of the war. The confideration of fo great a danger, approching fo swiftly, caused the Thebans to fecke what helpe they could abroade, for a fmuch as their owne strength was farre too little to make relistance against such mightie preparations. It was not viknown to them, that many followers of the Lacedemonians were otherwise affected in heart than they durst vtter in countenance; but the good wishes of such people were little auaileable, confidering that the most which could be expected from them, was, that they should doe as little hurt as they could: by which manner of terginer sation, the 40 Corinthians did at that present cast themselves into the displeasure of the Spartans, to the no great benefit of Thebes. Wherefore it was thought the fafell course, to procure the affistance of some Estate that might presently declare it selfe on their side. which would cause many others to follow the example, & make their partie strong. To this end they sent Embassadours to Athens, excusing old offences, as either not committed by publike allowance, or done in time of the generall warre, and recompenced with friendship lately shewne in their refusall of assisting Pausanias, when he came in behalfe of the thirtie Tyrants, against the good Citizens of Athens. In regard of which, and for their owne Honour fake, they requested them of aide in the present warre, offering to doe the best that they could for the restoring of Athens to 50 her former Estate and Dignitie. Thrasybulus and his Friends, who persecuted by the thirtie, had been well entertained at Thebes, procured now the Citie to make a large requitall of the courtesie which they had received. For it was decreed, that the State of Athens should not only resule to aide the Lacedamonians in this Warre; but that it should affist the Thebans, and engage it selfe in their cause. Whilest Pausanias lay fill, waiting the arrivall of his Confederates; Lyfander being desirous to doe somewhat that might advance the businesse in hand, came to Haliartus, where, though Paulanias did not meet him, as had beene appointed, yet he attempted the Towne. and was flaine in fight by the Thebans, who came hattily to the rescue. As this vi-Ctorie did encourage the Thebans, so the comming of Pausanias with his great Army did againe amaze them, with presentation of extreme danger; but their spirits were foone reuiued by the strong succour which was brought from Athens, in consideration of which, and of the lace battaile, Paufanias durst not hazard a new fight with them, but receiving the bodies of those that were slaine, by composition departed out of their Territorie, for which, either cowardile or indifcretion, he was at his re- 10 turne to Sparta condemned as a Traitour, and driven to flie into Tegea, where hee ended his daies in banishment.

How AGESILAVS was called out of Asia to helpe his Countrie. A victorie of the Spartans. Conon the Athenian, afifted by PHARNABAZVS, ouercomes the Lacedemonian fleet; recouers the masterie of the Seas ; and rebuilds the walls of Athens.

His good fuccesse, and the confederacie made with Athens, gaue such reputation to the Thebans, that the Argiues, Corinthians, Eubeans, Locarians, and Acarnanes, did forthwith fide with them, & railing a strong Armie, determined to give battaile to the Lacedamonians as necre as they might, to their owne dores; Considering that the force of Spartait selfe was not great, but grew more and more by the adjunction of their Confederates. The Magistrates of Sparta perceiuing the danger, sent for Agesilaus, who readily obeied them, and promising his friends in Asia to returne speedily to their affiltance, paffed the Straights of Hellespont into Europe. In the meane time the Cities of the new league had given battaile to the Lacedemonians, and the remainder of 20 their Associates, but with il successe. For when the right-wing of each part had gotten the better hand, the Argines and Thebans returning from the chale in some disorder were broken and defeated by the Lacedamonians, who meeting them in good order, wonne from them the Honour which they had gotten, by forcing the left wing of the Lacedamonians, and made the victoric of that day entirely their owne. The report of this battaile meeting Agesilaus at Amphibolis, were by him sent ouer into Asia, where it is not likely that they brought much comfort vnto his friend, who had since his departure seene the Spartan fleet beaten, and Lysander the Admirall flaine. The fame man, whose endeuour had brought the Athenians into order, by advancing the Sea-forces of the Lacedamonians with money, and all manner of 40 fupplies, was now the occasion that the power of Athens grew strong at Sca, when the Citie was despoiled of her old reputation, and scarsly able to mainetaine an Armie by Land for her owne defence. Pharnabazus considering how much it imported the King his Master, to haue the Greeks divided into such factions, as might vtterly disable them from vndertaking abroad, thought it the safest way for himselfe, during these broiles, to take such order, that he should not need any more, to seeke peace by entreatie and commoration of old benefits, at their hands, who vn-prouoked had fold his love for thirtie Talents. To which purpose he furnished Conon the Athenian with eight ships, who had escaped, when the flect of Athens was surprised by Lylander at Agos. Potamos; giving him the command of a great Nauic, 50 wherewith he requited the losse received at Agos-Potamos, by repaying the Lacedemonians with the like destruction of their fleet at Cnidus. After this victorie Conon failed to Athens, bringing with him, partly as the liberalitie of Pharnabazus, partly as the fruit of his victorie, so strong a Nauie, and so much gold, as encouraged the Athenians to rebuild their walls, and thinke more hopefully vpon recouring the Signiorie which they had loft.

VIII.

Of fundrie small victories gotten on each part. The Lacedamonians lose all in Asia: The Athenians recouer some part of their old Dominion.

Euerthelesse the Lacedamonians, by many victories at Land, maintained for some yeeres the honour of their estate, endangered very greatly by this losse at Sea. For Agestlaus obtained the better with his shorfe-menfrom the Theffalians, who were accounted the best riders in Greece: He wasted Bwetra, and fought a great battaile at Coronea against the Thebans, and their Allies, whome he overthrew; and by his Marshall Gylis forraged the Countrie of Locris: which done, he returned home.

The gains of these victories was not great, & the reputation of them was, by many losses, much defaced. For the Thebans did in the battailes of Corones vanquish the Orchomenians, who stood opposite vnto them, and retired vnbroken to Mount 20 Helicon, opening way perforce when Agesilaus charged them in the returne from the pursuit, Likewise Gylis was flaine with a great part of his Armie by the Locrians, and some other exploits by the Lacedemonians performed against the Corinthians, were repayed with equall damage received in the parts adioyning; many Townes being easily taken, and as easily recourred. The varietie of which enter-feates was fuch, that the Thebans themselves were drawne, by the losse of the hauen of Corinth, to fue for peace, but could not get audience, till fuch time as the newes came of a great victorie obtained by Iphicrates, Generall of the Athenian-forces at Lechaum; wherevoon the Theban Embassadours being sent for, and willed to doe their mesfage, required only in scorne, to have a safe conduct given them, that they might 30 enter into Corinth. From this time forward the Warre was made for a while only by incursions, wherin the Acheans, confederates of Sparta, felt most losse, their whole state being endangered by the Acarnanians, who held with the contrarie side, vntill Agefilans repaied these inuaders with equall, or greater calamities, brought vpon their owne Lands, which did so afflict the Acarnanes, that they were driven to sue for peace. But the affaires at Sea were of most consequence, vpon which the successe of all depended. For when the Townes of Asia perceived, that the Lacedamonians were not only intangled in an hard war at home, but almost disabled to passe the Seas, having lost their fleet at Cnidus; they soone gave eare to Pharnabazus, who promifed to allow that they should vsed their own lawes, if they would expell 40 the Spartan Gouernours. Onely the Citie of Abidus did fland firme, wherein Dercylcing the Ile of Lesbos to their ancient acknowledgement of Athens.

lidas lay, who did his best to containe all the Townes about Hellespont, in the alliance of the Lacedamonians; which he could not doe, because the Athenian flect vnder Thrasybulus tooke in Byzantium, Chalcedon, and other places thereabout, redu-

The base conditions offered unto the Persian by the Laced amonians. Of sundrie fights and other passages in the warre. The peace of ANTALCIDAS.

Bout this time the Spartans beganne to perceive how vneasse a thing it would bee, to maintaine the warre again and a second a second and a second an would bee, to maintaine the warre against men as good as themselues, affifted with the treasures of Persia: wherefore they craued peace of Artaxerxes, most basely offering, not only to renounce the Greekes inhabiting few or none escaped. For which cause Timotheus did passe away much part of his time in the Isle of Lesbos; Iphicrates in Thrace; and Chabrias now did carrie away into Cyprus a greater force than his Countrie well could have spared, with which he returned not when the businesse in Cyprus came to an end, but sought new aduentures in £gypt, whereby arose neither thankes to himselfe, nor profit to his Citie. though honour both to him and it. The Athenians being thus careleffe of things at hand, had a notable blow given vnto them, shortly after that Chabrias was gone to Cyprus, euen within their owne Hauen. For Teleutias, a Lacedamonian, being made Governour of Agina, conceived a strong hope of surprising the Navie of Athens. 10 as it lay in Pirem; thinking a-right that it was an harder matter to encounter with ten ships prepared for the fight, than with twentic lying in harbour, whose Mariners were afleepe in their Cabbins, or drinking in Tauernes. Wherefore he failed by night vnto the mouth of the Port, which entring at the breake of day, hee found (according to his expectation) most of the men on shore, & few or none left abourd to make relistance; by which meanes hee tooke many ships laden with marchandizes, many fither-men, paffengers, and other Veffels, also three or foure Gallies, having funke or broken, and made unferuiceable, as many of the rest as the time would fuffer. About this time Pharnabazus, the Lieutenant of Phrygia, had one of the Kings Daughters given to him in marriage, with whom heelined about the 20 Court; and many Officers that fauoured the Lacedamonians were placed in the lower Asia; by whose affishance, the fleet of Sparta grew victorious about Hellespont; in such wife, that perhaps they should not have needed the peace, which they themselves procured by Antalcidas, from the great King, the conditions whereof were such as are mentioned before, giving freedome to all the Cities of Greece, and dividing the Countrie into as many severall States as there were pettic Boroughs in it. Thus Artaxerxes having bought his owne peace with money, did likewise by his money become arbitrator & decider of Controuerfies betweene the Greekes, disposing of their businesse in such wise as stood best with his owne good. The renor of Artaxerxes his decree was, That all Asia and Cyprus should be his owne; the 30 Iles of Lemnos, Imbrus, and Scirus be subject to Athens; all other Greeke Townes, as well the little as the great, be fet at libertic; and that who focuer should refuse this peace, vpon them the approvers of it should make warre, the King affishing them by Land and Sea, with men, and ships, and treasure. The Athenians were so discouraged by their loffes at Sea; the Lacedemontans by revolt of their Confederates, and the necessitie of maintaining many Garrisons, for which they wanted money; and other States by the miseries of the warre, whereof they saw no end; that all (excepting the Thebans) did consent vnto these Articles. This was called the peace of Antalcidas: whereof the Lacedamonians taking upon themselves the execution, did not only compell the Argines to depart out of Corinth (which under pretence of defen-40 ding they held by Garrisons, lately thrust into it, not as Patrons, but as Lords) and the Thebans to leave Baotia free, of which Province Thebes had alwaics held the gouernment: the Thebans themselues being also comprehended under the name of the Baotians; but caused the Mantineans to throw downe their owne Citic, and to dwell in Villages: alleaging that they had formerly beene accustomed so to doe, though purposing indeede to chastise them, as having beene ill affected to Sparta in the late Warre. By these courses the Lacedamonians did hope that all the small Townes in Greece would, when occasion should require it, willingly follow them in their warres, as Authors of their libertie; and that the great Cities having lost all their dependants, would be vnable to make opposition.

The wrare which the Lacedamonians made upon Olynthus. They take Thebes by treason 3 and Olynthus by famin.

Hilest these warres, which ended without either victorie or profit, consumed the riches and power of Greece, the Citie of Olynthus in Thrace was growne so mighty, that shee did not only command her Neighbour-Townes, but was become terrible to places farre remoued, and to Sparta it selfe. Great part of Macedonia, together with to Pella, the principall Citie of that Kingdome, was taken by the Olynthians, who following the viual pretence of the Lacedamonians, to fet at libertie the places over which King Amyntas did tyrannize, had almost now driven him out of his Dominions, and taken all to themselues. The Citizens of Acanthus and of Apollonia, being neerest vnto the danger of these incroching neighbours, acquainted the Laceda. monians with their feare, affirming that this Dominion of the Olynthians would bee too ftrong for al Greece, if some continuance of time should give it reputation, which only it wanted, wherefore they requested affishance, but in such termes as did sound of compulsion; protesting that either they must warre vpon Olynthus, or become fubiect vnto her, and fight in her defence. Hecreupon was made a hastic leavie of 20 men, two thousand being presently sent away with promise to bee seconded by a greater Armie. Whilest these two thousand gaue such beginning to the warre, as agreed with their small number, the body of the Armie following them, surprised the Cittadell of Thebes, which was betraied into the hands of Phabidas the Lacedamanian, by some of the Magistrates, who sought to strengthen their faction by the flauerie of their Countrie. The Thebans were ill affected to Sparta, but had not in any one point violated the peace lately made betweene them; which caused the Lacedamonians to doubt whether this act of Phabidas were more worthy of reward or of punishment; In conclusion, profit so farre ouer weighed honestie, that the decde was approued, many principall Citizens of Thebes condemned to death, ma- 30 ny driven into banishment, and the Traitors rewarded with the government of the Citie: by whole authoritie, and the force of the Garrison, the Thebans were compelled to serue the Lacedemonians, in all, and more than all that they could require. This accesse of power having strengthned the Lacedamonians, caused them to entertaine the greater forces about Olynthus, which (notwithstanding the losse of one great battaile, and some other disasters) they compelled at length by famine to render it felfe to their obedience.

Fter this Olynthian Warre, which endured almost three yeeres, it seemed that no Estate in Greece was able to make head against that of Sparta: but it was not long ere the Thebans found meanes to shake off their yoke, and gaue both example and meanes to others to doe the like. One of the banished men found by conference with a Scribe of the Theban Magistrates, comming to Athens, that the tyrannie wherewith his Countrie was oppressed, pleased him no better than it did those who for seare of it 50 were fled from home. Whereupon a plot was layd betweene these two, that soone found very good successed, being managed thus. Seuen of the banished men for sooke Athens privily, and entred by night into the fields of Thebes; where spending the next day secretly, they came late in the cuening to the Gates like husband-men returned from worke, and so passed undiscovered unto the house of Charon, whom Phyllidas the Scribe had drawne into the conspiracie. The day following, a solemne fealt being then held in the Citie, Phyllidas promised the Gouernours, who were infolent and luttfull men, that hee would conveigh vnto them that night the most beautifull Dames of the Towne, with whom they should take their pleasure. Haning cheared them with such hope, and plentie of good wine, hee told them when the time of performance (which they vrged) came, that hee could not make good his promife, vnleffe they would dimiffe their followers, because the Gentlewomen. who attended without a Chamber, would not endure, that any of the fernants to should see their faces. Vpon this occasion the attendants were dismissed, and the Conspirators, attired like Ladies and their Maides, brought into the place; who taking advantage of the Governours loofe behaviour, flew them al vpon the fodaine with Daggers, which they brought hidden under their garments. Then prefently casting off their disguise, they went to other places, where faining themselves to come to the Gouernours vpon businesse, they got admittance, and slew those which were of the Lacedamonian faction. By the like denice they brake into the prison; flew the Gagler: and fet at libertic fuch as they thought meete, and being followed by these desperate men, proclaimed libertie, making the death of the Tyrants known. The Captaine of the Castle hearing the Proclamation, thought the Rebels to bec 20 stronger than indeed they were : the Citizens contrariwise mistrusted, that it was a practice to discouer such, as would be forward vpon occasion of revolting. But as foone as day-light reuealed the plaine truth, all the people tooke armes & beffeed the Castle, sending hastily to Athens for succour. The Garrison also sent for aide vnto the Townes adjoyning, whence a few broken troupes comming to the refene. were defeated on the way by the horse-men of Thebes. On the other side the banished Thebans did not only make speede to affist their Countrimen, but procured fome Athenians to joyne with them, and thereby came so strong into the Citic, that the Castle was yeelded, more through seare than any necessitie, ypon codition that the Souldiers might quietly depart with their Armes; for which composition the to Captaine at his returne to Sparta was put to death. When the newes of the doings at Thebes, and the successe arrived at Sparta, an Armie was raised forth with, and all things prepared as earnestly for the recovering of that Citic, as if some part of their ancient inheritance had beene taken from the Lacedamonians, and not a Towne perfidiously vsurped by them, restored to her owne libertic, Cleambrotus, one of the Kings, was sent on this expedition, who having wearied his followers, with a toilefome Winters journey, returned home without any good or harme done; leaving Sphodrias, with part of his Armic, at Thefpies, to infelt the Thebans; who doing them fome displeasures, made large amends by a foolish attempt vpon the Hauen of omedipleatures, made large amends by a foothtracterible vipon the Flatter

Athens, which failing to take, hee wasted the Countrie adjoyning, and draue away Cattaile, causing by this outrage the Athenian to enter with all their power into the Warre, out of which they were before very carefully seeking how to with-draw themselues.

Of the flourishing estate of Thebes, from the battaile of Leuctra to the battaile of Mantinæa.

How Thebes and Athenriogned together against Sparta. How the Athenians made peace for themselves, and others, out of which the Thebans were excluded. The battaile of Leuctra, and beginning of the Theban greatnesse.

H E Lacedamonians were men of great resolution, and of much gravitie in all their proceedings, but one difhonorable rule they held, That all respects with standing the commoditie of Sparta were to be neglected: the practice of which doctrine; even by the best and wisest of them, did greatly blemish that Estate, but when it was put in execution by insufficient ouerweening men, it feldome failed to bring vpon them in 20 stead of profit vnjustly expected, both shame & losse. And foit befel them in these enterprises of Phabidas, vpon the Castle of Thebes, and Sphodrias vpon the Pi-raus. For how socuer Agesilaus did spoile the Countrie about Thebes, in which hee spenttwo Summers, yetthe diligence of the Thebans repaired all, who by the good fuccesse of some attempts, grew stronger than they were at the first.

The Athenians likewise beganne to looke abroade, sailing to the He of Coreyra, where they ordered things at their pleasure, and having in some fights at Sea preuailed, began as in the Peloponnesian warre, to surround Peloponnesia with a Nauie; afflicting so the Lacedamonians, that had not the Thebans by their insolencie wearied 30 their friends, and caused them to seeke for peace, it had beene very likely that the end of this warre, should have soone come to a good end, which neverthelesse, being prosequuted by the Thebans (who opposed at once both these two great Estates) left the City of Sparta as much dejected as the beginning found it proud and tyrannous. But the Athenians perceiuing how Thebes encroched every day vpon her weake Neighbours, not sparing such as had beene dependants upon Athens, and finding themselues, whilest engaged in such a warre, vnable to relieue their complaining friends, resolued to settle the affaires of Greece, by renewing that forme of peace which Antalcidas had brought from the Persian. Wherefore they sent Messengers to Thebes, peremptorily fignifying, That it was their intent to finish the Warre; to 40 which purpose they willed the Thebans to send Embassadours along with them to Sparta; who readily condescended, fearing otherwise that they should be left out of the Treatic of peace, which came to passe, being so wrought by the couragious wisdome of Epaminondas, who vnderstood farre better than his Countrimen, what was to be feared or hoped. In this Treatie the Lacedamonians and Athenians did soone agree; but when the Thebans offered to sweare to the Articles in the name of the Baotians; Agesilaus required them to sweare in their owne name, and to leave the Bxotians free, whom they had lately reduced under their obedience. Whereunto Epaminondas made answere, That the Citie of Sparta should give example to Thebes by fetting the Laconians free; for that the Signorie of Bacotia did by as good right ap- 50 pertaine to the Thebans, as that of Laconia to the Spartans. This was well and truly spoken; but was heard with no patience: For Agefilaus bearing a vehement hatred vnto those of Thebes, by whom he was drawne back out of Asia into Greece, & disappointed of all the glory which he had hoped to atchieue by the Persian Warre, did now very passionately vige that point of setting the Baotians at libertie, and finding it as oblinately refused, he dasht the name of the Thebans out of the league. At the lame time Cleombrotus the other King of Sparta lay in Phocis, who received command from the Gouernours of Sparta forthwith to enter vpon the Land of the Thebans with all his power, which he did, and was there flaine at Leuctra, and with him the flowre of his Armie. This battaile of Lengtra being one of the most famous that euer were fought betweene the Greekes, was not so notable for any circumstance foregoing it, or for the managing of the fight it selfe, as for the death of the King, and many Citizens of Sparta, but especially, for that after this battaile (betweene 10 which and the conclusion of the generall peace there passed but twentie daies) the Lacedamonians were neuer able to recouer the strength and reputation which had formerly made them redoubted farre and neere; whereas contrariwise the Thebans, whose preatest ambition had in former times confined it selfe vnto the little Region of Baotia, did now begin to vindertake the leading and command of many People and Estates, in such wise, that soone after they brought an Armie of threescore and ten thousand strong vnto the Gates of Sparta. So much doe the afflictions of an hard warre, valiantly indured, advance the affaires of the diffressed, and guide them into the way of Conquest, by stiffening that resolution with a manly temper, which wealth and eafe had through luxurie, rechleffeneffe, and many other vices or vani-

CHAP.12. S. 2.

He Athenians, refuling to take advantage of this overthrow fallen voon their old Enemies, and new Confederates the Lacedamonians: did neuerthelesse finely give them to vnderstand, that their Dominion was expired; and therefore their pride might well be laid away. For taking vpon themselues the maintenance of the peace lately concluded, which Agesilaus (perhaps of purpose to make benefit of quarels that mightarise) had left unperfect, they affembled the Deputies of al the Estates confederated at Aibens; where the generall libertie of all Townes, as well small as great, was ratified, under the stile Of the Athenians, and their Associates. Hereupon began fresh garboiles. The Mantingans, claiming power by this decree to order their affaires at their owner pleasure, did (as it were) in despight of the Spartans, who had enforced them to raze their towne, reedificit, & allie themselves with such of the Arcadians as stood worst affected to Sparta. The Arcadians, a strong Nation, consisting of many Cities, were 40 distracted with factions; some desiring to hold good correspondencie with the Lacedamonians; some to weaken & keep them low; yet all pretending other ends. The Lacedemonians durst not give impeachment to the Mantineans; nor take vpon them to correct their ill-willers among the Arcadians, till fuch time as the factions brake out into violence, and each part called in forraine helpe. Then was an Armie sent from Sparta, as it were in defence of the people of Tegea, against the Mantineans, but indeed against them both. Agefilaus had the leading of it, but effected nothing. The Thebans had by this time subdued the Phocians & were become head of the Locrians, Acarnanians, Eubæans, & many others; with the power of which Countries they entred Feloponne [w in fauor of the Areadians, who had, vpon expectatio of their com-50 ming abstained from giving battaile to Agesilaus. The Armie of the Spartans being dismissed, and Epaminondas joyned with the Arcadians; the Region of Laconia years inuaded and spoiled: a thing so strange, that no Oracle could have found beliefe if any had foretold it. Almost fixe hundred yeeres were spent, since the Dorians, under the posteritie of Hercules, had seized upon Laconia, in all which time the found of an enemies trumpet was not heard in that Countrie: Ten yeeres were not fully past, fince all Greece was at the deuotion of the Spartans: but now the Region which neither Xernes with his huge Armie could once looke voon, nor the mightie forces of Athens, and other Enemie-States had dared to fet foot on, fauing by stealth, was all on a light fire, the very smoke whereof the women of Spartawere ashamed to behold. All which indignitie notwithstanding, the Lacedamonians did not issue out of Sparta to fight, but fought how to preserve the Towne, setting at libertie as many of their Heilotes or Slaues as were willing to beare Armes in defence of the State, and somwhat pittifully entreated the Athenians to give them succour. From Corinth and fome Townes of Peloponnesus they received speedic assistance; the Athensans came 10 forward more flowly, so that Epaminonaus returned without battaile, having rebuilded the Citie of Mellene, and peopled it a-new by calling home the ancient Inhabitants, whom the Lacedamonians many Ages before had chased away into other Countries, possessing their Territories themselves.

The composition betweene Athens and Sparta for command in warre against the Thebans; who againe inuade and spoile Pelopennesus. The unfortunate presumption of the Arcadians.

His journietherefore vtterly defaced the reputation of the Spartans, 20 in fuch wife, that they did no longer demand the conduct of the Army, which was to be raised, nor any maner of precedence: but sending Embassadors from Sparta, and from an the Chies which with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the with it, vnto Athens, they offered to yeeld the Admiraltie to the Congressis by Land. This had

Athenians, requesting that they themselves might be Generalls by Land. This had beene a composition well agreeing with the situation and qualitie of those two Cities; but it was rejected, because the Mariners and others that were to be imploied at Sea, were men of no marke or estimation, in regard of those companies of horse and foot whereof the Land-Armie was compounded, who being all Gentlemen or Citizens of Athens, were to have served under the Lacedamonians. Wherefore it was 30 agreed that the authority should be divided by time, the Athenians ruling five daies, the Lacedemonians other five, & so successively that each of them should have command of all, both by Land and by Sea. It is manifest, that in this conclusion vaine ambition was more regarded than the common profit, which must of necessitie be very flowly advanced, where confultation, refolution, and performance are so often to change hands. This appeared by a second inualion of Pelopenness, wherein the Thebans found their enemies so vnable to impeach them, that having fortified Ishmus from Sea to Sea, as in former times they had done against xerxes, they were driuen out of their strength by Epaminondas, who forraged the Countrie without resistance. But as the Articles of this league betweene Athens and Sparta did, by diui- 40 ding the conduct in such manner, disable the societie, and make it insufficient to those ends for which it was concluded; so the example of it wrought their good, by filling the enemies heads with the like vanitie. For the Arcadians confidering their owne numbers which they brought into the field, and having found by many trials that their people were not inferiour to others in strength of body, in courage, or in good Souldiership, thought it good reason that they should in like maner share the gouernement, with their friends the Thebans; and not alwaies continue followers of others, by encrealing whose greatnes they should strengthen their own yoke. Herevpon they began to demeane themselves very insolently, whereby they grew hatefull to their Neighbours, and suspected of the Thebans in an ill time. For a motion of 50 generall peace having been made (which tooke not effect, because the City of Meffene was not abandoned to the Lacedamonians) the next enterprise of the Spartans and their friends was vpon these Arcadians, who relying too much vpon their owne worth, were ouerthrowne in a great battaile, their calamitie being as pleafing to their Confederates as to their Enemies.

The great growth of the Theban Estate. Embassages of the Greekes to the Perlian; with the reasons why he most favoured the Thebans. Troubles in the Persian Empire. The fruitlesse iffue of the Embassages.

He Thebans especially rejoyced at the Arcadians misfortune, confidering, that, without their aide, the fuccesse of all enterprises proued so ill, whereas they themselves had by their owne power accomplished very well what focuer they tooke in hand, and were become not only very well what locuer they tooke in hand, and were become not only victorious ouer the Lecedemonians, but patrons ouer the Thessalians, and Moderators of the great quarrels that had rifen in Macedonia, where compounding the differences about that Kingdome, as pleased them bell, they carried Philip the Sonne of Amyntas, and Father of Alexander the Great, as an Hostage vnto Thebes. Having therefore obtained such reputation, that little seemed wanting to make them absolute Commanders of al Greece, they sought meanes of alliance with the Persian King, to whom they sent Embassadour the great and famous Captaine Pelopidas, whose reputation drew Artaxernes to grant vnto the Thebans all that they 20 delired; whereof two especiall points were, That Messer should remaine free from the Lacedemenians, and that the Atherians should for beare to fend their ships of Warre to Seasonly the later of these two was somwhat qualified with reference to further aduice. The other States of Greece did also fend their Embaffadours at the lame time, of whom few or noncreceived much contentment. For the King having found by long experience, how farre it concerned him to maintaine a fure partie in Greece, did vpon many waightie considerations resolue, to binde the Thebans firmely vnto him; justly expecting, that their greatnesse should bee on that fide his owne securitie. The Athenians had beene ancient enemies to his Crowne, and, having turned the profit of their victories vpon the Persian to the purchase of a 30 great Estate in Greece, maintained their Signoric in such puissant manner, that (sundriegricuous misfortunes notwithstanding) they had endured a terrible warre. wherein the Lacedemonians being followed by most of the Greeks, and supplied with treasure, and all sorts of aide by Darius Nothus, were notable to vanquish thorn, till their owne indifcretion brought them on their knees. The Lacedemonians being victorious ouer Athens, had no fooner ellablished their Dominion at home, than they undertooke the conquest of Asia from which though, by the commotion raifed in Greece with Persian gold, they were called backe, yet having renewed their power, and settled things in Greece, it was not vnlikely, that they should vpon the next advantage have purfued the same enterprise, had not they been empeached 40 by this Theban Warre. But the Thebans contrariwise had alwaies discouered a good affection to the Crowne of Persia. They had sided with Xerxes in his inuasion of Greece; with Darius and the Lacedemonians against Athens: And finally, having offered much contumely to Agessiaus when he put to Sea, they drew him home by making warre on the Confederates of sparta. Besides all these their good desernings, they were no Sea-men, and therefore vnlikely to looke abroade; whereunto if perchance they should have any desire, yet were they disabled by the want of good hauen townes, which they could not feize vpon without open breach of that peace, whereof they intended to become the Executors, giving libertie to all Cities that had at any time been free. Wherefore Artaxernes did wholly condescend vnto the 50 requests of Pelopidas, as farre forth as he might without giving open defiance to the rest of Greece; and by that meane he purchased his owne quiet, being neuer afterward molested by that Nation in the lower Afra. The ill meanes which the Greeks had to disturbe Artaxerxes, was very beneficiall to the Estate of Persia shortly after these times, in that great rebellion of all the Maritime Provinces. For had then the affaires of Greece beene so composed, that any one Citie might without empeach-ment of the rest have transported an Armie, to assist the revolting Satrape, or Vice-roies of Caria, Phrygia, Lydia, Mylia, Lycia, Pifidia, Pamphilia, Cilicia, Syria, and Phanicia, humane reason can hardly find the meanes, by which the Empire could have been

How all Greece was divided, betweene the Athenians and Lacedemonians, on the one side, and Thebans on the other. Of the great tumults rising in Arcadia.

CHAP. 12, S.5.

He condition of things in Greece at that time did stand thus. Athens and Sparta, which informer times had commanded all that Nation, and each vpon enuie of the others greatnesse drawne all her followers into a cruell intestine warre, by which the whole Countrie, and especially the Estate of these two Cities, was brought very low, did now conjoune their forces against the Thebans, who fought to make themselues Lords of all. The Eleans, Corinthians, and Achaians, followed the partie of these ancient gouerning Cities; either for the old reputation of them, and benefits received, or in diflike of those, who by strong hand were readie to become Rulers, to which authoritie they could not suddenly aspire without some injurie and much enuie. The Citie of Thebes abounding with men, whom necessitie had made warlike, and many victories in few yeeres had filled with great spirits, & being so mightie in dependants. that shee had reduced all the continent of Greece without Peleponne sus (the Region of Attica, and very little part belide excepted) under fuch acknowledgement, as wan-20 ted not much of meere Valallage, did hope to bring all Peloponnesus to the like obedience, wherein alreadie shee had set good footing by her conjunction with the States of Argos, and of Arcadia. The Argines had been alwaies bad Neighbours to the Spartans, to whom they thought the infelues in ancient Nobilitie Superiours, but were farre vnder them in valour, having beene often beaten out of the field by them, and put in danger of looling all: which caused them to suspect and enuie nothing more than the greatnesse and honor of sparta, taking truce with her when shee was at rest, and had leisure to bend her whole force against them, but firmely joyning with her enemies when soeuer they found her entangled in a difficult Warre. As the Argines were, in hatred of Sparta, sure friends of Thebes, so the Arcadians, trans-30 ported with a great opinion of their owne worthines, had formerly renounced and prouoked against them their old Confederates and Leaders, the Lacedemonians, and were now become very doubtfull adherents to the Thebans. In which regard it was thought convenient by Epaminondas, and the State of Thebes, to fend an Armie into Peloponnesus, before such time as these wavering friends should fall further off, and become either Neutrall, or, which was to be feared, open enemies. And furely great cause there was to suspect the worst of them, considering that without consent of the Thebans, they had made peace with Athens; which was very strange, and seemed no leffe to the Athenians themselves, who holding a firme league with Sparta at the same time when the Arcadians treated with them, did neuerthelesse accept this new 40 Confederacie, not relinquishing the old, because they found that, how socuer these Arcadians were enemies to the Lacedemonians, they should hereby be drawne somewhat further from their alliance with Thebes, which without them was vnlikely to inuade Peloponnessus with a strong Armie. But this did rather hasten, than by any meanes stay, the comming of Epaminond is 3 who finding the way somewhat more cleare for him (because the Citie of corinth, which lav vponthe Isthmus, and had beene aduerse to Thebes, was now, by miseries of this gricuous warre, driven to become Neutrall)tooke occasion hereby, and by some disorders among the Arcadians, to visit Peloponnesus with an Armie, consisting of all the power of Thebes. A great tumult had risen in Arcadia about consecrated money, which many principall men 50 among them had laied hands on, under pretence of imploying it to publique vses. In compounding the differences growne vpon this occasion, such, as had least will to render account of the money which had come into their handes, procured the Captaine of some Theban Souldiers, lying in Tegea, to take prisoners many of their Countrimen, as people desirous of innouation. This was done: but the vp-roare Nnnn 3 preserved from that ruine, which the duine Coucel had deferred vnto the daies of Alexander. But this great conspiracie of so many large and wealthy Provinces, wanting a firme bodie of good and hardy Souldiers, was in short space discussed and vanished like a mist, without effect: these effeminate Asiatiques weried quickly with the trauailes and dangers incident to warre, for faking the common caufe, and each man friging to bee the first, that by treason to his company should both redeeme the former treason to his Prince, & purchase withal his own promotion with encrease of riches. Of this commotion, which in course of time followed some actions not as yet related, I have rather chosen to make short mention in this place, than hereafter to interrupt the Narration of things more important; both for that it was like a fuddaine storme, rashly commenced, idlely followed, and foolishly laied downe, having made a great noise without effect, and having small reference to any other a-Ction regardable; as also because in the whole raigne of Artaxerxes, from the warre

of Cyrus, to the inuation of Egypt, I finde nothing (this infurrection, and a fruit leffe journey against the Cadusians excepted) worthy of any metion; much lesse of digreffion from the course of the businesse in Greece. All, or the most of his time, passed a- 20 way so quietly, that he enjoied the pleasures which an Empire so great and wealthy could affoord vnto so absolute a Lord, with little disturbance. The troubles which he found were only or chiefly Domesticall; growing out of the hatred which Paryfatis the Queen-Mother bare vnto his wife Statira, and to fuch as had bin the great tell enemies to her fonne Cyrus, or gloried in his death : vpon whom, when by poifon and mischieuous practices shee had satisfied her seminine appetite of revenge, thenceforth she wholly applied her selfe to the Kings disposition, cherishing in him the lewd defire of marrying his own Daughter, & filling him with the perswasion, which Princes, not endued with an especiall grace, doe readily entertaine, That his owne will was the supreme law of his subject, and the rule by which all things were 30

> But such foundations of eternitic laied by mortall men in this transitory world, like the Tower of Babel, are either shaken from heaven, or made vaine and unprofitable, ere the frame can be raifed to full heighth, by confusion of tongues among the builders. Hereof was found a good example in the Thebans, and other Estates of Greece 40 that had sent Embassadours to the Persian. For whereas it had been concluded, that all Townes, as well the little as the great, should be fet at libertie, and the Thebans made Protectors of this common peace, who thereby should become the Judges of all controuerfies that might arife, and Leaders in warre of all that would enter into this Confederacy; the Kings letters being folemnely published at Thebes, in the prefence of Embaffadours, drawne thither from all parts of Greece; when an oath was to be measured, and adjudged to be good or cuill. In this imaginarie happinesse Pe-lopidas, and the other Embaffadours of Greece, both found and left him, but left him by so much more assured than they found him, by how much the coclusion of his Treatie with them, being altogether to his owne advantage, did sceme to promise, if not the perpetuitie, a long endurance of the same felicity to him and his, or (at the least )a ful security of danger from Greece, whence only could any danger be seared.

required for observation of the forme of peace therein set downe, a dilatoric anfwere was made by the Embaffadors, who faid, that they were fent to heare the articles; not to sweare vnto them. Hereby the Thebans were driven to send vnto each of the Cities to require the Oath; But in vaine. For when the Corinthians had bold- 50 ly refused it, saying, That they did not neede it; others tooke courage by their example to doe the like, disappointing the Thebans of their glorious hopes, to whom this negotiation with Artaxerxes gaue neither addition nor confirmation of great-

thereby caused was so great, that the prisoners were forth-with enlarged, and the Areadians, who had in great numbers taken Armes, with much a doe scarse pacified. When complaint of the Gaptaines proceedings came to Thebes, Epaminondas turned all the blame vpon them, who had made the peace with Athens, letting them know. that he would be shortly among them, to judge of their sidelitie, by the affistance which they should give him, in that warre, which he intended to make in Peloponne. fus. These Lordly wordes did greatly amaze the Arcadians; who needing not the aide of so mightie a power as he drew a-long with him, did vehemently suspect that great preparation to bee made against themselves. Hereupon such of them as had before fought meanes to settle the affaires of their Countrie, by drawing things to 10 fome good conclusion of peace, did now forth-with fend to Athens for helpe, and withall dispatched some of the principall among them as Embassadours to Sparta, by whom they offered themselves to the common defence of Peloponnesus, now readie to be inuaded. This Embassage brought much comfort to the Lacedamonians. who feared nothing more than the comming of Epaminondas, against whom they well knew, that all their forces, and best prouisions, would bee no more than very hardly sufficient. Forbearing therefore to dispute about prerogatives, they (who had been accustomed ynto such a supremacie, as they would in no wife communi. cate with the powerfull Citie of Athens, till other hope of securing their owne Eflate could not be thought vpon) did now veriegently yeeld to the Areadians, that 20 the command of the Armie in chiefe, should be given, for the time, to that Citie, in whose Territorie it lay.

Ertaine it is, that the condition of things did at that time require a verie firme consent, and vniforme care of the common safetie. For befide the great forces raifed out of the other parts of Greece, the Ar- 30 giues, and Messenians, prepared with all their strength to ioyne with Epaminondas; who having lien a while at Nemea, to intercept the Athenians, received there intelligence, that the Armic comming from Athens would passe by Sea, whereupon he dislodged, and came to Tegea, which Citie, and the most of all Arcadia besides, forthwith declared themselves his. The common opinion was, that the first attept of the Thebans, would be upon such of the Arcadians as had revolted; which caused the Lacedamonian Captaines to fortifie Mantinea with all diligence, and to fend for Agesilaus to Sparta, that he bringing with him all that small force of able men, which remained in the Towne, they might be strong enough to abide Epaminondas there. But Epaminondas held fo good espiallypon his Enemies, 40 that had not an vnknowne fellow brought hastie advertisement of his purpose to Agesilaus, who was then well onward in the way to Mantinea, the Citie of Sparta had suddenly been taken. For thither with all speede and secrecie did the Thebans march, who had furely carried the Citie, notwith standing any defence that could have beene made by that handfull of men remaining within it; but that Agesilaus in all flying hafte got into it with his Companies, whom the Army of his Confederates followed thither to the rescue as fast as it was able. The arrival of the Lacedamonians and their friends, as it cut offall hope from Epaminondas of taking Sparta, foir presented him with a faire advantage vpon Mantinea. It was the time of Haruest, which made it very likely, that the Mantineans, finding the warre to be carried 50 from their walls into another quarter, would vie the commoditie of that vacation, by fetching in their corne, and turning out their cattellinto their fields, whilest no enemie was neere that might empeach them. Wherefore hee turned away from Sparta to Mantinea, sending his horse-men before him, to seize upon all that might be found without the Citie. The Mantineans (according to the expectation of Epaminondas) were scattered abroad in the Countrie; farre more intent upon their haruest-businesse, than vpon the warre, whereof they were secure, as thinking themselues out of distance. By which presumption it fell out, that great numbers of them, and all their Cattell, being vnable to recouer the Towne, were in a desperate case; and the Towneit selfe in no great likelihood of holding out, when the enemy should have taken all their provision of victuals with so many of the people, as had not ouer-dearely beene redeemed, by that Cities returning to focietie with Thebes, But at the same time, the Athenians comming to the succour of their Confederates. so whom they thought to have found at Mantinea, were very earnessly entreated by the Citizens to rescue their goods, and people, from the danger whereinto they were fallen, if it were possible by any couragious aduenture to deliuer those who otherwise were given as lost. The Thebans were knowne at that time to bee the best Souldiers of all the Greekes, and the commendation of good horsemanship had alwaies beene given to the The Salians, as excelling in that qualitie all other Nations: yet the regard of honour so wrought vpon the Athenians, that for the reputation of their Citie, which had entred into this warre, vpon no necessitie of her owne, but onely in defire of relieuing her distressed friends, they issued forth of Mantinea, not abiding so long as to refresh themselves, or their horses with meat, and giving a lu-20 stie charge vpon the enemie, who as brauely received them, after a long and hote fight, they remained masters of the field, giving by this victorie a safe and easie retrait to all that were without the walls. The whole power of the Baotians arrived in the place soone after this battaile, whom the Lacedemonians and their Affistants

PAMINONDAS, confidering that his Commission was almost now expired, and that his attempts of surprising Sparta and Mantinea, hauing failed, the impression of terrour which his name had wrought in the Peloponnessams, would soone vanish, vnlesse by some notable act he should abate their courage in their first grouth, and leaue some memorable character of his expedition; resolued to give them battaile, whereby he reasonably hoped both to settle the doubtfull affections of his own Associates, and to leaue the Spartans as weake in spirit and abilitie, as he found them, if not wholly to bring them into subjection. Having therefore warned his men to prepare for 40 that battaile, wherein victorie should be rewarded with Lordship of all Greece; and finding the alacritie of his Souldiers to be fuch as promifed the accomplishment of his ownedefire; he made shew of declining the enemie, and intrenching himselfe in a place of more advantage, that so by taking from them all expectation of fighting that day, hee might allay the heate of their valour, and afterward firike their fenses with amazement, when hee should come you them vnexpected. This opinion deceived him not. For with very much tumult, as in fo great and fodaine a danger, the enemie ranne to Armes, necessitie enforcing their resolution, and the consequence of that daies service vrging them to doe as well as they might. The Theban Armie consisted of thirtie thousand foot, and three thousand horse; the La-50 cedamonians and their friends were short of this number, both in horse and in foot, by a third part. The Mantineans (because the warre was in their Countrie) stood in the right wing, and with them the Lacedamonians: the Athenians had the left wing, the Acheans, Eleans, and others of leffe account, filled the bodie of the Armie. The Thebans stood in the left wing of their owne battaile, opposite to the La-cedamonians, having by them the Arcadians; the Eubeans, Locrians, Sicyonians, Mesenians, and The Saltans with others, compounding the maine battaile; the Argines held the right wing; the horse-men on each part were placed in the flancks, only a troupe of the Eleans were in reare. Before the footmen could joyne, the encounter of the horse on both sides was very rough, wherein finally the Thebans prevailed. notwithstanding the valiant relistance of the Athenians: who not yeelding to the enemie either in courage or skil, were ouer-laied with numbers, and so beaten vpon by Thessalan slings, that they were driven to forsake the place, and leave their infanterie naked. But this retrait was the lesse disgracefull, because they kept themselues together, and did not fall backe vpon their owne foot-men; but finding the 10 Theban horse to have given them over, and withall discovering some Companies of foot, which had beene fent about by Epaminondas, to charge their battaile in the reare, they brake upon them, routed them, and hewed them all in peeces. In the meane season the battaile of the Athenians had not onely to doe with the Argines, but was hardly pressed by the Theban Horse-men, in such wise that it beganne to open, and was readie to turne backe, when the Elean Iquadron of Horse came vp to the reliefe of it, and restored all on that part. With farre greater violence did the Lacedamonians and Thebans meete, these contending for Dominion, the other for the maintenance of their ancient honour, so that equal courage and equal losse on both sides made the hope and appearance of victorie to either equally doubtfull: 20 vnlesse perhaps the Lacedemonians being very firme abiders, might seeme the more likely to preuaile, as having borne the first brunt, and furie of the on-set, which was not hitherto remitted, and being framed by Discipline, as it were by Nature, to excell in patience, whereof the Thebans, by practice of a few yeeres, cannot be thought to have gotten a habite so sure and generall. But Epaminondas perceiuing the obstinate stiffenesse of the Enemies to bee such, as neither the badde successe of their owne horse, nor all the force of the Baotian Armie, could abate so farre, as to make them give one foote of ground; taking a choise Companie of the most able men, whom hee cast into the forme of a Wedge, or Diamond, by the aduantage of that figure against a squadron, and by his owne exceeding vertue, accompanied 30 with the great strength and resolution of them which followed him, did open their rancks, and cleave the whole battaile in despight of all resistance. Thus was the honour of that day wonne by the Thebans, who may justly bee said to haue carried the victorie, seeing that they remained Masters of the ground whereon the battaile was fought, having driven the Enemie to lodge farther off. For that which was alleaged by the Athenians, as a token that the victorie was partly theirs, the flaughter of those Mercenaries vpon whom they lighted by chance in their owne flight, finding them behinde their Armie, and the retaining of their dead bodies; it was a Ceremonie regardable onely among the Greekes, and serued meerely for oftentation, shewing that by the fight they had obtained somewhat, which the 40 Enemie could not get from them otherwise than by request. But the Thebans arrived at the generall immediate end of battaile; none daring to abide them in the field: whereof a manifest confession is expressed from them, who for sake the place which they had chosen or accepted, as indifferent for triall of their abilitie and prowesse. This was the last worke of the incomparable vertue of Epaminondas, who being in the head of that Warlike troupe of men, which broke the Lacedamonian esquadron, and forced it to give back in disaray, was furiously charged on the sodaine, by a desperate Company of the Spartans, who all at once threw their Darts at him alone; whereby receiving many wounds, hee neuerthelesse with a fingular courage maintained the fight, vling against the Enemies many of their 50 Darts, which hee drew out of his owne bodie; till at length by a Spartan, called Anticrates, hee received so violent a stroke with a Dart, that the wood of it brake, leaning the yron and a peece of the tronchion in his breft. Hereupon hee funke downe, and was soone conneighed out of the fight by his friends; having by his fall somewhat animated the Spartans (who faine would have got his bodie) but much more inflamed with reuengefull indignation, the Thebans, who raging at this heavie mischance did with great slaughter compell their disordered enemies to leave the field; though long they followed not the chase, being wearied more with the fadnesse of this disaster, than with all the trauaile of the day. Epaminandas being brought into his Tent, was told by the Philicians, That when the head of the Dart should be drawne out of his bodie, bee must needes die. Hearing this, hee called for his shield, which to have lost, was held a great dishonour: It was brought vnto him. He bade them tell him which part bad the victorie; answere was made, that the Baotians had wonne the field. Then faid he, it is faire time for mee to die. and withall fent for Iolidas, and Diophantes, two principall men of Warre, that were both flaine; which being told him, He adulted the Thebans to make Peace, whilest with advantage they might, for that they had none left that was able to discharge the office of a Generall. Herewithall he willed, that the head of the weapon should be drawne out of his bodie; comforting his friends that lamented his death, and want of iffue, by telling them, that the victories of Leuttra and Mamines were two faire Daughters, in whom his memorie should live.

So died Epaminondes, the worthieft man that ever was bred in that Nation of Greece, and hardly to bee matched in any Age or Countrie: for hee equalled all o-20 thers in the feuerall vertues, which in each of them were fingular. His luffice, and Sinceritie, his Temperance, Wisedome, and high Magnanimitie, were no way inferiour to his Militarie vertue; in enery part whereof hee so excelled, That hee could not properly bee called a Warie, a Valiant, a Politique, a Bountifull, or an Industrious, and a Provident Captaine; all these Titles, and many other, being due vnto him, which with his notable Discipline, and good Conduct, made a perfect composition of an Heroique Generall. Neither was his private Conversation vnanswerable to those high parts, which gaue him praise abroade. For he was Graue, and yet very Affable and Curteous; resolute in publique businesse, but in his owne particular casie, and of much mildnesse: a louer of his People, bearing with mens 30 infirmities, wittie and pleasant in speech, farre from insolence, Master of his owne affections, and furnished with all qualities that might winne and keepe loue. To these Graces were added great abilitie of bodie, much Eloquence, and very deepe knowledge in all parts of Philosophie and Learning, wherewith his minde being enlightened, refted not in the sweetnesse of Contemplation, but brake forth into such effects as gaue vnto Thebes, which had ener-more beene an vnderling, a dreadfull reputation among all people adjoyning, and the highest command in Greece.

Of the peace concluded in Greece after the battile of Mantinga. The voiage of AGESILAV sinto Egypt. His death, and qualities, with an examination of the comparison made betweene him and POMPEY the Roman.

His battaile of Mantinea was the greatest that had ever beene fought in that Countrie betweene the Naturals; and the last. For at Marathon, and Plates, the populous Armies of the barbarous Nations gaue rather a great fame, than a hard triall to the Gracian valour, neither were the practice of Armes and Art Militarie fo perfect in the beginnings of the Peloponnesian Warre, as long continuance and daily exercise had now made them. The times following produced no actions of worth or moment, those excepted which were undertaken against forraine enemies, prouing for the most part unfortunate. But in this last fight all Greece was interested, which neuer had more able Souldiers, and braue Commanders, nor cuer contended for victory with greater care of the successe, or more obtlinate resolution. All which not with standing, the iffine being fuch as hath beene related, it was found best for enery particular Effate, that a generall peace should be established, every one retaining what hee prefently had, and none being forced to depend vpon another. The Messenians were by name comprised in this new league; which caused the Lacedemonians not to enter into it. Their itanding out hindred not the rest from proceeding to conclution; confidering that Sparta was now too weake to offend her Neighbours, and 10 therefore might well bee allowed to shew that anger in ceremonies, which had no power to declare it selse in execution. This peace, as it gaue some breath and refreshing to all the Country, so to the Cities of Athens and Sparta it associated leisure to tecke after wealth by forraine emploiment in Agept, whither Agefilaus was fent with some smal forces to assist, or indeed, as a Mercenarie, to serue vnder Tachos King of Egypt in his warre vpon Syria. Chabrias the Athenian, who had before commanded under Acoris King of Agypt, went now as a voluntary, with fuch forces as he could raife, by entreatic, and offer of good pay, to the same seruice. These Agyptian Kings descended from Amyrteus of Sais, who rebelled against Darius Nothis, nating retained the Country, notwithstanding all intestine diffensions, and 20 forraine inualions, during three Generations of their owne race, were so well acquainted with the valour of the Greekes, that by their helpe (casily procured with gold) they conceived great hope, not onely to afture themselves, but to become Lords of the Provinces adioyning, which were held by the Persian. What the issue of this great enterprise might have been, had it not fallen by Domesticall rebellion, it is vncertaine. But very likely it is, that the rebellion it selfe had soone come to nothing, if Agesslaus had not proved a falle Traitor, ioyning with Nettanebus, who rose against his Prince, and helping the Rebell with that Armic which the money of Tachos had waged. This fallhood Agestlaus excused, as tending to the good of his owne Countrie; though it seeme rather, that hee grudged because the King 30 tooke vpon himselfe the Conduct of the Armie, vsing his service onely as Lieutenant, who had made full accompt of being appointed the Generall. Howfocuer it came to passe, Tachos being shamefully betraied by them, in whom he had reposed his chiefe confidence, fled vnto the Persian, who vpon his submiffion gaue him gentle entertainement; and Neclanebis (who seemes to have beene the Nephew of Tachos) raigned in his flead. At the same time the Citizens of Mendes had set vp another King, to whom all, or most of the Egyptians yeelded their obedience. But Agesilaus fighting with him in places of advantage, prevailed so farre, that hee left Nectanebus in quier possession of the Kingdome, who in recompence of his treason to the former King Tachos, and good service done to himselfe, rewarded him with 40 two hundred and thirtie Talents of silver, with which bootic sailing homewards, he died by the way. He was a Prince very temperate, and valiant, and a good Leader in warre, free from couetousnesse, and not reproched with any blemish of lust; which praises are the lesseadmirable in him, for that the discipline of Sparta was fuch as did endue cucric one of the Citizens (not caried away by the violent freame of an ill nature) with all, or the chiefe, of these good qualities. Hee was nevertheleffe very arrogant, peruerfe, vniust and vaine glorious, measuring all things by his owne will, and obstinately profecuting those courses, whose ends were beyond hope. The expedition of xenophon had filled him with an opinion, that by his hand the Empire of Persia should be ouerthrowne; with which conceipt being transpor- 50 ted, and finding his proceedings interrupted by the Thebans, and their Allies, hee did euer after beare such hatred vnto Thebes, as compelled that Estate by meere neceffitie to grow warlike, and able, to the vtter dishonour of Sparta, and the irreparable losse of all her former greatnesse. The commendations given to him by **Xenophon** his good friend, have caused **Plutareh** to lay his name in the ballance against **Pompey** the Great*; whose actions (the solemne gravitie of carriage excepted) are very disproportionable. Yet we may truely say, That as **Pompey** made great warres vnder sundrie Climates, and in all the Provinces of the **Roman** Empire*, exceeding in the multitude of imploiments all that were before him; so **Agesslans** had at one time or other, some quarrell with every Towne in **Greece**, had made a Warre in **Assand meddled in the businesse of the **Expytians**, in which variety he went beyond all his **Predecesslours**, yet not winning any Countries, as **Pompey** did many, but obtaining large wages, which **Pompey** neuer tooke. Herein also they are very like; 10 Each of them was the last great Captaine which his Nation brought forth in time of libertie, and each of them ruined the libertie of his Countrie by his owne Lordly wisfulnesse. We may therefore well say, **Similia magis omnia quam paria**; The resemblance was neerer than the equalitie**. Indeede the freedome of **Rome*** was lost with **Pompey**, falling into the hands of **Casa**, whom he had enforced to take Armes; yet the **Roman** Empire** flood, the forme of Government only being changed: But the libertie of Greece, or of **Sparta** it selse, was not forfaited vnto the Thebans, whom Agestan had compelled to enter into a victorious warre; yet the Signiorie, and ancient renowne of Sparta was presently lost and the freedome of all

CHAP. I.

Of PHILIP, the Father of ALEXANDER the Great, King of Macedon.

Q. 1.
What Kingsraigned in Macedon before PHILIP.

HE Greekes, of whom wee hau calreadie made large discourse, not as as yet wearied with intestine warre, nor made wise by their vaine contention for superioritie, doe still, as in former times, continue the inuasion and vastation of each other.

Against Xerxes, the greatest Monarch of that part of the World, they defended their libertie, with as happie successe, as euer Nation had, and with no lesse honour, than hath euer beene acquired by deeds of Armes. And having had a trial land experience, more than fortunate, against those Nations, they so little regarded what might come from them, who had 50 so often for feited the reputation of their forces, as what so cure could be spared from their owne distraction at home, they transported ouer the Hellesport, as sufficient, to entertaine and busic them with all.

But, as it commonly falleth out with every man of marke in the world, that they vnder-fall, and perish, by the hands and harmes which they least feare; so fared it at this time with the Greeks For of Philip of Macedon (of whom we are now to speake) they had to little regard jasthey grew quenthen more violent in denouring each other, when the falt-growing greatheffe of fucha Weighbour King, should, in regard of their owne fafetics, have lerued them for a strong argument of vnion and accord. But the gloric of their Perfun victories, wherewith they were pampred and made proud, taught them to neglect all Nations but them (elues, and the rather to value at little the power and purpoles of the Macedonians, because those Kings and States, which fate neerer them than they did, had in the time of Amyntas, the Father of Philip, so much weakned them, and wonne upon them, that they were not (as the Gracians perswaded themselves) in any one age, likely to recover their owne, much 10 leffe to worke any wonders against their borderers. And, indeed, it was not in their Philosophic to consider, That all great alterations are storme-like, suddaine, and violent; and that it is then ouer-late to repaire the decaied and broken banks, when great Rivers are once swollen, fast running, and inraged. No, the Greeks did rather imploy themselves, in breaking downe those defences, which stood betweene them and this inundation; than seeke to rampare and re-enforce their owne fields, which by the Levell of reason they might have found to have lien under it. It was there-Orofint 13.2.12. fore well concluded by OROSIVS: Gracia Ciuitates dum imperare singula cupiunt, imperium comnes perdiderunt; The Cities of Greece lost their command, by strining each of

ther Authors affirme, of Jupiter and Athra, is the next Region towards the North which bordereth Greece; It hath to the East, the Agean Sca; it is bounded on the North and North-west, by the Thracians and Illyrians; and on the South and Southwest, by Theslalie and Epirus.

Their Kings were of the family of Temenus, of the race of Hercules, and by nation Argines; who are lifted as followeth. About some fixe yeeres after the translation of the Affrian Empire, Arbaces then governing Media; Caranus of Argos, commanded by an Oracle, to lead a Colonie into Macedon, departed thence with many people, and as hee was marching through that Countrie, the weather being raynie 30 and tempestuous, hee espied a great heard of Goats, which fled the storme as fast as they could, hasting them to their knowne place of couert. Whereupon Caranus, calling to minde, that he had also by another Oracle beene directed, to follow the first troupe of those beasts, that should either lead him, or flye before him; He pursued these Goats to the Cates of Edessa, and being vindiscoursed by the Inhabitants, by reason of the darkpesse of the aire, he entred their Citic without resistance, and pos-Euseb.in chron. fest it. Soone after this, by the ouerthrow of Cisseus, Caranus became Lord of the rest of Macedon, and held it eight and twentie yeeres. Canus succeeded Caranus, and raigned twelve yeeres. Perdiceas the first, the sonne of Tyrimas, gouerned one and fiftie yeeres: a Prince, for his great valour, and many other vertues, much renowned. Solinus, Plinie, Iustine, Eusebius, Theophilus, Antiochenus, and others affirme, that he appointed a place of buriall for himselfe, and for all the Kings of Macedon his Successiours, at Ega: assuring them, that the Kingdome should so long continue in his line and race, as they continued to lay up their bodies in that Sepulchre; wherein it is faid, that because dlexander the Great failed, therefore the posteritie of the Temenida failed in him:a thing rather deuised after the effect, as I conceive, then foretold by Perdiccas.

Argeus succeeded vnto Perdiceas, and ruled eight and twentie yeeres. Philip the first, his successour, raigned eight and twentie yeeres.

Europus followed Philip, and gouerned fixe and twentie yeeres: n who feinfancie the Illyrians invaded Macedon, and having obtained a great victoric, they purfued the fame to the great danger of that State. Whereupon the Macedonians, gathering new forces, and refoluing either to recouer their former losse, or to loose at once both their Kingdome and their King, they carried him with them in his Cradle into the field, and returned victorious; for they were either confident that their Nation could not bee beaten (their King present;) or rather they perswaded themselues that there was no man so void of honour and compassion, as to abandon their natu- Euseb. alcetras succeeded Fropus, and ruled nine and twentie yeares.

Amyntas the first succeeded Alectas, and raigned fiftie yeeres; Heelined at such to time as Darius Hyllafes, after his enprosperous returne out of Seythia, sent Megabazus with an Armic into Europe, who in Xerxes name required Aminias to acknowledge him for his Supreme Lord, by yeelding vnto him Earth and Water. But his Embassadours, as you have heard before, were, for their insolent behaviour towards the Macedonian Ladies, flaine by the direction of Alexander, who was the sonne of Her, Euf, Iufling. Amyntas, and his Successiour.

Alexander, surnamed the rich, the sonne of Amyntas, governed Macedon three and fortie yeeres. He did not only appeale the wrath of Megabazus, for the flaughter of the Persian Embassadours, by giving Gyzea his Sister, to Bubares of the bloud of Persia, but by that match he grew so great in Xerxes grace, as he obtained all that 20 Region betweenethe Mountaines of Olympus and Hemus, to be vnited to the Kingdome of Macedon. Yet could not these benefits buy his affection from the Greekes. For Nerwes being returned into Asia, and Mirdonius made Generall of the Persian Armie; Mexander acquainted the Greekes with all his intents and purposes against Her. 1.8. them. He had three lonnes, Perdiceas, Alcetas, and Philip.

Perdicens the fecond, the forme of Alexander, lived in the time of the Peloponnefian Juft. of Warregand raigned in all eight and twentie yeeres. The Warres which hee made were not much remarkeable: the Storie of them is found here and there by peices, in Thueydides, his first fixe bookes. Hee left behind him two fonnes; Perdiceas, who was very yong, and Archelaus who was base borne.

Perdices the third, being delivered to the custodic and care of Archelaus, was at seven vecres of age cast into a Well and drowned by his false Guardian: who excufing this fact to Cleopatra the Mother of the young King, faid, That the child in fol- plat.in Gorg. lowing a Goose haltily, fell thereinto by misaduenture. But Archelius staied not Arif. Polis. here : for having thus dispatched his brother, hee slew both his Vnele Alcetas the sonne of Alexander the Rich, and Alexander the sonne of this Alcetas, his Cosen Germaine, and enjoyed the Kingdome of Macedon himselfe foure and twentie yeeres.

This Archelaus, of whom both Plate and Ariftotle make mention, though hee made himselfe King by wicked murder, yet hee performed many things greatly to the profit of his Nation. It is faid, That he fought by all meanes to draw Socrates 40. vnto him, and that he greatly loued and honoured Eurypides the Tragadian. He had two fonnes, Archelaus and Orefles.

Arabelaus the second succeeded his Father, and having raigned seven yeeres, hee was flaine in hunting, either by chance or of purpose, by Crataus.

Onesses his younger sonne was committed to the education of Eropus, of the roial blond of Macedon, and had the same measure which Archelaus had measured to his Pupils for From murdered him and vourped the Kingdome, which he held some fixe yeeres: the fame who denied paffage to Agestlaus King of Sparta, who defired after His returne from the Afian expedition, to passe by the way of Macedon into

This V furper left three sonnes, Pansanias, Argeus, and Alexander. Pausanias suc- Died Polyan. ceeded his father From, and having raigned one yeere, hee was driven out by A. Plut in Demet. mynt as the sonne of Philip, the sonne of the first Perdices, the sonne of Alexander the Rich; which Philip was then preserved, when Archelaus the Bastard slew his brother Perdieras, his Vnele Aleetas, and his fonne Alexander. This Amontas raigned raigned (though very virguictly) foure and twentie yeeres; for he was not only infelled by Paulanias, affifted by the Thracians, and by his brother Argaus; incouraged by the Illyrians; and by the faid Argaus, for two yeeres dispossed of Macedon: but on the other side, the Olynthians, his Neighbours neere the Agaan Sea, made themselues for a while Masters of Pella, the chiefe Citic of Macedon.

Amintas the second had by his Wife Eurydice, the Illyrian, three Sonnes; Alexander the second, Perdiceas the third, and Philip the second, Father of Alexander the Great; and one Daughter called Euryone or Exione: He had also by his second Wife Grees, three Sonnes; Archelaus, Argaus, and Menelaus, afterward flaine by their brother Philip: He had more by a Concubine, Ptolomie, furnamed Alorites, of the 10

Citie Alorus, wherein he was borne.

Alexander the second raigned not much about one yeere, in which time hee was inuaded by Paulanias, the sonne of Eropus, but defended by Iphicrates the Athenian, while he was at that time about Amphipolis. Hee was also constrained (for the payment of a great summe of money) to leave his yongest brother Philip in Holtage with the Illyrians, who had subjected his Father Amyntas to the payment of tribute. After this, Alexander, being invited by the Alexande against Alexander the Tyrans of Pheres in Thessalie, having redeemed his brother Philip; to draw the Thebans to his affistance, entred into confederacie with Pelopidas, being at that time in the same Countrie, with whom he also left Philip with diversother principall persons for the 20 gage of his promises to Pelopidas. But Eurydice his Mother falling in loue with her Sonne-in-law, who had married her Daughter Euryone or Exione, practized the death of Alexander her sonne, with a purpose to conferre the Kingdome on her Paramour, which Ptolomie Alorites did put in execution: by meanes whereof hee held Macedon for three yeeres, but was soone after slaine by Perdicas the brother of Diod. 15.6 16. Alexander. Diodor hath it otherwiscof Philips being made pledge; and sayth, That Amyntas his Father delivered him for hostage to the Illyrians, by whom he was conucied to Thebes, there to be kept : others report that Philip (while his Father was yet liuing) was first ingaged to the Thehans, and delivered for hostage a second time by Alexander his brother.

Perdiccas the third, after he had flaine Alorites his base-brother, gouerned Macedon fine yeeres, and was then flaine in a battaile against the Illyrians, according to Diodorus; but Iustine affirmeth, that he perished by the practice of Eurydice his Mother, as Alexander did.

Iuft.1.7.

HILLP the second, the yongest sonne of Amyntas by Eurydice, having beene instructed in all knowledge requisite vnto the gouernment of a Kingdome, in that excellent education which her had under Epaminondas, making an escape from Thebes, returned into Macedon, in the first yeere of the hundred and fifth Olympiad, which was after the building of Rome three hundred fourfcore and thirteene yeeres: and finding the many enemics and dangers wherewith the Kingdome was invironed, hee tooke on him, not as King (for Perdiceas left asonne, though but an infant) but as the Protector of his Nephew, and Commander of the men of Warre. Yet his fruitfull ambition soone ouergrew his modestie, and hee was easily perswaded by the people to accept both the Title of King, and withall the absolute Rule of the Kingdome. And to fay the truth, The necessitie of the State of Macedonat that time required a King both prudent and active. For, belides the incursions of the Illyrian and Pannonians, the King of Thrace did fet vp in opposition Pausanias; the Athenians, Argaus;

sonnes of the late Vsurper Fropus: each of these labouring to place in Aucedon a King of their owne Election. These heavie burdens when Philip could not well beare, he bought off the weightieft by money, and by faire promites viloded himselfe of so many of the rest, as he ranne under the remainder happily enough. For, notwithstanding that his brother Perdiceas had his death accompanied with four e thousand Macedonians, beside these that were wounded and taken prisoners; and that the Pannonians were delitroying all before them in Macedon, and that the Athenians with a fleet by Sea, and three thousand Souldiers by Land under Mantias, did beat voon him on all sides and quarters of his Countrie: Yet after he had practifed the men of warre of Pannonia; and corrupted them with gifte; and had also bought the King of Thrace from Pansanias, he forthwith made head against the Athenians his stiffest enemies; and, for the first, he preuented their recourse of simphipolis, a Citie on the frontier of Macedon and did then purfue Argens the sonne of Aropus fet against him by the Athenians, and followed him so hard at the heeles, in his retrait from Ages, that he forced him to abide the battaile: which Argans loft, having the greatest part of his Armie slaine in the place. Those of the Athenians, and others which remained unbroken, tooke the advantage of a strong peece of ground at hand, which though they could not long defend, yet avoiding thereby the present turne of the Souldiers, they obtained of the vanquithers life and libertie to returne into 20 Attica. Whereupon a peace was concluded betweene him and the Athenians for that present, and for this elementic he was greatly renowned and honoured by all the Greekes.

The good successe which PHILIP had in many enterprises.

Ow had Philip leifure to looke Northward, and to attend the Illyrians and Paonians, his irreconciliable enemies and borderers: both which he inuaded with so prosperous successe, as hee slew Bardillis, King of the Illyrians, with seven thousand of his Nation, and thereby recovered all those places which the Illyrians held in Micedon: and withall, vpon the death of the King of Pannonia, he pierst that Countrie, and after a maine victorie obtained, hee enforst them to pay him tribute. This was no sooner done, than (without staying to take longer breath) he hasted speedily towards Larts/a,vpon the River Peneus in Thessalze, of which Towne hee soone made himselfe matter; and thereby he got good footing in that Countrie, whereof he made vse in time following. Now although hee resolued either to subdue the Thessalians, or to make them his owne against all others, because the horse-men of that Countrie were the 40 best, and most feared in that part of Europe, yet he thought it most for his safetie to close up the entrances out of Thrace, least while hee inuaded Thessalie and Greece towards the South, those ample Nations, lying towards the North, should either withdrawhim, or ouer-runne Macedon as in former times. He therefore attempted Amphipolis, seated on the famous River of Strimon, which parteth Thrace from Macedon. and wonneit. Healforecourred Pydna; and (to the North of Amphipolis) the Citie of Crenides ( sometime Datus ) and called it after his owne name Philipps: to the people whereof St. Paul afterward directed one of his Epiftles. This place, wherein Philippi stood, is very rich in Mines of gold, out of which, greatly to the advancement of Philips affaires, he drew yeerely a thousand talents, which make sixe hun-50 dred thousand French Crownes.

And that hee might with the more case disburden the Thracian-shores of the Athenian Garrisons, to which he had given a great blow by the taking in of Amphipolis. he entred into league with his Fathers malicious enemies the Olynthians, whom the better to fasten vnto him, he gaue them the Citic of Pydna with the Territorie, meaning nothing lesse than that they should enjoy it, or their owne Estate, many

Now that he might by degrees winne ground vpon the Greeks, he tooke the faire occasion to deliver the Citie of Pheres in The [alie, from the tyrannie Lycophron and Tiliphonus. Who, after they had conspired with Thebe the wife of Alexander, who vsurped vpon the libertie of that State, they themselves ( Alexander being murdered) held it also by the same strong hand and oppression that Alexander did, till by the affiftance of Philip they were beaten out, and Pheres reftored to her former libertie. Which act of Philip did for ever after fasten the Thessals vnto him, and, to his exceeding great aduantage, bind them to his service.

3. IIII.

Of the Phocian Warre which first drew PHILIP into Greece.

Bout this time, to wit, in the second veere of the hundred and sixth Olympiad, eight yeeres after the battaile of Mantinea, and about the eighth yeere of Artaxerxes Ochia, beganne that Warre, called Sacred. Now, as all occasions concurre towards the execution of eternal prouidence, and of every great alteration in the World there is some 20 preceeding preparation, though not at the first easily discerned; so did this reuengefull hatred by the Thebans, Theffalians, and Locrians, conceived against the Phocians, not only teach Philip how he might with halfe a hand wrest the sword out of their fingers; but the Greekes themselues beating downe their owne defences, to give him an casie passage, and beating themselves, to give him victorie without perill, left nothing unperformed towards their owne flauerie, fauing the title and imposition. Of this Warre the Thebans (made over-proude by their victorie at Leuctres ) were the inflamers. For at the Councell of the amphyetiones, or of the general Eflates of Greece, in which, at that time, they swaied most, they caused both the Lacedamonians and Phocians to be condemned in greater fummes of money than they could 30 well beare; the one for furpfiling the Castle of Cadmea in the time of peace, the other for ploughing vp a peece of ground belonging to the Temple of Delphos. The Phocians being resoluted not to obey this Edict, were secretly set on and incouraged by the Lacedamonians: and for refufall were exposed as Sacrilegers, and accurfed to all their Neighbout-Nations, for whom it was then lawfull to invade, and deftroy them at their pleafures.

The Phocians perswaded thereunto by Philomelus, a Captaine of their owne, cast the same dice of hazard that Casar after many Ages following did; but had not the fame chance. Yet they dealt well enough with all the enemies of their owne Nation. And the better to beare out an vngracious quarrell, of which there was left no 40 hope of composition, they resolved to sacke the Temple it selfe. For seeing that for the ploughing of a pecce of Apollo's ground, they had so much offended their neighbour-God, and their Neighbour-Nations, as worse could not befall them than alreadie was intended; they resolved to take the gold with the ground, and either to perish for all, or to prevaile against all that had commission to call them to account. The treasure which they tooke out of the Temple in the beginning of the Warre, was tenne thousand talents, which in those daies served them to wage a great many men, and fuch was their successe in the beginning of the warre, as they wonne three great battailes against the Thebans, Thessalans, and Locrians, but being beaten in the fourth, their Leader Philomelus cast himselfe head-long over the Rockes.

In the meane while the Cities of Chersonesus, both to defend themselves against their bad-Neighbour Philip, who encroched vpon them, and to draw others into their quarrell, rendred themselves to the Athenians. Philip prepareth to get them into his hands, and at the fiege of Methone lost one of his eyes. It is faid, That hee that flot him, did purposely direct his arrow towards him, and that it was written on the shaft thereof: After PHILIPPO; After to PHILIP; for so hee was called Par Vision.

that gaue him the wound. This Citic he enened with the foile.

The Tyrant Lycophron before mentioned, while Philip was builed on the border of Thrace, and the Theffalians ingaged in the holy warre, entied Theffalie with new forces, being athited by Onomarchies, Commander of the Phocian Armie, in place of Philomeliss. For hereby the thecians hoped to to entertaine the The flatians at home, as they should not find leisure to invade them. Hercupon was Philip the second time called into Thessalie, but both the Thessalians, and Macedonians, (Platip being present) were veterly ouerthrowne by Gnomarchus; and great numbers of both Nations lott. From The ffalie, Ono marchus drew speedily towards Bactiz, and with the same victorious Armie brake the forces of the Fastians, and tooke from them their Citie of Coronea. But i belip imparient of his late misaduenture, after he hadre-enforced his Armie, returned with all speed into Theilalie, there to find against he honour which he lately loft : and was the second time incountred by Cnomarthus, who brought into the field twentie thousand foot, and fine hundred horse. All this great preparation sufficed notator Onomarchus was by Philip surmounted, both in numbers and in good fortune, his Armie ouerturned, fix thouland flaine, and three thouland taken: of which number himselfe being one, was among others hanged by Philip. Those that fled, were in part received by the Athenian Gallies, which failed alongst the coast, commanded by Chares, but the greatest number of those that tooke the Sea, were therein denoured ere they recovered them. Lycophron was now againe driven out of Theff lie, and Pheres made free as before.

Of the Olynthian Warre. The ambitious practices of PHILIP.

Rom hence Philip resolued to inuade Phocis it selfe, but the Athenians did not fauour his entrance into those parts, and therefore with the helpe of the Lucedamonians they retrencht his passage at the Straits of Thermopylis. Whereupon hee returned into Macedon, and after the caking of Micyberne, Torone, and other Townes, hee quarrelled with the Olynchians, whom not long before he had wooed to his alliance, and bought his peace of them. For the Olymbians were very strong, and had enermore both braued and beaten the Mace lemins. It is faid, that Philip having put to death Archelaus his halfe brother (for Amontas had three sonnes by Eurydice the Mother of Philip, and three other sonnes by Gyg.ea: but Philips elder brothers by the same Mother being dead, he determined to rid himselfealso of the rest) the two yonger held themselves 40 within Olynthus; and that the receiving of them by the Olynthians was the cause of the warre, infine affirmeth. But just quarrels are ballanced by just Princes, for to Infide. this King all bings were lawfull that might any way seruc his turne; all his affections, and pattions, how divers foeuer in other men, were in Lis ambition fwallowed vp, and thereinto connected. For hee neither forbare the murder of his owne brothers, the breach of faith, the buying of other mens fidelitie; he effected no place strong where his Asse loaden with gold might enter, Nor any Citic or State vnconquerable, where a few of the greatest, to be made greater, could loose the sense of other mens forrow and subjection. And because hee thought it vaine to practise the winning of olynthus, till he had inclosed all the power they had within their owne 50 walls, he entred their Territorie, and by the advantage of a well compounded and trained Armie, he gaue them two ouerthrowes ere hee fate downe before the Citie it felfe: which done, he bought Euthicrates and Lasthenes from their people, and from the service of their Countrie and Common weale, by whose treason he entred the Towne, flew his brothers therein, fackt it, and fold the Inhabitants for flaves by the drum. By the spoile of this place he greatly inriched himselfe, and had treasure sufficient to buy in other Cities with all, which he daily did. For so was hee aduled by the Oracle in the beginning of his undertaking, That hee should make his assaults with silver speares: Whereupon Horace well and truly said.

By gifts the Macedon clane Gates a-funder, And Kings enuying his estate brought vnder.

And it is true that he wonne more by corruption and fraude, than he did by force. For as he had in all the principall Cities of Greece his fecret workers (which way of Conquest was well followed by Philip the second of Spaine: ) So when in the contention between the Competitors for the Kingdome of Thrace, he was chosen the Arbitrator, he came not to the Councell accompanied with Pietie and Iustice, but with a powerful Armie and having beaten and slaine both Kings, gaue sentence for himselfe, and made the Kingdome his owne.

Q. VI. How Philip ended the Phocian Warre.

HE warre fill continuing betweene the Phocians, and the Affociates of the holy warre, the Bæotians, finding themselues vnable to sublish without some present aide, sent vnto Philip for succour, who willingly yeelded to their necessities, and sent them such a proportion of men, as were neither sufficient to master their enemies, nor to assure them-

felues; but yet to inable them to continue the ware, and to waste the strength of 30 Greece. They also sent to Artaxerxes Ochus for supply of treasure, who lent them thirtic talents, which makes a hundred & sources thousand Crownes: but when with these supplies they had still the wort in all their attempts against the Phoesans, who held from them three of their strongest Cities within Bacotia it selfe, They then belought Philip of Macedon that he would affish them in person, to whom they would give an entrance into their Territorie, and in all things obey his Commandements in that Warre.

Now had Philip what he longed for; for he knew himselfe in state to give the law to both, and so quitting all his other purposes towards the North, he marched with a speedie pace towards Baotia, where being arrived, Phallecus who commanded the 40 Phosian Armic, fearing to shock with this victorious King, made his owne peace, and withdrew himselfe with a Regiment of eight thousand Souldiers into Pelsponnesus, leaving the Phocians to the mercie of the Conquerour, and for conclusion he had the glorie of that warre called Sacred, which the Gracians with so many mutual slaughters had continued for ten yeeres, and, besides the glorie, hee possess himselfe of orchomene, Coronea and Corsia, in the Countrie of the Bacteans, who invited him to bee victorious ouer themselues. Hee brought the Phocians into servitude, and wasted their Cities, and gave them but their Villages to inhabite, referring to himselfe the veerely tribute of threefcore talents, which make fixe and thirtie thousand French Crownes. He also hereby (besides the fame of pictic for service of the Gods) obtai- 50 ned the same double voice in the Councell of the AmphyEtiones, which the Phocians had, with the superintendencie of the Pythian games, for feited by the Corinthians, by being partakers in the Phocian facriledge. 3. How PHILIP with ill successe attempted upon Perinthus, Byzantium, and the Scythians.

HILLP, after his triumphant returne into Macedon, by the Lieutenant of his Armic Parmenio, flaughtered many thousands of the Myrians, and Dardanians, and brought the Thracians to pay him the tenth part of all their revenues. But his next enterprise against the Perinthians staid his furie. Perinthus was a Citic of Thrace, seated vpon

Propontis, in the mid-way betweene Seftos and Byzantium, a place of great strength, and a people resoluted to defend their libertic against Philip, where the Athenians incouraged and affilted them. Philip fate downe before it with a puilfant Armie, made many faire breaches, gaue many furious affaults, built many ouer-topping and commanding Towers about it. But hee was repel'd with equall violence. For whereas Philip thought by his continuall affaults to wearie them, and waste both their men and munition, they were supplied, not only from the Persian with men and money, and succoured from Byzantium which stood vpon the same Sea-coast, but they were relieved from Athens, Chio, and Rhodes, by the conduction 20 of Phocion, with what societ was wanting to their necessitie. But because those of Byz intium, by reason of their neighbour-hood, and the easie passage by water, gaue them often and readie helpe; Philip removed with the one halfe of his Armie and belieg'd it, leaving fifteene thousand foot before Perinthus, to force it if they could; but to be short, he failed in both attempts, (as all Princes commonly doe that vnder-take divers enterprises at one time ) and returned into Macedon with no lesse dishonour than losse; whereupon he made an Ouerture of peace with the Athenians, and greatly defired it, to which though Phocion perswaded them in all he could, and that by the occasion offered they might greatly advantage their conditions, Yet Demosthenes with his eloquence prenaited in the refusall. In the meane while Philip 30 having digested his late affront, and supplied his expence, by the taking of an hundred and threescore and ten Marchants ships, he gathered new forces, and being accompanied with his sonne Alexander, led them into Scythya; but hee was also vnprosperous in this enterprise: For the Triballi, a people of Masia set on him in his returne, wounded him, and tooke from him the greatest part of the spoiles, which he had gathered.

à. VIII.

How Philip ouerthrowing the Greekes in the battaile of Charonaa, was chosen Captaine-Generall of Greece. The death of Philip.

Mong these Northern Nations (part of which hee suppress, and part quieted) hee spent some eight yeeres; and in the ninth yeere, after the end of the holy warre, he was to his great advantage invited againe by the Gracians to their assistance. For the Citizens of Amphiss having disobeyed the decree of the Amphissiones, in which Philip had a double voice, and who by reason that the Thebans and Losrius gaue countenance and aide to the Amphissiones, the rest were not of themselves able to constraine them, they besought Philip to come in person to their assistance. Now you must thinke that Philip was not long in resoluing you this enterprise; been edded no drawing on, whom nothing could keepe backe; nor other dissance than a mastring power could hold thence. He therefore commanded his Armic forthwith to march; the same being compounded of thirtie thousand soot, and two thousand horse; and with as much expedition expedition as could be made, he entred Phocis, wanne Platea, and brought into Subication all that Region.

The rest, and especially the Athenians, although they had good cause to seare that agreat part of this storme would fall on themselucs, yet were they disswaded by Demosthenes from accepting such reasonable conditions of peace as Philip offered. and rather made choise (having drawne the Thebans to joyne with them) to leave the injoying of their cltates and their freedome to the chance of one battaile, than to hold it either by composition, or by the grace of Philip. But this their Oratours eloquence cost them deare. It is true that he could farre more easily minde them of the vertue of their Ancestors, then make them to be such as they were. Hee might 10 repeate vnto them (with wordes mouing passion) the wonders they wrought at Marathon, but hee could not transforme the Macedonians into Persians, nor draw from the dead, a Militades, an Ariftides, a Themistocles, or a Cimon, or any of those famous Commanders, whose great vertues they had payed with the greatest ingratitude that cuer Nation did. A Phocien they had, but by the strength of a contrarie faction hee was at this time in difgrace, and not imployed: in so much as when the Armies of Philip and the Confederates incountred, although somethousand of the Athenians abid the killing, and the like number well-neere of the Thebans died with them; yet the want of worthie men on that fide to hold up the rest, and to draw them on, and the many choise Captains of the Macedonians, incouraged by a King of 20 a growing fortune, as it gaue to Philip to thining a victoric that Alexander by the light thereof found his way (in despight of all the Nations interjacent ) into Persia, Inder, and Egypt; foit cut to the ground, and gave end and date to all the Gracian plorie : Yea their libertic (faith Eurtius) with their large Dominion wonne with fo many difficulties, continued for so many Ages, and so often defended against the greatest Kings, was now lost in a moment, and for ener lost.

Now this admifed King (neuer pathonate to his difaduantage) to the end hee might obtaine the Soueraignetic ouer all Greece, and be acknowledged for their Captaine-Generall against the Persians, without any further hazard or trouble, was content to let goe those Athenians that were taken at this battaile of Cheronea, as he also 30 forbare to attempt any thing against their Citie : but in Thebes (which lately by the vertue of Epaminondess triumphed over the rest) hee lodged a Garrison of Macedomians. And being foone after (according vnto the long defire which he had nourished of this Sourraignetie) by the generall States at Corinth, stiled the first Commander of all the Gracians, and contribution of men and money granted him, he compounded an Armie of great strength, and vnder the commandement of Attalus and Parmenie, transported the same ouer the Hellespont into Asia, to begin the Warre. Of his enterprise against Persia hee sought the successe from the Oracle at Delphos, from whence he received such another convertible riddle, as Crassus did when he attempted Cyrus, and was in like fort mistaken in the exposition.

But as it is hard to discerne and withstand the flatteries of our owne appetites, so did Philips ambitious desire to inuade Persia abuse his judgement, so farre, that the death, wherewith himselfe was threatned, he understood to be deliuered of his enemie, whom he intended presently to inuade. Before his purposed departure into Asia; hee prepared for the marriage of his Daughter Cleopatra with Alexander King of Epirus, to which feast and passimes thereat appointed, hee inuited all his Friends, and Allies, with the principall persons of the Gracian Cities, from whom he received much honour and many rich presents; but this was indeed the feast of his Funerall. For having refused to doe justice to one Pausanias a Gentleman of his Guard; whom Aitales (greatly favoured by Philip) had first made drunke, and then 50 left to be carnally abused by divers base persons, This Pausanias grew into so great detestation of the Kings partialitie in so foule a fact, as when Philip was passing towards'the Theater, he drew a fword from under his long garment and wounded him to death, when hee had lived fixe and fortic yeeres, and raigned five and twentie.

Infline reports it that Olympias incouraged Paul anias to murder the King her huf- Juffig. band, which after his death flee boldly anowed, by the honour flee did vnto Pau-Canage in crowning his idead bodic, in confecrating his sword vnto Apollo, by building for him a Monument, and other like Graces.

what good foundations of Alexanders greatneffe were laied by PHilir. Of his laudable qualities, and iffue.

Ow although he were then taken from the World, when he had ma-fired all opposition on that side the Sea, and had seene the fruits of his hopes and labours, changing colour towards ripenesse and perfection, yet he was herein happy that hee lived to see his sonne alexander at mans estate, and had him selfe been an eie-witnesse of his resolution, and tingular valour in this last battaile. The foundation of whose future greatnesse he had laied so soundly for him, with fo plaine a patterne of the buildings which himselfe meant to erect, as the performance and finishing was farre more easie to Alexander, though more glorious than 20 the beginnings were vnto Philip, though lesse famous. For besides the recourse of Macedon it felfe, in competition betweene him and the sonnes of Aropm, the one affilled by the Thracians, the other by the Athemans, and belides the regayning of many places possess by the Illyrians, the crushing of all those Northren Kings his Neighbours, the ouerthrow of Olynthus, a State that despised the power of his Father, the many Maritimate Citiestaken, of great strength and ancient freedome. and the subjection of that famous Nation of Greece, which for so many Ages had defended it selfe against the greatest Kings of the World, and wonne vponthem; Hee left vnto his sonne, and had bred vp for him, so many choise Commanders, as the most of them, both for their valour and judgement in the warre, were no lesse wor-30 thie of Crownes, than himselfe was that ware a Crowne: For it was said of Parmenie (whom Alexander, vngratefullto fo great vertue, impioully murdered) That Parmenio had performed many things challenging eternall fame, without the King. but the King, without Parmenjo neuer did any thing worthic of renowne; as for the rest of his Captaines, though content to obay the Sonne of such a Father, yet did they not after Alexanders death endure to acknowledge any man Superiour to them felues.

Of this Prince it is hard to judge, whether his ambition had taught him the exercise of more vices, than Nature, and his excellent Education had inriched him with vertues. For besides that he was Valiant, Wise, Learned, and Master of his 40 Affections, he had this fauour of Pietie, that he rather laboured to fatis fie those that were grieued, than to suppresse them, Whereof (among many other) wee finde a good example in his dealing with Arcadion, and Nicanor; whom, when for their cuill speech of Philip, his familiars perswaded him to putto death; Hee answered them, That first it ought to bee considered, whether the fault were in them that gaue him ill language, or in himselfe: Secondly, that it was in every mans owne power to bee well spoken off; and this was shortly proued, for after Philip had relieued their necessities, there were none within his Kingdome that did him more honour than they did. Whereupon hee told those that had perswaded him to vse violence, that he was a better Philition for cuill speech than they were.

His Epistles to Alexander his sonne are remembred by Cicero, and Gellius; and cic. of a. by Dion: and Chrysostome exceedingly commended. His Stratagems aregathered Gelligates by Polyanus and Frontinus, his wife fayings by Plutarch, And albeit hee held Macedon as in his owne right, all the time of his raigne, yet was he not the true and next Heire thereof: for Amyntas the sonne of his Brother Perdiceas (of whom he had the protection

By Andata, an Illyrean, his second wife, hee had Cyna, married as is shewed 10

By Nicasipolis, the Sifter of Iason, Tyrant of Pheres, hee had Thessalinica, whom Cassander; after he had taken Pidna, married, but shee was afterward by her Father-

By Phila and Meda he had no iffue.

Hee had also two Concubines, Arsinee, whom, after hee had gotten with child, hee married to an obscure man, called Lagus, who bare Ptolomie, King of Egypt, called the sonne of Lague, but esteemed the sonne of Philip: by Philinna, his second Concubine, a publike Dancer, He had Arideus, of whom wee shall have much occasion to speake hereafter. 1919 1919

CHAP. II.

Of ALEXANDER the Great:

A briefe rehearfall of ALEXANDERS doings, before hee inuaded Asia.

EXANDER, afterward called the Great, succeeded vnto Philip his Father; being a Prince no lesse valiant by Nature, than by Education, well instructed, and inriched in all forts of Learning and good Arts. Hee began his raigne ouer the Macedonians foure hundred and scuenteene yeeres after Rome built, and after his owne birth twentie yeeres. The strange dreames of Philip his Father, and that one of the gods, in the shape of a Snake, begat him on Olympias his Mother, 50 I omit as foolish tales; but that the Temple of Diana (a worke the most magnificent of the World) was burnt vpon the day of his birth, and that so strange an accident was accompanied with the newes of three feuerall victories, obtayned by the Macedonians, it was very remarkeable, and might with the reason of those times be interpreted for ominous. and foreshewing the great things by Alexander afterward performed. Vpon the change of the King, the Neighbour-Nations, whom Philip had oppress, beganne to confult about the recourrie of their former libertie, and to aduenture it by force of Armes, Alexanders yong-yeeres gave them hope of prevailing, and his suspected severity increased courage in those, who could better resolute o die, than to live slamilly. But Alexander gaue no time to those swelling humours, which might focedily have endangered the health of his estate. For after reuenge taken voon the Conspirators against his Father, whom he slew vpon his Tombe; and the celebrato tion of his Funeralls, hee first fattened vnto him his owne Nation, by freeing them from all exactions, and bodily flauerie, other than their feruice in his warres; and vfed fuch Kingly aufteritie towards those that contemned his yong yeeres, and such clemencie to the rest that perswaded themselves of the crueltie of his disposition, as all affections being pacified at home, He made a prefent journey into Peloponnelus. and so well exercised his spirits among them, as by the Counsell of the States of Greece, he was according to the great defire of his heart, elected Captaine-Generall against the Pertians, vpon which war Philip his Father had not only resolved. (who had obtained the same title of Generall Commander) but had transported under the leading of Parmenio, and Attalus, a part of his Armie, to recouer some places on

This enterprise against the Persian occupied all Alexanders affections; those faire markes of riches, Honour, and large Dominion, hee now shot at both sleeping and waking: all other thoughts and imaginations were either grieuous or hatefull. But a contrary winde arifeth; for hee receiveth advertisement that the Athenians, Thebans, and Lacedamonians, had united themselves against him, and, by affistance from the Persian, hoped for the recourse of their former freedome. Hereto they were perswaded by Demosthenes, himselfe being thereto perswaded by the gold of Persia; the device he vsed was more subtile than profitable, for hee caused it to be bruted that Alexander was flaine in a battaile against the Triballes, & brought into the affem-30 bly a Companion whom hee had corrupted to affirme, That himselfe was present and wounded in the battaile. There is indeede a certaine Doctrine of Policie (as Policie is now a-daies defined by falshood and knauerie) that deuised rumours and lies, if they serue the turne, but for a day or two, are greatly availeable. It is true that common people are sometime mockt by them, as Souldiers are by false alarums in the Warres; but in all that I have observed, I have found the successe as ridiculous as the inuention. For as those that finde themselves at one time abused by such like brutes, doe at other times neglect their duties, when they are vpon true reports, and in occasions perilous, summoned to assemble; so doe all men in generall condemne the Venters of such trumperie, and for them feare vpon necessarie occasions to en-40 tertaine the truth it felfe. This labour vnlooked for, and losse of time, was not only very grieuous to Alexander, but by turning his sword from the ignoble and effeminate Persians, against which he had directed it, towards the manly and famous Grecians, of whose affistance he thought himselfe affored, his present undertaking was greatly disordered. But he that cannot indure to strine against the winde, shall hardly attaine the Port which hee purposeth to recover: and it no lesse becomment the worthick men to oppose misfortunes, than it doth the weakest children to bewaile

Hee therefore made such expedition towards these Revolters, as that himselfe. with the Armie that followed him, brought them the first news of his preparation. 10 Hereupon all stagger, and the Athenians, as they were the first that moved, so were they the first that fainted, seeking by their Embassadours to pacific the King, and to be received againe into his grace. Alexander was not long in resoluting; for the Persians perswaded him to pardon the Gracians. Wise men are not easily drawne from great purposes by such occasions as may easily be taken off, neither hath any King euer brought to effect any great affaire, who hath intangled himfelfe in many enterprifes at once, not tending to one and the same certaine end.

And having now quicted his borderers towards the South, he refolued to affure those Nations which lay on the North-side of Macedon, to wit, the Tracians, Triballes, Peones, Getes, Agrians, and other faluage people, which had greatly vexed with incursions, not only other of his Predecessours, but even Philip his Father: with all which, after divers ouerthrowes given them, hee made peace, or else brought them into subjection. Notwithstanding this good successe, he could not yet find the way out of Europe. There is nothing more naturall to man than libertie; the Greekes had enjoyed it ouer-long, and loft it too late to forget it; they therefore shake off the to yoke once againe. The Thebans, who had in their Citadella Garrison of a thousand Macedons, attempt to force it; Alexander hasteth to their succour, and presents himfelfe with thirty thousand foot, all old Souldiers, and three thousand horse, before the Citie, and gaue the Inhabitants some daies to resolue, being euen heart-sicke with the defire of passing into Asia. So vnwilling, indeede, he was to draw bloud of the Gracians, by whom hee hoped to serve himselfe elsewhere, that hee offered the Thebans: remission, if they would only deliner into his hands Phanix and Prothytes, the flirrers up of the Rebellion. But they, oppoling the mounting fortune of Alexander, (which bare all relistance before it, like the breaking-in of the Ocean-Sca) in flead of fuch an answer, as men besieged and abandoned should have made, deman- 20 ded Philotas and Antipater to bee deliucred vnto them; as if Thebes alone, then layed in the ballance of Fortune with the Kingdome of Macedon, and many other Prouinces could either haue euened the scale or swaied it. Therefore in the end they perished in their obstinacie. For while the Thebans oppose the Armie assailant, they are charged at the back by the Macedonian Garrison, their Citie taken and razed to the ground, fixe thousand flaine, and thirty thousand sold for flaues, at the price of fourehundred and fortie talents. This the King did to the terrour of the other Gra-

Many Arguments were weed by Cleadar one of the prisoners, to perswade Alexander to forbeare the destruction of Thebes, He prayed the King to believe that they 30 were rather misseled by giving hasty credit to salfer eports, than any way malicious; for being perswaded of Alexanders death, they rebelled but against his Successour. He also besought the King to remember, that his father Philip had his education in that Citic, yeat hat his Ancestor Hereules was borne therein: but all perswassons were fruitlesse; the times wherein offences are committed, doe greatly aggravate them. Yet for the honour he bare to learning, he pardoned all of the race of Pindarus the Poet, and spared, and set at libertic Timoclea, the sister of Theagenes, who died in desence of the libertic of Greece against his Father Philip. This Noblewoman being taken by a Thracian, and by him rauished, hee threatned to take her life vnsesse has would consesse her treasures; the led the Thracian to a Well, and told him that she had therein cast it: and when the Thracian stooped to looke into the Well, she suddainly thrust him into the mouth thereof, and stoned him to death.

Now because the Athenians had received into their Citie so many of the Thebans, as had escaped and sed vnto them for succour, Alexander would not grant them peace, but upon condition to deliver into his hands both their Orators which perswaded this second revolt, and their Captainess yet in the end it being a torment unto him to retard the enterprise of Persia, he was content that the Orators should remaine, and accepted of the banishment of the Captaines, wherein he was exceeding ill advised, had not his fortune, or rather the providence of God, made all the resistance against him unprofitable: for these good Leaders of the Gracians betooke 50 themselves to the service of the Persian, whom after a few daies he invadeth.

ð. I I.

How ALEXANDER passing into Asia, fought with the Persians upon the River of Granicus.

Hen all was now quieted at home, Alexander, committing to the trust of Antipater both Greece and Macedon, in the first of the Spring did passe the Hellespont, and being readie to dis-imbarke, he threw a Dart towards the Asian shore, as a token of defiance, commanding his Souldiers not to make any waste in their owne Territorie, or to burne, or deface those buildings which themselves were presently, and in the future to possess. He landed his Armie, consisting of two and thirtie thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all old Souldiers, necre vnto Troy, where he offered a solemne facrifice vpon Achilles Tombe, his maternall Ancestor.

But before he left his own coast, he put to death, without any offence given him, all his Mother-in-lawes Kinsmen, whom Philip his Father had greatly advanced, not sparing such of his owne as he suspected. Hee also tooke with him many of his tributarie Princes, of whose sidelitie he doubted; thinking by vniustcrueltie to assure all things, both in the present and future. Yet the end of all fell out contrary to the policy which his Ambition had commended vnto him, though agreeing very well with the justice of God; for all that he had planted, who soone after withered, and rooted vp; those, whom he most trusted, were the most traiterous; his mother, friends, and children, fell by such another mercilesse sword as his own, and all manner of consusion followed his dead bodie to the grave, and left him there.

When the knowledge of Alexanders landing on Asia fide was brought to Darim, hee so much scorned the Armie of Macedon, and had so contemptible an opinion of Alexander himselfe, as having stiled him his scruant on a letter which hee wrote vnto him, reprehending his disloyaltie and audacitie (for Darim intitled himselfe King of Kings, and the Kinsman of the gods) hee gaue order withall to his Lieute-30 nants of the lesser Asia, that they should take Alexander aline, whip him with rods, and then contay him to his presence: that they should sinke his shipe, and send the Macedons taken prisoners beyond the Red-Sea, belike into Athoria, or some other vnhealthfull part of Affrica. In this fort did this glorious King, confident in the glittering, but heartlesse, multitude which he commanded, dispose of the alreadic-vanquished Macedonians; But the il destinies of men bearethem to the ground, by what strong confidence soeuer armed. The great numbers which he gathered together, and brought in one heape into the field, gaue rather an exceeding advantage to his enemies, then any discouragement at all. For besides that they were men vtterly vnacquainted with dan-49 gers, men who by the name and countenance of their King were wont to prevaile against those of lesse courage than themselves, menthat tooke more care how to embroder with gold and filuer their vpper garments, as if they attended the inuafion but of the Sunne-beames, than they did to arme themselues with yron and steele against the sharpe pikes, swords and darts of the hardie Macedonians; I say, befides all these, euen the opinion they had of their owne numbers, of which euery one in particular hoped that it would not fall to his turne to fight, filled every of them with the care of their owne safetie, without any intent at all to hazard any thing but their owne breath, and that of their horses, in running away. The Macedonians as they came to fight, and therby to enrich themselues with the gold and 30 iewels of Persia, both which they needed, so the Persians, who expected nothing in that Warre but blowes and wounds, which they needed not, obeyed the King, who had power to constraine them in affembling themselues for his seruice; but their owne feares and cowardice, which in time of danger had most power over them, they only then obeied, when their rebellion against fo seruile a passion did instly and Pppp 2 violently require it. For faith V EGETIVS: Quema: modum bene exercitatus miles pralium cupit, ita formidat indoctus; nam (ciendum est in pugna v (um amplius prodesse auam vires : As the well practifed Souldier desires to come to battaile, so the raw one feares it: for we must under stand, that in fight it more availes to have beene accustomed unto the like than only to have rude strength. What maner of men the Persians were, Alexander discourred in the first encounter, before which time it is said, by those that writ his Storie. That it was hard to judge, whether his daring to vndertake the Conquest of an Empire fo wel peopled, with a handfull of men, or the successe he had, were more to be wondred at. For at the River of Granick, which severeth the Territoric of Trov from Propontis, the Persians sought to stop his passage, taking the higher ground and 10 banke of the river to defend, which Alexander was forced (asit were) to clime vo vnto, and scale from the Level of the water; Great resistance (faith Curtims) was made by the Persians, yet in the end Alexander preuailed. Butit seemes to mee, that the victorie then gotten was exceeding easie, and that the twentie thousand Persian foot-men, faid to be flaine, were rather kil'd in the back, in running away, than hurt in the bosomes by relisting. For had those twentie thousand foot, and two hundred and fiftie horse-men, or after Plutareh, two thousand and fiue hundred horse-men. died with their faces towards the Macedonians, Alexander could not have bought their lines at so small a rate, as with the losse of four and thirtie of all forts of his owne. And if it were also true, that Plutarch doth report, how Alexander encoun- 20 tred two of the Persian Commanders, Spithridates and Rha saces, and that the Persian horse-men fought with great furie, though in the end scattered; and lastly, how those Gracians in Darius his pay, holding themselues in one bodie vpon a piece of ground of aduantage, did (after mercy was refused them) fight it out to the last; how doth it then resemble truth, that such resistance having beene made, yet of Alexanders Armie there fell but twelve Foote-men, aud two and twentie Horse-

He winning of this passage did greatly encourage the Macedonians, and brought such terror vpon all those of the lesser Asia, as hee obtained all the Kingdomes thereof without a blow, some one or two Townes excepted. For in all inualions, where the Nations inuaded have once 🍇 beene beaten vpon a great aduantage of the place, as in defence of Ri-

uers, Streights, and Mountaines, they will foone have perswaded themselves, that fuch an enemie vpon equal termes and even ground, can hardly be relifted. It was 40 therefore Machianels counsell, that he which resolueth to defend a passage, should with his ablest force oppose the Assailant. And to say truth, few Regions of any great circuit are so well fenced, that Armies of such force as may be thought sufficient to conquer them, can be debarred all entrance, by the natural difficultie of the waies. One passage or other is commonly left vnguarded: if all be defended, then must the forces of the Countrie bedistracted, and yet lightly, some one place will be found that is defended very weakely. How often have the Alpes given way to Armies, breaking into Italie? Yea, where shall we finde that ever they kept out an inuadour? Yet are they such, as (to speake briefly) afflict with all difficulties those that trauaile ouer them; but they give no securitie to those that lie behinde them: for 50 they are of too large extent. The Townes of Lumbardie perswaded themselves that they might enioy their quiet, when the Warlike Nation of the Switzers had undertaken to hinder Francis the French King from descending into the Duchie of Milan: but whilest these Patrons of Milan, whom their owne dwelling in those Mountaines

Mountaines had made fittest of all other for such a service, were busied in custodie of the Alpes; Francis appeared in Lumbardie, to so much the greater terrour of the Inhabitants, by how much the leffe they had expected his arrivall. What thall we say of those Mountaines, which locke vp whole Regions in such fort, as they leave but one gate open? The Straights, or (as they were called) the gates of Taurus in Cilicia, and those of Thermopyla, have seldome beene attempted, perhaps because they were thought impregnable: but how feldome (if ever) have they been attempted in vaine ? Xerxes and long after him, the Romans, forced the entrance of Thermapyle; Cyrus the yonger, and after him Alexander, found the Gates of Cilicia wide 10 open; how strongly soeuer they had beene locked & barred, yet were those countries open enough to a fleet that should enter on the backe-fide. The defence of Riuers how hard a thing it is, we finde examples in all histories that beare good witnesse. The deepest have many Foords; the swiftest and broadest may bee passed by Boates, in case it be found a matter of difficultie to make a bridge. He that hath mon enow to defend all the length of his owne banke, hathalfo enow to beat his enemic; and may therefore doe better to let him come ouer, to his losse, than by ftriuing in vaine to hinder the paffage, as a matter tending to his owne disaduantage, fill the heads of his Souldiers with an opinion, that they are in ill case, hauing their meanes of safeguard taken from them, by the skill or valour of such as are too 20 good for them. Certainely, if a River were sufficient defence against an Armie, the Isle of Mons, now called Anglesey, which is divided from North-Wales by an arme of the Sea; had beene fafe enough against the Romans, inuading it under conduct of Iulius Agricola. But he wanting, and not meaning to fpend the time in making veffels to transport his forces, did affay the foords. Whereby hee so amazed the ence mies attending for ships and such like prouision by Sea, that surely beleeuing nothing could bee hard or inuincible to men, which came so minded to Warre, they humbly intreated for peace, and yeelded the Iland. Yet the Britaines were men flout enough; the Persians very dastards.

It was therefore wisely done of Alexander, to passe the River of Granick in sace 30 of the enemic; not marching higher to feeke an easier way, nor labouring to conucy his men ouer it by some safer meanes. For having beaten them vpon their own ground, he did thereby cut off no leffe of their reputation, than of their firength, leauing no hope of fuccour to the partakers and followers of fuch vnable Pro-

CHAP.2. S.2.

Soone after this victoric he recourred Sardis, Ephe/us, the Cities of the Trallians and Magnesia, which were rendred vnto him. The Inhabitants of which, with the people of the Countrie, he receyued with great grace, suffring them to be governed by their ownelawes. For he observed it well; Nouum Imperium inchoantibus viilis clementia fama; It is commodious unto such as lay the foundations of a new Souer aignety. 49 to have the fame of being mercifull. He then by Parmenio wanne Miletin, and by force mastred Halicarnassius, which because it relisted obsinatly he razed to the ground. From whence he entred into Caria, where Ada the Queene, who had beene cast out of all that shee held (except the Citie of Alunda) by Darius his Lieutenants, presented her selfe vnto him, and adopted him her sonne and successor; which Alexander accepted in so gracious part, as he left the whole Kingdome to her disposing. Hee then entred into Lycia, and Pamphilia, and obtained al the Sea-coasts, and subjecting vnto him Pifidia, he directed himfelfe towards Darius (who was faid to be aduanced towards him with a maruellous Armie) by the way of Phrygia: For all the Prouince of Matheleffe, bordering vpon the Sca, his first victorie layed under his feet.

While he gaue order for the gouernment and fetling of Lycia, and Pamphilia, the sent Cleander to raise some new Companies in Peloponnesus, and marching towards the North, he entred Celenas feated on the River Meander, which was abandoned vnto him, the Castle onely holding out, which also after fortie daies was given vp: for so long time he gaue them to attend succour from Darius. From Celenas he past on through Phrygia towards the Euxine Sea, till hee came to a City called Gordium. the Regall-leate, in former times, of King Midas. In this City it was that he found the Gordian-knot, which when he knew not how to vndoe, hee cut it a funder with his fword. For there was an ancient prophecie did promife to him that could untie it, the Lordship of all Asia; whereupon Alexander, not respecting the maner how, fo it were done, assumed to himselfe the fulfilling of the prophesie, by hewing it in

But before he turned from this part of Asia the leffe towards the East, hee tooke care to cleare the Sea-coast on his backe, and to thrust the Persians out of the Ilands of Lesbos, Scio, and Coos, the charge whereof hee committed vnto two of his Cap. 10 taines, giuing them such order as he thought to be most couenient for that service; and delinering unto them fiftie Talents to defray the charge; and with all out of his first spoilegotten, hee sent threescore talents more to Antipater his Lieutenant in Greece and Macedon, From Celenas he remoued to Ancira, now called Anguori, standing on the same River of Sangarius, which runneth through Gordium: there hee mustred his Armie, and then entred Paphlagonia, whose people submitted themsclues vnto him, and obtained freedome of tribute: where he left Catus Gouernour with one Regiment of Macedonians lately arrived.

Heere he understood of the death of Memnon, Darius Lieutenant, which hartned him greatly to passe on towards him, for of this only Captaine hee had more re- 20 spect than of all the multitude by Darius affembled, and of all the Commanders he had belides. For so much bath the spirit of someone man excelled, as it hath vndertaken and effected the alteration of the greatest States and Common-weales, the erection of Monarchies, the conquest of Kingdomes and Empires, guided handfuls of men against multitudes of equal bodily strength, contriued victories beyond ail hope and discourse of reason, converted the fearefull passions of his owne followers into magnanimitie, and the valour of his enemies into cowardize; such spirits have beene stirred vp in sundry Ages of the world, and in divers parts thereof, to erect and cast downe againe, to cstablish and to destroy, and to bring all things, Perfons and States, to the same certaine ends, which the infinit Spirit of the Vniuer sall, 20 piercing, mouing, and gouerning all things, hath ordained. Certainly the things that this King did were maruellous, and would hardly haue beene undertaken by any man else: and though his Father had determined to haue inuaded the leffer A-Gaitislike enough that he would have contented himselfe with some part thereof, and not have discovered the River of India, as this man did. The swift course of victory, wher with he ranne ouer so large a portion of the World, in so short a space, may justly be imputed vnto this, that he was neuer encountred by an equall spirit, concurring with equall power against him. Hereby it came to passe that his actions being limited by no greater opposition, then Desart places, and the meere length of tedious journies could make, were like the Colossus of Rhodes, not so much to bee admired for the workemanship, though therein also praise-worthy, as for the huge bulke. For certainely the things performed by Xenophon, discouer as braue a spirit as Alexanders, and working no leffe exquisitely, though the effects were leffe materiall, as were also the forces and power of command, by which it wrought. But hee that would finde the exact patterne of a noble Commander, must looke vpon such as Epaminondas, that encountring worthy Captains, and those better followed than themselues, haue by their singular vertue ouer-topped their valiant enemies, and ftill preuailed ouer those, that would not have yeelded one foot to any other. Such as these are, doe seldome live to obtaine great Empires. For it is a worke of more labour and longer time, to master the equal forces of one hardie and well-ordered State, than to tread downe and vtterly subdue a multitude of servile Nations, com- 50 pounding the body of a groffe vn weildie Empire. Wherefore these Parus Potentes. men that with little haue done much vpo enemies of like ability, are to be regarded as choise examples of worth; but great Conquerours, to be rather admired for the fubstance

fubstance of their actions, than the exquisite managing: exactnesse and greatnesse concurring fo seldome, that I can finde no instance of both in one, saue onely that

Hauing thus farre digressed, it is now time that wee returne vnto our Easterne Conqueror; who is trauailing hastily towards Cilicia, with a desire to recouer the Streights thereof before Darius should arrive there. But first making a dispatch into Greece, he fent to those Cities, in which he reposed most trust, some of the Persians Targets which he had recourred in his first battaile; vpon which, by certaine inscriptions, he made them partakers of his victorie. Herein he well aduised himselfe: to for he that doth not as well impart of the honour which he gaineth in the Warres. as hee doth of the spoiles, shall never be long followed by those of the better fort. For men which are either well borne or well bred, and have more of wealth than of reputation, doe as often fatisfie themselves with the purchase of glorie; as the weake in fortune, and strong in courage, doe with the gaine of gold and silver.

The Gouernour of Cilicia hearing of Alexander comming on, left some Companies to keepe the Streights, which were indeede very defencible; and withall, as Curtius noteth, hee beganne ouer-late to prife and put in execution the Counfell of Memnon: who in the beginning of the Warresadvised him to waste all the prouifions for Men and Horse, that could not be lodged in strong places, and alwaies to 20 giue ground to the Inuader, till hee found some such notableaduantage as might affuredly promise him the obtaining of victory. For the fury of an inuading Army is best broken, by delaies, change of diet, and want, eating sometimes too little, and fometimes too much, fometimes repoling themselues in beds, and more oftner on the cold ground. These and the like suddainealterations bring many diseases vpon all Nations out of their owne Countries. Therefore if Darius had kept the Macedonians but a while from meat and sleepe, and refusing to give or take battaile, had wearied them with his light horse, as the Rarthians afterward did the Romans, hee might perchance have faued his owne life, and his estate. For it was one of the greatest incouragements given by Alexander to the Macedonians, in the third and last fa-30 tall battaile, that they were to fight with all the strength of Persia at once.

Xerxes, when hee inuaded Greece and fought abroad, in being beaten, lost onely his men; but Darius being inuaded by the Greekes, and fighting at home, by beeing beaten, lost his Kingdome; Pericles, though the Lacedomonians burnt all in Attica to the Gates of Athens, yet could not be drawne to hazard a battaile: for the inuaded ought euermore to fight vpon the aduantage of time and place. Because wee reade Histories to informe our vnderstanding by the examples therein found, wee will giue some instances of those that have perished by adventuring in their own countries, to charge an inuading Armic. The Romans, by fighting with Hannibal, were brought to the brinke of their destruction.

40 Pompey was well aduised for a while, when hee gaue Cafar ground, but when by the importunitie of his Captaines he adventured to fight at Pharfalia, hee lost the battaile, lost the freedome of Rome, and his owne life.

Ferdinand, in the Conquest of Naples, would needs fight a battaile with the French to his confusion, though it was told him by a man of sound judgement, that those Counsels which promise suretie in all things, are honourable enough.

The Constable of France made frustrate the mighty preparation of Charles the Fift, when he inuaded Prouence, by wasting the Countrie, and forbearing to fight; so did the Duke of Alus wearie the French in Naples, and dissolue the boisterous Armic of the Prince of Orenge in the low-Countries.

The Leigers, contrarie to the advice of their Generall, would needs fight a battaile with the Bourgonisms, invading their Countrie, and could not be perswaded to linger the time, and flay their advantage; but they loft eight and twenty thousand vpon the place. Philip of Valois fet vpon King Edwardat Cressie, and King Iohn (when the English were well neare tired our, and would in short time by an orderly pursuit have beene walled to nothing) constrained the black Prince with great fury, neere Poitiers, to joyne battaile with him: But all men know what lamentable successe these two French Kings found. Charles the Fift of France made another kinde of Fabian-Wartare; and though the English burnt and waited many places, yet this King held his resolution to forbeare blowes, and followed his advice which told him. That the English could neuer get his inheritance by smoke; and it is reported by Bellay and Herrault, that King Edward was wont to lay of this Charles, that hee wanne from him the Duchie of Guien without cuer putting on his Armour.

But where God hath a purpose to destroy, wise men grow short-lived, and the charge of things is committed vnto such as either cannot see what is for their good, to or know not how to put in execution any found aduice: The course which Memnon had propounded, must in all appearance of reason have brought the Macedonian to a great perplexitie, and made him stand still a while at the Streights of Cilicia, doubting whether it were more shamefull to returne; or dangerous to proceede. For had Cappadocia and Paphlagonia beene wasted whilest Alexander was farre off; and the Streights of Cilicia beene defended by Arlenes, Gouernor of that Province, with the best of his forces: hunger would not have suffered the enemie, to stay the triall of all meanes that might be thought vpon, of forcing that passage; or if the place could not have beene maintained, yet might Cilicia, at better leifure have beene fo throughly spoiled, that the heart of his Armie should have beene broken, by see- 20

But Arsenes leaving a small number to defend the Streights, took the best of his Armie with him, to waste, & spoile the Countrie; or rather, as may seeme, to finde himselfe some worke, by pretence of which he might honestly runne further away from Alexander. Hee should rather have adventured his person in custodie of the Streights, whereby hee might perhaps have faued the Province; and in the meane time, all that was in the fields, would have been conveighed into strong Townes. So should his Armie, if it were driven from the place of advantage, have found good entertainement within walled Cities, and himselfe with his horse-men haue had the leffe worke in destroying that little which was left abroad. Handling the 30 matter as he did, hee gaue the Cilicians cause to wish for Alexanders comming, and as great cause to the Keepers of the passage not to hinder it. For cowards are wise in apprehending all formes of danger. These Guardians of the Streights, hearing that Ar senes made all haste to joyne himselfe with Darius, burning down all as he went, like one despairing of the desence, beganne to grow circumspect, and to thinke that furely their Generall, who gaue as lost the Countrie behinde their backs, had exposed themselues vnto certaine death, as men that were good for nothing else, but to dull the Macedonian swords. Wherefore, not affecting to die for their Prince and Countrie ( which honour they faw that Arfenes himselfe could well forbeare) they speedily followed the foote-steps of their Generall, gleaning after his Haruest, 40 Thus Alexander without labour got both the entrance of Cilicia, abandoned by the cowardifeof his Enemies, and the whole Province that had beene alienated from the Persian side by their indiscretion.

d. IIII.

d. IIII.

Of the unwarlike Armie leuied by DARIVS against ALEXANDER. The unaduised courses which DARIVS tooke in this expedition. He is vanquished at Iss; where his Mother, Wife, and Children are made prisoners. Of some things following the battaile of Iffus,

N the meane season Darius approched; who (as Curtius reports) had compounded an Armie of more than two hundred & ninetic thoufand Souldiers, out of divers Nations; Instine musters them at three hundred thousand Foot, and a hundred thousand Horse; Plutarch at fixe hundred thousand.

The manner of his comming on, as Curtius describes it, was rather like a masker than a man of Warre, and like one that tooke more care to fet out his glorie and riches, than to prouide for his owne fafety, perswading himselfe, as it seemed, to beat Alexander with pompe and sumptuous Pageants. For, before the Armie there was carried the holy fire which the Persians worshipped, attended by their Priess, and after them three hundred and threefcore and fine yong-men, answering the num-20 ber of the daies of the yeere, couered with Scarlet; then the Chariot of Inpiter drawne with white Horses, with their Riders cloathed in the same colour, with rods of gold in their hands; And after it, the Horse of the Sunne: Next after these followed ten sumptuous Chariots, inlaied and garnisht with siluer and gold, and then the Vantguard of their horse, compounded of twelve severall Nations, which the better to avoide confusion, did hardly understand each others language, and these marshalled in the head of the rest, being beaten, might serve very fitly to disorder all that followed them; in the taile of these Horses the Regiment of foote marched, with the Persians called immortall, because if any died, the number was presently supplied: and these were armed with chaines of gold, and their coates 30 with the same metall imbrodered, whereof the sleenes were garnished with pearle, baites, either to catch the hungrie Macedonians withall, or to perswade them that it were great incivilitie to cut and to deface such glorious garments. But it was well said: Sumptuose inductus miles, se virtute superiorem alijs non existimet, sum in pralijs oporteat fortitudine animi, & non vestimentis muniri, quoniam hostes vestibus non debellantur; Let no man thinke that hee exceedeth those in valour, whom hee exceedeth in gay garments, for it is by men armed with fortitude of mind, and not by the apparell they put on. that enemies are beaten. And it was perchance from the Roman Papyrius that this advice was borrowed, who when he fought against the Samnites in that fatall battaile, wherein they all sware either to prevaile or die, thirtie thousand of them having ap-40 parelled themselves in white garments, with high crests and great plumes of feathers, bade the Roman Souldiers to lay aside all feare: Non enim cristas valnera facere, & per picta atque aurata scuta transire Romanum pilum: For these plumed crests would wound no bodie, and the Roman pile would bore holes in painted and gilded shields.

To fecond this Court-like company, fifteene thousand were appointed more rich and glittering than the former, but apparelled like Women (belike to breede the more terrour) and these were honoured with the Title of the Kings Kinsmen. Then came Darius himselfe, the Gentle-men of his Guard-robe, riding before his Chariot, which was supported with the gods of his Nation, cast and cut in pure gold; these the Macedonians did not serve, but they served their turnes of these, by 50 changing their maffie-bodies into thinne portable and current coine. The head of this Chariot was fet with precious stones, with two little golden Idols, couered with an open-winged-Eagle of the fame metall: The hinder part being raifed high wheron Darius fate, had a covering of inestimable value. This Chariot of the King was followed with ten thousand Horse-men, their Lances plated with filuer, and their beads guilt; which they meant not to imbrew in the Maceaoman bloud, for feare of marring their beautie. He had for the proper Guard of his person two hundred of the bloud Royall, bloud too Royall & precious to be spilt by any valorous aduenture, (I am of opinion that two hundred sturdie sellowes, like the Switzers, would have done him more service and these were backt with thirtie thousand foot-men, after whom againe were led source hundred spare horses for the King, which if hee had meant to have vsed, he would have marshalled somewhat neerer him.

Now followed the Reareward, the same being led by Sifygambis the Kings Mother, and by his Wife, drawnein glorious Chariots, followed by a great traine of Ladies their attendants on horse-back, with fifteen Wagons of the Kings children, 10 and the wives of the Nobilitie, waited on by two hundred and fiftie Concubines, and a world of Nurses, and Eunuchs, most sumptuously apparelled. By which it should seeme that Darius thought that the Macedonians had beene Comedians or Tumblers; for this troupe was far fitter to behold those sports than to be present at battailes. Betweene these and a company of slight-armed slaues, with a world of Vallets, was the Kings treasure, charged on fixe hundred Mules, and three hundred Camels, brought, as it proued, to pay the Macedonians. In this fort came this Maygame-King into the field, incombred with a most vinecessarie traine of Strumpets. attended with troupes of divers Nations, speaking divers languages, and for their numbers impossible to be marshalled, and for the most part so esseminate, & so rich 20 in gold and in garments, as the same could not but have incouraged the nakedest Nation of the world against them. We finde it in daily experience, that all discourse of magnanimitie, of Nationall Vertue, of Religion, of Libertie, and what soeuer else hath been wont to moue and incourage vertuous men, hath no force at all with the common Souldier, in comparison of spoile and riches. The rich ships are boorded vpon all disaduantages, the rich Townes are suriously assaulted, and the plentifull Countries willingly inuaded. Our Engish Nations have attempted many places in the Indies, and runne vpon the Sp ineards head-long, in hope of their Royals of plate, and Pistolets, which had they been put to it vpon the like disaduantages in Ireland, or in any poore Countrie, they would have turned their Peeces and Pikes against 30 their Commanders, contesting that they had beene brought without reason to the Butcherie and flaughter. It is true that the warre is made willingly, and for the most part with good successe, that is ordained against the richest Nations; for as the needie are alwaies aduenturous, so plentie is wont to shunne perill, and men that haue well to liue, doe rather studie how to liue well, I meane wealthily, than care to die (as they call it) honourably. Car ou il ny arien a gaigner, que des coups volontiers il ny va pas; No man makes halle to the market, where there is nothing to be bought but blowes.

Now if Alexander had beheld this preparation before his consultation with his South-faiers, hee would have fatisfied himfelfe by the out-fides of the Persians, and neuer haue looked into the intrales of Beafts for successe. For leaving the descrip- 40 tion of this second battaile (which is indeede no-where well described, neither for the confusion and hastic running away of the Asians could it be) we have enough by the flaughter that was made of them, and by the few that fell of the Macedonians, to informe vs what manner of resistance was made. For if it be true that threescore thousand Persian footmen were flaine in this battaile, with ten thousand of their horsemen: Or (as Curtius saith) an hundred thousand footmen, with the same number of horse men, and besides this slaughter, fortie thousand taken prisoners, while of Alexanders Armie there miscatried but two hundred and sourescore of all sorts, of which numbers Arianus and other Historians cut offalmost the one halfe: I doe verily beleeue, that this smal number rather died with the over-travaile and paines- 50 taking in killing their enemies, than by any strokes received from them. And surely if the Persian Nation (at this time degenerate and the basest of the World) had had any fauour remaining of the ancient valour of their forefathers; they would neuer haue fold so good cheape, and at so vile a price, the Mother, the Wife, the Daugisters, and other the Kings children; had their owne honor beene valued by them at nothing, and the Kings safetie and his clate at lesse. Darius by this time found it true, that Charidemus a banished Grecian of Athens had told him, when hee made a view of his Armie about Babylon, to wit, That the multitude which bee had affembled of divers. Nations, tichly attired, but poorely armed, would bee found more terrible to the Inhabitants of the country, whom in passing by they would devour; than to the Macedonians, whom they meant to affaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse square to affaile; who being all old and obedient Souldiers, imbattailed in grosse square square to affaile their Phallanx, well covered with Armour for defence, and surnished with weapons for offence of great advantage, would make so little accompt of his delicate Persians, louing their case and their palat, being withall ill armed and worse disciplined, as except it would please him to entertaine (hauing so great aboundance of treasure to doe it withall) a sufficient number of the same Grecians, and so to encounter the Macedonians with men of equall courage, hee would repent him over-late, as taught by the miserable successed in the to follow.

But this discourse was so unpleasing to Darius (who had been accustomed to nothing so much as to his owne praises, and to nothing so little as to heare truth;) as he commanded that this poore Greesan should be presently slaine: who while hee was a fundring in the Tormentors hand, yield this speech to the King, That Alexander, against whom hee had given this good counsell, should assuredly readened by death, and lay deserved punishment upon Darius for despising his aduice.

It was the saying of a Wise man: Desperata eius Principis salus est, cuius aures ita sormata sunt, ut aspera qua utilia, nec quicquam nisi iucundum accipiat; That Princes safetie is in a desperate case, who se eares iudge all that is prositable to bee too sharpe, and will entertaine nothing that is uppleasant.

For libertie in counfell is the life and effence of counfell; Libertas confily eft cius vita, & effentia qua crepta confilium euanefeit.

Darius did likewise value at nothing the Aduice given him by the Gracian Souldiers that served him, who intreated him not to fight in the Streights: but had they beene Counsellers and directors in that Warre, as they were vnderlings and commanded by others, they had with the helpe of a good troupe of horse-men beene able to have opposed the furic of Alexander, without any affistance of the Persian foot-men. For when Darius was overthrowne with all his cowardly and confused rabble, those Gracians, under their Captaine Amyntas, held firme, and marched away in order in despight of the vanquishers. Old Souldiers are not easily dismayed: we reade in Histories ancient and moderne, what brave retraits have beene made by them, though the rest of the Armie in which they have served, hath beene broken.

At the battaile of Rauenne, where the Imperialls were beaten by the French, a fquadron of Spaniards, old Souldiers, came off vnbroken and vndifmayeth, charged, as holding the victorie not intire by their escape, here was ouer-turned and flaine in the place. For it is truely said of those men, who, by being acquainted with dangers feare them not, That, Neglecto periculo imminentis mali opus insum quantumuis dissiplie aggrediuntur; They goe about the businesse it selse, how hard sower it be, not standing to consider of the danger, which the missing ouer them heads may bring; and as truely of those that know the warres but by heare-say. Quod valentes sum of premalentes ante pericula, in ipsis tamen periculis discedurt; They have abilitie enough, and to spare, till dangers appeare; but when perill indeede comes, they get them gone.

These Grecians also that made the retract, adulted Darius to retire his Armie into the plaine of Mesopotamia, to the end that Alexander being entred into those large stelds and great Champions, he might have invironed the Macedonians on all sides with his multitude; and withall they counselled him to divide that his huge Armie into parts, not committing the whole to one stroke of Fortune, whereby he might have fought many battailes, and have brought no greater numbers at once then might haue beene well marshalled and conducted. But this counsell was so contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuirone the Gracians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisedome of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking understanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither give nor discerne of Counsels, For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a straightned piece of ground. neere vnto the Citie of 1/100, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio flaied there, as in a place of best ad- 10 uantage) was veterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, lewels, and Honour: It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Iewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: onely it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Hulband lately dead, who was taken fly- 20 ing from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who raigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Darius himselfe leaving his brother dead, with divers other of his chiefe Cap-fell into captivitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was scized.

taines (casting the Crowne from his head) hardly escaped.

After this ouerthrow given vnto Darius, all Phanicis (the Citie of Tyre excepted) was yeelded to Alexander, of which Parmenio was made Gouernour.

Aradus, Zidon, and Biblos, Maritimate Cities of great importance, of which one 30 Strato was King (but hated of the people) acknowledged Alexander. Alexander, to honour Epheftion, whom he loued most, gaue him power to dispose 40 of the Kingdome of Zidon. While he made some stay in those parts, he received a letter from Darius, importing the ransome of his Wise, his Mother, and his Children, with some other conditions of peace, but such as rather became a Conqueror, than one that had now been twice shamefully beaten, not vouch safing, in his direction, to sile Alexander King. To be short, Alexander resoluted to enter it by force, and though it were a place in all mens opinion impregnable, because the land whereon it was built, was eight hundred surlongs from the Maine, yet with the labour of many hands, having great store of stone from the old Tyre, and timber sufficient from Lybanus, he filled the passage of the Sea betweene the Iland and the Maine, which being more then once carried away by the strength of the Sea vpon astorme of winde, sometime by the Tyrians fired, and sometime torne assunder, yet with the helpe of his Nauie which arrived (during the siege) from Cyprus, he ouercame ald ifficulties and prevailed, after he had spent seuen months in that attempt. The Tyrians in the beginning of the siege had barbarously drowned the messengers sent by Alexander, perswading them to render the Citie, in respect whereof, and of the great losse of time and men, hee put eight thousand to the sword, and caused two thousand of those, that escaped the first surie, to be hanged on Crosseon the

might have fought many battailes, and have brought no greater numbers at once then might haue beene well marshalled and conducted. But this counsell was so contrarie to the cowardly affections of the Persians, as they perswaded Darius to inuirone the Gracians which gaue the aduice, and to cut them in pieces as Traitors. The infinite wisedome of God doth not worke alwaies by one and the same way, but very often in the alteration of Kingdomes and Estates, by taking understanding from the Gouernours, so as they can neither give nor discerne of Counsels, For Darius that would needs fight with Alexander vpon a straightned piece of ground, neere vnto the Citie of Iffis, where he could bring no more hands to fight than Alexander could, (who by the aduice of Parmenio staied there, as in a place of best ad- 10 nantage) was veterly ouerthrowne, his Treasure lost, his Wife, Mother, and Children (whom the Gracians his followers had perswaded him to leave in Babylon, or elsewhere) taken prisoners, and all their traine of Ladies spoiled of their rich Garments, lewels, and Honour: It is true, that both the Queene, with her Daughters, who had the good hap to be brought to Alexanders presence, were entertained with all respect due vnto their birth, their Honours preserved, and their Iewels and rich Garments restored vnto them; and though Darius Wife was a most beautifull Ladie, and his Daughters of excellent forme, yet Alexander mastred his affections towards them all: onely it is reported out of Aristobulus the Historian, that he imbraced the Wife of the valiant Memnon, her Husband lately dead, who was taken fly- 20 ing from Damascus by Parmenio, at which time the Daughters of Ochus, who raigned before Darius, and the Wives and Children of all the Nobilitie of Persia in effect, fell into captiuitie; at which time also Darius Treasure (not lost at Issus) was seized, amounting to fixe thousand and two hundred talents of coine, and of Bullion five hundred talents, with a world of riches besides.

Tigris, Araxes, and the rest, with all such other fearefull things : for he that was now filled with nothing but feare, had arguments enough of that nature to present vnto another. All the Kingdomes betweene the River of Alys, and the Hellespont, hee offered him in Dower with his beloued daughter. But Alexander answered, That he offred him nothing but his own, and that which victorie and his own vertue had possess that he was to give conditions, and not to receive any, and that he having passed the Sea it selfe, disdained to thinke of relistance in transporting himselfe ouer Rivers. It is said, that Parmenio, who was now old and full of honour and riches, told the King, that were he Alexander, he would accept of Darius his offers; to which Alexander answered, That so would he, it he were Parmenio.

But he goes on towards Agypt, and comming before Gaza, Betis a faithfull feruant to Darius, shuts the Gate against him, and defends the Towne with an obstinate resolution, at the siege whereof Alexander received awound in the shoulder, which was dangerous, and a blow on his legge with a stone; Hee found better men in this place than he did at the former battailes, for he left fo many of his Macedonians buried in the fands of Gaza, that hee was forst to send for a new supply into Greece. From Gaza (faith Iolephus) he led his Army towards Ierusalem,a Citic, for the antiquitic and great fame thereof, well known vnto him while he lay before Tyre; He had fent for some supply thither, which laddus the high Priest, being subject and fworne to Darius, had refused him. The Jewes therefore fearing his revenge, and vnable to relift, committed the care of their estates and fasetie to Iaddus, who, being 30 taught by God, issued out of the Citie concred with his Pontificall Robes, to wit, an upper garment of purple, embrodered with gold, with his Miter, and the plate of gold wherein the name of God was written, the Priests and Leuits in their rich ornaments, and the people in white garments, in a maner so vnusual, stately and graue, as Alexander greatly admired it. Iofephus reports it, that he fell to the ground before the high Prieft, as reuerencing the name of God, and that Parmenio reprehended him for it; How soener it was, I am of opinion, That he became so confident in his enterprise, and so affured of the successe after the prophetic of Daniel had been read vnto him, wherein he saw himselfe, and the conquest of Persia so directly pointed at, as nothing thence-forth could discourage him or searchim. He consessed to Par- 40 menio (faith Iosephus) That in Dio a Citie of Macedon, when his minde laboured the conquest of Asia, he saw in his sleepe such a person as ladden, and so apparelled, professing one and the same God, by whom he was incouraged to pursue the purpose he had in hand with affurance of victorie. This apparition, formerly apprehended only by the light of his fantalie, he now beheld with his bodily eies; wherewith he was so exceedingly pleased and imboldened, as contrarie to the practice of the Phanicians, (who hoped to have fackt and destroyed Ierusalem) he gave the Iewes all, and more than they defired, both of libertie and immunitie, with permiffion to liue vuder their owne lawes, and to exercise and enioy their owne Religion.

d. VII. ALEXANDER winnes Agypt: and makes a journie to the Temple of HAMMON.

Rom Ierusalem Alexander turned againe towards Egypt, and emred it. where Darius his Lieutenant, Afraces, received him and delivered into his hand the Citic of Memphis, with eight hundred talents of treasure, and all other the Kings riches. By this wee see that the Kings of Persia, who had more of affection than of judgement, gaue Kings of Persia, who had more of affection than of indgement, gaue to the valiantest man hee had but the command of one Citie, and to the verieft co-10 ward the gouernement of all Agypt. When he had fet things in order in Agypt, he beganne to trauaile after God-head, towards Inpiter Hammon, so foolish had prosperitic made him. He was to passe ouer the dangerous and drie sands, where, when the water which he brought on his Camels backe was spent, he could not but have perithed, had not a maruailous showre of raine fallen upon him, when his Armie was in extreme despaire. All men that know Agypt, and have written thereof, affirme, That it neuer raines there; but the purposes of the Almightie God are secret, and he bringeth to passe what it pleaseth him; for it is also said, That when hee had loft his way in those vast defarts, that a flight of Crowes flew before the Armie; who making fatter wing when they were followed, and fluttering flowly when the 20 Army was cast backe, guided them ouer those pathlesse sands to Impiters T emple. Arrianus from the report of Ptolomie, the sonne of Lagus, saies, That he was led Arriandia. by two Dragons, both which reports may be a-like true; But many of these wonders and things prodigious, are fained by those that have written the Storie of Alexander, as that an Eagle lay houering directly ouer his head at the battaile of Illius; That a Swallow flew about his head when he flept, and could not be feared from him till it had wakened him at Halicarnaffens, fore-shewing the treason of From. practifed by Darins to have flaine him; That from the yron barres of which the Tyreans made their defensive engines, when Alexander besieged them, there fel drops of bloud; and that the like drops were found in a loafe of bread, broken by a Mace-30 donian Souldier, at the same time. That a Turfe of earth fell on his shoulder, when he lay before Gaza, out of which there flew a Bird into the aire. The Spaniards in the conquest of the West-Indies have many such pretie tales, telling how they have been affifted in battaile, by the presence of our Ladie, and by Angels riding on white horses, with the like Romish miracles, which I thinke themselves do hardly beleeve. The strangest things that I have read of in this kind being certainly true, was, That the night before the battaile at Novarra, all the Dogges which followed the French Armic, ranne from them to the Switzers, leaping and fawning vpon them, as if they had beene bred and fed by them all their lines, and in the morning following, Tri-

40 vtterly broken and put to ruine. The place of this Idol of Inpiter Hammon is ill described by Curtius, for he bounds it by the Arabian Troglodites on the South, betweene whom and the Territorie of Hammon, the Region Thebais, or the superiour Agypt, with the Mountaine of Lybia, and the River of Nilus are interiacent, and on the North he joynesit to a Nation, called Nassamones, who bordering the Sea-shore, line (faith hee) vpon the spoiles of shipwracke, whereas the Temple or groue of this Idoll hath no Sea neere it by two hundred miles and more, being found on the South part of Lybia; these Nasfa- Piol. nulzs and Tremouille, Generals for Lewis the twelfth, were by thele Imperial Switzers mones being due West from it, in the South part of Marmarica.

When Alexander came necre the place, hee sent some of his Parasites before him 50 to practife the Priests attending the Oracle, That their answer might bee given in all things, agreeable to his madde ambition, who affected the title of Inpiters sonne. And so he was saluted, Sonne of Iupiter, by the Deuils prophet, whether prepared before to flatter him, or rather (as some thinke) desective in the Greeke tongue. For whereas he meant to fay Opaidion, he faid Opaidios, that is, O some of Inpiter, in stead of, O deare some: for which Grammaticall error he was richly rewarded, & a rumor presently spred, that the great supiter had acknowledged Alexander for his owne.

He had heard that Perfeus and Hercules had formerly consulted with this Oracle. The one, when he was imploied against Gorgon, The other, against Ameus & Businis; and seeing these men had deriued themselues from the gods, why might not hee? By this it seemes, that he hoped to make his followers and the world fooles, though indeede he made himselfe one, by thinking to couer from the Worlds knowledge his vanities and vices; and the better to confirme his followers in the beliefe of his Deitie, hee had practized the Priests to give answere to such as consulted with the Oracle, that it should be pleasing to Inpiter to honour Alexander as his Sonne.

Who this Ammon was, and how represented, either by a boffe carried in a Boate, or by a Ramme, or a Rammes-head; I fee that many wife-men haue troubled themsclues to finde out; but, as Arrianus speakes of Dionysus, or Liber Pater (who lived faith St. Augustine in Moses time) Ea que de dijs veteres fabulis suis conscripsere, non funt nimium curiose perueftiganda ; we must not oner-curiously search into the fables, which the Ancients have written of their gods.

But this is certaine and notable, that after the Gospel beganne to be preached in the world, the Deuill in this and in all other Idols became speechlesse. For that this Hammon was neglected in the time of Triberius Cafar, and in the time of Traian altogether forgotten, Strabo and Plutarch witnesse.

There is found neere his Temple a Fountaine called Fons folis (though Ptolomie in his third African Table lets it farther off; that at mid-night is as hot as boyling water, and at Noone as cold as any ver, so which I cannot but give credit, because I have heard of some other Wells of ake nature, and because it is reported by Saint Augustine, by Didore, Herodotns, Plinie, Ste , Solanis, Arrianus, Cartius, and others, and indeed our Bathes in England are much warmer in the night, than in the day.

How ALEXANDER marching against DARIVS, was opposed very waskilfully by the Enemie.

Rom the Temple of Hammen hereturned to Memphis, where among many other learned men, he heard the Philosopher Pfammones, who, belike vnderstanding that heastfeeted the title of Inpiters Sonne, told him that God was the Father-Kine of all men in the part of the control of the c many other learned men, he caffected the title of Iupiters Sound, the belike viderstanding that heaffected the title of Iupiters Sound, but that God was the Father-King of all men in generall; and refining the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to say, That God ning the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to say, That God ning the pride of this haughtie King, brought him to say, That God none for his children saue good men. He gaue the charge of the seuerall Provinces of Agypt to severall Governours, 40 following the rule of his Master Artfotte, That a great Dominion should not bee continued in the hands of any one: whom therein the Roman Emperours also followed, not daring to commit the government of Agipt to any of their Senators, but to men of meaner ranck and degree. He then gave order for the founding of Alexandria vpon the Wester-most branch of Nilus. And having now settled (as hee could) the estate of Egypt, with the Kingdomes of the leffer Air, Phanicia, and Syria, (which being but the pawnes of Darum his ill fortune, one happie victorie would readily have redeemed,) he led his Army towards Euphrates, which paffage though the same was committed to Mazeus to defend, yet was it abandoned, and Alexander without refiftance past it. From thence he marched towards Tigris, a River for the swiftnesse thereof called by the Persians, The Arrow. Here, as Curtius, and Reason it selfe tels 50 vs, might Darius easily have repelled the invading Macedonian for the violent course of the streame was such, as it draue before it many waightie stones, and those that moued not burlay in the bottome, were foround and well polished by continual rolling, that no man was able to fight on fo flipperic a tooting; nor the Macedonian foot-men to wade the River, otherwise than by ioyning their hands and enterlacing their Armes together, making one waightic and entire body to relift the swift passage and surious race of the streame. Besides this notable helpe, the Channell was so deepe towards the Easterne shore, where Darius should have made head, as the footmen were inforst to lift their Bowes, and Arrowes, and Darts ouer their heads to keepe them from being moistned, and made unseruiceable by the Waters. But it was truely and understandingly said of Homer.

> Talis est hominum terrestrium mens, Qualem quotidie ducit pater virorumą, Deorumą,

The mindes of men are euer fo affected, As by Gods will they daily are directed.

And it cannot be denied, that as all Estates of the World, by the surfeit of miseouernement haue beene subiect to many grieuous, and sometimes mortall discases: So had the Empire of Persia at this time brought it selfe into a burning and consuming Feauer, and therby become frantick and without vnderstanding, foreshewing 20 manifestly the dissolution and death thereof.

But Alexander hath now recovered the Easterne shores of Tygris, without any other difficultie, that that of the nature of the place, where Mazeus (who had charge to defend the passage both of Euphrates and it) presented himselfe to the Macedonians, followed with certaine companies of Horse-men, as if with vneuen forces hee durst haue charged them on euen ground, when as with a multitude farre exceeding them, he forfooke the advantage which no valour of his enemies could eafily haue ouercome. But it is commonly seene, that searefull and cowardly men doe euer follow those waies and counsels, whercof the opportunitie is already loft.

It is true that he fet all prouisions a fire wherewith the Macedonians might serue 30 themselues over Tygris, thinking thereby greatly to have distressed them; but the execution of good counsell is fruitlesse when vnscasonable. For now was Alexander fo well furnished with carriages, as nothing was wanting to the competencie of the Armie which he conducted. Those things also which he fought to waste, Alexander being now in fight, were by his Horse-men saued and recoursed. This, Mazeus might have done some daies before at good leisure; or at this time with so great a strength of horse-men, as the Macedonians durst not have pursued them, seauing the strength of their foote out of fight, and farre behinde.

The new provisions of DARIVS. Accidents foregoing the battaile

ARIV s, vpon Alexanders first returne out of Ægypt, had affembled all the forces, which those Regions next him could furnish, and now also were the Arians, Scothians, Indians, and other Nations arrived; Nations (faith Curtius) that rather ferued to make up the names of men, than to make refistance. Arrianus hath numbred them with their Leaders; and finds of foot-men of all forts ten hundred thousand, and of horse 50 foure hundred thousand, besides armed Chariots, and some sew Elephants. Curtius who musters the Armie of Darius at two hundred thousand soote, and neere fiftie thousand horse, comes (I thinke) neerer to the true number; and yet seeing he had more confidence in the multitude than in the valour of his Vassals, it is like enough that hee had gathered together of all forts some three or soure hundred thousand, Qqqq 3 with which hee hoped in those faire plaines of Affria to have over-borne the few numbers of the inuading Armie. But it is a Rule in the Philosophie of the Warre. In omni pralio non tam multitudo, & virtus indocta, quam ars & exercitium (olent prassare victoriam; In cuerie battaile skill and practice doe more towards the victory than multitude and rude audacitie.

While Alexander gaue rest to his Armic after their passage ouer Tygris, there happened an Eclipse of the Moone, of which the Macedonians, not knowing the cause and reason, were greatly affrighted. All that were ignorant (as the multitude alwaies are) tooke it for a certaine presage of their ouerthrow and destruction, in so much as they began not only to murmur, but to speake it boldly, That for the am- 10 bition of one man, a man that disdained Philip for his Father, and would needs bee called the Sonne of Inpiter, they should all perish; For he not only inforst them to make warre against Worlds of enemies, but against Rivers, Mountaines, and the Heavens themselves.

Hereupon Alexander being readic to march forward made a halt, and to quiet the mindes of the multitude, he called before him the Agyptian Astrologers, which followed him thence, that by them the Souldiers might be affured that this defection of the Moone was a certaine presage of good successe; for that it was natural they neuer imparted to the common people, but referued the knowledge to themselves, so as a sorrie Almanack-maker had beene no small soole in those daies.

Of this kind of superstitious observation Cafar made good vse, when hee fought against Ariousstus and the Germans: for they being perswaded by the catting of lots, that if they fought before the change of the Moone, they should certainely lose the battaile, Cafar forft them to abide it, though they durit not sine it, wherein having their mindes already beaten by their owne superstition, and being resolutely charged by the Romans, the whole armie in effect perished.

These Agyptians gave no other reason than this, That the Grecians were vinder the aspect of the Sunne, the Persians, of the Moone; and therefore the Moone failing and being darkened, the state of Persia was now in danger of falling, and their glorie of being obscured. This judgement of the Agyptian Priests being noised through 20 all the Armie, all were satisfied, and their courage redoubled. It is a principle in the Warre, which, though denised fince, was well observed then. Exercitum terrore. plenum Durad pugnam non ducat; Let not a Captaine leade his Armie to the fight, when it is volleffed with matter of terrour.

It is thely observed by Curtius, that the people are led by nothing so much as by supersition; yea, we finde it in all Stories, and often in our owne, that by such inuentions, deuised tales, dreames, and prophesies, the people of this Land have been carried bead-long into many dangerous tumults and infurrections, and still to their owne losse and ruine.

As Alexander drew neere the Persian Armie, certaine letters were surprized writ- 40 ten by Darius to the Gracians, perswading them for great summes of money, either to kill or betray Alexander. But these by the advice of Parmenio he suppressed.

At this time also Darius his faire Wife, opprest with sorrow, and wearied with trauell, died. Which accident Alexander seemed no lesse to bewaile than Darius, who vpon the first bruit suspected that some dishonourable violence had beene offered her, but being fatisfied by an Eunuch of his owne that attended her, of Alexanders Kingly respect towards her, from the day of her being taken, he desired the immortal Gods, That if they had decreed to make a new Master of the Persian Empire, then it would please them to conferre on so instand continent an enemie as salexander, to whom he once againe before the last triall by battaile offered these con- so ditions of peace.

That with his Daughter in marriage he would deliuer vp and refigne all Asia the leffe, and with Egypt, all those Kingdomes between the Phanician Sea, and the River of Euphrates; That he would pay him for the ransome of his Mother, and his other Daughter thirtie thousand talents, and that for the performance thereof, hee would leave his Sonne Occhus in hostage: To this they sought to perswade Alexander by fuch arguments as they had. Alexander cauting the Embaffadours to be remoued, aduised with his Counsell, but heard no man speake but Parmenio, the very right hand of his good fortune; who perfuaded him to accept of these faire conditions. Hee told him, that the Empire betweene Euphrates and Hellespont was a faire addition to Macedon; that the retaining of the Persian prisoners was a great cumber, and the treasure offered for them of farre better vie than their persons, with divers other arguments; all which Alexander rejected. And yet it is probable to that if he had tollowed his advice, and bounded his ambition within those limits, he might haue lived as famous for vertue as for fortune, and lett himself a Successor of able age to have enjoyed his estate, which afterward, indeed, hee much inlarged, rather to the greatning of others than himselfe: who to affure themselves of what they had vsurped vpon his issues, left not one of them to draw breath in the world within a few yeeres after. The truth is, That Alexander in going fo far into the East, left behinde him the reputation which he brought out of Macedon; the reputation of a just and prudent Prince, a Prince remperate, aduised and gratefull: and beeing taught new lessons by aboundance of prosperitie, became a louer of wine, of his owne flatterie, and of extreme crueltie. Yea, as Seneca hath observed, the taint of 20 one virjust slaughter, amongst many, defaced and withered the flourishing beautie of all his great acts and glorious victories obtained. But the Persian Embassadours stay his answere, which was to this effect, That what soener hee had bestowed on the Wife and children of Darius, proceeded from his owne naturall elemencie and magnanimitie, without all respect to their Master, that thanks to an enemie was improper; that he made no warres against adversitie, but against those that resisted him; not against Women and Children, but against armed enemies; and although by the reiterated practice of Darius, to corrupt his Souldiers, and by great summes of money to perswade his friends to attempt upon his person, hee had reason to doubt that the peace offered was rather pretended than meant, yet hee could not 30 (were it otherwise and faithfull) resolue in haste to accept the same, seeing Darius had made the Warre against him, not as a King with Royall and ouert-force, but as a Traitor by secret and base practice; That for the Territoric offered him, it was alreadie his owne, and if Darius could beate him back againe over Euphrates, which he had alreadie past, he would then beleeve that hee offered him somewhat in his owne power: Otherwise he propounded to himselfe for the reward of the Warre, which hee had made, all those Kingdomes as yet in Darius possession, wherein, whether he were abused by his owne hopes or no, the battaile which hee meant to fight in the day following should determine. For conclusion, he told them, that he came into Asia to giue, and not to receive; That the Heavens could not hold two 49 Sunnes: and therefore if Darius could be content to acknowledge Alexander for his Superiour, he might perchance bee perswaded to give him conditions fit for a second Person, and his Inferiour.

> The battaile of Arbela: and that it could not be so strongly fought as report hath made it.

Ith this answer the Embassadors returne; Darius prepares to fight, and fends Mazeus to defend a passage, which he neuer yet dared so much as to hazard. Alexander confults with his Captaines, Parmenio perfwades him to force Darius his Camp by night; so that the multitude of enemies might not moue terrour in the Macedonians, being but, few. Alexander distaines to steale the victorie, and resolues to bring with him the day-light, to witnesse his valour. But it was the successe that made good Alexanders resolution, though the counsell given by Parmenio was more sound: For it is a ground in Warre, Si pauci necessario cum multitudine pugnare cogantur, conflium est noetis tempore belli fortunam tentare. Notwithstanding vpon the view of the multitude at hand, hee staggers and intrenches himselfe vpon a ground of aduantage, which the Persian had abandoned: And wheras Darius for feare of surprise had stood with his Armie in armour all the day, and forborne sleepe all the night; Alexander gaue his men rest and store of foode, for reason had taught him this Rule in the Warre. Inpugna Milites validius resistunt, si cibo potug, refecti fuerint, nam fames intrinsecus magis pugnat, quam ferrum exterius; Souldiers doe the better fland to it in fight; if they have 10 their bellies full of meate and drinke; for hunger within, fights more eagerly than steele

The fourth Booke of the first part CHAP.2. S.10.

The numbers which Alexander had, faith Arrianus, were fortie thousand foot. and seven thousand horse; these belike were of the European Armie; for hee had belides both Syrians, Indians, Agyptians, and Arabians, that followed him out of those Regions. He vsed but a short speech to his Souldiers to incourage them; and I thinke that he needed little R hetorick; for by the two former battailes vpon the River of Granick and in Cilicia, the Macedonians were best taught with what men they were to encounter. And it is a true faying, Victoria Victoriam parat, animuma, victoribus auget, & aduer arijs aufert; One victorie begets another, and puts courage in- 20 to shole that have alreadie had the better, taking (pirit away from such as have beene beaten.

Arrianss and Curtius make large descriptions of this battaile, fought at Gaugamela; They tell vs of many charges and re-charges; That the victory inclined sometime to the Persians, sometime to the Macedonians; That Parmenio was in danger of being ouerthrowne, who led the left wing; That Alexanders Reare-guard was broken and his carriages loft; That for the fierce and valorous encounters on both fides. Fortune her felfe was long virefolged on whom to bestow the Garland: And lastly, That Alexander in person wrought wonders, being charged in his retrait. But, in conclusion, Curtius deliuers vs in accompt but three hundred dead Macedonians, in 30 all this terrible daies-worke, faying, That Epheftion, Perdiccas and others of name were wounded. Arriannus findes not a third part of this number flaine; of the Perfians there fell fortic thousand (faith Cartius,) thirtie thousand according to Arria-Ninetic thousand, if we beleeue Diodor. But what can wee judge of this great encounter, other than that, as in the two former battailes, the Persians upon the first charge ranne away, and that the Macedonians purfued? For if of these foure or five hundred thousand Asians brought into the field by Darius, every man had but cast a Dart, or a Stone, the Macedonians could not have bought the Empire of the East at so casie a rate, as sixe or seven hundred men in three notorious battailes. Certainly, if Darius had fought with Alexander upon the bankes of Euphrates, and had ar- 40 med but fiftie or threescore thousand of this great multitude, onely with Spades (for the most of all he had were fit for no other weapon) it had been impossible for Alexander to have past that River so easily, much lesset the River of Treris. But as a man whose Empire God in his prouidence had determined, He abandoned all places of advantage, and suffered Alexander to enter so farre into the bowels of his Kingdome, as al hope and possibilitie of escape by retrait being taken from the Macedonians, they had presented vnto them the choise, either of death or victorie; to which election Darius could no way constraine his owne, seeing they had many large Regions to runne into from those that inuaded them.

Of things following the battaile of Arbela. The yeelding of Babylon and Sufa.

ARIVS after the rout of his Armie recoursed Arbela the same night, better followed in his flight, than in the fight. He propounded vnto them that ranne after him his purpose of making a retrait into Media, perswading them that the Macedonians, greedie of spoile and riches, would rather attempt Bibylon, Susa, and other Cities, filled with treasure, than pursue the vanquished. This miserable resolution his Nobilitie rather obeied than approued.

Alexander soone after Darius his departure arrives at Arbela, which with a great masse of treasure, and Princely ornaments, was rendred vnto him: for the feare which conducted Darius, tooke nothing with it but shame and dishonour. Hee that had beene twice beaten, should rather have sent his treasure into Media, than broughtit to Arbela, so necre the place where he abid the comming of his enemies. if he had beene victorious, he might have brought it after him at leisure, but beeing ouer-come, hee knew it vnpoffible to drive Mules and Camels laden with gold ao from the pursuing Enemie, seeing himselfe, at the overthrow hee had in Cilicia, cast the Crowne from his head, to runne away with the more speed. But errors are then best discerned when most incurable. Et preterita magis reprehendi possunt quam corrigi; It is easier to reprehend than amend what is past. From Arbela Alexander took his way towards Babylon, where Mazeus in whom Darius had most considence rendred himselfe, his children and the Citie. Also the Captaine of the Castle, who was keeper of the treasure, strewed the streets with flowres, burnt frankinsence vpon Altars of filuer as Alexander passed by, and delivered vnto him what source was committed to his trust. The Magi (the Chaldean Astrologers) followed this Captaine in great solemnitie to entertaine their new 30 King: after these came the Babylonian horsemen, infinite rich in attire, but exceeding poore in warlike furniture. Betweene these (though not greatly to be seared) and himselfe, Alexander caused his Maccionian foote-men to march. When he entred the Castle, he admired the glorie thereof, and the aboundance of treasure therein found amounting to fiftie thousand talents of silver vncoyned. The Citie it selfe I haue elsewhere described with the Walles, the Towers, the Gates and the Circuite, with the wonderful place of pleasure about two miles in Circuite, surrounded with a Wall of fourescore soote high, and on the top thereof (being vnder-borne with Pillars) a Grouc of beautifull and fruitfull trees, which it is faid that one of the Kings of Babylon caused to be built, that the Queene and other Princesses might 40 walke privately therein. In this Citic, rich in all things, but most of all in Voluptu-

ous pleasures, the King rested himselfe and the whole Armie source and thirty daies, An. b. Alex. consuming that time in banquetting and in all forts of effeminate exercise, which so much softned the mindes of the Macedonians, not acquainted till now with the like delicacies, as the scucre discipline of warre which taught them the sufferances of hunger and thirst, of paincfull travaile, and hard lodging, began rather to be forgotten, than neglected.

Heere it was that those bands of a thousand Soldiers were erected, and Commanders appointed ouer them, who thereupon were filled Chiliarchi. This new order Alexander brought in, was to honor those Captaines which were found by certaine so selected Judges to have descrued best in the late warre. For before this time the Macedonian companies confifted but of five hundred. Certainely the drawing downe of the foote-bands in this latter age hath been the cause (saith the Marshal Monlust) that the title and charge of a Captaine hath beene bestowed on every Picque Beuf or Spurn-Cow, for when the Captaines of toote had a thousand Souldiers under one Enfigne, and after that five hundred, as in the time of Francis the first, the title was honorable, and the Kings were leffecharged, and farre better lerued. K. Henry the eighth of England neuer gaue the commandement of any of his good ships, but to men of knowne valour, and of great estate, nay sometime he made two Gentlemen of qualitic commanders in one ship: but all orders and degrees are fallen from the reputation they had.

While Alexander was yet in Babylon, there came to him a great supply out of Europe, for Antipater fent him fixe thousand foote and fine hundred horse, out of Macedon, of Thracians three thousand toot, and the like number of horse, and out of Greece foure thouland foote and foure hundred horse, by which his Armie was greatly 10 firengthred: for those that were infected with the pleasures of Babylon, could hardly be brought againe, De quitter la plume pur dormir sur la dure ; To change from loft heds to hard boords.

Hee left the Callle and Citie of Babylon with the Territories about it in charge with three of his owne Captaines, to wit, Agathon, Minetus, and Appoliderus; to supply all wants a thousand talents: but to grace Mazeus, who rendred the citie vnto him, he gave him the title of his Lieutenant over all, and tooke with him Baciltines that gaue vp the Caille, and having distributed to every Souldier a part of the Treafure, he left Babylon and entred into the Province Satrapene: from thence hee went on towards Susa in Persia, the same with Piolomie, Herodotus, and Elianus call Mem- 20 nonia, situate on the river Euleus, a Citie sometime governed by Damel the Prophet. Abulites also, governour of this famous Citie gave it vp to the Conqueror, with fifty thousand talents of siluer in bullion, and twelve Elephants for the warre, with all other the treasures of Darius. In this fort did those Vassals of fortune, louers of the Kings prosperitie, not of his person (for so all ambitious men are) purchase their owne peace and safetie with the Kings treasures. And herein was Alexander well on, and of nine aduled, that what locuer titles be gaue to the Persians, yet hee left all places of imgold, (ub dorri. portance in trust with his owne Captaines, to wit, Babylon, Sufa, and Persepolis, with caforma excust. other Cities and Provinces by him conquered; for if Darius (as yet living) had beaten the Macedonians but in one battell, all the Nobilitie of Persia would have re-30 turned to their naturall Lord. Those that are Traitors to their owne Kings, are neuer to bee vsed alone in great enterprises by those Princes that entertaine them. nor euer to bee trusted with the defences of any frontier-Towne, or Fortresse of waight, by the rendring whereof they may redeeme their libertie and estates lost. Hercof the French had experience, when Don Pedro de Nauarra, being banished out of Spaine, was trusted with Fonterabe, in the yeere 1522.

While Alexander spoiled Arbela, Mazeus might have furnisht the King from Babylon, and while he stated foure and thirtie dates at Babylon, Abulites might have holpen him from Susa: and while he feasted there, Tiridates from Persepolis might have relieued him, for the great masse of treasure was laied up in that Citie. But who 40 hath fought out and friended fearefull adversitie? It is certaine, that benefits binde nor the ambitious, but the honest: for those that are but greedy of themselves, doc in all changes of fortune onely consult the conservation of their owne greatnesse.

The government of Susa, with the Castle and Treasure, hee committed to his owne Macedonians, making Abulites who rendred it vnto him his Lieutenant, as he had done Mazeus and others, in giving them Titles, but neither trust nor power; for he left three thousand old Souldiers in Garrison to affure the place; and Darius Mother and her children to repose themselues.

It is faid, that Charles the fifth having promifed Charles of Bourbon the governement of Marfeilles, if he could have for stit, and whereof he made sure accompt, told 50 fome of his necreft Counsellers, that he meant nothing leffe than the performance of that promise, because hee should thereby haue left the Duke (revolved from his Master) very well wherewithall to have recovered his favour. d. How ALEXANDER came to Persepolis, and burnt it.

CHAP.2. S.12.

hee fought to passe the Mountaines which funder Susiana and Perfia, hee was soundly beaten by Ariobarzines, who defended against him those Straights called Pole Partidio or Susiana and Per-Rom Sufa Alexander leadeth his Armic toward Persepolis, and when him those Straights, called Pyla Persidis, or Susaida; and after the losse of many Companies of his Macedonians, he was forft to faue himfelfe to by retrait, causing his foote to march close together, and to cover themselves with their Targets from the stones tumbled on them from the Mountaine top. Yet in the end he found out another path, which a Lycian, living in that Countrie, discouered vnto him, and came thereby fuddenly in view of Ariobarzanes, who being inforst to fight vpon euen ground, was by Alexander broken, whereupon he fled to Persepolis, but (after that they of Persepolis had refused to receive him) hee returned and gaue a second charge vpon the Macedonians, wherein he was slaine. In like manner did King Francis the first, in the yeere 1515. finde a way ouer the Alpes; the Switzers undertaking to defend all the pallages, who, if their footmanship had not faued them vpon the Kings descent on the other side, they had beene ill paied for 20 their hard lodging on those Hils.

Foure thousand Greekes, faith Curtius, ( Iustine numbers them but at eight hundred) having been taken prisoners by the Persians, presented themselves to Alexander now in fight of Persepolis. These had the barbarous Persians so maimed and defaced, by cutting off their Hands, Noses, Eares, and other Members, as they could no way have beene knowne to their Country-men, but by their voices; to each of these Alexander gaue three hundred Crownes, with new garments, and such Lands as they liked to line vpon. Tiridates, one of Darius his falle-hearted Grandes, hearing of Alexanders approch, made him know that Persepolis was ready to receive him, and praied him to double 30 his pace, because there was a determination in the people to spoile the Kings treafure. This Citie was abandoned by many of her Inhabitants upon Alexanders arriuall, and they that stated followed the worst counsell, for all was lest to the libertie of the Souldiers, to spoile and kill at their pleasure. There was no place in the world at that time, which, if it had been elaied in ballance with Perferolis, would have waighed it downe. Babylon, indeede, and Sufa, were very rich; but in Perfepolis lay the bulke and maine store of the Persians. For after the spoile that had beene made of money, curious plate, bullion, Images of gold and filuer, and other jewels; there remained to Alexander himselfe one hundred and twentie thousand talents. He left the same number of three thousand Macedonians in Persepolis, which he had done in 40 Sufa, and gaue the same formall honor to the Traitor Tiridates, that he had done to Abulites; but he that had the trust of the place was Nicarides, a creature of his owne. The bodie of his Armie he left here for thirtie daies, of which the Commanders were Parmenia and Craterus, and with a thousand horse and certaine troupes of chosen foote, hee would needs view in the Winter-time those parts of Persia, which the Snow had couered, a fruitlesse and foolish enterprise, but as Seneca saies: Non ille ire vult, sed non potest stare; Hehath not a will to goe, but he is unable to stand still. It is said and spoken in his praise: That when his Souldiers cried out against him, because they could not indure the extreme frost, and make way, but with extreme difficultie, through the snow, that Alexander for sooke his horse, and led them the way. But 50 what can bee more ridiculous than to bring other men into extremitie, thereby to shew how well himselfe can indure it? His walking on footedid no otherwise take off their wearinesse that followed him, than his sometime for bearing to drinke did quench their thirst, that could lesse indure it. For mine owne little judgement I shall rather commend that Captaine, that makes carefull provision for those that follow him, & that leckes wifely to preuent extreme necessitie, than those witleffe arrogant fooles, that make the vaunt of having indured equally with the common Souldier, as if that were a matter of great glorie and importance.

We finde in all the Warres that Cafar made, or the best of the Roman Commanders, that the prouision of victuals was their first care. For it was a true laying of Coligni, Admirall of France; That whoso will shape that beast (meaning Warre) must begin with his belly.

But Alexander is now returned to Persepolis, where those Historians, that were most amorous of his vertues, complaine, that the opinion of his valour, of his liberalitie, of his clemencie, towards the vanquished, and all other his Kingly conditions, 10 were drowned in drinke; That he smothered in carrowsing cups all the reputation of his actions past, and that by descending, as it were, from the reuerend Throne of the greatest King, into the companie and familiaritie of base Harlots, he beganne to be despised both of his owne and all other Nations. For being perswaded, when he was inflamed with wine, by the infamous Strumpet Thais, hee caused the most sumpruous and goodly Castle and Citic of Persepolis, to bee consumed with fire, notwithstanding all the arguments of Parmenio to the contrarie, who told him that it was a dishonour to destroy those things by the perswasions of others, which by his proper vertue and force he had obtained; and that it would be a most strong perfwasion to the Asians, to thinke hardly of him, and thereby alienetheir hearts: For 20 they might well beleeue that he which demolished the goodliest Ornaments they had, meant nothing leffe than (after fuch valiation) to hold their poffession. Fere vinolentiam crudelitas sequitur; Crueltie doth commonly follow drunkennesse: For so it fell out soone after, and often, in Alexander.

d. XIII. The Treason of Bessys against DARIVS. DARIVS

Bout this time he received a new supply of Souldiers out of Cilicia, and goes on to finde Darius in Media. Darius had there compounded his fourth and last Armie, which hee meant to have increased in Bactria, had he not heard of Alexanders comming on, with whom (trusting to fuch companies as hee had, which was numbred at thirtie or fortie thousand) hee determined once againe to trie his fortune. He therefore cals together his Captaines & Commanders, and propounds vnto them his resolution, who being desperate of good successe vsed silence for a while. Artabazus, one of his eldest men of Warre, who had fometime lived with Philip of Macedon, brake the yee, and protesting that hee could never be beaten by any adversitie of the Kings, from the 40 faith which he had euer ought him, with firme confidence, that all the rest were of the same disposition (whereof they likewise assured Darius by the like protestation) hee approved the Kings resolution. Two only, and those the greatest, to wit, Nabur zanes, and Beffus, whereof the latter was Governour of Bactria, had conspired against their Master, and therefore aduised the King to lay a new foundation for the Warre, and to pursue it by some such person for the present, against whom neither the gods nor Fortune had in all things declared themselves to bee an enemie: this preamble Naburzanes vied, & in conclusion aduised the election of his fellow Traitor Beffus, with promise, that the warres ended, the Empire should again be restored to Daries. The King swollen with disdaine prest towards Naburzanes to have slaine 50 him, but Beffus & the Bactrians whom he commanded, being more in number than the rest, with-held him. In the meane while Naburzanes with-drew himselfe, and Beffus followed him, making their quarter a-part from the rest of the Armie. Artabazus, the Kings faithfull scruant, perswaded him to be aduised, and scrue the time, feeing Alexander was at hand, and that hee would at least make shew of forgetting the offence made, which the King being of a gentle disposition, willingly yeelded. vnto. Beffus makes his submittion and attends the King, who remoones his Armie. Patron, who commanded a Regiment of foure thousand Greekes, which haddin all the former Battailes served Darius with great fidelitie, and alwayes made the retrait in loight of the Macedonians, offered himselfe to guard his person, protesting against the Treason of Besses, but it was not in his destinie to follow their aduice who from the beginning of the Warre gaue him faithfull counsell but hee inclined skill to Befa (w, who told him, that the Greekes with Patron their Captaine were corrupted by 10 Alexander, and practifed the division of his faith ull servants. Bellius had drawne vhto him thirtie thousand of the Armie, promising them all those things by which the louers of the World and themselues are wont to bee allured to wit, riches, safetie,

Now the day following Darius plainely discouered the purposes of Bessus, and being ouercome with passion, as thinking himselfe vnable to make head against these vngratefulland vnnaturall Traytors, he prayed Artabazus his faithfull sernant; to depart from him, and to prouide for himselfe. In like fort he discharged the rest of his attendants, all faue a few of his Eunuchs; for his Guards had voluntarily abandoned him: His Persians being most base Cowardes, durst not underrake his defence 20 against the Bactrians, notwithstanding that they had foure thousand Greekes to joyne with him, who had beene able to have beaten both Nations. But it is true, that him, which for fakes himselfe, no man followes. It had beene farre more Man-like and King-like to have dyed in the head of those foure thousand Greekes, which offered him the disposition of their lives, (to which Attabazus perswaded him) than to have lien bewailing himselfe on the ground, and suffering himselfe to bee bound like a Slaue by those ambitious Monsters that layd hand on him, whom neyther the confideration of his former great estate, nor the honours he had given them, nor the trust reposed in them, nor the world of benefits bestowed on them, could moue to pittie: no, nor his present advertitie, which aboue all things should have mooved them, 30 could pierce their viperous and vngrateful hearts. Vaine it was indeed to hope it, for infidelitie hath no compaffion. Now Darius, thus for laken, was bound and layd in a Cart, couered with Hides of Beafts, to the end that by any other ornament he might not bee discoursed; and to adde despight and derision to his aduersitie, they fastned him with Chaines of Gold; and to drew him on among their ordinary Carriages and Carts. For Belias and Nabirzanes perswaded themselves to redeeme their lives and the Provinces they held, eyther by deliuering him a Prisoner to Alexander, or if that hope failed, to make themselves Kings by his flaughter, and then to defend themselves by force of Armes. But they failed in both. For it was against the nature of God, who is most 40 iuff, to pardon so strange villanie, yea though against a Prince purely Heathenilh and an Idolater. Alexander having knowledge that Darias was retyred towards Ballria, and durst not abide his comming, hasted after him with a violent speed, and because hee would not force his Foot-men beyond their powers, hee mounted on horse-backe certaine selected Companies of them, and best armed, and with fixe thousand other Horse, rather ranne than marched after Darius. Such as hated the Treason of Bessus and secretly for sooke him, gaue knowledge to Alexander of all that had happened, informing him of the way that Beffes tooke, and how neere hee was at hand : for many men of worth daily ranne from him. Hereupon Alexander againe doubled his 50 pace, and his Vant-gard being discouered by Bessus his Reare, Bessus brought a Horse to the Cart, where Darius lay bound, persuading him to mount thereon, and to saile himselte. But the vnfortunate King refusing to follow those that had betraved him, they cast Darts at him, wounded him to death, and wounded the Beasts that drew him, and flew two poore Seruants that attended his person. This done, they all fled that could, leaving the rest to the mercie of the Macedonian Swords.

Polystratus a Macedonian, being by pursute of the vanquished prest with thirst, as he was refreshing himselfe with some water that he had discoucred, espying a Cart with a Teame of wounded beafts breathing for life, and notable to moue, fearched the fame, and therein found Darius bathing in his owne bloud. And by a Persian captive which followed this Polystratus, he understood that it was Darius, and was informed of this barbarous Tragedie. Darius also seemed greatly comforted (if dying menignorant of the liuing God can bee comforted) that hee cast not out his last forrowes unheard, but that by this Macedonian, Alexander might know and take vengeance on those Traitors, which had dealt no lesse vnworthily than cruelly 10 with him, recommending their reuenge to Alexander by this Messenger, which hee besought him to pursue, not because Darins had desired it, but for his owne honor, and for the fafetic of all that did, or should after weare Crownes. Hee also, having nothing elfeto present, rendred thankes to Alexander for the Kingly grace vsed towards his Wife, Mother, and Children, desiring the immortall Gods to submit vnto him the Empire of the whole world. As hee was thus speaking, impatient death pressing out his sew remaining spirits, he desired water, which Polystratus presented him, after which he lived but to tell him, that of all the best things that the world had, which were lately in his power, he had nothing remaining but his last breath, where-with to desire the Gods to reward his compassion.

d. XIIII.

How ALEXANDER pursued Bessus, and tooke into his grace DARIVS his Captaines.

T was now hoped by the Macedonians, that their travells were neere an end severy man preparing for his returne. Heercof when Alexander had knowledge, hee was greatly grieved; for the bounded earth der had knowledge, hee was greatly grieued; for the bounded earth 30 fufficed not his boundlesse ambition. Many arguments hee therefore vsed to draw on his Armie farther into the East, butthat which had mouturength was, that Beffus, a most cruell Taitor to his Master Darius, hauing at his denotion the Hyresnians, and Bactrians, would in short time (if the Macedonians (hould returne) make himselfe Lord of the Persian Empire, and enioy the fruits of all their former trauailes. In conclusion, hee wanne their consents to goe on: which done, leaving Craterus with certaine Regiments of foot, and Amyntas with fixe thousand Horse in Parthenia, hee enters not without some opposition into Hyreania; for the Mardons, and other barbarous Nations, defended certaine passiges for a while. Hee passeth the River of Zioberis, which taking beginning in 40 Parthia, dissolues it selfe in the Caspian Sca: it runneth vnder the ledge of Mountaines, which bound Parthicand Hyrcania, where hiding it selfe under ground for three hundred furlongs, in then rifeth againe and followeth its former course. In Zadracarta or Zeudracerta, the same Citie which Ptolomie writes Hyrcania, the Metropolis of that Region, hee rested fisteene dayes, banquetting, and feasting therein.

Phataphernes, one of Darius his greatest Commanders, with other of his best followers, submit themselues to Alexander, and were restored to their places and gouernements. But of all other he graced Artabazus most highly for his approved & constant faith to his Master Darius. Artabazus brought with him ten thousand and fine hun- 50 dred Greekes, the remainder of all those that had served Darius; He treats with Alexander for their pardon, before they were yet arrived, but in the end they render themselucs simply without promise or composition he pardons all but the Laced amonians, whom he imprisoned, their Leader bauing flaine himselfe. Hee was also wrought, (though to his great dishonour) to receive Nabarzanes that had joyned with Bestus to murder Darius.

Of THALESTRIS Queene of the Amazons; where, by way of digression it is shewed, that (ach Amazons have beene, and are.

Ere it is faid, that Thalestris or Minothea, a Queene of the Amazones, came to vilite him, and her fute was, (which shee easily obtayned) That shee might accompanie him till shee were made with childe by him : which done (refuting to follow him into inaia) the returned into her owne Countrie.

Plutarch citeth many Historians, reporting this meeting of Thatestris with Alexander, and some contradicting it. But, indeede, the letters of alexander himselfe to Antipater, recounting all that befell him in those parts, and yet omitting to make mention of this Amazonian businesse, may justly breede suspicion of the whole matter as forged. Much more justiy may we suspect it as a vame tale, because an Historian of the same time reading one of his bookes to Lymachus (then King of 20 Thrace) who had followed Alexander in all his voyage; was laught at by the King for inferting such newes of the Amazons, as Lysimachus himselfe had neuer heard of. One that accompanied Alexander tooke vpon him to write his acts; which to amplific, He tolde how the King had fought fingle with an Elephant, and flaine it. The King hearing such stuffe, caught the booke, and threw it into the River of Indus; faying, that it were well done to throw the writer after it, who by inferting such fables, disparaged the truth of his great exploits. Yet as wee beleeve and know that there are Elephants, though it were false that Alexander fought with one; so may we give credit vnto writers, making mention of fuch Amazons, whether it were true or falle that they met with Alexander; as Plutarch leaves the matter undetermined. 30 Therefore I will heere take leaue to make digreffion, as well to show the opinions of the ancient Historians, Cosmographers, and others, as also of some moderne discoucrers touching these warlike Women, because not onely Strabo, but many others of these our times make doubt, whether, or no, there were any such kinde of people. Julius Solinus leares them in the North parts of Affa the leffe. Pom. Mela finds two sole.27.6 65. Claudian affirmes, That they commanded many Nations: For he speakes (largely perhaps as a Poet) thus:

Diodorus Siculus hath heard of them in Lybia, who were more ancient (faith hee) than those which kept the bankes of Thermodoon, a River falling into the Euxine Sea necre Heraclium.

Herodotus doth also make report of these Amazons, whom hee tells vs that the Scythians call Lorpatas, which is as much as Viricidas, or Men-killers. Plutareb in the life of Thefeus, out of Philocherus, Hellanicus, and other ancient Hiflorians, reports the taking of Antiopa Queene of the Amazons by Hercules, and by him given to Thefeus, though some affirme, That Thefeus himselfe got her by stealth when shee came to visit him aboord his ship. But in substance there is little difference; all consessing, That such Amazons there were. The same Author in the life of Pompey speakes of certaine companies of the amazons, that came to aide the Albanians against the Romans, by whom, after the battaile, many Targets and Buskins of theirs were taken vp: and hee faith farther, That these women entertaine the 20 Geleand Lelages once a yeere, Nations inhabiting betweene them and the Alba-

Butto omit the many Authors, making mention of Amazons that were in the old times; Fran. Lopez who hath written the nauigation of Orellana, which he made down the River of Amazons from Peru, in the yeere 1542. (vpon which River, for the diners turnings, he is faid to have failed fixe thouland miles) reports from the relation of the faid Orellana, to the Councell of the Indies, That hee both faw those women and fought with them, where they fought to impeach his passage towards the East-

It is also reported by Viricus Schmidel, that in the yeere 1542. where he failed up 30 the Rivers of Paragna and Parabol, that hecameto a King of that Countrie, called Scherues, inhabiting under the Tropick of Capricorne, who gave his Captaine Ernando Rieffere, a Crowne of filuer, which hee had gotten in fight from a Queene of the Amazons in those parts.

Ed. Lopes, in his description of the Kingdome of Congo, makes relation of such Amazons, telling vs, That (agreeable to the reports of elder times) they burne off their right brest, and live a-part from men, save at one time of the yeere, when they feast and accompanie them for one moneth. These (saith he) possesses a part of the Kingdome of Monomotapa in Africa, ninetcene degrees to the Southward of the line and that these women are the strongest guards of this Emperour, all the East Indian Por- 40 tugals know.

I have produced these authorities, in part, to justific mine owne relation of these Amazons, because that which was deligered mee for truth by an ancient Cacique of Guiana, how vpon the River of Papamena (fince the Spanish discoveries called Amszons) that these women still line and gouerne, was held for a vaine and vnprobable report.

How ALEXANDER fell into the Persians Luxurie : and how hee further pursued BESSVS.

Owas Alexander had begunne to change his condition after the taking of Persepolis: so at this time his prosperitie had so much ouer-wrought his vertue, as hee accompted elemencie to bee but basenesse, and the temperance which hee had vsed all his life-time, but a poore and dejected humour, rather becomming the instructers of his youth and dejected humour, rather becomming the instructers of his youth. than the condition and flate of fo mighty a King, as the world could not equal. For hee perswaded himselfe that he now represented the greatnesse of the gods : he was pleased that those that came before him, should fall to the ground, and adore him; he ware the Robes and garments of the Persians, and commanded that his Nobilitie should doe the like; hee entertained in his Court, and Campe, the same shamelesse rabble of Curtifans, and Sodomiticall Eunuches, that Darius had done, and imitated in all things the proud, voluptuous, and detested manners of the Perlians. whom hee had vanquished. So licentious is felicitie, as notwithstanding that hee wasfully perswaded, that the Gods whom he served (detesting the vices of the in-20 uaded) affitted him in all attempts against them, he himselfe, contrarie to the Religion he profest (which how Idolatrous soeuer it were , could not be but fearefull vnto him by neglecting it ) became by imitation, and not by ignorance or education, a more foule and searcfull Monster than Darius, from whose tyrannie hee vaunted to haue delivered so many Nations. Yea, those that were dearest and neerest vnto him. began to be alhamed of him, entertaining each other with this, and the like scornefull discourse; That Alexander of Macedon was become one of Dariu his licentious Courtiers; That by his example, the Macedonians were in the end of so many trauailes, more impouerished in their vertues, than inriched by their victories; and that it was hard to judge whether the Conquerors, or the Conquered were the bafer 30 slaues. Neither were these opinions so reserved, but that the noise of them came to his cares. He therefore with great gifts fought to pacific the better fort, and those of whose judgements he was most icalous; and making it knowne to the Armie, that Beffus had affumed the title of a King, and called himselfe Artaxerxes, and that hee had compounded a great Armie of the Bactrians, and other Nations, hee had arguments enow to perswade them to goe on , to the end that all aircadie gotten, might not with themselues (so farre ingaged) be cast away. And because they were pestered with the spoiles of so many Cities, as the whole Armie seemed but the guard of their carriages, (not much valike the warfare of the French) having commanded euery mans fardells to be brought into the market-place, he together with his owne, 40 caused all to bee consumed with fire. Certainely, this could not but have prooued most dangerous vnto him, seeing the common-Souldiers had more interest in these things which they had bought with their painefull travailes, and with their bloud, than in the Kings ambition; had not (as Seneca often observed) his happie temeritie ouer-come all things. As hee was in his way, newes came to him, that Satribarzanes, whom he had chablished in his former gouernement over the Arrians, was revolted; whereupon leaving the way of Bactria, he fought him out, but the Rebell, hearing of his comming, fled to Beffin, with two thousand Horse. Hee then went on towards Bessu, and by setting a great pile of wood on fire, with the advantage of a strong winde, wonne a passage ouer an high and vnaccessable Rocke, which was de-30 fended against him, with thirteene thousand soote. For the extremitie of the Flame and smoke, forced them from the place, otherwise invincible. I saw in the third civill

warre of France, certaine Caues in Languedoc, which had but one entrance, and that very narrow, cut out in the mid-way of high Rockes, which wee knew not how to enter by any ladder or engine, till at last, by certaine bundels of straw, let downe by an yron chaine, and a waighty stone in the middest, those that defended it, were fo smothered, as they rendred themselves with their plate, monie, and other goods therein hidden. There were also some three yeeres before my arrivall in Guiana, three hundred Spaniards well mounted, smothered to death, together with their Horses, by the Countrie people, who did set the long dry grasse on fire to the Eastward of them, (the winde in those parts being alwayes East) so as not withstanding their flying from the smoke, there was not any one that escaped. Sr. Iohn Borrowes also, with a hundred English, was in great danger of being lost at Margarita, in the well-Indies, by having the graffe fired behinde him, but the smoke being timefully discouered, hee recouered the Sea-shore with the losse of fixetcene of his men. 1 10 remember these things, but to give caution to those that shall in times to come inuadeany part of those Countries, that they alwayes, before they passe into the Land, burne downe the graffe and fedge to the East of them; they may otherwife, without any other enemie, than a handfull of straw fet on fire, die the death of hony-Bees, burnt out of the Hiue.

LEXANDER was, after he parted hence, no where refifted, till he came into Aria, to the East of Bastria, where the chiefe City of that Prointo Aria, to the East of Ballria, where the chiefe City of that Pro-prince, called Artacoana, was a while defended against him, by the re-unit of Sartibarzanes, but in the end her received the Inhabitants to mercie. At this place his Armie was re-enforced with a new supply of fine thousand and fine hundred foote, and necre fine hundred Horse, out of Greece, Theffalle, & other places. His iournie out of Persia into these parts, is very confusedly described. For having (as all his Historians tell vs ) a determination to find Bellius in Bactria, he leaves it at the very entrance, and takes the way of Hyreania; from thence 30 hee wanders Northward towards the obscure Mardi, vpon the Caspian-Sea, and thence ouer the Mountaines Coronus into Aria, and Drangiana.

At this time it was that the treason of Dimnus brake out, of which Philotas the forme of Parmenio was accused, as accessarie, if not principall. This Dimnus, having (I know not vpon what ground) conspired with some others against the life of Alexander, went about to draw Nicomachus, a yong man whom hee loued, into the fame treason. The Youth, although hee was first bound by oath to secrecie, when he heard fo foule a matter vttered, beganne to protest against it so vehemently, that his friend was like to have flaine him for fecuritie of his owne life. So, conftrained by feare, hee made show as if hee had beene wonne by perswasion, and by seeming at 40 length to like well of the businesse, hee was told more at large what they were, that had vndertaken it. There were nine or ten of them, all men of ranke; whose names Dimnus (to countenance the enterprise ) reckoned up to Nicomachus, Nicomachus had no fooner freed himselfe from the company of this Traitor Dimnus, than he acquainted his owne brother Ceballinus with the whole Historie: whereupon it was agreed betweene them, that Ceballinus ( who might with least suspition ) should goe to the Court, and vtter all. Ceballinus, meeting with Philotas, told him the whole bufineffe; defiring him to acquaint the King therewith: which hee promifed to doe, but did not. Two dayes passed, and Philotas neuer brake with the King about the matter, but ftill excused himselse to Ceballinus by the Kings want of leisure. This 50 his coldnesse bred suspition, and caused Ceballinus to addresse himselfe to another, one Metron, Keeper of the Kings Armorie, who forth-with brought him to Alexanders presence. Alexander, finding by examination what had passed betweene Ceballinus and Philotas, did fully perswade himselfe that this concealement of the treason, argued his hand to have beene in the businesse. Therefore when Dimnus was brought before him, he asked the Traitor no other question then this: Wherein have I so offended thee, that thou shouldest thinke PHILOTAS more worthie to be King than I? Dimnus perceiuing, when he was apprehended, how the matter went, had fo wounded himselfe, that he lived no longer, than to give his last groane in the Kings prefence. Then was Philotas called, and charged with the suspition, which his silence might justly breede. His answere was, That when the practice was reucaled vnto him by Nicomachus, he judging it to be but friuolous, did forbeare to acquaint Alexander therewithall, vntill he might have better information. This errour of his, ( if to it were onely an errour) although Alexander, for the notorious seruices of his Father Parmenio, of his brother Nicanor lately dead, and of Philotas himselfe, had freely pardoned and given him his hand for affurance; yet by the inftigation of Craterus, hee againe swallowed his Princely promise, and made his enemics his Judges: Curtius giues a note of Craterus in this bulinesse; How hee perswaded himselfe, that hee could never finde a better occasion to oppresse his private enemie, than by pretending pietie, and dutie towardes the King. Heercof a Poet of our owne hath given a note as much better, as it is more generall in his Philotas.

See how these great men cloathe their private hate, In these faire colours of the publike good, And to effect their ends, pretend the State, As if the State by their affection flood, And arm'd with power and Princes jealousies, Will put the least conceit of discontent Into the greatest ranke of treacheries. That no one action shall seeme innocent; Yea valour, honour, bountie, shall be made As accessaries vnto ends vnjust: And even the service of the State must lade The needfull'st undertaking with distrust, So that base vilenise; idle Luxurie, Seeme safer farre, than to doe worthily, &c.

Now although it were fo, that the King, following the aduice of Craterus, had refolued the next day to put Philotas to torment, yet in the very euening of the same night in which he was apprehended, he called him to a banquet, and discoursed as familiarly with him as at any other time. But when in the dead of the night Philotus was taken in his lodging, and that they which hated him beganne to binde him; he cryed out vpon the King in these wordes: O A LEXAN DER, the malice of mine 40 Enemies hath surmounted thy mercie, and their hatred is farre more constant than the word of a King. Many circumstances were vrged against him by Alexander himselfe; ( for the Kings of Macedon did in person examine the accusations of treason ) and this was nor the least (nor the least offence, indeede, against the Kings humour, who desired to be glorified as a God) That when Alexander wrote vnto him concerning the title given him by Jupiter Hammon; Hee answered, That hee could not but reioyce that he was admitted into that facred Fellowship of the gods, and yet hee could not but withall grieue for those that should liue vnder such a one as would exceede the nature of man. This was (faith Alexander) a firme perswasion vnto me, that his heart was changed, and that hee held my glory in despight. See what a strange Monster 50 Flatterie is, that can perswade Kings to kill those that doe not praise and allow those things in them, which are of all other most to becabhorred. Philotas was brought before the multitude, to heare the Kings Oration against him: he was brought forth in vilde garments, and bound like a Theefe; where hee heard himselfe, and his absent Father the greatest Captaine of the World, accused, his two other Brothers,

Hector and Nicanor having beene lost in the present Warre. Hee was so greatly oppress with griefe, as for a while he could vtter nothing but teares, and sorrow had so wasted his spirits, as hee sunke under those that led him. In the end the King asked him, in what language he would make his defence; he answered, In the same wherein it had pleased the King to accuse him, which hee did, to the end that the Persians, as well as the Macedonians, might understand him. But heered the King made his advantage, perswading the assembly, that hee dissained the language of his owne Countrie, and so with-drawing himselfe, left him to his mercilesse enemies.

This proceeding of the Kings, Philotas greatly lamented, feeing the King, who had so sharpely inucyed against him, would not vouchsafe to heare his excuse. For, 10 not his enemics onely were imboldened thereby against him, but all the rest, having discouered the Kings disposition and resolution, contended among themselues, which of them should exceede in hatred towardes him; Among many other arguments, which he vied in his owne defence, this was not the weakest; That when Nicomachus desired to know of Dimnus, what men of marke and power were his partners in the conspiracie (as seeming vnwilling to aduenture himselfe with meane and base Companions) Dimnus named vnto him Demetrius of the Kings Chamber, Nicanor, Amyntas, and some others, but spake not a word of Philotas, who by being Commander of the Horse, would greatly have valued the partie, and have incouraged Nicomachus. Indeede, as Philotas faid well for himselfe, it is likely that Dimnus, 20 thereby the better to have heartned Nicomachus, would have named him, though hee had neuer dealt with him in any such practice. And for more certaine proofe, that he knew nothing of their intents, that practifed against the King, there was not any one of the Conspirators, being many, inforc'd by torments, or otherwise, that could accuse him, and it is true, that adversity being seldome able to beare her owne burden, is for the most part found so malicious, as shee rather desires to draw others (not alwayes descruing it) into the same danger, than to spare any that it can accuse. Yet at the last, howsoener it were, to avoide the extremity of relistlesseand vnnaturalltorments, deuised by his profest enemies Craterus, Cenus, Ephestion, and others, Philotas accused his owne selfe; being perswaded that they would have slaine him 30 forthwith. But he failed euen in that miserable hope, and suffering all that could be layd on flesh and bloud, hee was fore'd to deliuer, not what he knew, but what soeuer best pleased their cares, that were farre more mercilesse than death it selfe.

Aug. de Ciuit. Dei, l.19.6.6. Of this kinde of judiciall proceeding S. Jugustine greatly complaineth as a matter to bee bewayled, saith he, with Fountaines of teares. Quid cum in sua causa quisify torquetur: & cum queritur virum sit nocens cruciatur: & innocensluit pro inserto selere certissimas panas: non quia illud commissife detegitur, sed quia non commisse nescitur? What shall we say to it, when one is put to torture in his owne case; and tormented whilest yet it is in question whether he be guiltie; and being innocent, suffers assured punishment for a fault, of which there is no certaintie, not because he is known to have committed the of-40 fence, but because other doe not know that he hath not committed it?

It had beene enough for Alexanders safety, if Philotas had beene put to death without torment, the rest would not much have grieved thereat, because hee was greatly suspected. But Hemolaus, who afterward conspired against him, made the Kings cruelty and delight in bloud, the greatest motive of his owneill intent. Therefore, Sescude Clem.1.1. necs, speaking of Alexander, saith thus: Crudelitas minime humanum malum off, indignates the state of the second control of the second contr mum tam miti animo; ferina ista rabies est sanguine gaudere & vulneribus, & abiesto bomine, in siluestre animal transfre; Crueltie is not a bumane vice; it is unworthy of so milde a spirit. It is euen a beastly rage to delight in bloud and wounds, and casting away the nature of man, to become a sanage Monster.

For the conclusion of this Tragedie, Curtius makes a doubt, whether the confession that Philotus made, were to give end to the torments which hee could not any longer indure, or that the same was true indeede; For (saith hee) in this case, they that speake truely, or they that deny fally, come to one and the same end. Now, while the Kings hands were yet wet in bloud, he commanded that Lyncestes, sonne-in-Law to Antipater, who had beene three yeeres in prison, should be slaine: The same dispatch had all those that Nicomachus had accused: others there were that were suspected, because they had followed Philotas, but when they had answered for themselves that they knew no way so direct to winne the Kings fauour, as by louing those whom the King fauoured; they were dismist. But Parmenio was yet liping; Parmenio, who had ferued with great fidelitie as well Philip of Macedon the Kings Father, as himselse; Parmeniothat first opened the way into Asia; That had deprest Attalus the Kings enemie; that had alwaies, and in all hazards, the leading of to the Kings Vant-guard, that was no leffe prudent in counfell, than fortunate in all attempts; A man beloued of the men of Warre, and, to fay the truth, hee that had made the purchase for the King of the Empire of the East, and of all the gloric and fame hee had: That he might not therefore reuenge the death of his Sonne, though not vpon the King, (for it was vnlikely that hee would have dishonoured his fidelitie in his eldest age, having now lived threescore and ten yeeres) yet vpon those that by the witchcraft of flatteric bad possest themselves of his affection; it was resolved that he should be dispatcht. Polydamas was imployed in this businesse, a man whom of all other Parmenio trusted most, and loued best, who (to bee short) finding him in Media, and having Cleander and other Murderers with him, flew him walking in his 20 Garden, while hee was reading the Kings letters. Hicexitus PARMENIONIS fuit, Lib.7. militia domig, clari viri; Multa sine Rege prospere, Rex sine illo nihil magna rei gesserat; This was the ende of PARMENIO (faith CVRTIVS) who had performed many notable things without the King, but the King, without him, did neuer effect any thing wor-

Hen these things had end, Alexander went on with his Armie, and brought under his obedience the Araspians or Euergitans, hee made Amenides (sometime Darius his Secretarie) their Gouernour; then he subdued the Arachosians, and lest Menon to command ouer them. Heere the Armie, sometimes led by Parmenio, findes him, consisting of twelve thousand Macedons and Greekes, with whom he past through some cold Regions with difficultie enough. At length hee came to the foote of the Mountaine Taurus towards the East, where he built a Citic which hee honoured with his owne 40 name, and peopled it with seven thousand of his olde Macedons, worne with age and with trauailes of the warre, The Arians, who since hee left them were reuolted, hee subdued againe by the industrie and valour of Caranus and Erigius; And now herefolues to finde out the new King Beffus in Bactria. Beffus, hearing of his comming, prepares to passe over the great River of Oxus which divides Bactria from Sogdiana; Artabazus is made Gouernour of Bactria abandoned by Bessus; The Macedonian Armie suffereth for want of Water, insomuch as when they came to the River of Oxus, there died more of them by drinking inordinately, then Alexander had lost in any one battaile against the Persians. And it may well be; For (as Clytus did after obiect vnto him) hee fought against women, not against men, and not aso gainst their persons but their shadowes. Hee found on the bankes of this great Riuer no manner of Timber or other materialls, to make either boates, bridges, or raffe, but was forst to sow together the Hides that couered his carriages, and stuffe them with straw, and on them in fixe daies to passe ouer his Armie; which Bessus might casily have distrest, if he had dared but to beholde the Macedonian Armie afarre off. Hee had formerly complained against Darius for neglecting to defend the bankes of Tigris, and other passages, and yet now, when this traiterous slane had Hyled himselte a King, hee durst not performe any thing worthy of a slaue. And therefore those that were neerest vnto him, and whom he most trusted, to wit, soitamines, Dataphernes, Catanes, and others the Commanders of his Armie, moued both by the care of their owne fafetic, and by the memoric of Beffus his Treason and crueltie against Darius, bound him in the like manner that hee had done his Master, but with this difference, that he had the chaine closed about his neck like a mastiffe Dog.

and so was dragged along to be presented to his enemie. In the meane while Alexander was arrived at a certaine Towne inhabited with 10 Greekes of Miletum, brought thither by Xerxes, when long before he returned out of Greece, whose issues had well-neere forgotten their Countrey-language. These most cruelly (after they had received him with greatioy) hee put to the fword, and destroyed their Citie. At this place he received Bessus, and having rewarded Spitamenes with the rest that delivered him, he gave the Traitor into the hands of Oxatres, Darius his brother, to be tormented. But while he now thought himselfe secure, some twenty thousand Mountainers affaulted his Camp; in repelling whom he received a shot in the leg, the arrow head sticking in the slesh, so as hee was carried in a Horse-Lytter, sometime by the horsemen, sometime by the soote.

Soone after hee came vnto Maracanda, which Petrus Perondinus takes to be Samarchand, the regall Citic of the great Tamerlaine. It had in compasse threescore and ten furlongs (Curtius faith.) Heere he received the Embassadors of the Soythians ( called Anians) who offered to ferue him.

The Ball rians are shortly againe with the Sogdians stirred to Rebellion, by the same Spitamenes and Catanes, who had lately delivered into his hands the Traitor Beffus. Many Cities were resolutedly detended against him, all which, after victorie, hee defaced and rased, killing all therein. At one of these hee received a blow on the necke which strucke him to the ground, and much disabled him for many daies after. In the meane while Spitamenes had recoursed Maracanda, against whom hee imployed 30 Mencdemus with three thou and foote and eight hundred horse.

In the heate of these tumults Alexander marched on (if we may beleeve Curtius and others) till he came to the River of Tanais; vpon whose banke he built another Alexandria three score furlongs in compasse, which hee beautified with houses within seuenteene daies after the walls built. The building of this Citie is faid to have beene occasion of a warre betweene him and the Scythians; the Scythian King perswading himselse, that this new Towne was fortified of purpose to keepe him vnder. I doe not well understand, why the Septhians, offering warre in such terrible manner that Alexander was judged by his owne Souldiers to counterfeit ficknesse for very scare, should neverthelesse make suite for peace: neither finde I the reason why Alexander 40 (not intending the conquest of those Northerne desarts, but onely the desence of his owne banke) should refuse to let them alone, with whom he could not meddle further then they should agree to suffer him. Yet hereof is made a great matter; and a victorie described; in pursuit of which the Macedons ranne beyond the bounds and monuments of Bacchus his expedition.

The truth is, That Curtius and Trogus have greatly mistaken this River which they call Tanais. For it was the River of laxartes, that runnes betweene Sogdiana and Scribia, which Alexander past ouer, while Menedemus was imployed in the recoverie of Samarchand: But Tanais which divides Asia from Europe, is necest wo thousand miles distant from any part of Bactria and Sogdiana, and the way defart & vnknowne. 50 So that Alexander had (besides Inxartes) the great River of Volga and many others to fwimme ouer, ere he could recouer Tanais: which (from the place where he was) he could hardly have discovered with the Armie that followed him, if he had imploied all the time that he lived in Asia in that travaile. Where-

Wherefore it is enough to beleeue, that the Affatique Sorthians, making some offer to disturbe the erection of this new Citic, which was like to give some hindrance to their excursions, were driven away by the Macedonians; and being naked of defensive Armes, casily chased some tenne or twelve miles; which is the substance of Curtius his report. As for the limits of Bacchus his journic; like enough it is that Bacchus (if in his life time he were as sober a man, as after his death he was held a drunken God) went not verie farre into that waste Countrie, where hee could finde nothing but trees and stones, nor other businesse than to set up a monument.

Threescore of the Macedons are said to have beene slaine, and one thousand one 10 hundred hurt in this fight, which might casily be in passing a great River, desended against them by good Archers. Of Seythian horses one thousand eight hundred were brought into the Campe, and many prisoners. It is forbidden by some Historians, and indeede it is hardly possible, to set downe the numbers of such as perish in battell: yet Cafar commonly did it. And where the diligence of the victors hath beene so inquisitiue into the greatnesse of their owne successe, that writers have beene ableto deliuer fuch particulars by credible report, I hold it not vnlawfull to fet downe what wee finde; especially when it serues to give light to the businesse in hand. The small number which the Macedonians lost; the omission of the number which they flew (a thing not viuall in Curtius, who forbeares nothing that may 20 fet out the greatnesse of Alexander ) and the little bootie that was gotten; doe make it probable, that this warre was no better than the repulsion of a few rouing Tartars (the like being yeerely performed by the Mesconite, without any boast) and therefore better omitted by some Historians, than so highly extolled as a great exploit by others.

While Alexander was affuring himselfe of those Scythians bordering vpon Jaxartes, hereceived the ill newes that Menedemus was flaine by Spitamenes, the Armie (by him led) broken, and the greatest numbers slaine, to wit, two thousand foote, and three hundred horse. He therefore, to appeale the rebellion, and to take reuenge of Spitamenes, makes all the haste be can; but Spitamenes flies into Bactria. Alexander 30 kills, burnes, and laies waste all before him; not sparing the innocent children, and so departs, leaving a new Gouernour in that Province.

To repaire this losse he received a great supply of nineteene thousand Souldiers out of Greece, Lycia, and Syria; with all which, and the old Armie, hee returnes towards the South, and passeth the River of Oxus; on the South-side whereof hee built fixe Townes neere each other for mutuall succour. But hee finds a new startvp-Rebell, called Arimazes, (a Sogdian) followed with thirtie thousand Souldiers that defended against him a strong piece of ground on the top of a high Hill; whom when Alexander had fought in vaine to winne by faire words, hee made choise of three hundred yong-men, and promifed ten talents to the first, nine to the second, 40 and so in proportion to the rest, that could finde a way to creepe up to the top thereof. This they performed with the loffe of some two and thirtie of their men, and then made a figne to Alexander, that they had performed his commandement. Hereupon he sent one Cophes to perswade Arimazes to yeeld the place; who, being shewed by Cophes that the Armie of Macedon was alreadic mounted vp, yeelded simply to Alexanders mercie, and was (with all his kinred) feourged and crucified to death; which punishment they well deserved for neglecting to keepe good watch in so dangerous a time. For the place, as seemes by the description, might easily haue beene defended against all the Armies of the World. But, what strength cannot doe; Mans wit, being the most forcible engine, hath often effected; Of which so I will give you an example in a place of our owne.

The Iland of Sarke, joyning to Garnfey and of that government, was in Queene Maries time surprised by the French, and could neuer have beene recovered againe by strong hand, having cattell and corne enough vpon the place to feede so many men as will serue to defend it, and being enery way so inaccessible, that it might bee held against the Great Turke. Yet by the industric of a Gentleman of the Netherlands, it was in this fort regained. Hee anchored in the roade with one Ship of small burden, and, pretending the death of his Marchant, befought the French, being some thirtie in number, that they might burie their Marchant in hallowed Ground, and in the Chappell of that Isle; offering a present to the French of such Commodities as they had aboord; whereto ( with condition that they should not come a-shore with any weapon, no not so much as with a Knife) the French-men yeelded. Then did the Flemings put a Coffin into their Boat, not filled with a dead carkaffe, but with Swords, Targets, and Harquebusses; The French received them at their landing; and searching euery of them so narrowly as they could not hidea Pen-knife, gaue 10 them leaue to draw their Coffin vp the Rockes with great difficultie; some part of the French tooke the Flemilh Boat and rowed aboord their Ship, to etch the commodities promised, and what else they pleased, but being entred, they were taken and bound. The Flemings on the Land, when they had carried their Coffin into the Chappell, shut the doore to them, and taking their weapons out of the Coffin, set vpon the French; they runne to the Cliffe and cry to their Companie aboord the Flea ming to come to their succour, but finding the Boat charged with Flemings, yeelded themselues and the place. Thus a Fox-taile doth sometimes helpe well to piece out the Lions-skinne, that else would be too short.

Fter these Sogdian and Scothian Warres, we reade of Alexanders killing of a Lion, and other friuolous matter, and that hee committed the Gouernment of Maracanda, & the Country about it, to Clysus, and how he flew him soone after, for valuing the vertue of Philip the father before that of Alexander the sonne, or rather because he objected to the King

the death of Parmenie, and derided the Oracle of Hammon: for therein hee toucht 30 him to the quicke, the same being deliuered in publike and at a drunken Banquet. Clying, indeed, had deserved as much at the Kings hands, as any man living had done, and had in particular faued his life, which the King well remembred when he came to himselfe, and when it was too late. Yet to say the truth. Clying his insolencie was intolerable. As he in his Cups forgat whom he offended, so the King in his (for neyther of them were themselues) forgat whom he went about to slay, for the griefe whereof he tare his owne face and forrowed so inordinately, as, but for the perswasions of Calisthenes, it is thought he would have slaine himselfe.

Wine begat Purie, Purie matter of Repentance: but preceding mischieses are not amended by succeeding bewailings: Omne vitium ebrietas & incendit, & detegit; ob- 40 stantemmalis conatibus verecundiam remouet; vbi possedit animum nimia vis vini , quicquid mali latebat, emergit : non facit ebrietas vitia, sed protrahit; Drunkennesse both kindles and layes open enery vice; it remoones out of the way that shame which gives impediment unto bad attempts; where wine gets the mastrie, all the ill that before lay hidden breakes out: drunkennesse indeed rather discouers vices, than makes them.

Soone after this, Spitamenes, who flew Beffus, and had lately revolted from Alexander, was murdered by his Wife, and his head presented to Alexander. Spitamenes being taken away, the Dahansallo seized vpon his fellow-conspirator Dataphernes, and deliuered him vp. So Alexander being now freed from all these pettie-Rebels, disposed of the Provinces which he past over, and went on with his Armie into Ga- 50 baza, where it suffered so much Hunger, Cold, Lightning, Thunder, and Storme, as he lost in one Tempest a thousand of his Traine. From hence he invaded the Sacans, and destroyed their Countrie. Then came he into the Territorie of Cohortanes, who submitted himselfe vnto him, feasted him greatly, and presented him with thirtie beautifull Virgins, among whom Roxane, afterward his Wife, was one: which although all the Macedonians disdained, yet none of them durst vie any freedome of speech after Clytus his death. From hence he directed his course towards India, having so increased his numbers, as they amounted to an hundred and twentie thousand armed men.

CHAP.2. $.20.

In the meane while he would needes bee honoured as a God: whereto that hee might allure the Macedonians, hee imploied two pernitious Parafites, Hagis and Gleo; whom Callifthenes opposed: For among many other honest arguments vsed to the affembly, he told Cleo. That he thought, that Alexander, would disdaine the 13 gift of God-head from his Vassalls, That the opinion of Sanctity, though it did fometime follow the death of those, who in their life-time had done the greatest things, yet it neuer accompanied any one as yet living in the world. He further told him, That neither Hereules nor Bacchus were Deified at a banquet, and vpon drinke, (for this matter was propounded by Clea at a carowling feast) but that for the more than manly acts by them performed while they lived, they were in future and fuccceding Ages numbred among the gods. Alexander stood behinde a partition and heard all that was spoken, waiting but an opportunitie, to be reuenged on Callifthenes, who being a man of free speech, honest, learned, and a louer of the Kings honour, was yet soone after tormented to death, not for that he had betraied the 20 King to others: but because hee neuer would condescend to betray the King to himselfe, as all his detestable flatterers did. For in a conspiracie against the King made by one Hermolaus and others (which they confest) he caused Callist henes without contession accusation or triall, to be torne a funder you the racke: This deed, vnworthy of a King Seneca thus censureth. Hot est ALEXANDRI crimen aternum. quod nulla virtus nulla bellorum fælicitas redimet. N am quotiens quis dixerit. Occidit Persarum multa millia: opponitur, & CALLISTHENEM: Quotiens dictum erit, Occidit DARIVM: opponitur, & CALLISTHENEM. Quotiens dictum erit, Omnia Oceano tenus vicit, ip sum quoque tentauit nouis classibus & Imperium ex angulo Thracia v que ad Orientis terminos protulit : dicetur, sed CALLISTHENEM occidit. Omnia licet antiqua Ducum 30 Regumque exemplatransierit ex his qua fecit nibil tam magnum erit quam scelus CALLIS-THENES; This is the eternall crime of ALEXANDER, which no vertue nor felicity of his in Warre shall ever be able to redeeme. For as often as any man shall say, He sew many thou. fand Persians: it shall be replied. He did so, and he slew CALLISTHENES: When it shall be (aid, He flew DARIVS, it shall be replied, and CALLISTHENES; When it shall bee faid, He wanne all as farre as to the very Ocean, thereon also he adventured with unusual Navies; and extended his Empire from a corner of Thrace, to the vemost bounds of the Orient, It shall be faid withall; But he killed CALLLISTHENES. Let him have out-gone all the ancient examples of Captaines and Kings; none of all his acts makes so much to his glory, as CALLIS-THENES to his reproch.

XX. of ALEX ANDERS iourney into India. The battaile betweene him and Porvs.

Ith the Armic before remembred, of one hundred and twenty thouand foot and horse, A'exander did enter the borders of India, where fuch of the Princes, as submitted themselves vnto him, hee entertained louingly, the rest hee constrained; killing Man, Woman, and Child, where they relisted. Hee then came before Nifa built by Bacchus, which after a few daies was rendred unto him. From thence he remoued to a Hill at hand, which on the top had goodly Gardens filled with delicate fruits and Vines, dedicated to Bacchus, to whom he made feasts for ten daies together. Now when hee had drunke his fill, hee went on towards Dedala, and thence to Acadera, Countries SIII

Countries spoiled and abandoned by the Inhabitants, by reason whereof, victuals failing, he divides his Armie: Ptolomie led one part, Cenon another, and him lelfe the reft. They take many Townes, whereof that of greatest fame was Mazage, which had in it three hundred thousand men; but after some resistance, it was yeelded vnto him by C'cophe the Queenc, to whom agains he restored it; at the siege of this Citie he receiucd a wound in the legge. After this, Nora was taken by Poly(perchon, and a Rocke of greatstrength by himselfe: he wannealso a passage vpon one Eryx, who was flaine by his companie, and his head presented to Alexander. This is the summe of Alexanders doings in those parts, before such time as he arrived at the River of Indus. Comming to Indus, he found there Ephestion, who (being sent before) had 10 prepared boates for the transportation of his Army, and ere Alexanders arrivall, had perswaded Omphis King of that part of the Country to submit himselfe to this great Conquerour. Therefore, soone vpon Alexanders comming, Omphis presented himselfe with all the strength of his Country, and sixe and siftie Elephants, vnto him; offering him his service and assistance. Hee made Alexander know, that hee was an Enemie to the next two great Kings of that part of India, named Abiafares and Porus; wherewith Alexander was not a little pleased, hoping by this disvnion to make his owne victorie by farre the more casie. Hee presented Alexander with a Crown of gold, so did he the rest of his Commanders, and withal fourescore talents of filuer coine, which Alexander not onely refused, but to show that hee was co- 20 uetous of glory, not of gold, he gave omphis a thousand talents of his own treasure, belides other Persian rarities. Abiasares, having heard that Alexander had received his enemie Omphis into his protection, resolued to make his owne peace also: For, knowing that his owne ftrength did but equall that of Omphis, and that there was no other difference betweene them, than that which the chance of Warre gaue, he thought it anill match when Alexander, who had alreadie beaten under foote all the greatest Princes of Asia, should make himselfea Party and Head of the quarrell. So had Alexander none now to stand in his way but Porus, to whom he fent a commandement, that he should attend him at the border of his Kingdome, there to doe him homage. But from Porus hee received this manly answere; That hee 30 would satisfie him in his first demand, which was to attend him on his borders, and that well accompanied; but for any other acknowledgement hee was refolued to take counsell of his Sword. To be short, Alexander resolues to passe ouer the Riuer Hydaspes, and to find Porus at his owne home. Porus attends him on the farther banke with thirtie thousand foot, fourescore and ten Elephants, and three hundred armed Chariots, and a great troupe of Horse. If Darius had done the like on Tigris, Alexander had furely stated somewhat longer ere he had seene India. The River was foure furlongs broad, which makes halfea mile, and withall deepe and swift. It had in it many llands, among which there was one well shadowed with wood, and of good capacitie. Alexander sent Ptolomie vp the River with a great part of the Ar- 40 mie, shrowding the rest from the view of Porus: who by this deuice being drawne from his first incamping, sets himselfe downe opposite to Ptolomie, supposing that the whole Armie of Macedon meant to force their passage there. In the meane while Alexander recouers the farther shore without relistance. He orders his troups and advanceth towards Porus, who at first rather beleeves, that Abialares his Confederate (but now the Confederate of fortune) had been come ouer Hydaspes to his aide, than that Alexander had past it. But he finds it otherwise, and sends his Brother Hagis with foure thousand horse, and a hundred armed waggons to entertaine him. Each waggon had in it foure to fight, and two to guide it; but they were at this time of little vie: for there had fallen so much raine, and thereby the fields were so fo moistned, as the horses could hardly trot. The Scythians & Dahans had the Vantguard, who fo galled thefe Indians, as they brake their reines, & other furniture, ouerturning the waggons, and those in them. Perdiceas also gaue vp the Indian hors-men, and the one & the other were forst to recoile. Parus moues forward with grosse of his

Armie, that those of his Vantguard scattered might recouer his Reare: Alexander being followed with Ephestion, Ptolomie, and Perdiccas, tooke on him to charge the Indian horse-men on the left wing, commanding Cenus or Cenon to inuade the right; Antigonus and Leonatus, hee directed to breake vpon Porus his battaile of foote, strengthened with Elephants, Porus himselfe being carried upon one of them of the greatest stature. By these beasts the Macedonian foot were most offended; but the Archers and Darters being well guarded with the long and strong Pikes of the Macedons, so galled them, as being inraged, they turned head, and ranne ouer the foote that followed them: In the end, and after a long and doubtfull fight, by the aduanto tage of weapon, and by the courage and skilfulneffe of the Macedonian Captaines. the victoric fell to Alexander, who also farre exceeded Porus in number: for besides the Macedonians and other Easterne and Northern Nations, Porus was affailed by his owne Confederate and Countrie people. Yet for his owne person he neuer gaue ground otherwise then with his sword towards his enemies, till being weakened with many wounds, and abandoned by his army, he became a prisoner to the Conqueror, from whom againe he received his estate with a great enlargement.

d. XXI.

How ALEXANDER finished his expedition, and returned out of India.

Forbeare to trouble my felfe and others with a friuolous discourse of Serpents, Apes and Peacocks, which the Macedonians found in these their trauailes: or of those pettie Wars which Alexander made betweene the ouerthrow of Porus, and his failing downe the River of Indu. The descriptions of places about the head and branches thereof are better knowne vnto vs in this Age, by meanes of our late Nauigations into those parts, than they were in any former times. The magnificence and riches of 30 those Kings we could in no fort be perswaded to beleeue, till our owne experience had taught vs, that there were many stranger things in the World, than are to bee feene betweene London and Stanes.

Our great traueller Mandenile, who died in the yeere 1372. and had seene so much of the World, and of the East India, wee accompted the greatest fabler of the World; yet had he another reputation among other Nations, as well able to judge as we. Witnesse the Monument made of him in the Couent of the Friers Guillimins in Liege, where the religious of that place keepe some things of his, Comme pour ho- Guicin Dife. norable memoire de son Excellence; For an honourable memorie of his Excellencie, saith Countries.

The Countries towards the Springs of Indus, and where those many Rivers of Hydaspes, Zaradris, Acesines, and the rest, fall into the maine streame, are now possest by the great Mogor, the ninth from Tamberlane, who commands all that tract betweene Persia and Indus towards the West, as also a great extent of Countrie towards Ganges. In the mouth of Indus, the Ascension, a ship of London, suffered shipwracke, in the yeere 1609. and some of the company trauailed ouer Land till they came to Agra, the same great Citie (as I take it) which our later Cosmographers call Nagra, being named of old Diony (opolis.

Phylostratus in the life of Apollonius Tyanaus, speaking of the expedition of Bacchus and Hercules into the East India, tells vs, that those two great Captaines (whom Alex-50 ander fought by all meanes to out-fame) when they indeuored to subject vinto them the Oxydraca, a people inhabiting betweene the Rivers of Hyphafis and Ganges, they were beaten from the affault of their cities with thunder and lightnings. This may well be vinderstood by the great Ordinance that those people had then in vse. For it is now certainely known, that the great Kings of the vttermost East, have had the

vse of the Canon, many hundreds of yeeres fince, and even fince their first civilitie and greatnesse, which was long before Alexanders time. But Alexander pierst not fo farre into the East. It sufficed, that having alreadie over-wearied his Armie, hee discouered the rest of India by same. The Indian Kings whom he had subdued informed him, that a Prince called Aggramenes, who commanded many Nations bevond the River of Ganges, was the powerfullest King of all those Regions: and that hewas able to bring into the field two hundred thousand Foot, three thousand Elephants, twentie thousand Horse, and two thousand armed Chariots. With this report, though Alexander were more inflamed, than ener to proceede in this discouerie and conquest, yet all the art he had, could not perswade the Souldiers to wan-10 der ouer those great desarts beyond Indus and Ganges, more terrible vnto them than the greatest Armie that the East could gather. Yet at the last contented they were, after many perswassue Orations, to follow him towards the South, to discouer such part of the Ocean Sea, as was neerer at hand, whereunto the River of Indus was their infallible guide. Alexander seeing that it would be no otherwise, deuised a prettie tricke, wherewith he hoped to beguile posteritie, and make himselfe seeme greater than he was. He enlarged his Campe, made greater trenches, greater cabbines for the Souldiers, greater Horse-stalles, and higher mangers than his Horses could feede in. He caused all furniture of Men and Horses to bee made larger than would serue for vse; and scattered these Armours and Bridles about his Campe, to 20 be kept as reliques, and wondred at by the Sauages. Proportionable to these heraifed vp twelue 200 Altars to be the monument of his journies end. This was a readie way to encrease the same of his bignesse; to his greatnesse it could adde nothing faue a suspition, that it was lesse than is thought, seeing he strone so earnestly to make it thought more than it was.

This done, he returned agains to the banke of Acesines, and there determined to fet up his fleet where Acesines and Hydaspis incounter, where to testifie by a surer monument, how farre he had past towards the East, he built by those rivers two Cities: the one he called Nicaa, and the other Bucephalon, after the name of his beloued Horse Bucephalus. Here againe hereceived a fourth supply of sixe thousand Thra- 30 cian Horse-men, seuen thousand Foot, and from his Lieutenant at Babylon fiue and twentie thousand Armours, garnished with silver and gold, which hee distributed among his Souldiers. About these Rivers he wanne many Townes, and committed great flaughter on those that resisted; It is then written of him, that assaulting a Citie of the Oxidracans, he lept from the top of the wall into it, and fought, I know not how long, against all the Inhabitants; tales like those of Benis of Southampton, friuolous and incredible. Finally, hee past downe the River with his fleete, at which time also the newes came vnto him of a rebellion in Bactria, and then of the arrivall of an hundred Embassadours from a King of India, who submitted himself vnto him. He scafted these Embassadours vpon a hundred beds of gold, with all 40 the sumptuosity that could bee deuised, who soone after their dispatch returned againe with a present of three hundred Horse, one hundred and thirtie Waggons, and to each foure Horses, a thousand Targets, with many other things rare

Their entertainments ended, he failes towards the South, passeth through many obscure Nations, which did all yeeld vnto him either quietly, or compelled by force : among these he builded another Alexandria. Of many places which he took in this passage, Samus was one, the Inhabitants whereof fought against him with poisoned Swords, with one of which Ptolomie (afterward King of Agypt) was wounded, and cured by an hearbe which Alexander dreamt that he had feene in the 50 mouth of a Serpent.

When he came neere the out-let of Indus (being ignorant of the tides of the Sea) his Gallies as they were on a sudden shuffled one voon another by the Floud, so on the Ebbe they were left on the drieground, and on the sandie bankes of the Riner, wherewith the Macedonians were much amazed, but after he had a few daies observed wel the course of the Sea, he past out of the rivers mouth some few miles, and after Sacrifices offered to Neptune returned: and the better to informe himfelfe, he fent Nearchus and Onesieritus, to discouer the coast towards the mouth of Euphrates. Arrianus in the beginning of his fixt Booke hath written this passage downe the River of Indus at length, with the manner of the Vessels, in which hee transported his Army, the Commanders that were vsed therein, and other the maruellous prouisions made.

Necre the out-lets of this River, he spent some part of the Winter, and in eighteene daies march from thence recovered Gedrofia, in which passage his Armie suffered such miserie for want of foode, that of a hundred and twentie thousand foot. and twelve thousand horse, which he carried into India, not the fourth part retur-

d. XXII.

Of ALEXANDERS Riot, Crueltie, and death.

Rom Gedrosia, Alexander led his Armie into Carmania, and so drawing neere to Persia, hee gaue himselse wholly to feasting and drinking, imitating the triumphs of Bacchus. And though this Swinish vice bee hatefull enough in it selfe, yet it alwaies inflamed this King to Cruel-tic. For (saith Curtius) the Hang-man followed the feast, for A s P A S T E S one of his Provinciall Governors he commanded to be flaine, so as neither did the excesse of voluptuousnesse qualifie his crueltie, nor his crueltie hinder in ought his voluptuousnesse. While he refreshed his Army in these parts, a new supply of five thousand foote and a thousand horse, was brought him by Cleander, and his fellowes, that had been imploied in the killing of Parmenio. Against these Murderers great complaint was 30 made by the Deputies of the Prouinces, in which they had commanded; and their offences were fo outragious, as Alexander was perswaded, that, had they not altogether despaired of his returne out of India, they durst not have committed them. All men were glad of the occasion, remembring the vertue of him, whom they had slaughtered. The end was, That Cleander, and the other chiefe, with fixe hundred Souldiers by them imploied, were deliuered ouer to the Hang-man: euery one reioycing that the Ire of the King was at last executed on the ministers of his Ire.

Nearchus and Onesicritus were now returned from the coast, and made report of an Iland rich ingold, and of other strange things; wherevoon they were commanded to make some farther discouerie: which done, that they should enter the 40 mouth of Euphrates, and finde the King at Babylon.

As he drew neere to Babylon, he visited the Sepulchre of Cyrus in Pasargada, now Arrianus hath called Chelquera: where he was presented with many rich gifts by Orsines, one of the Princes of Persia, of the race of Cyrus. But because Barous, an Eunuch in especial fa- on of cyrus uour with the King, was neglected, he not only practifed certaine loofe fellowes to Tombe. witnesse against Orsines, that he had robbed Cyrus tomb, for which he was condemned to die; but he affisted the Hang-man with his owne handes in tormenting him. At which time also Alexander caused Phradates to be slaine, suspecting his greatnes. Caperat (faith CVRTIVS) effe prieceps ad repriesentanda supplicia, item ad deteriora credenda; He began head longly to shed bloud, and to beleeve false reports. It is true, that he 50 tookea way to make all men wearie of his gouernement, seeing crueltie is more fearefull, than all the adventures that can be made against it.

At this time it is faid, that Calanus the Philosopher burnt himselfe, when hee had lived threefcore and thirteene veeres. Whether herein he followed the custome of his Countrie, being an Indian, Or fought to prevent the griefe and incommoditie of elder age, it is vncertaine: but in this the Hiltorians agree, that fore-feeing and foreshewing Alexanders death, he promised to meete him shortly after at Babylon.

From Palargada he came to Sufa, where hee married Statira, Darius his eldest Daughter, giuing her younger fitter to his beloued Ephestion, and fourelcore other Persian Ladies to his Captaines. There were fixe thousand guests inuited to the feast, to each of which he gaue a cup of gold. Here there came vnto him three thoufand yong fouldiers out of his conquered Prouinces, wherat the Macedonians greatly murmured. Harpalus, his Treasurer in Babylon, having lauishly consumed the monies in his keeping, got him going with five thousand talents, and fixe thousand hired Souldiers, but he was reiected in Greece, and there flaine. Alexander greatly re- 10 ioyced at the fidelitic of the Greeks, whom Harpalus with these forces and treasures could not stirre: yet he sent commandement, that they should again ereceive their banished men, whereunto (fearefull of his indignation) all submitted themselues, (except the Athenians) though they resolved, that it was a manifest preparation towards their bondage. After this there followed a maruellous discontentmet in his Army, because he had resolued to send into Macedon all those old Souldiers which could no longer indure the trauell of Warre, and to keepe the rest in Asia. He vied many orations to satisfie them, but it was in vaine during the tempest of their furv. But afterward, as Whales are drawne to the Land with a twine threed, when they haue tumbled a while, so are the vnconsiderate multitude easily conducted when 20 their first passions are evaporate. With such as were licenced to depart, he sent Craterus, to whom he gaue the Licutenantship of Macedon, Thessaly, and Thrace, which Antipater had held from his first departure out of Europe, who had beaten the rebellious Greeks in his absence, discharged the trust committed vnto him with great fidelity, and sent him so many strong supplies into Asia from time to time. Certainely, if Alexander had not taken counted of his cups, he would have cast some better colour on this alteration, and given Antipater a stronger reason for his remove, than to have imploied him in the conduction of a new supply to be brought him to Babylon, the warre being now at an ende. For Antipater faw nothing in this remoue, but the Kings disposition to send him after Parmenio, and the rest. With this 30 Antipater, the King, notwithstanding his great courage, had no great appetite to grapple: Princes, though icalous, doe not stand in doubt of every manill affected though valiant: but there is a kind of Kingly courage, compounded of hardinesse and vnderstanding, which is many times so fearefull vnto them, as they take leave both of Law and Religion, to free themselves thereof.

After he had sent for Antipater, he made a journey into Media to settle things there; where Ephestion, whom he fauoured most of all men, dies. The King according to the greatnesse of his loue, laments his losse; hangs his Phisicion; and bestowes vpon his Monument twelve thousand talents: After which he returnes to Babylon. Thirther Antipater came not, but fent; and not to excuse himselfe, but to 40 free himselse. For if we beleeue Curtius (whom Plutarch and others gaine-say) Antipater by his Sonnes, Caffander, Philip, and Iolla, who waited on Alexanders cup, gaue him poison, The slaus (who was of the conspiracie) having invited him to a drinking feast of purpose. For after he had taken a carouse in Hercules his cup, a draught of drinke stronger than Hercules himselfe, he quitted the World within a few daies.

Certainely the Princes of the World have seldome found good, by making their ministers ouer-great, and therby suspicious to themselues. For he that doth not acknowledge fidelitie to be a debt, but is perswaded, that Kings ought to purchase it from their Vassals, will never please himselse with the price given. The only restoratine, indeed, that strengerens it, is the goodnes and vertue of the Prince, and his so liberality makes it more diligent; so as proportion and distance be observed. It may be that Antipater having commanded two or three Kingdoms twelve yeeres, knew not now how to play any other part; no more than Casar did, after he had so long a time gouerned the Gaules, where hevtterly forgat the art of obedience. A most cruel and ungratefull traitor Antipater was, if Curtius doe not belie him : For though he feared some ill measure vpon his remoue (the Tragedies of Parmento, Clytus, and Callishenes, having been so lately acted) yet hee knew nothing to the contrarie, but that the King had resolved to have given him some other great governement in Asia: The old Souldiers thence returned, having perchance desired to be governed by Craterus, whom they had followed in all the former Warre.

d. XXIII.

Of ALEXANDERS Person and qualities.

Owfocuer it were, Alexanders former cruelties cannot bee excused, no more than his vanitie to be effected the sonne of Iupiter, with his excessive delight in drinke and drunkennesse, which others make the canfe of his feuer and death. In that hee lamented his want of enterprising, and grieued to consider what hee should doe when hee had conquered the World, Augustus Casar found just cause to deride him, as if the well gouerning of so many Nations & Kingdomes, as he had alreadic conquered, could 20 not have offered him matter more than aboundant, to busie his braines withall. That he was both learned and a louer of learning, it cannot bee doubted. St Francis Bacon, in his first booke of the advancement of learning, hath proved it sufficiently. His liberalitie I know not how to praise, because it exceeded proportion. It is faid, That when he gaue a whole Citie to one of his Seruants, He, to whom it was giuen, did out of modestie refuse it, as disproportionable to his fortune: to whom Alexander replyed, That hee did not enquire what became him to accept, but the King to give: of which SENECA; Animofavox videtur & regia, cum fit fultiffima. L.2.de Bene. t. Nibil enim per se quenquam decet. Refert, quid, cui, quando, quare, vbi &c sine quibus facti ratio non constabit; habeatur personaru & dignitatum proportio & cum sit vbiq virtutis 30 modus, aque peccat quod excedit, qua quod deficit; It secmes a brane & royall speech, whereas indeede it is very foolish. For nothing simply considered by it selfe beseemes a man. Wee euer limited by measure, the excesse is as faultie as the defect. For his Person, it is very apparant, That he was as valiant as any man, a disposition taken by it selfe, not much to be admired; For I am resolved that hee had ten thousand in his Armie as daring as himselfe. Surely, if aduenturous natures were to be commended simply, wee should confound that vertue with the hardinesse of Theeues, Ruffians, and mastife Dogges. For certainely it is no way praise-worthie 40 but in daring good things, and in the performance of those lawfull enterprises, in must regard what, to whom, when, why, where, and the like; without which considerations

no act can be approued. Let honours be proportioned unto the persons: for whereas vertue is which we are imployed for the service of our Kings and Common-weales. If we compare this great Conquerour with other Troublers of the World, who haue bought their glorie with so great destruction, and essuson of bloud, I thinke him farre inferiour to Cafar, and many other that lived after him, feeing hee neuer vndertooke any warlike Nation, the naked scythians excepted, nor was euer encountred with any Armie of which he had not a most mastring advantage, both of weapons and of Commanders, every one of his Fathers old Captaines by farre exceeding the best of his Enemies. But it seemeth, Fortune and Destinies (if we may vse those termes) had found out and prepared for him, without any care of his owne, 50 both heaps of Men, that willingly offered their necks to the yoke, and Kingdomes, that inuited and called in their owne Conquerours. For conclusion, we will agree with Seneca, who speaking of Philip the Father, and Alexander the Sonne, gives this judgement of them. Quod non minores fuere peftes mortalium quam inundatio, qua pla- Natur. quaft. numomne perfusum cst, quam conflagratio quamagna pars animantium exarnit; That 1.3.9.1.

The raigne of ARIDEVS.

è. I.

Of the question about succession to ALEXANDER.

HE death of Alexander left his Armie (as Demades the Athenian then compared it) in such case, as was that monstrous Giant Polyphemus, having lost his only eye. For, that which is reported in tables of that great Cyclops, might well be verified of the Macedonians: their force was intolerable, but for want of good guidance vneffectuall, and harmefull chiefly to themselves. The causes whereof (under the divine ordinance) were, partly the vncertainetie of Title to succession in the Kingdome of Macedon, partly the suborne pride of Alexander himself, who thinking none worthy to bee his Heire, did refuse to establish the right in any one, leaving every one to his owne fortune: but especially the great ambition of his followers, who all had learned of their Master to suffer no equals; a lesson soone taught vnto spirits reflecting upon their owne worth, when the reverence of a greater object faileth.

It hath formerly beene shewed, That Philip (the Father of Alexander) gouerning in Macedon as Protector, assumed vnto himselfe the Kingdome, not rendring it vnto Ampntus, (the Sonne of his elder brother Perdices) when he grew to mansefate; but only bestowing vpon him in marriage a Daughter of his owne: by which bond, and much more by his proper strength, he affured the Crowne vnto himselfe: Amputus neuer attempting ought against Philip; though (with price of his life) hee did against Alexander in the beginning of his raigne. Wherefore Eurydice the sole issue of his marriage, ought in reason to haue beene acknowledged Queene after Alexander; as having better Title thereto, than either He or Philip had, when they lived, ynlesse (peraduenture) some Law of that Nation forbade the raigne of women. But the excellent vertue of those two Princes had vtterly defaced the right of all Pretenders, not claiming from their owne bodies: and so great were their conquests, that Macedon it selfe was (in regard of them) a very small Appendix, and no way descruing to be laied in ballance against the demand of their posterite, had they left any able to make challenge of the Royall seate.

Alexander having taken many wives, had iffue by none of the principall of them.

Bar fine the Daughter of Artabazus a Per fian had borne vnto him a yong Sonne: and Roxane the Daughter of Oxyartes (whom he had more folemnely married) was left by him great with child. But the basenesse of the Mothers, and contempt of the conquered Nations, was generally alleaged in Barre of the Plea made for them, by some that would (perhaps) have wrought out their owne ends, vnder the name of Alexanders children.

Cleopatra

Cleopatra the sister of Alexander, widdow to the King of Epirus, and Arideus his base brother (sonne to Philip by a Concubine of no account) who had married the Ladie Eurydiee before mentioned, were next in course. Of Cleopatra there was no speech, which may give suspicion, that either Law or Custome had made that sex vncapable of the Soucraignetic Arideus (besides his bastardie) was neither for person nor qualitic sit to rule as King; yet vpon him the election fell, but slowly, and (as happeneth often) for lack of a better: when the Counsailors having over-labored their disagreeing wits in deuising what was best, were content for very wearinesser take what came next to hand.

Ptolomie (foone after King of Ægypt) concurring with them who rejected all mention of the halfe-Persian broode, King Alexanders children, was of opinion, that the rule of all should be given to the Captaines, that going for law which by the greater part of them should be decreed: so farre was hee from acknowledging any one as true Heire to the Crowne.

CHAP-2. S.I.

This Prolomie was called the sonne of Lagus, but reputed of Philip: who having vsed the company of Arsinois Ptolomeis mother, delivered her in marriage to Lagus being great with child. Therefore, whether it were so, that he hoped well to worke his owne fortune out of those dissensions, which are incident vnto the consultations of many ambitious men, equall in place, forcing them at length to redeeme their quiet with subjection to one, deserving regard by his bloud, and trust for his cuen carriage; or whether hee desired onely to get a share to himselfe, which could not have come to passe, had all beene given to one: plaine enough it is, that he thought not on preferring Aridsus before himselfe; and therefore gave such counsaile as sitted his owne and other mens purposes. Yea, this device of his tooke place in deede, though not in forme as he had propounded it: For, it was in effect all one, to have assembled at Alexanders emptie chaire, as Ptolomie had conceived the forme of their consultations, or to set in the chaire such a King as Aridsus, no wifer then the chaire it selse. Also the controversies arising were determined by the greater part of the Captaines; by the greater part, if not in number, yet in puissance.

But as these counterfait showes of diffembling aspirers, doe often take check by the plaine dealing of them, who dare to goe more directly to worke: so wasit like to have fared with Ptolomie and the rest, when Aristonus, another of the Captaines, interpreted the words of Alexander; faying, That he left his Kingdome to the worthiest, as designing Perdiccas, to whom (lying at the point of death) hee delinered his ring. It feemed good in reason, that Alexander should bee disposer of his owne purchases; and those tokens of Alexanders purpose appeared plaine enough, folong as no man would interpose another construction: cuery one being vncertaine how the secret affections of the rest might be inclined. Many therefore, either out of their love, or because they would not be of the latest, vrged Perdiccas to take 40 vpon him the estate Royall. He was no stranger to the Royall bloud; yet his birth gaue him not fuch reputation, as the great fauour of his dead King, with whom hee had beene very inward, and that especially since the death of Ephestian (a powerfull Minion) into whose place he was chosen. For his owne worth hee might well bee commended, as a good man of Warre, and one that had given much proofe of his private valour. But very surly hee was: which qualitie (joyned with good fortune) carried a shew of Majestie: being checkt with misaduenture, it was called by a true name Pride; and rewarded with death.

In the present businesses and evanded.

In the present businesses a solid ouer-weening did him as great harme, as it had beene great happinesses have succeeded Alexander. For not content to have the acclamation of the Souldiers, approving the sentence of Aristonus, he would needs counterfait modestic; thinking that every one of the Princes would have intreated him to take the waightie burden of an Empire, which would bee the lefte enuious, the more solemnity he vsed in the acceptance. It is truely said, He that faineth himselfe a sheepe, may chance to be caten by a Wolfe. Meleager, (a man by nature en-uious, and bearing a particular hatred to Perdiceas) tooke aduantage of his irrefolute behaviour, and very bitterly inueighed against him. In conclusion, he pronounced, that who socuer was Heire to the Crowne, the Souldiers ought to be Heires to the treasure; and therefore he inuited them, who were nothing slow, to share it. This disturbed all the Consultation. The Captaines were left alone, farre enough from agreeing, and not able to have brought any conclusion to good effect without confent of the Souldiers, who greedie of spoile thronged about Meleager.

The election of ARID & VS, with the troubles there-about arising; the first division of the Empire.

Vring this vp-rore, mention was made of Aridaus by some one, and entertained with good liking of many, untill at last it grew to the voice of the Armie. Meleager having with drawne himfelfe tumulthouse the company of the Lords, was glad of so faire an occasion to make himselfe great: therefore he produced Arideus, commended him to the Souldiers, who called him by his Fathers name Philip, and 20 brought him into the Palace, inuesting him in Alexanders Robes, and proclaiming him King, Many of the Nobles with flood this election, but in vaine: for they could not resolve what course to follow, reiecting this. Only Python, a hot headed man, tooke vpon him to proclaime the Sonne of Alexander by Roxane, according to the counsaile which Perdiceas at first had ginen, appointing Perdiceas and Leonatus his Protectors. But this child was not yet borne, which made that attempt of Python vaine. Finally, Perdiccas with fixe hundred men, and Ptolomie with the Kings Pages tooke vpon them to defend the place where Alexanders bodie lay: but the Armie conducted by Meleager, who carried the new King about whither he listed, easily brake in vpon them, & inforced them to accept Arideus for their Soucraigne Lord. 30 Then by the intercession of the ancient Captaines, a reconciliation was propounded and admitted, but on neither side faithfully meant.

Leonatus, who was of the Roiall bloud, a goodly Gentleman and valiant, issued out of Babylon, being followed by all the horfe, which confifted (for the most part) of the Nobilitie. Perdiceas abode in the Citie (but standing vpon his guard) that he might be readic to take the opportunitie of any commotion, that should happen among the infantrie, The King (who was gouerned by Meleager) commanded or gaue leave to haue Perdicess made away; which attempt succeeded ill, being neither fecretly carried, nor committed to fure executioners. Their comming was not vnexpected: and they were by Perdiceas rebuked with fuch grauitie, that they departed honester than they came; being sorrie of their bad enterprise. Vpon the newes of this attempt the campe was in an vp-rore, which the King feeking to pacifie, wanted authoritie, as having newly got the Crowne by them, and holding it by their courtesie. The matter it selse affoorded no good excuses, and his indiscretion made them worse. He said, that no harme was done, for Perdiccas was aline: but their exclamations were against the tyrannous enterprise, which hee imputed to Meleager; abandoning the surest of his friends to the rage of the multitude, who were not appeased, vntill the King by offering to resigne his estate vnto them, renued out of their pittie that fauourable affection, which had moved them to fet him vp at the Perdiccas having now joyned himselfe with Leonatus, kept the fields, intending to cut off all provision of victuals from the Citie. But after sundrie Embassies palfing betweene the King and the Nobles, (they requiring to have the Authors of sedition given vp into their handes; the King, that Meleager might bee joyned with Leonatus Leonatus and Perdiceas, as a Third in government of the Armie) things were compounded according to the Kings desire. Meleager should have done well to consider, that such men as had one day demanded his head, were not like the day following to give him a principall place among them without any new occasion offered. had not some purpose of treacherie !urked vnder their great facilitie. Generall peace was renewed, and much lone protested where little was intended. The face of the Court was the same which it had beene in Alexanders time: but no longer now did the same heart give it life; and windie spirits they were which moved in the arteries. False reports were given out by appointment of Perdiceas, tending to his owne to diffrace; but in such termes as might seeme to have proceeded from Meleager : who finding part of the drift, but not all, tooke it as an injurie done to himselfe; and (as desirous of a true friendship) desired of Perdiceas, that such authors of discord might beconnished. Perdicas (as a louer of peace) did well approue the motion; and therefore agreed that a generall Muster should bee made, at which time the disturbers of the common quiet should receive their punishment (as was the manner for Souldiers offending) in presence of the Armie. The plot was mischieuously laied: Had Meleager given way to seditious rumours, he must needs have incurred the generall hatred of all, as a fower of diffension; and thereby with publike approbation might have beene cut off, as having often offended in that kinde: his Prince being 20 too weake a Patron. Now feeking redreffe of these disorders, he hastened his owne ruine, by a leffe formall, but more speedie way. This kinde of Muster was very solemne and practifed with many ceremonies, as for cleanling of the Armie. The Horse-men, the Elephants, the Macedonian foot, the Mercinaries, were each accor-ercise)according to direction of their severall Captaines. But at that time the great battaile of Macedonian Pikes, which they called the Phalanx, led by Meleager, was of purpose bestowed in a ground of disaduantage; and the countenance of the horse and Elephants beginning to giue charge vpon them, was such, as discouered no je-30 fting pastime nor good intent. Kings were alwaies wont to fight among the horsemen : of which custome Perdiceas made great vse that day, to the vtter confusion of his enemies. For Arideus was alwaics gouerned by him, which for the present had him in possession. Two or three daies before he had sought the death of Perdiceas at the instigation of Meleager: now he rides with Perdiccas vp and downcabout the foot-men, commanding them to deliner vnto the death all fuch as Perdice as required. Three hundred they were who were cast vnto the Elephants, and by them flaine, in the presence of the King, who should have defended them, and of their affrighted companions. But these three hundred were not the men whose punishment Meleager had expected: they were such as had followed him, when he distur-40 bed the first consultation that was held about the election of a new King, and some of them his especiall friends. Having therefore kept himselfe quiet a while, as vnwilling to give offence to them which had the advantage; when hee faw their pro-

ding to their qualitie fet in array, a part from others, as if they had beene of fundrie forts, met at aduenture: which done, the manner was to skirmilh (as by way of exccedings tend very manifestly to his destruction, he fled away into a Temple, which he found no Sanctuarie: for thither they fent and flew him. The Armie being thus corrected was led into the Citie, where a new Councell of the Princes was held, who finding what manner of man their King was, divided all the Provinces of the Empire among themselves; leaving to Aridaus the office of a Visitor, and yet making Perdiceas his Protector, and Commander of the forces remaining with him. Then were the funerals of Alexander thought vpon; whole 50 bodie hauing beene seuen daies neglected, was opened, and embalmed by the Ægyptians: no figne of poison appearing, how great socuer the suspition might bee. The charge of his buriall was committed to Arideus: one of the Captaines, who was two yeares preparing of great and costly shew, making a stately Chariot in which the corps was laid; many coarses of his friends being laid in the ground, before that of Alexander was beltowed in Alexandria, a Citic of his owne building in Ægypt.

ø. III. The beginning of the Lamian Warre.

Hilest these things were in doing, or presently after, Antipater and Craterus, two principall Noble-men, and inferiour to none of Alexanders followers, if not greater than any of the rest, were busied in Greece 10 with a Warre, which the Athenians more brauely than wifely had begunne in Alexanders life, but now did prosecute more boldly than before, you the courage which they had taken by his death. Alexander, not long before he died, had commanded that all the banished Greekes (few excepted) should be restored vnto their former places. Hee knew the factious qualitie of the Gracian Estates, and therefore thought so to prouide, that in every Citie hee would have a fure partie. But it fell out otherwise: For he lost the hearts of many more than hee wanne by this proud injunction. His pleasure indeede was fulfilled; yet not without great murmuring of the whole Nation, as being against all order of Law, and a beginning of open tyrannie. The Athenians greatly decayed in chate, but retaining 20 more, han was needfull, of their ancient spirits, for bade the execution of this decree in their Dominions; so did also the Ætolians, who were valiant men, and inhabited a Region well fortified by nature; yet neither of them tooke Armes, but feemed to beare themselues, as men that had done no more then they might well justific by reason: neuerthelesse to preuent the worst, the Athenians gave secret instructions to Leosthenes a Captaine of theirs, willing him to leavie an Armie, but in his owne name, and to keepe it in a readinesse for their vse. This was no hard thing for Leafthenes to doe: great numbers of Greeke Souldiers being lately returned from the A-Gan Warre in poore estate, as defrauded of their pay by the Captaines. Of these he had gathered vp eight thousand, when the certaine newes were brought of Alexan-30 ders death : at which time the Citie of Athens declared it selfe, and more honorably than wifely, proclaimed open Warre against the Macedonians, for the libertie of Greece. Hercupon Leosthenes drew in the Atolians, and some other Estates, gauc battaile to the Baotians, who fided with Antipater, and ouerthrew them; growing so fast in reputation, and so strong in Adherents; That Antipater (arming in all haste, yet suspecting his owne strength) was faine to send into Asia to Craterus for

Nothing is more vaine than the feares and hopes of men, shunning or pursuing their destinies a-farreoff, which deceiue all mortall wisdome, euen when they seeme neere at hand. One moneth was scarcely past, since nothing so heavily burthened 40 the thoughts of Antipater as the returne of Craterus into Macedon; which hee then feared as death, but now defired as the most likely assurance of his life. Craterus, whom Alexander held as of all men the most assured vnto him, was sent into Macedon to conneigh home the old Souldiers (that was the pretence) and to succeed Antipater in the government of Macedon and Greece. The suspicions were strong that he had a privie charge to put Antipater to death: neither did that which was commonly published sound much better, which was, That Antipater should bee sent vnto the King, as Captaine of the yong Souldiers, newly to bee leavied in Europe. For Alexander was much incensed against him by his Mother Olympias: and would fometimes give out speeches testifying his owne jealousie and hatred of him; but so yet he stroue to smother it, which in a cruell Prince betokeneth little good. Few of Alexanders Lieutenants had escaped with life: most of them indeede were meane persons in regard of those who followed him in his Indian expedition, and were therefore (perhaps) removed to make place for their betters. But if the Kings rigour was such, as could finde rebellious purpotes (for so hee interpreted even lewd gouernement)in base persons ; little might Antipater hope for, who having sitten Viceror ten veeres in the strongest part of the Empire, was called away to the presence of so fell a Master, and the enuie of a Court, wherein they had beene his inferiors, which would now repine to fee him their equall. Therefore whether his feare drew him to prevention, working first the Kings death by poison, given by his Son Iolaus, Alexanders cup-bearer; or whether it brake not forth vntill opportunitie had changed it into the passion of reuenge, which was cruelly performed by his Sonne Caffander: great cause of much feare he had, which I note in this place as the ground no of effects to be produced in very few yeeres.

At the present Craterus was sent for, and all the Captaines of companies lying ncere, sollicited to make haste. Not without cause. For in Macedon there could not at that time be raifed more than thirteene thousand foot, and sixe hundred horse; which Muster was of raw Souldiers, all the force of the Countrie being emptied into Alia. The The flatians indeede who had long flood firme for Philip and Alexan. der, who also were the best horse-men of Greece, furnished him with very braue troupes, that might have done great service, had their faith held out, which they changed for the libertie of Greece. With these forces did Antipater in The falie trie the fortune of a battaile with Leosthenes; rather (as may seeme) fearing the increase 20 of his enemies power and rebellion of the Greeker, (were they not checkt at the first) than presuming on his owne strength. For Leosthenes had of Athenians, Atolians, and Mercinaries, two & twentie thousand foot, besides the affiliance of many petty Signories, and of some Illyrians, and Thracians: of horse hee brought into the field about two thousand and five hundred; but over-strong he was that way also, when once the Thessairs had revolted vnto him. So Antipater lost the day : and his losse was such, that he neither was able to keepe the field, nor to make a safe retraite into his owne Countrie: therefore he fled into the Towne of Lamis, which was well fortified, and well prouided of all things necessarie to beare out a siege. Thither did Leosthenes follow him, present him battaile againe, and vpon the refusall close vp the 20 Towne with earth-workes, and a wall. There will wee leave him for a while, trauailing in the last honourable enterprise that euer was under taken by that great Citie of Athens.

ø. IIII.

How PERDICCAS emploied his Armie.

Ing Aridaus living under the rule of Perdiccas, when all the Princes were gone each to his owne Prouince, kept a naked Court: all his greatnesse consisting in a bare title, supported by the strength of his Protector, who cared not for him otherwise than to make vie of him. Perdiceas had no Province of his owne peculiar, neither was he like to be welcome to any whom he should visit in his Gouernement. A stronger Armic then any of the rest he had, which he might easily hope in that valettled condition of things to make better worth to him, than many Provinces could have been. The better to accomplish his desires, he closely sought the marriage of Cleapatre, the sifler of Alexander; yet about the same time hee either married Nicas the Daughter of Antipater, or made such loue to her as blinded their cies, who did not somewhat narrowly fearch into his doings.

Ariarathes the Cappadocian, the second of that name, and tenth King of that Countrie, had continued faithfull to the Persian Empire as long as it stood: following the example of his forefathers, even from Pharmaces the first that raigned in Cappadocia, who married Atoffa fister to the great Cyrus. Some of his Ancesters had (indeede) beene oppressed by the Persians: but what Fortune tooke from them at one time; Vertue restored at another, and their saithfull Princes had much increased all. But now in the fatall Period of so great an Empire, with much wisedome, and (Darius being flaine) with sufficient honour, he might have acknowledged the Macedonian in the Perstians roome. This hee did not; neither did Alexander coll him to account, being occupied with greater cares. But Perdiceas, who had no greater bufinesse wherein to entertaine his Armic, found it expedient both for the honour of the Empire, to take in that in-land Kingdome, Jurrounded with Provinces of the Maccdonian conquest, and for his owne particular to have one opportune place of füre retrait, vnder the gouernement of a stedfast friend. Therefore he entred Cappadocia, fought with Ariarathes, who drew into the field thirtie thousand foot, and to fisteene thousand horse (a strong Army, had it not incountred a stronger, and better trained) wanne the victorie, and thereby the whole Kingdome. But with much crueltie did he vie the victorie: for hauing taken Ariarathes prisoner with many others, hee crucified him, and as many of his Kindred as he could light vpon: and fo deliuered that Province to Eumenes, whom of all men living he trulted most.

Another part of his forces he had committed to Python; rather as to the most honourable of fuch as remained about him, than as to the molt affured. Python was to subdue the Greekes, rebelling in the high Countries of Asia. Aboue twenty thoufand foot, and three thousand horse they were, (all old Souldiers) who planted in Colonies by Alexander, to bridle the barbarous Nations, were soone wearie of their 20 vnpleafant habitations, and the rude people, among whom they hued: and therefore tookeaduantage of the present troubles to seeke vnto themselues a better fortune. Against these Python went, more desirous to make them his owne, than to deftroy them: which intent of his Perdices discovering, did both give him in charge to put all those Rebels to the sword, giuing the spoiles of them to his Souldiers, and further enjoyned it vnto Pythons Captains (his own creatures) that they shuld fee this command executed. These directions for vice of the victory might have proued needlesse; so vncertaine was the victorie it selfe. A Captaine of the Rebels commanding ouer three thousand, corrupted by Python, did in the heat of the fight (which was very doubtfull) retire without necessitie to a Hill not farre off. This dif- 30 maied the relt, and gaue the day to Python: who being farre enough from Perdices, offered composition to the vanquished, granting vnto them their lines and libertie, under condition of laying down their armes, and hereupon he gaue them his faith. Being master of these companies, he might well haue a good opinion of his owne power: all power being then valued by strength in followers, when as none could vaunt himselfe as free Lord of any Territorie. He had thirteene thousand foot, and eight thousand eight hundred horse, besides these new Companions, whom needleffe feare without great loffe had caufed to leave the field: but in true estimation all the greatnesse whereof Python might thinke himselse assured, was (and soone appeared to be) inherent in Perdiccas. For by his command were ten thousand foote, 40 and eight thousand horse, of those which followed Python, leavied; the Rulers of the Provinces carefully obeying the letters of Perdices, by which they were enioyned to giue affistance to that businesse: and by vertue of the precept giuen vnto them by Perdicens, did the Macedonians cut in pieces all those poore men who had yeelded themselues; leauing Python as naked as he came forth to returne vnto his

Now was Perdiccas mightie aboue the mightie, and had faire leifure to purfue his hopes of marriage with Cleopatra, and thereby to make himselfe Lord of all: but this must be secretly carried for seare of opposition. How it succeeded will appeare, when the Lamian warre taketh ending.

The processe of the Lamian Warre.

E left Antipater hardly belieged, wanting meanes to free himself without succours from his friends in Asia. Those helps not appearing so foone as he expected, he came to parle with Leofthenes, & would have yeelded vnto any termes of reason, wherewith men possessed with hope of victoric, do seldome limit their defires. Leofthenes willed him without further circumstance to submit himselfe to discretion. This was too much for him, that had once commanded ouer them, who now required of him fuch a dif-10 honourable composition. Wherefore knowing that the extremities, from which as yet he was far enough; could bring no worse with it, Antipater prepared for the defence; and the other for winning the Towne, which felt great want of victuals.

In this lingring war, the Atolians (whether wearie of fitting still at a fiege, or hauing busines which they pretended at home) took their leaue, & returned into their owne Countrie. Their departure left the trenches fo thinly manned, that Antipater found means to fally out vpon his enemies to their great loffe: for many were flaine, and Leofthenes himselfe among them, ere he could be repulsed into the Towne. Yet hereby the Macedonians were nothing relieued; their victuals wasted, and they were not firong enough to deale with the Greeks in open fight Craterus was long in com-20 ming. Lylimachus who was neerest at hand in Thrace, had work too much of his own. leading no more than 4000. foote, and 2000. horse, against Senthas the Thracian King, who brought into the field aboue foure times that number; and though Lysimachus, not without losse, had gotten one victorie, yet the enemie abounding in multitude, telt not the blow fo much as might abate his courage. Therfore Leonatus was carnellly follicited by Antipaters friends, to make all hafte to the rescue. He had the government of Phrygia the leffe, and was able to raife an Army of more than 20000. foote, and 2500. horse, whether leavied out of his Province, or appointed vnto him out of the maine Armie, it is vncertaine. Certaine it is, that he was more willing to take in hand the fourny into Greece, than Antipater was to have him come. 20 For Cleopatra had written vnto him, desiring his presence at Pella, the chiefe Citie of Macedon, and very kindly offering her selfe to be his wife; which letters hekept not so close as had beene requisite, and therefore brought himselfe into great suspition, that soone ended with his life. Antiphilus, chosen Generall by the Athenians in place of Leosthenes, hearing of his approch, for looke the siege of Lamia, and took the ready way to these great Conquerors of Asia, with purpose to give them an enill welcome home, before Antipater and they should joyne in one. He had (not withstanding the departure of the Atolians) the advantage of Leonatus in horse, by the ods of 2000. Theffalians; in other things he was equall to him; in cause he thought himselfe Superior; in the fortune of that day he proued fo : for he wan a great victorie (chiefly by 40 vertue of the Thessalians) which appeared the greater by the end of Leonatus himselfe; who fighting valiantly, was driven into a marish piece of ground, where hee found his death, which desperately he had sought among the Indians, but it waited for him at home, not far fro the place of his nativitie. He was the first of Alexanders Captaines which died in battaile, but al, or most of the rest, shal follow him the same way. After this day, the Athenians did neuer any thing futable to their ancient glory.

The vanquilhed Macedonians were too weake to renew the fight, & too proud to flie. They betooke themselves to high grounds, whit for service on horse back, and so abode in fight of the enemie that day; the day following Antipater with his men came into their camp and tooke the charge of all. The Athenians perceiving their 50 strength to be at the greatest, and fearing lest that of the enemie should increase, did earnestly seeke to determine the matter quickly by another battaile. But still Antipater kept himselfe on ground of advantage: which gave more than reasonable confidence to the Greekes, many of whom departed to their homes, accounting the enemie to be vanquished. This rechlesnesse (incorrigible in an Armie of voluntaries) was very inexcusable; seeing that the victories by Land were much detaced by losses at Sea, where the Athenians labouring to have made themselves once againe

Masters, were put to the worst.

But now the fatall captilitie of Greece came on, of which she neuer could bee delivered vnto this day. Craterus with a strong Armie having made great marches from Cilicia, passed ouer into Europe, and comming into Thessalie, ioyned himselse with Antipater. The forces of Lionatus, Antipater, and Craterus, being loyned in one contained fortic thousand waightily armed, three thousand light-armed men, and five thousand horse; of which numbers the Greekes wanted a thousand and five hundred in horse, in soot eighteene thousand. Carefully therefore did Antiphilus la- 10 bour to avoide the necessitie of a battaile, vntill such time as the Townes confederate, should returne vnto the campe those bands which had straggled from it. But those companies were so slow in comming, and Antipater so vrgent vpon the Greeks, that compelled they were to put the matter in hazard without further attendance. Like enoughit is, that with a little more helpe they had carried away the victorie: for the Theffalians had the upper hand, and held it, until fuch time as they perceived their battailes (ouer-laied with multitude) retire vnto the higher grounds, which caused them also to fall back. So the Macedonians became Lords of the field, having little else to boast of, considering that with the losse of a hundred and thirtie men, they had purchased only the death of some fine hundred enemies. Yet hereof was 20 great vie made. For the Greekes, as not subject vnto the full command of one Generall, and being euerie one desirous to preserve his owne estate, and Citie; concluded to make a treatie of peace with Antipater; who being a subtile artificer, & wel vnderstanding their aptnesse to division, refused to harken to any generall composition, but willed every City to deale apart for it self. The intent of his device was so apparent, that it was reiected, the Greekes chooling rather to abide the comming of their Affistants, whose vnreasonable carelesnes betraied the cause. Antipater and Craterus besieging & winning some townes in Thessalie, which the army of the Consederates wanted meanes & courage to relieue, wearied that Nation from attending any longer vpon other mens vnlikely hopes, with their owne affured and present calamity. 30

> Q. VI.
> Of the peace granted to Athens by ANTIPATER. Of DEMOSTHE-NES his death.

He Thessalians falling off, all the rest soone followed severally, and sued for peace; the gentle conditions given to the most forward, inviting fuch as were flack. Only the Athensans and Ætolians held out. Little fauour could they hope for, having beene Authors of this tumult; and their feare was not great; the seate of the warre being farre from them. But the celeritie of Antipater confounded all their imaginations; who fate 40 Still at Athens, deniling vpon courses of prosecuting the Warre to come, which came to their dores, before their consultation could finde iffue. He was ready to enter vpon their Frontiers; they had no abilitie to relift, and were as heartleffe as friendleffe. All that remained was to fend Embassadors, desiring peace upon some good termes: necessitie enforcing them to have accepted even the very worst. Photion, with Demades the Orator, and Xenocrates the Philosopher, were chiefe of this Embassage; Phocion as the most Honorable; Demades as a strong Perswader; (both of them well respected by Antipater) and Xenocrates, as one admired for wisedome, granitie of manners, and vertue; but all these ornaments consisting in speculation, and therefore of lesse regard, when their admiration was to cost much in reall effects.

Antipater calling to minde the pride of Leosthenes, required of the Athenians, that they should wholly submit themselves to his pleasure; which being (perforce) granted, he commanded them to defray the charges of the warre past, to pay a fine, and enterraine a Garrison. Further, he abrogated the popular estate, committing the government of the Citie to those of most wealth, depriving of the right of suffrage all such as wanted a convenient proportion of riches.

About nine thousand they were, all men of good substance, to whom the admit nistration of the Common-wealth was given; a number great enough to retaine the name and forme of a Democratie. But the rascall multitude of beggerly persons, accustomed to get their livings out of the commo troubles, being now debarred from bearing offices and giving their voices, cried out, that this was a meere Oligarchie; the violent vourpation of a few incroaching vpon the publike right. These turbulent fellowes (of whom King Philip had been wont to lay, That warre to them was 10 peace, and peace warre) Antipater planted in Thrace, and gaue them lands to manure; leaving as few of them as he could to molest the quiet of Athens.

To the same end (yet withall for satisfying his owne suspitions and hatred) hee caused Demosthenes and Hyperides famous Orators, with some others to bee slaine. Had the death of these two, especially of Demosthenes, beene forborne, the rest of his proceedings in this action might well have palled for very milde: whereas now all fuch as either are delighted with the Orations of Demosihenes, or have fur-rendred their judgements to Authors justly admiring him, as the most eloquent of all that euer did speake and write, condemne him veterly, calling him a bloudy tyranta Such grace and reputation doe the learned arts finde in all civill Nations, that the co 20 uill done to a man, famous in one of them, is able to blemish any action, how good focuer otherwise it be, or honourably carried.

Demosthenes had taken Sanctuarie in the Temple of Neptune, in the Isle of Calaurie; there did Archias (sent with Souldiers by Antipater for the purpose) finde him, and gently perswade him to leave the place, but not so prevailing, bee threatned violence. Then Demosthenes, entreating a little respit as it had beene to write fomewhat, secretly took poison, which he had kept for such a necessity, and so died; rather choosing to doe the last execution upon himselfe, than to fall into the hands of such as hated him. Only this act of his (commendable, perhaps, in a Heathen man)argued some valour in him; who was otherwise too much a coward in bat-30 taile, how soeuer valiant in perswading to enterprises; wherein the way to very honourable ends was to be made through passages exceeding dangerous. Hee loued monie well, and had great fummes given him by the Persian, to encourage him, in finding worke for the Macedonians at home. Neither did heeill (me thinkes) in taking from the Persians which lound not his Countrie, great reward, for speaking fuch things as tended to his Countries good; which hee did not cease to procure, when the Persians were no longer able to give him recompence. Such as in tender contemplation of his death can indure no honourable, though true, mention of Ans tipater, may (if they can) beleeue Lucian, who tells vs, Thatit was Antipaters purpose to have done him great honour. Sure it is, that hee was a stedfast enemie to the 40 Macedonians: therefore discretion required that he should be cut off.

The matters of Ashens heing thus ordered, the chiefe command was left in the hands of Phocion, a vertuous man, and louer of his Countrie, yet applying himfelfe to the necessity of the times; by which commendations he had both at other times done the Citie much good, and now procured this peace, which (though grienous to free-men, yet fauourable to the vanquished) hee endeuoured carefully to preserue.

How CRAYERVS and ANTIPATER were drawne from their Atolian Warres into Asia. The grounds of the first civil Warre betweene the Macedonian Lords.

Antipater with Craterus returned into Macedonia, where they frengthned their friendship with a new alliance; Craterus taking Phia, the Daughter of Antipater, to Wife. Shortly after they went against the Ætolians, whose pouertie was 10

not so cassly danted, as the luxurious wealth of the more powerfull State of Athens had beene. Their Countrie was rough and mountainous, having many places of great fattnes, into which they conneied such of their goods as they most esteemed, and of their people, as were least fit for warre : with the rest they fortified the ftrongest of their Cities, and so abode the comming of the Macedonians, whom they manfully relifted. With great obstinacie did the Macedonians contend against the difficulties of the places, which the Ætolians made good as long as their victuals held out. But when Craterus had shut vp all passages, and vtterly debarred them of reliefe; then were they put to a miserable choice; either to descend from their firong holds, and fight vpon equall ground, with vnequall numbers; or to en. 20 dure the miseries of hunger and cold, against which they could make no long resistance; or to yeeld themselves to the Macedonians: who incensed by the losse of many good Souldiers, were not like to leave fo stubborne enemies in places, which might give confidence to rebellion. In cases of extremitie, much finenesse of wit apprehending all circumstances of danger commonly doth more hurt, than a blunt consideration of that only, which at the present is in hand. These Atolians did not as yet want meat; but their enemies daily molefied them; wherefore as yet they thought upon nothing but fighting. Fortune was gracious to their courage. For fuch newes came out of Alia into the Macedonian campe, as made Antipater and Craterus thinke enery houre a moneth, till they had rid their hands of these Atolians, 30 giving them what focuer conditions the way ould aske yet with purpose to call them to seucre account; yea, to roote them out of Greece by death, or by captinitie, when once they should have settled the affaires of Asia; as they hoped and desired. But of mens purposes God is the disposer: in whose high Counsell it was ordained, that this poore Nation should continue a troublesome barre to the proceedings of Macedon and Greece, and (when time had ripened the next Monarchie) an open gate to let the Roman Conquerors into those and other Provinces. Likewise concerning the matters of Asia, the reformation intended by Antipater and Craterus, was so farre from taking effect, that it ferued meerely as an introduction to all the civil warres

The grounds of the Asiatique expedition, which did set the world in an vp-rore, were these. Antipater and Craterus were of Alexanders Captaines the mightiest in reputation: The one, in regard of his ancient precedencie, and the present rule which he bare in the parts of Europe. The other, as of all men the best beloved, and most respected, both of Alexander and of the whole Armie. Next vnto these had Perdiecas beene; whom the advantage of his presence at the Kings death did make equall, or superiour, to either of these, if not to both together. The first intents of Perdiscas were, to haue conforted with these two, and to haue beene with them a third partner in the gouernement of all; to which purpole hec entertained the difcourse of marriage with one of Antipaters Daughters. But feeling in short space the to ftrength of that gale of winde which bore him vp, he began to take wing and soare quite another way. Aridaus was a very simple man, yet scrued wel enough to weare the title of that Maiestie, whereof Perdicess being Administrator; and hoping to become proprietarie, the practice was more senere than had been in the daies of Alexander: the delire to seeme terrible, being very familiar with weake Princes, and their ambitious Officers, who know no other meanes of preferuing themselues from contempt, and of giving fuch a fierie luftre to their actions, as my dazell the eies of the beholders. How cruelly the poore Greekes in the higher Asia were all put to the fword; and how tyrannoully the King and Princes of Cappadocia were crucified. hathalreadie beene shewed. The Pifitians were the next who felt the wrath of these counterfait Alexanders. One Citie of theirs was vtterly razed; the children fold for slaves, and all the rest massacred. The Isanrians by this example growne desperate, when after two or three daies triall they found themselues vnable to continue the to defence, lockt themselves into their houses, and set the Towne on fire, into the flame whereof the yong-men did throw themselues, after that they had a while repelled the Macedonians from the wals.

These exploits being performed, the Armie had no other worke than to sift the ashes of the burnt Citie for gold and silver; but Perdiceas had businesse of greater importance troubling his braines. Nothing was more contrarie to his ends, than to fit still without imploiment : letting his Souldiers grow idle about him, whilest others grew great, and tooke deepe roote in their seuerall Prouinces. Hee purposed therefore to transport his forces into Europe, vnder pretence of bringing the King into Macedonia, the feate of his Ancestors, and head of the Empire. The Kings 20 presence would make the offices of his Vice-roies (during the time) actually voide; Antipater with Craterus being once in case of private men, and onely Perdiceas holding authoritie, the match with Cleopatra might cafily bee made. So should greatneffe meete with a good title; and what more could be wished? Some impediment the power of Ptolomie might giue, who held Agypt well fortified with men, but much better with loue of the people; yet if the businesse prospered in Macedonia, like enough it was that either Ptolomie would follow of himselfe, or bee driven to come to reason. Antigonus likewise then gouerning in Phrygia, a busie-headed man, and ill affected to the fide, wasto bee looked into, and made away, for feare of further trouble. So thought Perdiccas, and was deceived in so thinking. Antigenus 30 was as good a man of warre, of as deepe a judgement, as high a spirit, and as great undertaking, as any of Alexanders Captaines. His imploiments had beene leffe than some of theirs, which made him also the lesse respected. But his thoughts were as proud as theirs: for he valued himselfe by his owne worth, not by the opinions of other men; with carefull attention had hee watched Perdiccas, and founded the depth of his purposes, which it was now high time to discouer. For Perdiecas haping with a jealous eye pried into the demeanour of Antigonia, and finding him no way fit for his turne, caused him to be charged with such accusations, as might susfice to take away his life, especially by a Judge that sought his death. This denice Antigonus would not seeme to perceive, but prepared himselfe in shew to make an-40 swere, indeede, to make escape, which easily he did, putting himselfe and his sonne Demetrius aboord of some Athenian Gallies, that carried him to Antipater, laden with fuch tidings, as finished the Ætolian warre before mentioned. As the comming of Antigonus made Craterus and Antipater manifestly perceine their owne danger: so his flight gaue Perdiceas to vnderstand that his intentions were laied open, and must now be justified by the sword. Therefore hee prepared as fast as he could, not only for defence, but (as having on his fide the Kings name) to meet with them at home, who were nothing flack in providing to encounter him. Ftolamie being aduertised of these proceedings, and considering how neerely they concerned him, fided with Antipater. To his gouernement of Agypt hee had annexed 50 the Dominion of Cyrene, not without confent of the chiefe Citizens; and now in the middest of these garboiles he celebrated the funerall of Alexander with great solemnitic, purchaling thereby to himfelfe much good will and many partakers, notwithstanding the terrible report of the Kings Armie comming against him.

PERDICCAS his voyage into Ægypt, and his death.

ERDICAS, vncertaine which way to bend his maine power, at length resolued to set vpon Ptolomie; leauing Eumenes to keepe to his vie, against Craterus and Antipater, the parts of Ma bordering vpon

It may seeme strange, that hee did not rather make head against thole who were to come out of Greece with a great number, and of more able men 10 than Ptolomie could bring. Perhaps he thought to make a quick end with Ptolomie; or beleeved that Craterus would not be readic for him soone enough. Sure it is that he tooke a bad courfe, and made it worfe with ill handling.

Ptolomie by his sweet behauiour allured many to his partie, without helpe of any bad arts. Perdiceas contrariwise was full of insolencie, which never faileth to be rewarded with hatred; that is truely defined. An affection founded vpon opinion of an vnjust contempt. The whole storie of his proceedings in Agypt 15 not worth relating: for he did nothing of importance; but (as a wilfull man) tired his followers, and wasted them in hard enterprises without successe. His most forceable attempt was vpon a little Towne, called the Camels Wall: thither he marched by 20 night, with more halte then good speed; for Ptolomie preventing him, did put himselfe into the place, where behaving himselfe not only as a good Commander, but as a flour Souldier, hec gaue the foile to Perdicess, cauling him to retire with loffe; after a vehement, but vaine, affault continued one whole day. The night following, Per diceas made another journie, (which was his last) and came to the divisions of Nilus, ouer against Memphis. There with much difficultie hee beganne to passe ouer his Armie into an Iland, where he meant to incampe. The current was strong, the water deepe, and hardly foordable. Wherefore he placed his Elephants aboue the paffage, to breake the violence of the streame, and his horse men beneath it; to take up fuch as were carried away by fwiftnesse of water. A great part of his Armie 30 being arrived on the further banke, the channell beganne to waxe deepe; fo that whereas the former companies had waded up to the chinne, they who should have followed could find eno footing. Whether this came by riling of the water, or flitting away of the ground; (the earth being broken with the feete of fo many Men, Horse, and Elephants) no remedie there was, but such as had passed must repasse againe, as well as they might: for they were too weake for the enemie, and could not be relieved by their fellowes. With great confusion therefore they committed themselves to the River, wherein above two thousand of them perished; a thoufand were devoured by Crocodiles; a miserable spectacle even to such as were out of danger; fuch as were strong and could swimme, recouered the Campe; many were 40 carried downe the streame, and driven to the contrarie banke, whereby they fell into the hands of their enemies.

This misfortune exasperated the Souldiers against their Generall, giving libertie to their tongues, which long time had concealed the cuill thoughts of their hearts. While they were thus murmuring, newes came from Ptolomy, which did fet them in an vp-rore. Ptolomie had not only the wed much compassion on those who fell into his hands aliue, but performed all rights of funerall to the dead carcafes, which the River had cast upon his side; and finally, sent their bones and ashes to be interred by their Kinsmen or Friends. This did not onely moue the common Souldier, but made the Captaines fall to mutinie, thinking it vnreasonable to make warre vpon so vertuous and honorable a person, to fulfill the pleasure of a Lordly ambitious man, vling them like flaues. The fedition growing flrong wanted only a head, which it quickly found. Python was there, who inwardly hated Perdiceas, for the difference which hee had suffered by his procurement, after the victorie upon the rebellious Greekes. Python had lived in honourable place about Alexander; he was in the divifion of the Provinces made Gouernour of Media; hee had followed Perdiceas, and being in all things (the Protectorship excepted) equall to him, had neuerthelesse beene scornefully vsed by him, which now he requited. Drawing together a hundred of the Captaines, & a good part of the horse, which consisted of the Gentrie. (the footmen having declared themselves before) he entred the Tent of Perdiscas. where without further circumstance they all ranne vpon him, and slew him. Such end had the proud mif-governing authoritie of Perdiceas. Hee might have lived as great as any, could be have suffered any as great as himselfe; yea, peraduenture ma-10 fter of all, had he not beene too masterly ouer those which were already his.

The next day Ptolomie came into the campe, where he was joy fully received the excused himselfe of things past, as not having beene Author, or given cause of the Warre, and was easily beleeved: the favour of the Armie being such toward him. that needs they would have made him Protector in the roome of Perdiceas. But this bee refused. It was an office fit for one, that would seeke to increase his greatnesse with his trouble. Ptolomie was well enough alreadie, wherefore, for his owne quiet he forbare to accept it, and for their well-deferuing of him hee procured that honourable charge to Python, and to Arideus the Captaine, who having had some companies of Souldiers, to furnish with their attendance the solemnities of Alexan-20 ders Funerals, did with them adhere to him against Perdiccas.

In the middest of these businesses came newes of two great victories obtained by Eumenes; which newes, had they arrived two or three daies sooner, had beene entertained with joyfull acclamations; and would have given such reputation to Perdiceas, as had caused both his private maligners to continue his open flatterers, and his open enemies to have accepted any tolerable composition. But these good tidings comming in ill time, when death had stopped the eares which would hane giuen them wel-come, found bad acceptance, as shall be shewed hereafter.

Q. IX. victories of Evmenes in the lower Asia.

Efore wee proceede in the relation of things, happening about the person of the King, it is meete that wee speake of those businesses in the lower Asia, which were handled by Eumenes with notable dexteritie, whileft Perdiceas was occupied in the Egyptian warres. Alcet assisted by the brother of Perdiceas and Manager and M from Perdiccas to be affistant to Eumenes, and to follow his directions. But Alcetas made flat answere, That he would not; alleaging the backwardnesse of his men to 40 beare armes against so great a person as Antipater, and a man so much honoured as Craterus, Neoptolemus was content to make faire shew, but inwardly hee repined at the Precedencie giuen to Eumenes, as thinking himselfe the better man. Eumenes discoucring, through the counterfaited lookes of Neoptolemus, the mischiefe lurking in his heart, wifely diffembled with him, in hope to winne him by gentle behauiour, and sweet language, that commonly are lost, when bestowed vpon arrogant creatures. Yet the better to fortifie himselse, that hee might stand vpon his owne strength, he raised out of the Countries vnder his jurisdiction, about sixe thousand horfe, giving many priviledges to such as were serviceable, & training them well vp. Not without great neede. For when vpon aduertisement of the great preparations 50 made by Craterus and Antipater (who had newly passed the Hellespont) for the inuasion of his Provinces, hee willed Neontolemus to come to him with all his power, Neoptolemus did (indeed) advance, but in hostile manner, though vnprouoked, prefented him battaile. Neoptolemus had fecretly couenanted with Antipater to lay open the way for him to the conquest of Asia, which now intending to performe, he was shamefully disappointed. For though his foot-men, being all Macedonians, had much the better, and prevailed sarre vpon Eumenes his battailes; yet were his horse driven out of the field, and himselfe compelled, with a few of them, to runne away, leaving naked the backs of his Macedonian foot-men, to bee charged by Eumenes, who forced them in such wise, that casting down their Pikes, they cried for mercie, and gladly tooke their oath to doe him faithfull service. Antipater and Craterus endeuored with many goodly promises to draw Eumenes into their societie, who contrariwise offered himselfe, as a meane of reconciliation, betweene Perdicas and Craterus, whom hedearely loved; professing withall his hatred to Antipater, and confiant saith to the cause which he had vidertaken to maintaine.

Whilest these negotiations were on foot, Neoptolemus came with his broken crue to Antipater, and his Affociates, vilifying Eumenes, and calling him a Scribe(at which foolish railing they laught) but extolling the vertue of Craterus (as well bee might) with high commendations; affuring them, that if Craterus did but once appeare, or that his voice were but heard by any Macedonian in Eumenes his Campe, the vi-Ctoric was wonne, for they would all forth-with revolt vnto him. Earnelfly therefore he defired them to give him aide against Eumenes, and especially requested that Craterus might have the leading of the Armie to be fent. Their owne affections did easily leade them to condescend to his motion; and good hope there was, that the reputation of Craterus might prevaile as much, as the force which hee drew along. 20 For he hadin the middeft of Alexanders venities, when others (imitating their King) betooke themselues to the Persian fashions of garments and customes, retained the ancient Macedonian forme of behauiour, and apparell; whereby hee became verie gracious with the common Souldiers, who beheld these new tricks of Asia, with discontented eies, as reprochfull and derogatorie to the manners of their native countrie. So Antipater tooke the way toward Cilicia, to hold Perdiccus at bay, and to joyne with Ptolomie. Craterus vied great celeritie, to have taken Eumenes reuelling (as he hoped) according to the common fashion of Captaines after a great victory.

But hee had a warie and well adusted enemie to encounter, who kept good espiall vpon him, and with much wisedome fore saw all that was to bee seared, and the 30 meanes of preuention, which his courage did not faile to execute.

Eumenes was not ignorant, that Craterus was able to defeat him without battaile, yea without stroke; him therefore he feared more than the Armie following him: (yet the Armie following him was fuch, as much exceeded his owne in footmen, but was inferiour in horse-men) and thought it more vncasie to keepe the Macedonians from revolting to him, than from knowing him. Hereupon hee tooke in hand a strange piece of worke, which desperation of all courses else taught him, and wife managing, prosperously accomplished. He gaue out reports, that Weoptolemus was returned with fuch companie as hee could gather together, and had gotten Pigres (a Captaine of no great estimation, who lay not farre off) to joyne with him. Ha- 40 uing animated his men against Neoptolemus, whom hee knew to be despiled and hated among them, (as having been vanquished by some of them, & for saken others in plaine field, whilest they valiantly sought in his quarrell) hee tooke great care to keepe them from receiving any intelligence of the enemies matters. Peremptorily he commanded, that no Messenger nor Trumpetter should be admitted; and not herewith satisfied, he placed against Craterus no one Macedonian, nor any other that much would have regarded him had he been knowne: but Thracians, Cappadocians, and Persians, under the leading of such as thought more highly of none, than of Perdiceas and himselfe. To these also he gaue in charge, that without speaking or hearkening to any word, they should runne voon the enemie, and give him no leisure to 50 fay or doe any thing, but fight. The directions which he gaue to others, he did not faile to execute in his owne person: but placing himself in the right wing of his battaile, opposite to Neoptolemus, who (as hee understood) conducted the left wing on the contrarie side, he held the Macedonians arranged in good order, and readie to charge the enemicas soon as the distance would give leave. A rising piece of ground lay betweene them, which having ascended, the Armies discouered each other; but that of Eumenes every way prepared for the fight, the other wearied with long journies, which ouer-hastily they had made, seeking the deceitfull issue of friuolous hopes. Then was it high time for Craterus (having failed in surprising them as encmies) to discour himselfe to his old friends and fellow-souldiers, of whom hee could fee none. Phanix a Tenidian, and Artabazus a Persian, had the leading of that fide, who mindfull of their instructions, beganne to give vpon him, with such countenance as told him his errour; which to redeeme, he bade his men fight and winne to the day, and take the spoile to themselves. But the Beare whose skinne hee sels is not yet caught. The ground whereon the battaile was fought gave most aduantage to the horse, who encountred very roughly on all parts: especially about Eumenes and Weoptolemus, who as foone as they had discovered one another, could not containe themselucs, but with great rage met bodie to bodie, and letting loose their bridles, grappled so violently together, that their horses ran from under them, leauing both of them tumbling on the ground. Neoptolemus role first vp, but Eumenes had his fword first drawne, where-with he houghed the other, causing him to fall downe and fight vpon one knee. In this conflict they received many wounds, but Neoptolemus giving flight ones tooke such as were deadly, by which hee died in the 20 place, and was there (being halfe-dead halfe-aliue) stripped by his mortall enemie, whose reuilings hee requited, lying even at the last gaspe, with one wound in the groine, dangerous had it not wanted force. The death of Neoptolemus caused his followers to runne away vpon the spurre, and seeke shelter behind the battailes of their foore. They were nothing hotly pursued. For Eumenes pained himselfe to carrie fuccour to his left wing, which he suspected much to be distressed; but found accompanied with the same fortune, that had affifted him when he fought in person. Craterus had gallantly borne himselfe a while, and sustained the impression of Artabazus and Phanix, with more courage than force; holding it nothing agreeable with his honour to retire and protract the fight, when he was charged by men of little e-30 slimation or note. Other wife it is not vnlikely, that hee might have either carried the day, or preserved himselfe to a better adventure by giving ground, as the rest (when he and Neoptolemus were flaine) did. But whilest hee sought to preserve his reputation, hee loft his life by the fall of his horse, or his falling from his horse, through force of a wound received ; vpon which accident hee was trampled vnder foot by many that knew him not, and so perished vnknowne, till it was too late to know it. Eumenes comming to the place where he lay, made great lamentation, as having alwaies loued and honoured Craterus, of whole death hee was now become the instrument. The vanquished Armie entertained a Treatie of peace with Eumenes, making shew of willing nesse to become his followers; but their intent was only night, and fled toward Antipater.

This battaile fought within ten daies of the former, wanne to Eumenes more reputation than good will: for his owne Souldiers took the death of Craterus heauily; and the Armies lying further off were inraged with the newes. But other matters there were which incenfed men against him, besides the death of Craterus, whereof it manifessly appeared, that hee was as forrie as any that pretended greater heauinesse. His Armie wanted pay. This was a great fault; which he wisely amended, by giving to them the spoile of such Townes as were ill-effected to him. So he redeemed the love of his owne men, who of their meere motion appointed vnto him a guard for desence of his person. Others were not so easie to be reconciled. They who had beene Traitors to Perdicess, hated him for his faithfulnesse, as greatly, as they thought that he would hate them for their falshood; neither sound they any fairer, way of excusing their late revolet, than by accusing and condemning the side which they had for saken. Wherefore they proclaimed Eumenes a Traitor, and

40 to refresh themselues, which (by his permission) having done, they stale away by

YTHON and Arideus being chosen Protectors of King Arideus, and 10 the children of Alexander, tooke the way to Affathe lesse, conductions the Armia should be a conduction of the Conduction of t ing the Armie through Syria. Of the letwo, Python was the greater in reputation, yet farre too weake to sustaine so important a charge. For Eurydice, wife to King Aridaus, was come to her husband, a Ladie of a malculine spirit, well understanding what she was or should bee, and thinking her selfeable to support the waight which Fortune had laid upon her foolish husband, being due to her owne title. Her Mother Cyna, fifter to Mexander by her Father King Philip, was married (as hath beene shewed) to Amyntu, who was right Heire to the Kingdome of Macedon, being the onely sonne of King Perdiceas, Philips elder brother.

This Cyna was a warlike woman; shee had led Armies, and (as a true Sister of Alexander) fighting hand to hand with Caria Queene of the Phrygians, a Virago like vnto her selfe, had slaine her. Shee brought vp this Eurydice in the same vnwomanly art of warre, who now among the Souldiers beganne to put in practice the rudiments of her education, to the small contentment of Python, that could not brooke her curious intermeddling in his charge. Whether it were fo, that Pythen had some purpose to advance the sonne of Alexander by Roxane, to the Kingdome; (as once he had fought to doe) or whether the Queene did suspect him of some such intent; or whether onely desire of rule caused her to quarrell with him; quarrell slice did, which disturbed the proceeding against Eumenes. Python, feeing this, would needes refigne his office, whether you wearinesse of the contentions daily growing, or on purpose to bring the Queene into enuie, it is vncertaine. Perhaps hee thought, that now being the farre worthiest man in the Campe, he should be intreated to retaine the place, and have his authoritie confirmed, or (as might be ) increased, were it but for want of a fit Successour. Eurydice was nothing forrie at this course; for now she thought to manage the affaires of the Empire at her owne wil, being freed from the 40 troublesome assistance of a Protector. But the Souldiers disappointed both her and Python, of their contrarie expectations: choosing Antipater, the onely powerfull man of Alexanders Captaines, then living, into the roome of Python. Hereat the Queene fretted exceedingly, and beganne to deale earneftly with the Macedonians, that they should acknowledge no Lord sauc onely the King their Soucraigne. Yet shee failed of her purpose, being hindred (as may seeme) by three things : the apparent weakenesse of her husband; the growth of Alexanders children, who (though borne of outlandish women) were bred in the Macedonian campe; and the mightinesse of Antipater, who commanding a great Armie necreat hand arrived in few daies at the campe, and enforced Eurydice to hold her felfe content. Antipater Was 50 of fuch power, that he needed not to worke by any close denices, as Perdiceas had done: he had no concurrents, all the Gouernours of Provinces that remained alive, acknowledged him their better: yea, many of them he displaced out of hand, putting others in their roomes. This done, hee tooke the King, Queene, and Princes along with him into Macedonia, leaving Antigonus Generall of the Royall Armie: to whom for his good services done, and to be done against Eumenes, hee gave the rule of Suffane, besides his former Provinces, and committed into his hands the gouernment of Alia during that warre.

Ere beginnes the greatnesse of Antigonus, whose power in few yeeres onergrowing, the rest wanted little of spreading it self ouer the whole Monarchie. Hee was to make warre voon Eumenes, Alcetus the brother, and Attalus the brother in-law to Perdiccas: worke enough to keepe his Armie imployed in the publike seruice, till such time as he might find occasion to make vie of it in his owne businesse. The first of these which he vindertooke was Eumenes, with whom Alcetus and Attalus refuled to joyne, hauing vnfeafonably contended with him in time of common danger about the chief place. Eumenes had an Army strong in number, courage, and all needfull provisions; but obedient only at discretion. Therefore Antigonus tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himselfe had scattered abroad those letters to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Of these Captaines one rebelled, breaking out too hastily before any helpe was neere him, yet looking so carelesly to himselfe, that he and his were surprised, when he thought his enemies farre off. Another follower of Eumenes (or rather of good fortune, which he thought now to be in company with Antigonus) kept his treacherie secret, reserving it for the time of execution. Vpon confidence of the treason which this fall man Apollonides had undertaken, Antigonus 30 presented battaile to Eumenes; in the heate whereof Apollonides, General of the horse to Eumenes, fled ouer to the contrary fide, with fuch as he could get to follow him: but was closely followed by some, whose company he defired not. Eumenes, perceiuing the irrecoucrable mischiese which this traiterous practice brought vpon him, pursued the villain, and cut him off before he could thrust himself into the troupes of Antigonus, and boast of his treacherie. This was some comfort to Eumenes in the losse of that battaile, which disabled him veterly to keepe the field and left it very hard for him to make a safe retrait. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possessi-40 on of the dead bodies. Eumener, whilest Antigonus held him in chace, turned out of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battaile had been fought, there he burned (according to the maner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and affies of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, raising up heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his brave spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to looke vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, enticed them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an affured victorie, and loaden with the spoyles of many Nations, the rewards of 50 their long service; all which hee might have taken: but fearing lest such a purchase thould proue a heavie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whilest he detained his men (vyhom authoritie could not have restrained) by this sleight, setting them to baite their horses. Therefore Antigonis tried all waies of corrupting his Souldiers; tempting first the whole Armie with letters: which practice failing by the cunning of Eumenes (who made shew as if he himselfe had scattered abroad those letters to trie the faith of his men) he dealt apart with such Captaines, as hee thought most easie to be wonne. Yet one thing he did which much amazed his enemies, and (though a matter of small importance) caused Antigonus himselfe to admire his high resolution. It was held no small part of the victorie to get possessi-40 on of the dead bodies. Eumenes, whileft Antigonus held him in chace, turned our of the way, and fetching a compasse, returned to the place where the battaile had been fought; there he burned (according to the maner of the time) the bodies of his own men, and interred the bones and ashes of the Captaines, and common Souldiers, apart, railing vp heapes of earth as Mountaines ouer them, and so went his way. As this bold adventure bred in the Macedonians, (returned to their campe) great admiration of his braue spirit: so the newes which Menander (who was set to looke vnto their carriages) brought and published among them, entited them to love him as their honourable friend. He had found Menander in an open Plaine, carelesse, as after an affured victorie, and loaden with the spoyles of many Nations, the rewards of 30 their long service; all which hee might have taken: but fearing lest such a purchase thould proue a heavie burthen to him, whose chiefe hope consisted in swift expedition, he gaue secret warning to Menander to flie to the mountaines, whilest he detained his men (vyhom authoritie could not have restrained) by this sleight, setting them to baite their horses. The Macedonians extolled him for this courtesie, as a noble Gentleman, that had forborne when it lay in his power to ffrippe them out of altheir wealth, and make their children flanes; and to raugh their wives: but Antigonus told them, that he had not forborne to do this out of any good wil to them; but out of meere subtiltie had avoided those precious fetters, which would have hindered his speedie flight. He told them true. For Eumenes did not onely thinke all cariages to be ouer-burdensome, but the number of his men to be more troublefome than availeable in his intended course. Wherefore he sent them from him as fast as he could, wishing them to shift for themselues; and retaining onely fine hundred horse, and two hundred foote. When he had wearied Antigonus awhile in following him vp and downe, he came to Nora: where againe, keeping no more a-10 bout him, than necessity required to make good the place, he louingly dismissed all the rest. Nora was a little Fortresse in the borders of Lycaonia & Cappadocia, fo strongly fituated that it seemed impregnable, and so well victualed and stored with all necollaries, that it might hold out for many yeeres. Thither did Antigonis follow, him, with more desire to make him his friend, than to vanquish him in warre. To this purpole be entertained parlee with him, but in vaine. For whereas Antigonus offered him pardon, and his love; Eumenes required restitution of his Provinces, which could not be granted without Antipaters consent. Then was Nora closed vp; where Antigorus leaving sufficient strength for continuance of the siege, tooke his journie into Pilidia against Alcetus and Astalus, with whom hee made short worke. 20 He came upon them unexpected, and feized on paffages, which wanted not men, but fuch a Captain as Eumenes, to have defended them. Alcetus and Attalus, as they had beene too fecure before his comming, to were they too adventurous in fighting at the first sight, vpon all disaduantages: and their folly was attended with surable euent. Attalus with many principall Captaines was taken; Alcefus fled to the Citie of Termefus, where the love of the yonger fort was toward him fo vehement; that flopping their eares against all perswassions of the ancient men, they needes would hazzard their lines and their Countrie in his defence. Yet this availed him nothing: For the Gouernours of the Towne having fecretly compounded with Antigonus, caused the yong men to fally out; and vling the time of advantage, they with their 20 servants did set vpon Aleetus, who vnable to resist, slew himselfe. His dead body was conneied to Antigonus, and by him barbaroully torne, was cast forth without burial. When Antigonus was gone, the yong meninterred the carcasse with solemne funerals, having once beene minded to set on fire their ovvne tovvne in revenge of his death. Such fauour had hee purchased with courteous liberalitie: but to make an able Generall, one vertue, hovv great socuer, is insufficient.

PTOLOMIE winnes Syria and Phanicia. The death of ANTIPATER.

Hilest these things were in doing, the rest of the Princes layidle, rather seeking to enjoy their Gouernments for the present, than to confirme or enlarge them. Onely Ptolomic looking abroad, wanne all Syria and Phanicia: an action of great importance, but not remarkcable for any circumstance in the managing. Hee senta Lieutenant thither with an Armie, who quickly tooke Laomedon prisoner, that ruled there by appointment of Antipater, and formerly of Perdiccia; but (as may seeme) without any great strength of Souldiers, farre from assistants, and vainely relying upon the authority which had given him that Province, and was now occupied with greater cares, than with seeking to maintaine him in his. Office.

Antipater was old and sickly, desirous of rest, and therefore contented to let Antigonus pursue the dispatch of those businesses in Asia. Hee had with him Polysperchon, one of the most ancient of Alexanders. Captaines, that had lately suppressed a dangerous insurrection of the Atolians, which Nation had stirred in the quarrell of Perdiccas, prevailing farre at the first, but soone losing all that they had gained, whilest Antipater was abroad in his Cilician expedition. In this Polysperchon. Antipater did repose great confidence; so farre foorth, that (suspecting the youth of his owne Sonne Cassander of insufficiencie in so great a charge) hee bequeathed vnto him on his death-bed the Gouernment of Macedon and Greece, together with his Office of Protectorship. So Antipater died being foure-score yeeres old, having alwaies trauailed in the great affaires of mightie Princes, with fuch reputation, that Alexander in all his greatnesse was icalous of him, and the successours of Alexander did either quietly give place vnto him, or were vnfortunate in making oppositions. 10 In his private qualities he was a subtile man, temperate, frugall, and of a Philosophicall behaulour, not vilcarned, as having beene Scholler to Ariffetle, and written fome Histories. Hee had beene much molested by Olympias, Alexanders mother. whom after the death of her Sonne, hee compelled to abitaine from comming into Macedonia, or entermeddling in matters of effate: yea, at his owne death he gave especiall direction, that no woman should bee permitted to deale in the administration of the Empire. But this precept was soone forgotten; and yet, ere long, by forrowfull experience approved to have been found and good.

& XIII.

Of POLYSPERCHON who succeeded unto Antipater in the Protectorship. The insurrection of Cassander against bim.

OLYSPERCHON was very skilfull in the art of warre. having long time beene Apprentile in that occupation 3 other qualities, requilite in fo high an Office as he vnder-went, either Nature had nor given to him, or Time had robbed him of them. He mannaged his butines more formally, then wifely, as a man of a fecond wit, fitter to affift, than commaund in chiefe. At the first entrance upon the stage, hee called to coun30 saile all his friends, wherein, for waightie considerations (as they who waighed not the contrary reasons held them) the Queene Olympias was reuoked out of Epirus in to Macedon, that the presence of Alexanders mother might countenance and strengthen their proceedings. For the condition of the times requiring, that the Gouernours of Provinces abroad should keepe greater Armies, than were needefull or easie to be retained about the person of the King in Macedonia; it seemed expedient, that the face of the Court should be filled with all maiestie, that might give authoritie to the Iniunctions from thence proceeding, and by an awfull regard containe within the bounds of dutie such as could not by force have beene kept in order, being strong, and lying too sarre off.

Such care was taken for preuention of imaginarie dangers and out of fight, whilest present mischiefe lay vnregarded in their bosomes. Cassander, the Sonne of Antipater, was notable to discouer that great sufficiencie in Polysperchon, for which his father had reposed in him so much considence: neither could hee discerne such oddes in the qualitie of himselfe and Polysperchon, as was in their fortune. Hee was lest Captaine of one thousand; which Office by practice of those times was of more importance, than the title now seemes to implie. He should thereby haue beene as Campe-master, or Lieutenant generall to the other: a place no way satisfying his ambition, that thought himselfe the better man. Therefore hee began to examine his owne power, and compare with the forces likely to oppose him. All that had relied on his Father, were his owne assured, especially such as commanded the Garrisons bestowed in the principall Cities of Greece. The like hope was of the Magistrates, and others of principall authoritie, in those Common-weales, whose formes had beene corrected by Antipater, that they would follow the side, and draw in many partakers: it concerned these men in their owne particular to adhere vnto the Captains, by whom their faction was vp-held; and by whom the rascall multitude, couetous of regaining the tyrannous power which they had formerly exercised ouer the principall Citizens, were kept in order, obaying their betters perforce. Besides all these helpes, Caffander had the secret loue of Queene Eary_ dice, who had in private rendered him such courtese, as was due onely to her husband. But neither the Queenes fauour, nor all his other possibilities, gaue him confidence to breake out into open rebellion; because he saw Poly Gerchon much reuetenced among the Macedonians; and strong enough to suppresse him, before he could have made head. Therefore he made shew of following his pleasures in the countrie, and calling many of his friends about him, under pretence of hunting, aduised 10 with them vpon the safest course, and most free from all suspition. The necessitie was apparant of raising an Armie, before the businesse were set on foot; and to doe this, opportunitie presented him with faire meanes. Ptolomie had by fine force, without any commission, annexed Syria to his gouernement of Egypt and Cyrene: this was too much either for the King to trust him with, or for him to part with. Antigenus vpon the first newes of Antipaters death, began to lay hold vpon all that hee could get, in such fort, that he manifestly discouered his intent of making himselfe Lord of all Asa. These two therefore stoode in neede of a civil Warre; which Callander well noted, and prefumed withall, That the friendship which had passed betweene his Father and them, would availe him somewhat. Whereupon hee se- 20 cretly dispatched messengers to them both; and within a little while conneied himselse on a sudden ouer the Hellespont, that hee might in person advance the businesse with greater speede. Much perswasion is needlesse in winning a man to what he defireth. Antigonus coueted nothing more, than to finde Polysperckon worke, by raifing some commotion in Greece. Yet (as formalities must not be neglected) Cassan der did very earneftly presse him, by the memory of his Father, and al requisite conjurations, to affift him in this enterprise; telling him, that Ptolomie was readie to declare for them, and vrging him to a speedie dispatch. Antigonus on the other side repaied him with the same coine; saying, That for his owne sake, and his dead Fathers, whom he had very dearely loued, hee would not faile to give him all manner 30 of succour. Having thus feasted one another with words, they were nothing slacke in preparing the common meanes, leading to their feuerall ends.

Q. XIIII. The unworthic courses heldby Polysperchon, for the keeping downe of Cassan Der.

Reat necessitie there was of timely prouision. For Polysperchon needed no other instructions to informe him of Cassanders drift, than the 40 newes of his departure. He was not ignorant of the ready disposition, which might be found in Antigonus and Ptolomie, to the strengthning of rebellion; and well hee knew that one principall hope of Caffander was reposed in the confidence of such as ruled in the Grecian Estate. Therefore (louing to work circumspectly) he called another Councel, wherein it was concluded, That the Popular forme of government should be erected in al the Cities of Greece; the Garrisons withdrawne; and that all Magistrates and principall Men, into whose hands Antipater had committed the supreme authority, should forthwith bee either slaine or banished. This was a fure way to diminish the number of Cassanders friends, and to raise vp many enemies to him in all quarters. Yet hereby was disclo- 50 fed both an vnthankefull nature in Poly/perchon, and a factious malice in his adherents. For how could he be excused of extreme ingratitude, that for hatred of the Sonne went about to dishonour the Fathers actions, whose only bountie had inabledhim to doe it? or what could bee faid in their defence, who fought to defiroy many worthic men, friends to the State, by whom the Greekes were held restrained from stirring against the Macedonians: and in opposition to their private Enemie. gaue the rule of things to base Companions, and such as naturally maligned the Empire? But as in mans bodie, through finnewes newly iffuing from one branch, a finger is more vexed by inflammation of his next Neighbour, than by any diftemper in the contrarie hand: foin bodies politique, the humours of men, subdivided in faction, are more inraged by the difagreeable qualities of such as curbe them in their neerest purposes, than they are exasperated by the generall opposition of such asare divided from them in the maine trunke. Hereby it comes to passe, that conto trarie religions are inuited to helpe against Neighbour Princes; bordering encmies drawne in to the part in civil warres; and ancient hatred called to counsaile against injurious friends. Of this fault Nature is not guiltie; shee hath taught the arme to offer it selfe vnto manifest losse in defence of the head: they are deprayed affections, which render men sensible of their owne particular, and forgetfull of the more generall good, for which they were created.

CHAP.2. $.15.

of the Historie of the World.

The decree, whereby the Greekes were presented with a vaine shew of libertie, ranne vnder the Kings name; but fo, as one might eafily discerne, that Polysterchon had guided his pen. For the maine point was. That they should follow such directions, as Poly (perchan gaue, and treate with him about all difficulties. In the rest it 20 contained such a deale of kindnesse, as proceeding on a sudden from those who had kept them in hard subjection, might well appeare to have some other root than the pretended good will; and was of it felfe too base and whit for a King to vie toward his conquered Subjects, and often-subdued Rebels.

Of the great commotions raised in Athens by POLYSPERCHONS decree. The death of PHOCION.

Evertheleffe the Athenians with immoderate joy entertained this happie-seeming Proclamation, and sought how to put it in execution without further delay. But Nicanor, Captaine of the Garrison, which kept one of their Hauens, called Manychia, in the lower part of the Towne, would needes take longer time of deliberation, than was pleasing to their hastie desires. Nicanor, as a trusty follower of Cassander, was by him shifted into the place, and Menillus (that was Captaine there before) discharged, when Antipater was newly dead. His comming to Athens was no way gratefull to the Citizens, who soone after hearing the newes of Antipaters death, cried out voon Phocion, laying, That hee 40 had sufficient intelligence of that accident, and might by advertising them in due time have put into their hands a faire opportunity of thrufting out the Macedonians. But these exclamations argued no more than a defire to shake off the Macedonian Yoke. Farre more grievously would they have beene offended, had they knowne the instructions, which Caffander had given to Wicanor, and his resolution to follow them. It was concluded, That he should not only retaine Mungehia, any initinction to the contrarie not with flanding ; but that hee should finde meanes to thrust some Companies into Pirau, and fortific that also, which was the principal Hauen, against the high-Towne. How to accomplish this, he rather wanted some reasonable pretence, than good abilitie. But the Athenians were not long in giving him fufso ficient cause to do that, which he would have done without any cause given. They defired him to come vnto their Councell, affembled in the Pirau, there to confider of the Kings Proclamation: whither vpon Phocions word and safe conduct he came, and earnestly pressed them to hold with Cassander in the warre which was ready to breake forth. Contrariwise they vrged him first of all, to make them Masters of Vuuu 2 their owne, which how to vie, they might consult afterwards. Each of them retufing to condescend vnto the others demand; the Athenians (who did alwaies meafure instice by profit, yet seldome thrived by that course) practised with Dercyllus, a Captaine following Polysperchon, and then lying necreat hand, that he should enter into the Towne, and take Nicenor prisoner. But Phocion, who then governed in Athens, a man very vnlike to the rest of the Citizens, being nothing pleased with since of politique dishonestie, did quietly suffer him to depart and save himselfe.

Nicanor hereupon beganne to deuise vpon taking Piraus; not as following now the project of Cassander, but prosecuting his owne instreuenge. He leavied as many 10 Souldiers as he could, and drew them closely into Munychia; which done, he issued into Piraus, tooke it, and intrenched himselfe therein, to the exceeding discomfort of the Athenians, who lately impatient of his keeping the one Hauen, saw him now Master of both. Alexander, the sonne of Polysperchon, came thither shortly after with an Armie. Then were the Citizens in great hope of recouering all, and addreffed themselves vnto him; who made faire shewes, intending meere mischiefe, which they perceived not, being blinded with the vaine Epiffles of his Father, and of Olympias the old Queene. Olympias taking vpon her to command, before shee durst well aduenture to returne into Macedon, had peremptorily charged Aicanor to restore to the Athenians the places which hee held: but hee would first consider 20 more of the matter. Polysperchon had further ordained, that the Isle of Samos should be rendred unto them: a goodly offer, had it accorded with his power and meaning. He was (indeede) so farre from purposing to let them have Samos, that as yet he did northroughly intend to let them have themselves. The commoditie of their Hanens was fuch, as he would rather get into his owne hands, than leaue in theirs; vet rather wished in theirs, than in Cassanders. His sonne Alexander notignorant of this, made faire shew to the Athenians, and spent much labour in communing with Nicanor, but suffered not them, for whom he seemed to labor, to intermeddle with the businesse. Hereupon the Citizens grew iealous, and the displeasure they conceined against him they powred out vpon Phocion, deprining him of his office. This 30 was done with much tumult: banished men and strangers, thrusting themselves into the affembly of the Citizens, who distracted with fundry passions, growing out of their present misfortunes, thought every one that best could inucigh against things past, a most likely man to finde some remedie for the euill threatning them. In this hurly burly was Alexander denising how he might come to some good point of composition with Nicanor, and held much privile conference with him; which he could not so secretly carrie, but that his negotiation was discovered, whereby the vp-rore in the Towne was so farre increased, that Phocion with many of his friends were accused, and driven to seeke saveguard of their lives by slight. So they came to Alexander, who entertained them gently, and gaue them his letters of commen- 40 dation to his Father, desiring him to take them into his protection.

Polysperchon was in the Countrie of Phocis, readie to enter with an Armie into Attica. Thicher came Phocion with his Companions, hoping well that the letters which they brought, and their owne deserts, (having alwaies been friends to the Maccelonians, as farre as the good of their Countrie gaue leaue) should be enough to get patronage to their innocencie. Besides all this, Dinarchus a Corinthian, Polysperchons familiar friend, went along with them, (in an euill houre) who promised to himselfe and them great fauour, by meanes of his acquaintance. But Polysperchon was an vnstable man, very earnest in what he tooke in hand, yet, either for want of indgement in following them, or of honestie in holding the best of them, easily so changing his intended courses, and doing things by the halues, which made him commonly saile of good successe. For searce of Cassander, he had offered wonderfull kindnesse to the Athenians; this had caused them to love him: out of their love hee gathered hope of deceiving them, which made him to change his minde, and seeke

how to get into his owne hands those keyes, with which Cassander held them fast ·lockt vp: finding himlelfe disappointed of this purpose, and suspected as a falle dishonourable man, hee flood wavering betweene the contrarie allurements of profit and reputation. To keepe the Athenians perforce at his denotion, would indeede have done well: but the effecting of this beganne to grow desperate; and many Townes of importance in Greece beganne to cast their eyes upon his proceeding in that action. Wherefore hee thought it the wilest way to redeeme their good opinion, by giving all contentment vnto the popular faction, which then was growne to be Master of that Citie. And in good time for this purpose were the Athenian Lo Embaffadours come, treading (as one may fay) vpon Phocions heeles, whom they were fent to accuse. These had solemne audience ginen to them in the Kings prefence, who was attended by many great Lords, and for offentations fake was glorified with all exteriour shewes of majestie; yet all too little to change Aridaus into Alexander; for he did nothing there, but either laugh or chafe, as hee law others do. For beginning of the businesse Polyspherchon commanded that Dinarchus should be tortured and flaine. This was enough to testifie his hearty affection to the Commonaltie of Athens, in that he spared not his old acquaintance for their sake; whose Embaffadours hee then bade to speake. When their errand was done, and answere to it made by the accused, who had no indifferent hearing, Phocion and the rest were 20 pronounced guiltie of treason; but to give sentence, and doe the execution vpon them, was (for Honours lake) referred vnto the Citie of Athens, because they were Burgesses, Then were they sent away to Athens, where the rascall multitude, not fuffering them to speake for themselves, condemned them to die. So they perished being innocent. But the death of Phocien, a man very conspicuous, made the fortune of the refit to be of the leffe regard. Five and fortie times had hee beene chofen Gouernour of the Citie, neuer suing for the place, but sent for when hee was ablent: fo well was his integritie knowne, and fo highly valued, even of fuch as were no pretenders to the same vertue. Hee was a good Commander in Warre. wherein though his actions were not verie great, yet were they of good impor-20 tance, and neuer vnfortunate. Neuer did the Citic repent of having followed his counfaile: nor any private man of having trufted his word. Philip of Macedon highly esteemed him; so, and much more did Alexander, who (besides other signes of his loue) fent him two hundred talents of filuer, and offered to bestow vpon him of foure Cities in Asia any one which hee would choose. But Photion refused these and other gifts, how foeuer importunately thrust vpon him; resting well contented with his honest pouertie: wherein he lived aboue fourescore yeeres, and then was compelled by the vnjust judgement of wicked men to drinke that poyson, which by just judgement of the righteous God, so infected the Citie of Athens, as from that day forwards it neuer brought forth any worthic man resembling the vertue of their

Ot long after these things were done, Cassander with such forces as Antigonus lent him, entred into Pireus; which newes drew Polyferchon head-long into Attica, with a great Army, but so ill victualed, that he was faine to depart without any thing done. Onely hee had given some impediment to the enemie; who not contented with defending what he held, beganne to looke out, and make new purchases abroad. Finding therefore himselfe vnable to drive Cassader out of Athens, her left his some Alexander, with such number of men, as exceeded not the proportion of victuals, to with stand his turther incroching. The greatest part of his Armie he carried into Peloponnesus, to make the Countrie sure to himselfe, wherein Cassander had many

His doings in Peloponnelus were such, as they had beene in other parts of Greece. First, he beganne to fight with Edicts, restoring the Democratie, or Popular forme of gouernement. He commanded that the principall Citizens, that had by Antipater beene made Rulers, should be either slaine, or driven into exile. This decree tooke immediate effect in most places: The vulgar fort being very ready to seale the Charter of their freedome and authoritie, with the bloud of those who had kept them in subjection. Yet many Cities there were, which delighted in the rule of the chiefe 10 Citizens; and many which wished well to Cassander, especially they of Megalopolis, on whom Polysperchon meant to inflict an exemplarie punishment of disobedience to him, which he termed Rebellion. Megalopolis had in it fifteene thousand seruiceable men, well furnished of necessariand resoluted to endure the worst. And neede there was of fuch resolution. For Polysperchon comming thither with all his power did so much, that he ouerthrew, by a Mine, three of their Bulwarks, and all the space of wall betweene them. But the Defendants manfully repelled the Macedonians which came up to the breach; and at the same time with great labour they raised up an inner wall, to beare out the next assault. The Assailants having failed to carrie the Towns at the first attempt, tooke much paine to cleare the ground, 20 and make faire way for their Elephants, whose violence was likely to ouerthrow all that came in their way. But the townes-men perceiuing their drift, prepared boords driven through with long nailes, which they vsed as gall-throps, bestowing them fleightly, couered with the points vpwards, in the way by which the beafts were to passe. Neither did they set any to encounter them in front, but appointed certaine light-armed men to beat upon their sides with Arrowes and Darts, as they were inftructed by some that had learned the manner of that fight in the Asian Warres. Of these prouisions they made happievse in the next assault. For by them were the Elephants (wherein the enemie chiefly trusted) either forely hurt, or driven back vpon the Macedonians, whom they trampled under feet. Polysperckon came as ill fur- 20 nisht for long abode to Megalopolis, as before to Athens. Therefore being neither able to dispatch the businesse quickly, nor to take such leisure as was requisite, hee for sooke the siege, with some losse, and much dishonour; leaving some part of his Armie to lie before the Towne for his credit.

After this hee sent Clitus, his Admirall, to Sea, to joyne with Arideus that was come out of Phrygia, and to cut off all succour which might come to the enemy out of Alia. Coffander also sent his whole Fleet under Nicanor, who taking along with him some ships of Antigonus, came to the Propontis, where hee fought with Clitus, and was beaten. But Antigonia hearing of the ouer-throw, gathered together the ships that were escaped, and manning them very well, sent out Nicanor againe, assu- 40 ring him of the victorie, as well he might. For hee sent out sufficient numbers of light-armed men, whom hee had caused to bee wasted ouer the Straights in small Veffels by night; these before day-light letting vpon Clitus, draue his men, that lay fecurely on the land, head-long into their ships; in which tumult Nicanor arriving did assaile them so lustily, that few or none escaped him.

This losse at Sea, together with his bad successe by Land, brought Polysperchon into great contempt. He had a good facilitie in penning bloudy decrees, but when the execution was referred to his owne fword, he could finde the matter more difficult. Wherefore the Athenians, perceining that hee had left them to shift for themfelues, and was not able to give them protection against the enemie which lay in 50 their bosomes, came to agreement with Cassander; accepting a Gouernour of his appointment; and restoring all things to the same state wherein Antipater had lest them. The like inclination to the partie of Caffander, was found in very many Cities of Greece, which daily and willingly revolted vnto him; as to an industrious man, and likely to prevaile in the end. Thus was the whole Countrie let in a combustion, vncalieto be quenched; which presented vnto Antigonus an opportunitie, that he neglected not, of making himselfe Lord of Asia.

ANTIGONUS Seekes to make himselfe an absolute Lord: and thereupon treates with EVMENES, who disappointeth him. Phrygia and Lydia wonne by ANTIGONYS.

NTIGON VS had in Antipaters life time a firme resolution, to make vnto himselfe the vimost benefit that he might of the Armie committed to his charge. And in faire season for advancement of his purposes came the newes of Antipaters death; euen then, when all the butinesse in Pisidia was dispatched, and no more imployment for the Armie remaining, fauc onely the continuance of the tiege of Nora; a final thing of it felfe, but ashard as a greater matter; and requiring few men, but much time; when time of all things was most precious. Eumenes lay in that Fort of Nora, able to make the place good, and hoping that the mutabilitie, to which the prefent effate was mani-20 feltly fubiect, would in continuance of some yeeres (which he might abide) worke more for him, than his enemies in that space could worke against him. His most feare was, that for want of exercise in that narrow Castle, his men and horses might grow lickly and vnferuiceable; which made him to practife many devices of keeping them in health and lustie. But when he had continued that vp in this manner about a yeere, his hopes came to good passe, and he was cased of his cares by Antigonus himselfe, whose forces held him besieged.

Antigonus knowing the great sufficiencie of Eumenes, and considering his sidelitie shewed vnto Perdiccas, thought that hee could not finde in all the world a fitter man than him, to imploy in managing those high designes, wherein hee doubted 30 not that hee should bee withstood by the mightiest Princes of the Empire. Hee fent therefore to Eumenes by one that was friend to them both, acquainting him with some part of his intent, and promising to make him a greater Lord than ever hee had beene, and the next man to himselfe, if things fell out as he desired : in regard whereof hee required onely his friendship, and thereupon sent him an oath to take; which done, he might at his good pleasure issue safely out of Nora, and eniov his perfect libertie. Eumenes peruling the forme of the oath, perceived the meaning of Antigonus; which was, rather to make him his follower than his fellow. For whereas, in a few words, it mentioned the King and Princes of the bloud, rather to keepe the Decorum, than vpon any loyall intent; the binding words and fumme of 40 all the rest were such, as tied him fast onely to Antigonus, omitting all reservation of dutie to the King or any other. This he liked not, holding it vnseemely to become a sworne man to him, with whom hee had fought for the mastrie, and being assured that his voluntarie assistance, which way soeuer he gaue, would be more acceptable, and farre more honourable, than the course propounded. Yet would hee not therefore breake off the negotiation, and waite for some better occasion of inlargement, which might perhaps be long in comming: but seeming to bee well agreed with Antigonus, hee prepared to give vp his Hold and depart. As for the oath it selfe, when he came to take it, he made shew of dislike, in that it was not solemne enough for such personages as they were, who could not be too ceremonious in te-50 shifying their Allegiance. The Macedonians which lay incamped before Nora, liked his words, and gaue him leave to put in Olympias, and the children of Alexander, binding himselfe to them and their adherents, as well as to Antigonus; and so he de-

Antigonus had taken vpon him, as soone as hee came downe to the Sea-side, to remoue fome of the Gouernours of Provinces, behaving himselfe according to the authoritie which hee had received of Antipater, to exercise in the time of warre. Neither did hee want sufficient pretence whereby to infline his proceedings. For if Polysperchon might lawfully hold the Protettor-ship, which the old man doting on his death-bed bequeathed vnto him, as a legacie, without consent of the Princes or Souldiers; why might not he himselse aswell retaine the Lieutenantship of Asia, that was granted vnto him for the generall good of the State, in presence of the whole Armie, by the King, and by Antipater, who had power to ordaine what should feeme conucnient whilest he lived, not to dispose of things that should happen aster his death? To give a faire colour to his ambition, this was enough; if any were to not herewith satisfied, he had threescore thousand footmen, ten thousand horse, & thirtie Elephants in a readinesse to answere them.

The first that perceived his drift, and provided to resist him, was Aridaus Gouernour of Phryeia; who fortified the Townes of his owne Prouince, and fought to haue wonne Cyzicus, a faire Hauen Towne, and seated very conueniently for him, but was faine to goc away without it. Hereupon Antigonus tooke eccasion to command him out of the Countrie. Arideus was so farre from obeying him, that he sent forces to relieue Eumenes. Neuerthelesse finding that he was vnable of himselfeto make long resistance, he tooke such companies as hee could draw along with him, and so passed ouer into Europe, to complaine at the Court. The like for- 20 tune had Clitus, who ruled in Lydia, and fought the like remedy of his fortune, with fome hope at the first (for both of them were entertained with very good words) which quickly vanished, and grew desperate, when they were beaten at Sea, as hath already been declared.

d. XVIII.

ANTICONVS pursues Evmenes. Evmenes having authoritie from the Court, raiseth great Warre against ANTIGONVS in defence of the Royall house.

NTIGONVS having thus gotten into his hands all, or most of Asia the lesse, was able to have entred Macedon, and seized vpon the the lesse, was able to have entred Maceaon, and select properties of the court; which that he forbare to doe, it proceeded (as may seeme) for some of the creasons. It would have bred as much jealousse in Cassander, as scare in Polysperchon, which might have brought them to tearmes of reconciliation; It would aske more time then hee could spare; and the enuie which followed the Protector-ship was such, as he that had power enough without the Office, ought rather to shunne, then to pursue. Besides all this, it was 40 manifest that Eumenes would not only refuse to take his part, but would make war vpon him in desence of the Royall house, to which it was found that Antigonus did not fland well-affected. Against him therefore hee bent his course, and with an Armie of twentie thousand foote, and foure thousand Horse, made great haste toward Cilicia, hoping to suppresse him before hee should bee able to make

Eumenes was one of those few that continued faithfull to their dead master, which being wellknowne in the Court, hee had commission sent unto him from thence to raise an Armie, and make warre vpon Antigonus, taking of the Kings treasure as much as hee should neede. Other letters also there were directed to all the Gouer- 50 nours of Provinces, requiring them to give affiftance to Eumenes, and bee ordered by his direction: especially to the Captaines of the olde Souldiers, called the Argyraspides, or filuer-sheelded bands, commandement was given to be at his appointment. He had of his old followers gathered together two thousand foote, and fine hundred hundred horse, before this authoritie was given him: but now he purposed with all the strength which he could make, to fight with Antigonus in defence of the Roiall bloud, Olympias had written to him, desiring him to bring help to her and her Nephew the sonne of Alexander; and in the meane time to give her his advice in that which Poly (perchantequired of her) for the was defirous to returne into Macedon, but suspected his ambition, as not contained within lawfull bounds. Eumenes therefore counfelled her to remaine in Epirus, till fuch time as hee could bring the warre to a goodiffue; which done, he promifed that his faith and care should not be wanting to the feede of Alexander.

Strange it is to confider, that in all the Empire scarce any one could be found among the Noble-men, in whom Alexanders mother, wines, and children, might repose firme confidence, saving onely this Eumenes, a stranger to the Macedonian bloud, borne at Cardia, a Citie of Thrace. His reputation was no more than his owne versue had made it; his followers obeyed at their owne discretion; and compelled hee was to trauaile as farre as Persia, to gather together an Armie sufficient, to relist the enemies that purfued his heeles.

How the Princes of Macedon stood affected mutually. OLYMPIAS takes AR IDEVS and EVRY DICE, whom free grille cruelly puts to death. cruelly puts to death.

Ow, for a much as in this present warre all the Rulers of the Prouinces didentermeddle; and great alterations happened, not onely in the parts of Afa, but Macedon it felfe, which brought a new face vnto the State, by the extirpation of the roial house of Philip and Alexander I hold it convenient in this place, before we enter into the parti-

30 culars of the warre it selfe, to shew briefly how the great ones did mutually stand affected; and by what paffions they were drawne into those courses, which ouerthrew most of them, and out of their ruines built the greatnesse of a few: as likewise to what extremitie the fraction brake out in Macedon it selfe, about the maine controuersie of title to the Crowne, whereupon all other quarrels were or should haue beene depending.

Usridam the King, being simple and searcfull, did onely what hee was bid-

Roly sperchon, desirous to continue long in Office, had a purpose to advance the fonne of Alexander by Roxane to the Kingdome, and become Gouernour to a King 40 of his owne making.

Eurydice the Queene discouring plainely this intent, and meaning nothing lesse thanto let her husband serue as a Stale, keeping the throne warme till another were growne old enough to fit in it, grew acquainted with Cassander, who hated the memory of Alexander, and was therefore the fitter for her turne.

Caffander held fresh in minde the danger wherein his family had beene through Alexanders malice, together with the indignitie offered to himselfe by Alexander, who knocked his head against a wall for deriding one that adored him after the Persian manner. The displeasure hereof; and the pleasure which he tooke in the amorous Queene, made him to resolue, both to suppresse the linage which he hated, 30 and to maintaine his beloued mistresse, either by supporting her weake husband, or by taking her to be his owne wife.

The rest of the Lords held it a thing indisferent who raigned ouer all, so as they might raigne in their seuerall Countries, and establish their authoritie in such wise, that it might not be taken from them.

Among

Among these, Ptolomie and Antigonus were well enough alreadie, if their ambition would have suffered them to see it.

Pitho and Seleucus lying farre off, and being strong, had some good hope to encroach vpon their neighbours. Against these, Pencestes and some others with much adoe hardly made relistance, vntill such time as Eumenes came to them; who propounded to himselfe great matters which he lived not to accomplish.

Olympias the old Queene (as it is common with Rep-dames) hated the children of her husband by his other wives. It was thought that shee had given poylon to Aridam, which failing to take away his life, had much impaired both his bodie and wits. Now thee confidering, that Eumenes was too full of businesseto come home 10 fo foone as the withed that he thould; and that Caffander daily prevailed in Greece: thought it the best way to ioyne with Polysperchon, and set vp, as King, her Nephew Alexander, the sonne of Roxane, remouing Aridaus before Cassander were able to defend him. To this intent she procured men among her kindred in Epirus, and so tooke her way towards Polysperchon, who ionning with her, entred into Macedon.

Eurydise hearing these newes, wrote very carneftly to Cassander, praying him to set aside all other businesse, and come to succour her. Shee her selse by entreatie. gifts and promifes, drew to her partie as many of the Macedonians as face could.vntill shee thought her owne side strong enough; and then taking her husband with her, went boldly forth against olympias, and the Traitor Poly (perchan.

These two Queenes met armed, as if the matter should have beene determined by their own hands, which ended without any stroke stricken, by the revolt of those who followed Enrydice. For as soone as the Macedonians beheld Olympias; calling to mind her former Estate, and the victorious reignes of her husband and sonne, they refused to lift any weapon against her. Eurydice finding her selfe thus forsaken. fled towards Amphipolis, but was intercepted and made prisoner with her husband.

Olympias having obtained this victorie without bloud, thought that all things would succeed as easily, and that vpon thesame considerations for which they had refused to beare Armes against her, the Macedonians would not sticke to maintaine her, whatfoeuer her proceedings were. Hauing therefore shut vp Aridam and his 30 wife in a close roome, where they could scarce turneround, shee fed them through a little hole, till after a while it came in her head, (for feare lest the people should have commiseration of him, that had raigned almost fixe yeeres and a halfe) to put them to death. So she delivered Aridaus to some barbarous Thracians, who tooke away his life by cruell torments: to Eurydice the fent a fword, a halter, and a cup of poylon, willing her to choose the instrument of her owne death, who praving that the like presents might one day be sent to Olympias, yeelded her necke to the halter, having fpent her last curses not in vaine. Nicanor the brother of Cassander, and a hundred the chiefe of his friends, did Olympias then choose out, all whom she commanded to be flaine. His brother Iolaus that was alreadie dead and buried, shee ac- 40 cused of poyson given to Alexander, & thereupon caused his Tombe to be throwne downe, and his bones to be scattered abroad. The Macedonians wondering at this furic began to condemne themselves, and the folly of Polysperchon, who had, quite contrarie to Antipaters charge given on his death-bed, called this outragious woman to the government of the Empire.

How CASSANDER Was renenged upon OLYMPIAS.

Assander at that time lay before Tegea, in Peloponne/w; whither when all these ill tidings were brought to him, hee neuer staied to take the Citic, nor to give order for the State of things in that Countrie, (though Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon were there with an Armie) but compounding with them of Tegea, hee willed his af-

20 fociates to looke to themselues as wel as they could, til his returne, and so in al haste he tooke his iournic toward Macedon, carried headlong with the greedy defire of instreuenge. The Ætolians had taken the Straights of Thermopyla, in fauour of the Queene and Polysperchon, to hinder his passage; but he, not willing to misspend anv time in dealing with them, got together as many ships as he could great and small. with which he transported his Army into Thessaly. There he divided his companies, appointing some vnder Callas, a subtile Captaine, to hold Polysperchon busied, who then lay incamped neere to Perbabia; with the reft he marched directly against Olympias. Shee, having once prevailed by the respect given to her dignitic, tooke more care how to appeare Maiesticall, than to make her selfe strong. To this ende 30 the made a folemne progresse to Pydna, a Sea-towne, and well fenced, having in her companie all the flowre of the Court, especially the great Ladies, among whom was Roxane, and her yong sonne Alexander, heire to the great Alexander, by his grandmothers designement: who, during his minoritie, kept the Soueraigne power in her owne handes. But all this pompe served to little vse, against the violence of the enemie, that soone presented himselfe before the wals; onely it sed the besieged with a vaine hope of fuccour, that would from all partes arrive, to rescue persons of their qualitie. And hereof there soone appeared faire likelihood, which as soone vanished and went away in smoke.

For Aacides King of Epirus, made great haste to bring succour to Olympias, his co-49 sen, with whom Deodamia his daughter was also shut vp. Neuerthelesse, his Subiccts were nothing forward in this expedition; but finding certaine passages taken in the way by Cassanders men, they called vpon him to retire, and quit the enterprise. The Kings importunitie vrging them to proceed, and the obstinate refusal of the Army, brake out at length into such termes, that when hee had raged in vaine against the multitude; his authority, with which he thought to have prevailed vpon them, was by them taken from him, and he compelled to for fake his Kingdom, and to wander vp and downe in forraine Countries a banished man, his people ioyning with the enemie, against whom he had led them forth to warre.

Pydna in the meane time was closed up straightly, both by Sea and Land, so that 50 neither any could issue out of the Citie, nor any reliefe be conucied into it; but it held out as long as any food was left, no memorable feruice being done there, whilft great actions were mannaged abroad.

A continuation of OLYMPIAS her florie, POLYSPERCHON defeated. Extreme famine in Pydna. OLYMPIAS yeeldes to CASSANDER.

Now, though order of time require it, that we should rehearse the doings of EVMENES and ANTIGONVS in this place, leaning OLYMPIAS yet a while to the hower of her destinie, which growes the taster upon her, because shee may discerne it comming; yet that wee may not bee compelled to 10 interrupt the course of our narration, by inserting her Tragedy in the midst of things, not manifeltly coherent with it; wee will here (as elsewhere we have done, and elsewhere must) continue to an ende one History, that we may not bee therewith distracted, when we shall come to the relation of another. All the hope of the belieged remaining in Poly/perchan, was in like maner disappointed, as their former trust had been, which was reposed in the succours of the Epirot. For Callas, who was fent against him, found the meanes to corrupt the greatest part of his Army with money, leaving him within a little while so slenderly accompanied, that hee was fit for no other businesse of warre, than a swift retrait. When famine had so farre prevailed in the city, that the horses were killed as a precious food, many me feeding 20 on the dead carcasses of their fellowes, and sawdust being given to the Elephants for prouender; some of the souldiers obtaining the Queenes leaue, (who could not denie it)others, without asking leave, yeelded themselves to the enemy, & were by him gently relicued, and fent abroad into the Country. The newes of the Queenes affaires, dispersed by these men, did so affright her wil-willers, that such as had referued themselves to the event, came in apace, and submitted them to Cassander. At length, when the mortalitie was fo great in the Towne, that the liuing were cuen poyloned with the noylome lent of the dead; Olympias bethought her selfe of stealing away by Sea in a Galley that the had: wherewith her successe was as bad as in thereft. For God had appointed this Towne, by her chosen as a place of refuge, to 20 be vnto her as a house of torment, and a Iaile, out of which shee should not be deliuered, but vnto an euill death. Being therefore vtterly broken with miseries, which daily afflicted her and the other Ladies, vnaccustomed to so wretched a kind of life, she offered composition, and with much labour hardly obtained of Cassander (who having fetcht her Gally out of the Hauen, accounted himselfe as good as master of her bodie) a graunt of her owne life. Immediately vpon her apprehension, Pella, the chiefe Citie of the Kingdome, was yeelded to Caffander. Amphipolis did stand out: for Aristonus, to whom Olympias had given charge of such forces as were left abroad in the Country, taking courage from the successe of some pettie services wherein hee had preuailed, began to promise himselse great vnlikelihoods. But Olympias, to win 40 Caffanders tauour, very earnestly required him vpon his faith to her, that he should giue it vp. He did fo, and presently after was killed by his private enemies, that were set on by Castander, who partly hated him vpon old respects, partly doubted him, as a man likely to seeke innouation.

t. III.

The death of OLYMPIAS, and her condition.

Hen Olympias had now heard forrowfull tidings of all her friends, fhee herfolie was called into question, and accused in an affembly of the Macedonic ans, for the murthers (they were so stilled in her affliction, which in time of prospecific she called iustice) by her committed. There was shee, (being not heard nor called to speake) condemned to die. The suite was commenced and prosecuted ted against her, by the kindred of those whom she had slaine. But it was at Cassanders instigation; who (to hasten the execution) sent her word, that he would furnish her, with a ship, and other necessaries, to saue her selfe by slight: which when she refused, saying, that shee would plead for her selfe, and tell her owne tale; she diffembled no longer, but fent vnto her fuch men as hated her most, who tooke away her miserable life. Shee was daughter, and lister, vnto two Kings of Epirus; wife, and mother, vnto two the mightiest Kings, of that, or many other ages; a stout Lady, and of vnreproueable chastitie, but her ambition was boundlesse, her hatred vnappeasable, and her furie in reuenge, most vinwomanly. Her peruerse conditions made her husband seeke other wives and Concubines, which caused her to hate both him. and them. She was thought privie to her husbands death; after which, very cruelly the flew his late wife Cleapatra, having first murdered one of her two children in her armes, and with a beauty furie broiled the other aliue in fire, in a copper bason. For these things, her sonne Alexander (otherwise louing her wel) forbade her to meddle in the gouernement of Macedon. But God more seuere vnto cruell Tyrants, than only to hinder them of their wils, permitted her to line & fulfill the rest of her wickednesse; (which was his instice vpon the adulteries of Philip, and the oppression done by him and others) after all which, He rewarded her malice, by returning it vpon her owne head.

CASSANDER celebrates the funerall of ARIDEVS and EVRYDICE; and seekes to make himselfe King of Magedon.

Fter her death, Cassader gaue honourable buriall to Aridams and Eurydice, among their Progenitors, Kings of Macedon. And looking further into his owne possibilities of greatnesse, he married the Lady Thessaden, whom he had taken at Pydana, being the daughter of King Philip, by another of his wines; that by her he might have some title to the Crowne. For the same end he committed Roxane, and her yong sonne, to close prison, removing thereby some part of his impediment. And, the better to encrease his same, and purchase loue, built a Citic, called by his owne name Cassader, that soone grew to be very great and powerfull. He readised likewise Thebes in Greece, and restored it vnto the old inhabitants, after it had laine twentie yeeres waste, being vtterly razed by Alexander. By these meanes, especially by the restauration of Thebes, whereunto all Greece voluntarily contributed, he grew so strong, that sew remained enemies vnto him; and they, with much labour, hardly could refift him. Leauing him therefore daily prevailing in Greece, we will returne to them, who contended in Asia, for leffe titles, but larger Provinces, with greater forces.

Of the great Lordship which ANTIGONVS got in Asia.

ð. I.

The lourney of EVMENES into Persia. His wife dealing with those that loyned with him.

VMENES, having ioyned vnto his company the Argyraspides, made haste into the Easterne parts, to take possession of those Countries, according to his commission, and strengthen himselfcagainst Antigomes. Hee tooke his iourney through Calofyria and Phanicia, hoping to reclaime those Provinces, vsurped with the rest of Syria (as hath beene shewed) by 20 Ptolomie, to the Kings obedience. But to effect this, his haste of his passing forward was too great, his Armic too little, and the readinesse of the people, to returneto their due obedience, none at all. Besides all which impediments, one inconvenience troubled him in all his proceedings, making them the leffe effectuall. The Captaines of the Argyrafpides were fo froward, that they scorned to repaire to him, and take his directions, and their sidelity was so vniteadie, that he might have more easily dealt with open Traitors. It was not expedient, that he, being Generall, should weaken his authority by courting them; neither lay it in his power to keepe them in order by compulion. Therefore hee 30 fained, that Alexander had appointed vnto him in a dreame, a place for their meeting, namely, in a rich paullion, wherin an emptie throne was placed, as if Alexander himselse had beene present at their consultations. Thus hee freed himselse from their vaine pride; but of their faith he could have no assurance. Yet when Ptolomie requested them, & Antigonus bribed them to fortake him, they continued (though not without considering of the matter) to take his part. So hee marched on, sending before him the Kings warrant, which Pytho & Seleucus refused to obey; not as rejecting the kings authority, but excepting against the person of Eumenes, as a man condemned to die by the Macedonian Armie, for the death of Craterus. Eumenes, knowing well that he was not to relye vpon their affifiance, who flood otherwise 40 affected then his affaires required, and were not to bee dealt with by perswasion, fought paffage by strong hand, through the Countrie of Babylon, in such wise that Seleucus, having in vaine affaied to hinder him, by opening the fluces of Euphrates, was glad at length to grant him friendly way, as defirous to be ridde of him. Thus he came to Peucestes and the rest of the Easterne Lords, who were glad of his companie, because of the differences betweene Pytho, Seleneus, and themselves. Yet the contention about superioritie, grew verie hot among them; every one finding matter enough, to feede his owne humour of felfe-worthinesse. But the former device of affembling in one paulion, made all quiet; the conclusion over being fure to follow that which Eumenes propounded, who was both wifest in giving aduice, and so best able to reward, by meanes of the authoritie given him, to take what he pleased of the Kings treasures. By these meanes he wonne to himselfe many of those, who had most power to doe good or hurt. à. II.

How Anticonvs, comming to set upon Evmenes, was driven off with losse.

CHAP.4. S.2.3.

NTIGONVS, hearing that Eumenes lay in the Province of Susa, had an earnest defire to follow him, and drive him further from the Kings treasures, which were kept there. To which end, as soone as he had made himselfe strong enough, he removed out of Mesopotamia, where he had wintered; and taking to him Pytho and Selencus, with their men, hee marched directly against the enemies, with intent to give them battaile. Eumenes had fortified the Cattle of Sula and was retired backe toward Persia, keeping the River of Tygris betweene him and his pursuers. The passages of the Riper were wel guarded, and good espiall kept vpon Antigonis, to observe which way he tooke. Before he came to Tyeris it felfe he was to passe ouer Coprates, a great Riuer, and not foordable, which he fought to doe by fmall veffels, whereof he had no great store. A great part of his Armie had gotten ouer, when Eumenes, who kept a bridge vpon Tygris, came with a thouland horse, and foure thousand foor, to see their demeanour: and finding them out of order, charged them, brake them, and and draue them headlong back into Coprates, wherein most of them were drowned:verie few escaping with life, except foure thousand that yelded themselues prisoners, in fight of Antigones, that was not able to relieue them. This loffe made Antieomus glad to fall off; and the heat of that Countrie in the dog-daies, breeding difeafes in his Army, by which many perished, caused him to remoue as farre as into Media. So he tooke Pithon with him; (leaving Selencus to beliege the Caltle of Su(a) and feeking to go the neerest way, passed through sauage Nations, that continually vexing him with skirmishes, slew great numbers of his men, before he could arriue in Media, with his troupes that were quite heart-broken.

Of EVMENES his cunning. A battaile between chim and Antigonvs.

Fter his departure, Eumenes with his affociates fell into confultation, about the remainder of their businesse. Faine hee would have had them to enter upon those Provinces, which Antigonus had left behinde him; to which also the Captaines of the Argyraspides or Silver-spields were very inclinable, as desiring to draw necret to Greece. But Peucester, and the rest, whose dominions lay in the high Countries, had more care of their owne particular Estates, and would needes march Esstward. These carried it; for the Armie was not firong enough to divide it selfe in-

When they came into Persia, Peucestes, ruling there, scasted them royally, & sought by all meanes to win the Souldiers loue to himselfe. Eumenes perceiving wherunto those doings tended, suffred him awhile to keepe good cheare, till the time of warre drew neere. Then did he saine an Epistle, directed, as from Orontes Gouernor of Armenia, to Peucestes himselfe: The purport wheros was; that Olympias had vanquished Cassander, and sent ouer a great Armie under Polysperchon, to ioune with Eumenes.

These newes, as they filled the Campe with vaine iou, so they wrought in all mens mindes a great willingnesse to obey Eamenes, by whom was the likeliest apparance of their preferment; wherein they dealt wisely, he being sarre the most sufficient Commander, as they found soone after. For when Antigonus, comming out of Media, drew neere unto them, Eumenes by some mischance was salless sicke, and Xxxx 3

faine to be carried in a Litter; the Armie marched in very bad array, and was likely to have beene forced to take battaile in that disorder. But Eumenes, when the rest of the Captaines were amazed, was carried about the Armie in his Litter, and voon the sedame did cast his men into so good forme, that Antigonus, perceiuing him a farre off, could not refraine from giving him deserved commendations. Yet he did not cease to promise great rewards to the Captaines, and all sorts of men, if they would for fake Eumenes: which hopes deceiving him, he came to the triall of a battaile. Eumenes had more Elephants than Antigonus; otherwise, he was inseriour in number both of horse and soote by a third part. The battaile was sought with variable successe, and great losse on both sides, continuing a great part of the day, and 10 of the night following. Yet the victorie was uncertained For Eumenes could not force his men to lie tarre from their carriages: by which meanes Antigonius (who had a more absolute command ouer his) incamping on the ground whereon they fought, had in his power the dead bodies; which was accounted the figne of victorie, for he buried his owne, and gaue leaue to his enemies crauing it, to doe the like. But a greater signe of victoric had Eumenes. For he abode still in the same place, and not onely buried his men very honourably, at great leifure, but held the Countrie round about; whereas Antigonns was glad (having tarried but one day) to ficale away by night, and returne into Media, from whence he came.

λ IIII. . .

Of divers firatagems practifed by ANTIGONVS, and EVMENES, one against the other.

Hus did the Warre continue doubtfull, and was protracted to a greaterlength, each part having front Souldiers, and skilfull Generals: but the fide which had hitherto prevailed, being hindred by the equall authoritic of many, from purluing all advantages to the bell. Antigonus grew dayly weaker in men and reputation, fo that to re- 20 paire himselse he could finde no way safer, then to put all to adventure. Hee knew that his enemies lay in their wintering places, quartered farre afunder, so that if he could suddenly come among them, he was likely to put them in great distresse. Betweene him and them, the way was not long, being onely nine daies journey, but very bad, through a rough drie wildernesse, hardly passable. Another way, fairer and leading through a Countrie well peopled, but requiring twentie fine daies iourney, he forfooke, partly for the length, partly, and chiefely, because he would come vudiscouered. So therefore taking his journey in the dead of Winter, he forbade vnto his men the vse of fire by night, because he would not have them descried a farre off. This commandement had beene well observed toure or fine dates, when 40 continuance of time (ascommonly) breeding negligence, and the cold weather pinching them, they were bold to cherish themselves, being neere to their wayes ende. The light of these fires gaue notice of their comming; which being reported to Pencefles, and other Captaines, they were so aftenished with the sodaine danger, that in all haste they betooke themselves to slight. But Fumenes, meeting with the newes, began to harten his affrighted companions, promifing to make Antigonus march lessurely, and willing them to abide, and draw vp their men together. They could scarce beleeue him, yet they were content to be ruled, and did as hee appointed, who failed not in making his word good. Hee tooke with him fome companies of the readiest men, wherewith hee occupied certaine toppes of mountaines, looking toward the Campe of Antigonus: there he chose a convenient 50 ground to incampe vpon, and made great store of fires in fundrie places, as if the whole Armie had beene present. This was a forrowful spectacle to Antigonus who thought himselfe preuented of his purpose; and began to seare lest he should be compelled compelled to fight, whileft his men were tired with a long and painefull journey. Therefore hee resolued to turne aside, and take the way to such places, as might better serue to refresh bis Armie. This he did with great care and circumspection. at the first, as knowing how readic Eumenes would be vpon all aduantages. But atter a while, confidering that no enemic firred about him, hee began to paule, and thinke in himselfe, that somewhat or other was not fallen out according to his opinion. To be the better informed in the matter, he caused some Inhabitants of that Defert to be taken, and brought before him; of whom he learned, that they had feene no other Armie than his thereabout, but onely a few men that kept fires on to the hil-tops. It vexed him exceedingly to finde that he had been fo deluded. Therfore he went against these troupes with great furie, meaning to take sharpe vengeance on them, for having so deceived him. But by this time, sufficient strength was arrived there, which could not be forced without much bulinesse, and long itay. All the Armie was come, faue onely Eudamus, Captaine of the Elephants, who, befides those beasts, had no more than foure hundred horsemen in his company. Intigonus hearing of this supply comming to his enemies, sent about two thousand horse, and all his light-armed footmen, to cut it off by the way. Endamus being fallen into this danger, was faine to place his Elephants round about his carriages, and foto defend himselfe as well as he could; for his horsemen, overlaid with multi-20 tudes, were quickly broken, and driven to runneaway vpon the spurre. Neither knew they, who fate vpon the Elephants, which way to turne them; for on all sides they received wounds, and were not able to requite them with the like. In this extremitie there appeared braue troupes of horse and foot, that came vnexpected to the refeue; and charging the affailants voon the backe, draue them to feeke their owne saletie by speedy flight. These were sent by Eumenes; who though hee knew not what his aduersarie meant to doe, yet hee knew very well what was fittest for him to doe: and therefore, playing both games himselfe, prouided the remedie.

The conspiracie of PEVCESTES and others, against Ev-

MENES his life.

Armie acknowledged a most expert Generall, and well worthy of the chiefe command. But Pencefies, and the other Captaines, guiltie of their own much infufficiencie were forces. Y these meanes Eumenes wanne great honour, and was by the whole they could now no longer contain their vile thoughts, but held com-

40 munication, as vpon a necessarie point, how they might finde meanes to murder

Surely, it is great injuffice to impute the mischiese, contriued against worthy men, to their owne proud carriage, or some other ill deseruing: For, though it often happen, that small vices doe serue to counterpoyse great vertues; (the sense of cuill being more quicke and lasting, than of good) yet hee shall bewray a very foolish malice, that, wanting other testimonic, will thinke it a part of wisedome, to finde good reason of the cuils, done to vertuous men, which oftentimes have no other cause than their vertue it selfe. Eumenes, among many excellent qualities, was noted to bee of fingular courtefie, of a very sweet conversation among his friends, and carefull by all gentle meanes to winne their love, that feemed to beare him any fecretill affection. It was his meere vertue that overthrew him, which even they that fought his life acknowledged. For they concluded that hee should not be flaine, before the battaile were fought with Antigonus, wherein they contessed that it stood best with their safety, to be gouerned by his directions, Of this treason, he was quickly advertised by Eudamus, to whom he had done many pleasures, and by some others of whom he vied to borrow money when hee needed not, to the end that they should be carefull of his good, for feare of losing their owne. Considering therefore, and discoursing with himself of the villanie intended against him, hee made his last will, and burnt all his writings that contained any matter of fecret: which done, hee revolued many things in his minde; being doubtfull what course were best to follow. All the Nobles of the Empire stood ill affected to the Royallbloud, excepting those which were with him, that were more in number, than in worth. How things at that time flood in Macedon and Greece, cither he knew not, or, knowing the truth, knew nothing that might encourage him to seeke their to helpe, that needed his. To make his owne peace with Antigonus, had beene against his faith to Olympias, and the Princes, that had committed this great power into his hands. For which cause also it may be thought, that hee forbare, either to lose the battaile willingly, orto flye into Cappadocia, and make shift for himselfe among his old friends. At length hee resolued to doc his best against the common enemie, and afterwards to looke to himselfe as well as he might.

δ. V I. The last battaile betweene Antigonvs and

He Souldiers, especially thoseold bands of the Siluer-shields, finding Eumenes perplexed, and not knowing the cause, entreated him not to doubt of the victorie, but onely to bring them into the field, and set theminarray; for the rest, they alone would take sufficient order. The like alacritic was generally found in the common Souldiers faces; but the chiefe Commanders were so mischieuously bent against him, that they could not endure to thinke vpon being beholding to him for the victorie. Yet he ordered the battaile so well, that, without their ownegreat fault, they could hardly 20 faile of getting the vpper hand.

Before the Armies came to joyning, a horse-man from the side of Eumenes, proclaimed with a loud voice to the followers of Antigonus, That their wickednesse, in fighting against their owne fathers, would now bee punished, as it well deserved. This was not spoken in vaine. For the Silver-shields were men of threescore or seuentie yeeres olde, strengthned more by continuall exercise, than decaied by age, and excelling in courage, as having passed through greater dangers, than any like to be presented in that fight. Therefore Antigonus his men (who had often been beaten by them, and were now to trie their last hope with these resolute warriours, the most Ancient and best regarded of all Alexanders Souldiers) grew very pen- 40 fine, and advanced heavily, suspecting their owne cause, and searing the threatnings vttered would proue true.

Antigonus was now againe farre the stronger in horse, which gave him cause of great hope; the ground, on which they were to fight, being a plaine leuelled field. Placing therfore himselfe and his sonne Demetrius in his right wing, and committing the left wing to Puthon, hee did fet forward couragiously against the enemies, that were readic to give him a sharpe entertainment.

Eumenes tooke vnto him Pencestes, with the rest of the Lords, and stood in the lest wing of his battaile, in the face of Antigonus, meaning both to prevent the Traitors, his Companions, of all meanes to make head against him on the sodaine, and so (withall) to give proofe of his owne valour, which perhaps he should no more doe, in the face of all his enemies. In the right wing, opposite vnto Pithon, hee bestowed the weakest of his horse and Elephants, under one Philip, an honest man, and (which was enough at such a time) obedient: commanding him to protract the fight, and make a leifurable retrait, expecting the euent of the other fide.

CHAP.4. S.6. of the Historie of the World.

So they joyned very fiercely; Antigonus, labouring to make himselfe mafter of all; Eumenes, to die an honourable death, or to winne such a victorie vpon his open enemies, as might give him leisure and opportunitie to deale with his false friends.

The footmen of Antigonus, being, even in their owne opinions, farre inferiour to those whom they must encounter, were at the first brunt presently defeated by the Silver-fhields, who flew about five thousand of them, losing of their owne, not one man. But in horse, Eumenes was so ouer-matched, that he could not repell Antigonus, who preffed him very hard, but was faine to fland wholly vpon defence. Yer to his courage wrought so well by example, among his followers, that the enemic could not winne one foot of ground vpon him, vntill fuch time as Peucestes, with one thousand five hundred horse, withdrew himselfe out of the battaile, leaving his companions fighting to defend his backe.

Then did Eumenes desperately rush amongst his enemies, labouring to breake open the way vnto Antigonus himselfe. And though hee failed of his purpose; ver with great flaughter he did so beate upon them, which came in his way, that the victorie hung a long time in suspence, vncertaine which way to incline.

The ground whereon they fought, being of a flight fandie mould, through the trampling of horses, men, and Elephants, did cast vp such a cloud of dust, as hin-20 dered the prospect, so that no man could see what was done a little from him. Antigonus finding this advantage, dispatched away some companies of horse, that passed undiscourred beyond Eumenes his battailes, and came to his carriages, which lay about halfe a mile from the place of fight, slenderly garded, (for that the whole body of the Armie lay betweene them and danger) and therefore eafily taken. Had Pencestes retired himselfe no further than vnto the carriages, hee might not onely have defended them, but peraduenture have furprifed those which came to furprife them, and so have done as good a piece of service as a better man. But he was gotten somewhat further, to a place, where out of danger hee might expect the event: and Eumenes was so over-laboured both in body and minde, that he could not give 30 an eve to euery place, being not well able to continue where he was.

It happened so, that the Elephants meeting together, those of Antigonus had the better hand, wherupon Eumenes, finding him (elf euery way ouer-charged, began to give back, and withdrew himselfe and his companies in good order, to the other side of the battaile, where Philip (as hee was directed) had by fighting and retiring together, kept that wing from losse. The Antigonians had felt so much of Eumenes that day, that they were well contented to let him depart quietly, and wished not to see him come againe; as faine he would have done.

The losse of the carriages was reported vnto him, as soone as he had any leisure to heare how things went: whereupon hee presently ordered his men for a fresh 40 charge, and sent for Peucestes that was not farre off, requesting him to bring in his men, and renew the fight, whereby hee trufted, not onely to recover their owne goods, but to enrich themselves with the spoiles of the enemies. Peucestes not only refused to joyne with him, but immediately withdrew himselfe into a safer place, where he might be further from such dangerous temptations.

Bythis, the night grew on; and both Armies, wearied with fighting, were desirous to returne into their Campes. Yet Antigorus conceived hope of doing somewhat more; and therefore taking halfe his horsemen, hee waited vpon Eumenes a part of his way homewards, but found no opportunitie to offend him: the other halfe hee committed to Pithon, willing him to fet vpon the Silver-shelds in their retrait; which yet he forbare to do, because it appeared too full of danger. So the battaile ended; wherein Antigenus had not so much the better in horse, as the worse in soote: but the spoile which hee got, by surprising his enemies carriages, made amends for all his other loffes.

ò. VII.

How EVMENES was betrayed to ANTICONVS, and flaine.

V MENES, comming into his Campe, and finding the Silver spields extremely discontented with their misfortune, beganne to cheere them vp, and put them in hope of recourring all with aduantage. For their braue demeanor that day had so crushed the enemy, that he had no power left, wherewith to abide them in open field, and was much lesse able to draw their Carts after him, through that great Wildernesse, ouer the 10

But these perswasions availed nothing. Peucestes was gone; the other Captaines would needs returne into the high Countries; and the Soldiers had no delire either to flie or to fight, but onely to recouer their goods. Wherefore Teutamus, one of the two Captaines of the Silver-shields, (who had in former times readily consented vnto traiterous motions, in hope of gaine, but was letted by his partner Antigenes) finding, as he thought, a fit occasion of making himselfe great, and winning the loue ofthose bands, dealt secretly with Antigonus, requesting him to restore vnto those old Souldiers their goods, which he had taken, being the onely reward of their feruices, in the warres of Philip and Alexander.

Antigonus, as a subtile man, knew very well, that they which requested more than they had reason to expect, would also, with a little entreatie, performe a great deale more than they promised; and therefore he louingly entertained the messengers, filling them with hopes of greater matters than they defired, if they would put Eumenes into his hands, by whom they were seduced to make warre against him. This answere pleased them so well, that they forthwith deuised how to deliper him alive, Wherefore comming about him, as at other times, to doe their dutic, and pretending more joy of their victorie, than forrow of their losse, which they faid they would redeeme by another fight; in the middest of this goodly talk they leapt vpon him, caught hold of his fword, and bound him fast. So they haled 30 him away; and stopping their cares against all perswasions, would not yeeld so far, as to loofen one of his hands and let him kill himselfe, but brought him aliue (that was their owne Generall, under whom they had obtained many victories ) as it had beene intriumph, into the Campe of their enemies.

The presse of men, running out of the Campe to see him, was so great, that Antigonus was faine, to fend a guard of horsemen and Elephants, to keep him from being smothered; whom he could not sodainely resolue, either to kill or saue. Very few they were that sucd for his life; but of these, Demetrius the sonne of Anticonus was one; the rest were desirous to be rid of him quickly; thinking belike, that if he were faued, he would foon be the chiefe in reputation, for his great abilitie. So after 40 long deliberation, Antigonus concluded, that it was the safest way, to put him to death, which intending to have done by famine (perhaps because he would keep it awhile in his owne power, to reverse the sentence, as desiring, if it might be, to have him liue his friend) haste of other businesse made him doe it by the sword.

To this end came all the trauailes of that worthy generall Eumenes; who had with great wisedome, fidelitie, and patience laboured in vaine, to vphold the family which God had purposed to cast downe. He is reckoned among the notable examples of Fortunes mutabilitie; but more notable was his gouernment of himselfe, in all her changes. Aduersitie neuer lessened his courage, nor Prosperitie his circumspection. But all his vertue, industrie, and wit, were cast away, in leading an Armie, 50 without full power, to keepe it in due obedience. Therefore it was not ill answered, by Gaspar de Collignie, Admiral of France in our dayes, to one that foretold his death, which ensued soone after in the massacre of Paris; That rather than to leade againe an Armic of Voluntaries, he would die a thousand times.

Antigonus

Antigonus himselfe gaue to the bodie of Eumenes honourable Funerall; and rewarded the Treason, wrought against him, with deserved vengeance. One chiefe Captaine of the Silner-shields he burnt alive; many of the other Captaines he flue; & to the whole multitude of the Silver-fields, that had betraied fo worthy a Commander, he appointed a Leader, that should carrie them into farre Countries, under pretence of warres; but with a priny charge, to confume them all, as perinted wretches, letting none of them returne aliue vnto his friends and kindred, or so much as once behold the Seas, that beate vpon the shoares of Greete and Maceden.

d. VIII.

How ANTICONVS flew PITHON, and occupied MEDIA. How he removed Governours of Provinces, and made himselfe Lord of Perlia, carrying away PEVCESTES.

He two Armies being joyned thus in one, were carried into Media, where they spent the rest of the Winter; the common Souldieridly; the principall men intentinely bent vnto the businesse ensuing. Pithon began to confider his owne descruings; for that the whole warre had beene chiefely maintained by the strength and riches of his Pro-

uince. Belides, he thought himselfe as good a man as Antigonus, vnlesse it were in the Souldiers opinion, which he judged case to be purchased with gifts, and therefore foared not to assay them with great liberalitie. But in following this course, hee was driven by necessitic to trust many, of whom he stumbled upon some, that were vnsecret, and others, bearing him no sincere affection. Thus was his purpose disconered to Antigonus, who (nothing like to Pithon) diffembled his indignation, and rebuked the informers as breeders of diffention between chim, and his honourable friend, vnto whom hee meant to commit the Gouernment of all those Countries: his owne bufinesse calling him into the lower Asia. These reports, comming 30 daily to his cares, did finely delude Pithon. By his greatnesse with Alexander; his authoritie in that Province where they lay, whereof he was Gouernour; and the loue of the fouldiers which he had bought with money; he was strong enough to maintaine, even an offensive warre. But what neede had he to vse the sword, when hee was likely without contention, to obtaine more than his owne asking? Therefore he came as soone as he was sent for, to take his farewell of Antigonus, and to divide the Provinces with him, that meant nothing lesse than to yeeld to any such division. As foone as he came, he was taken, and accused, condemned to die, and slain out of hand. For Antigonus, having begunne with Eumenes his ancient friend, was not afterward restrained by any consideration of old acquaintance, from cutting down 40 indifferently all that flood in his way; but fwamme carelefly through the bloud, wherein at the first he doubtfully waded.

When this businesse was ended, he appointed a new Gouernour in Media, to order the Prouince, and a Captaine, to suppresse all commotions: thinking belike, that the power and authoritie, so divided, would hardly agree in one against him, from whom both were deriued.

After this he marched into Persia, where he was entertained, as absolute Lord of Asia. There began he to shew how well he understood his owne might inesse. For he placed and displaced, at his pleasure, Governours in all Provinces, leaving none in Office, that were not his owne creatures, excepting such as lay too farre off to 50 bedislodged casily.

Penceftes, who ruled in Per sia, thought with good cheere to redeeme old offences, but was deceived, having to doe with one, that could not be taken with such baites: he was caried away, and feasted with goodly words of promise, that neuer tooke effect. Thus he, that enuied the vertue of his friend, was driven to Batter (in vaine)

the fortune of his enemie, after which he liued a contemptible life, till needled obscurely a man forgotten.

Q. IX.

How SELEVEVS was chased out of Babylon, by ANTIGON VS. The greatriches of ANTIGONVS.

ELEVEVS was the next in this visitation; one that had from time to time continued in the same tenor of good-will to Antigonus, and 10 now gaue proofe of his heartic affection toward him, by making the Captaine of the Castle of sufa to meete him on the way, rendring vn-to him that strong Peece, and all the treasures therein best weed. This offer was fo great, that Antigonus ( though having in his hands the Keeper of the place) could hardly beleeue it; but vsed him with excessive kindnesse, for scare so good a moode should change. In that Castile he found all the treasures of Alexander, with the Iewels of the Persian Kings, which, added to his former store of money, made vp twentie fiue thousand talents. Having all this, he might well account himselse a happy man, if riches were sufficient to happinesse. But large dominion was the marke at which hee aimed, therefore hee proceeded, with intent to leane no 20 Country behind his back, that should not acknowledge him for Soueraigne Lord. Comming to Babylon, hee was entertained by Seleucus with all possible demonstration of loue, and honoured with presents, beseeming the Maiestie of a King. All this he accepted with great grauitic, as being due to him; and beganne to require an account of the reuenues of that Province. This demand Seleucus held vnreasonable; faying, that it was not needfull for him to render vnto any man an account of that Prounce, which was given vnto him, in respect of his many good services to the State. But whether he spake reason or no, it sufficed, that Antigonus was powerfull; who vrged him daily to come to a reckoning. Manifest it was, that neither want of money, nor any other necessitie, moued Antigonus to presse him thus, but 30 onely the desire to picke matter of quarrell against him, whereof it was likely that hee should find such iffue, as Pithon and Pencestes had done. Therefore taking with him onely fiftie horse, be conveied himselfe away, and fled into Ptolomies Dominions; desiring him to protect him from the violence of such a man, as went about to oppresse all, that in former times had beene his betters, or at least his equals. Antigonus was glad of his flight; for now all those Countries were yeelded vnto him without battaile, whereas to fight with Seleucus for them hee wanted all pretence; and to kill him it was not his desire, having received many benefits of him, and those not intermixed, as commonly it happens, with any injuries. Yet it is reported, that the Chaldeans brought a strange prophesic to Antigones, bidding him looke well to 40 himselfe, and know, that if Selencus did escape his hands, hee should recouer Babylon, yea, winne all Asia, and kill Antigonus in battaile. Easie belceuers may giue credit to thistale. Had it beene true, me thinkes, Antigonus rather should have hanged those Chaldeans, for giving him no warning till it was too late, than fent pursuers (as they fay that heedid) after him, whom the destinies preserued for so great purposes. When he had fettled things at Babylon, he tooke his journie into Cilicia, where he wintred. There hee tooke vp ten thou and talents more of the Kings treasures, and casting his accounts, found his yeerely income to amount vnto eleuenthou-fand Talents.

Of the great civill Warre betweene ALEXANDERS Captaines: and how they assumed the name and state of Kings.

Q. I.
The combination of PTOLOMIE, CASSANDER, and others, against ANTI-GONVS. Their demands, and his answere.

His great riches, and the rest of his power, made Antigonus dreaded, enuied, and fuspected, whereby he quickly was embarked in a new War. Ptolomie, Caf-(ander, and Ly (imachus, had privily combined themselves together, intending to hinder his further growth, and bring him to more reason, than of his owne accord he seemed like to yeeld vnto. Of their practices he had some notice; the good entertainement giuen vnto Seleucus, giuing him sufficient cause of miltrust. Therefore he sent Embassadors to them feuerally, entreating them to continue firme in their love toward him, that would be readie to requite them with the like. The cold anfwers which they made, occasioned his hasty preparation against the most forward of them, which was Ptolomie; it being likely that a good armie should prevaile more than a faire message. Therefore, as soone as the scason of the yeere would permit. he tooke the way toward Syria, and was encountred by Embassage from them all. These told him, that their Lordsdid much reioyce at his victorie, obtained against Eumenes their common enemie, and the honor that he had therby gotten. In which 30 war, for a fmuch as they being his Confederates, must have endured great losse, with hazzard of their whole estates, if the contrary faction had prevailed; they held it vericiust that all should be partakers in the fruits of that voiage, wherin they had been all adventurers. Wherefore they defired him, that making betweene them all an equall division of the treasures that were in his hands, (a thing easie to be done) he would also take some convenient order for enlarging their Dominions, according to the rate of his new purchases. This might best beeto enery ones liking if hee would make ouer Cappadocia, with Lycia, to Cassander; and Phrygia, bordering vpon the Hellespont, to Lysimachus; for wheras his own Dominions were so much extended Eastward by his late victoric, he might wel spare some of those westerne Prouinces, 40 to those that were seated in the West. As for Ptolomie, he would not craue any new addition, but rest contented within his owne Territories. Prouided alwaies, that Seleucus their common friend, and partner in the late warre, might be restored to his owne out of which he had beene driven so injuriously, that all of them were forced to take it deeply to heart; requiring amends, with his friendly confent vnto their demands, which otherwise they must labour to obtaine with armed hands.

Antigonus knew, that after many loffes received, hee should yet bee able to redeeme peace when beuer he lifted, with these, or perhaps with easier conditions. Neither was he so weak, to give away quietly any part of his strength into the hands of such bad friends, for feare only, lest it should bee taken from him perforce. Ra-50 ther he hoped that he should be able to find them worke, more than enough to defend their owne. Therefore, he roundly answered the Embassadors, that it was no part of his meaning to communicate with other men the profit of that victorie, which he alone without other mens helpe had obtained. Though indeed they had already fufficiently gained by him, if they could fee it, having by his meanes kept their gouernments, wherefthey were like to be dispossessed by Felyperchen, and the countell of chate in Macedon. But what maruaile was it, if they confidered not how he had faued them, feeing one of them had forgotten the time, when commine to him as a fugitue, & begging succour, he was by his meere bountie relieued, and enabled to get all that he now held? Cassander did not (said he) in those daies command me to surrender Provinces, and give him his equall share of my treasures; but (for his Fathers fake) defired me to pittie him, and help him against his enemics: which Idid; by lending him an Armie, and Fleet, on confidence whereof hee now prefumes to threaten me. As for Seleucus, how can he complaine of wrong, that durst not flay to plead his right? I did vie him well; but his conscience told him that he 10 had deserved ill: else he would not have fled. Let them that so curiously search into my doings, consider well their owne, which some of them can hardly justifie. I am now in the way to Syria, meaning to examine Ptolomies proceedings; and after him to deale with others, if they continue to prouoke me.

II.

The preparations and beginnings of the Warres.

Hen the Embassadors were dismissed with this answer, nothing was thought vpon but warre. Antigonus perceiving that he should bee 20 inuaded from Europe, as soone as hee were entred into Syria; left his Nephew Ptolomie to guard the Sea coasts, and hinder Cassander from landing in Alia: giving him also in charge, to drive out of Cappadocia some that were already sent ouer to molest him. Likewise he dispatched Messengers into Greece and Cypress, not vnfurnished of monie, to draw friends to his side, and raife vp troubles to his enemies. Especially, he laboured to make himselfe the strongest by Sea; to which purpose he rather hastened, than foreslowed his journey into Syria, that he might get possession of Mount Libanus, which affoorded many excellent commodities for building of a Navie. Therefore, having crected Beacons, and laid post-horses throughout all Asia, to give swift advertisement of all occurrences, 30 he inuaded Syria, that was not held against him by any power sufficient to maintaine the field.

Ptolomy lay in Egypt, the strength and heart of his Dominion, where he was beloued and honoured of the people as their naturall Lord: his other Provinces hee kept with a few Garrisons, better seruing to containe the people within obedience, than to confront a forraine enemie. So Antigonus tooke many Cities, and Places, of that Countrie, and beganne to set great numbers of Artificers on worke in making ships, which was one of his most earnest cares. In these businesses he consumed a veere and three moneths; not idly. For he tooke Ioppe, and Gaza, which were yeelded vnto his discretion, and wellvsed. The strong Citie of Tyrus held out long, 40 but was compelled in the end, by famine, to render it selfe vpon composition, that Ptolomies Souldiers might depart with their Armes; which was permitted.

Ptolomic was not ascepe, whilest these things were in doing, though he kept himselfe within the bounds of Agypt, as indeede it behoued him to doe. His forces were not able to stand against Antigonus in plaine field, but likely they were to increase, which made him willing to protract the time. Neuerthelesse by Sea (where his enemie was as yet vnready) he fent his Flect into all quarters, whereof Selencus had the chiefe command.

Seleucus passed with an hundred faile along the coast of Syria, in the full view of Antigonus, and his Armie, to their no little discomfort. He landed in Cyprus, which 50 was then gouerned by many pettic Lords; of whom the greatest adhered to Ptolomiesthe rest were, by the Factors of Antigonus, bought for him with gold, but now redeemed by the Egyptian with sharpe steele.

The same commoditie of aide by Sea encouraged the President of Caria (called also Callander, but not the sonne of Antipater, how socuer by the painefull and learned writer Reiner in Reineccius, he is by some ouerlight, counted for the same) to declare for Ptolomie, and his Confederates, and bufily imploy in their quarrell all his forces, which he had hitherto kept in good neutralitie, and thereby enjoyed reft; but now he threwe himselfe into dangerous warre, choosing rather to vidergoe trouble at hand, than to fal vnder certaine ruine, though somewhat further distant, which would have overwhelmed him, if Antigonus had beaten all the rest.

10 How each partie fought to winne the afsistance of Greece. ANTIGONVS his declaration against Cass Ander. Alexander the some of Polisper Chonrenolteth from ANTIGONVS, who had let him up.

N the meane feason all care possible was taken on both sides, to assure vnto them the people of Greece, who se aide which way so them the people of Greece, who se aide which way so the clined was of great importance. Herein at the first, Anigonus sped so well by large effusion of his treasure, that hee drew to him the Lacedamonians, and other Peloponnessans, of whom hee waged eight thought fand, and caused Polysperchon (who had a good while made hard shifts) to rowse 20 himselfe againe, and taking vpon him the title of Captaine of Peloponnesus, to make head against Cassander.

These hopeful beginnings encouraged him to proceed further in the same kind. Wherefore to make Cassander the more odious, hee called together both his owne Souldiers, and all the Greeks and Macedonians that were to bee found thereabouts. To these he declared, That Cassander had very cruelly slain Olympias, mother to the great Alexander; and not herewith contented, had flut vp in close prison the poore Ladie Roxane, Alexanders wife, and his sonne begotten on her bodie. That all this proceeded from a defire to make himselfe King over the Macedonians; which well appeared by his enforcing the Ladie The falonica, Daughter to King Philip, a match 30 vnfit for a man of no greater Parentage than he, to ioyne with him in marriage. That in meere despight of those dead Princes, Philip, and Alexander, he had planted the Olynthians, rooted out by Philip, in a new Citie by him built, and called by his owne name Callandria; and had reedified the Citic of Thebes, which for the great treason of the inhabitants, was levelled with the ground by the victorious hand of Alexander. For these reasons hee required them to make a decree, that Cassander should reflore to absolute libertie the Ladie Roxane, and her sonne; and should yeeld obedience to the Lord Lieutenant Generall of the Empire (by which name Antigonus himselse was vnderstood) or else should be reputed a Traitor, and open Enemie to the State. Furthermore he propounded, that all the Cities of Greece 40 should be restored into freedome; this he did, not because he was carefull of their good, but for the neede which he had of their affiltance.

These things being decreed, Antigonus was perswaded, that not only the Greekes would adhere vnto him, as to their louing Patron, and fall off from Caffander; but that the Rulers of Prouinces, who had hitherto suspected him as a man regardfull of nothing, but his owne benefit, would correct their opinion, and thinke him the most faithfull of all others to the Royall bloud. But concerning his loyaltie to the yong Prince, the world was too wife to be deceined with vaine shewes. His undertaking for the libertie of the Greekes was more effectuall, and got casie beliefe, in regard of his present hatred to Cassander. Yet herein also Ptolomie stroue to be as earnest as he, making the like decree, in hope to winne to himselfe that valiant Nation, which affoorded men farre more serviceable in warre, than were to be found in any Province of the Empire. And this indeede was the point, at which both sides aimed. Wherein Antigonus thinking to make all fare, deceived himselfe, not without great cost. For he gave to

Alexander the sonne of Polysperchon five hundred talents, willing him to set the warre on foot in Peloponnesus, whereby it might appeare, that on his side was meant nothing eife, than what was openly pretended.

In Peloponne (us; Caffanders men had, with much bloud-shed, gricuously afflicted the contrarie faction; and he himselfe perceiving, that they were more easily spoiled as enemes, than retained as friends, thought it the best way, to make what vse he could of them, that were not long like to continue his. Finally, perceiuing that Alexander came furnished with plentic of gold, wherewith he was able, not only to winne the doubtfull, but to corrupt such as might seeme best assured: hee thought it a good part of wisedome, to surrender upon faire conditions, that which he could to not assure himselse to hold any long time by force. Therefore he sent one to deale with Alexander, about the matters in controuersie; letting him know, that Antigonus was verie skilful in letting men together by the eares, not caring who prevailed. but only desiring to have them wearythemselves, whilest he was busied elsewhere; that so at length he might finde opportunitie to set vpon the stronger. If therefore Alexander were so wise, as to keepe in his purse the fine hundred Talents which he had, and without stroke stricken, to receive the whole Lordship of Peloponness; it should be freely put into his hands by Caffander. Provided, that hee should from thencefoorth renounce all confederacie made with Antigoniu, and enter into a fure and faithfull league with Ptolomie, Callander, and the rest of the Confederates. O- 20 therwise, he might well perswade himselfe, that the Countrie which his Father could not keepe, when he was indeede the Lieutenant of the Empire, should not in haste be wonne by him, that was only the Factor of a proud injurious man, so stilling himfelfe, but not acknowledged by others.

Alexander had lived a while with Antigonus fince the beginning of these wars; among whose followers it was not hard to discouer the intent, (which hee did not carrie verie secret ) of making himselfe absolute Lord of all. Therefore he was soone entreated to accept so good an offer; and did not sticke to enter into that league, whereby he was to become a free Lord, and subject vnto no mans controll.

Howbeit this his honour continued not long, ere he lost both it and his life toge- 30 ther, by treason of the Siegonians; who thinking thereby to have made themselves free, were soone after vanquished in battaile by Cratesipolis, Alexanders wife, a discreet and valiant Ladie. Shee in revenge of her husbands death, crucified thirtie of the Citizenstaken in fight; and having by severity taught them obedience, did afterwards containe her Armie in good order, and gouerned those places that shee held, with the loue and commendation of her Subjects and Neighbours.

d. IIII.

The Atolians rife against CASSANDER in favour of ANTIGONVS, and are beaten. Afleet and land-armie of ANTIGONVS, viterly defeated by PTOLOMIES Lieutenant. In what termes the warre stood at this time. ANTIGONVS drawes neerer to Greece.

NTIGONVS, when he found, that with fo much monie he had onely bought an enemie, beganne to raife troubles to Cassander and his other aduer laries in Greece, by stirring up the Atolians against them; Likewise he laboured to winne to his partie the Ilands in the Greeke 50 Scas, by whose affiftance he might be the better able to deale with

Ptolomie, that greatly prevailed by reason of his strong fleet. But neither of these attempts had the successe which he expected. The Atolians, a factious Nation, and alwaies enuying the greatnesse of their Neighbours, were often in commotion, but fo, that commonly their gaines equalled not their losses. Callander wanne some of their owne Countrie; fortified the Acarnanians against them, and compelled Glasscias. King of the Illyrians, whom he vanquilhed in battaile, to for fake their fide, and binde himselfe to beare no Armes against Cassanders friends.

On the other side, as many pettie Ilands were drawne to joyne with Antigonus: fo the fleet of the Rhodians under Theodatus, who was Admiralito Antigonus, palfine along the coast of Asia towards Cyprus, with an Armie vider conduct of Perilans marching on the shore for mutuall assistance, was quite overthrowne by Ptolomies Nauic. Polyclytus, who in Ptolomies behalfe had been fent into Peloponnesus a-10 gainst Alexander, finding no neede of his service in that Countrie, because Alexander was come over to their fide, returned homewards, and by the way heard of the course which these Antigonians held, whom he very cunningly surprised. Hee rode with his Fleet behinde a Cape, which the enemies were to double; his Land-forces he placed in ambush, whereinto Perilaus falling was taken prisoner, with many of hismen, and many were flaine, making little refiftance. Theodation the Admirall perceining this, made all hafte to helpe his fellowes that were on Land; but whileft he with all his Fleet were intentiue only to that businesse, Polyelytus appeared at their backs; who as foone as he perceived their diforder, haltened about the Cape, and charging them behinde suffered not one of them to escape him. These ill tidings 20 caused Antigonus to deale with Ptolomie about some composition. First, hee sent Embassadors; afterwards they met in person. But Antigonus would not yeeld vnto the demands of Ptolomie: so the parlie was vaine.

Hitherto each part seemed to have indifferently sped in the Warre, and thereby to have equall cause of hope and scare. This late victorie with the good successe of his affaires in Cyprus, did seeme to make amends to Ptolomie for his losses in Syria. Likewisc the revolt of Alexander from Antigonus did equall the Confederacy, made betweene the Ætolians and him; as also those pettie skirmishes, that had beene in Asia the lesse, to Antigonus his advantage, were sufficiently recompensed by others of like regard, but aduerfe to him; and by the troubles brought vpon his estates in

Contrariwife, Antigonis valued the losse of his men, monie, and ships, no otherwise than as the paring of his nailes, that were left long enough, and would easily grow againe; but the enlargement of his Territorie by addition of Syria, he prized at a higher rate, as if thereby he had fed vpon a limbe of Ptolomie his enemie, and strengthened the body of his owne Empire. Concerning other accidents, whereof the good were hitherto sufficient to counterpoize the bad, he meant to proceed as occasion should direct, which commonly is not long wanting to them, that want

That which most molested him was the attempts of his enemies vpon Asia the 40 leffe; wherein though as yet they had gotten little, yet had he cause to seare, left the people being tyed vnto him by no bond of allegeance, might vpon small occafion reuolt from him, to men of as honourable reputation as he himselfe. To prevent this, and to be necret to Greece, he held it expedient for him to be there in person, where his affaries did sceme to prosper the worse, by reason of his absence. Therefore he left part of his Armie in Syria, vnder his sonne Demetrius, to whom being then but two and twenty yeeres old, he appointed many ancient Captaines as affiftants, or rather as Directors: the rest he carried with him into Phrygia, where he meant to winter.

How LYSIMACHUS and CASSANDER vanquished some enemies, raised against them by ANTIGONVS. The good successe of ANTIGONVS in Asia and Greece: with the rebellion of many Cities against CASSANDER.

He comming of Antigonus into those parts, wrought a great alteration in the processe of his businesse thereabouts. For his enemies had short leifure to thinke vpon molesting him in Asia: they themselves to were held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe inc. Semons a King of the Thracians, ioyning with some Townes that rebelled awere held ouer-hardly to their owne worke on Europe lide. Senthes a gainst Lysimachus, brought also the bordering Scythians into the quarrell. All these relyed vpon antigonus, who was to helpe them with monie, and other aide. The Atolians likewise tooke courage, and rose against Cassander, having Aacides, lately restored to the Kingdome of Epirus, their assistant. But Lysimachus gaue vnto his Rebels no time to confirme themselues. Hee sodainely presented himselse before two of the Cities that had rebelled, and compelled them by feare to returne to their dutie. He fought a battaile with the Seythians, and wilde Thracians, and draue them out of the Countrie. Finally, he ouercame Seuthes; and following the heate 20 of his victorie, flew Paufanias in battaile, whom Antigonus had fent ouer with an Armie; and all his men he did either put to ransome, or fill vp with them his owne Bands. The like successe had Philip, Cassanders Lieutenant, against the Ætolians. For he wasted their Countrie; fought with the Epirotes, that came to helpe them; and after the victorie, fought againe with their forces ioyned in one, overthrowing them, and killing Lacides that vn fortunate King. Finally, hee draue the Ltolians out of most of their Countrie, and forced them to seek their safetie among the wild Mountaines. Of the Epirotes he fent as prisoners to Cassander, the principall authors of the Kings restitution, and of the present Warre.

Yet these actions required some time, and wearied Antigonia his aductsaries 30 with painefull trauaile; after which they remained onely fauers. Antigonus himfelfe at faire leifure, wanne all Caria the whilest, and fent Armies into Peloponnesus, and other parts of Greece, bestowing libertic vpon all the Cities he tooke out of Ca/fanders hands. The whole Countrie of Peloponnesus (excepting Sievon and Corinth) with the Ile of Eubwa, and many places of the firme Land, were by these meanes wonne to be his in true and vehement affection, ready to do or fuffer any thing for him that had made so euident a demonstration of his readinesse, to give them the libertie indeede, which others promifed in idle words. Many States desirous of the fame benefit, would faine have shewed their good will; but they were kept in by Casanders Garrisons, who was too wise to trust them look. Therefore Antigonus 40 made shew as if he would passe ouer into Macedon: by which terror he forced Casfander to repaire thither in al hafte, with the best of his strength, leaving many good Townes of Greece so weakely guarded, that well they might take courage to helpe themselves, if any for raine succour appeared. The aide which they defired was not long wanting. The Lieutenants of Antigonus, taking the advantage of Callanders departure, entred the Countrie; draue his Garrisons out of divers Cities; forced the Gouernour of Athens to enter into league with their Lord; wanne the Citadell of Thebes, and set the people at libertie. This last action was somewhat remarkable. For Thebes had not long before beene raised out of her old ruines by the meere power of Cassander; of which act he was accused by Antigonius, as if it had beene so fome hainous crime. Yet now the same Antigonus winneth the Citic, and the loue of the Inhabitants, onely by expelling him that was their Founder. So much are men readier to thanke the Increaser, than the Author of their good; and rather to looke forward vpon those hopes, which vainely they extend beyond all measure, than backward vpon their miferable nullitie, that held them vncapable of being any thing.

V I.

Victories of PTOLOMIE by Sea. A great battaile at Gaza, which PTOLOMIE and SELEVCV's wanne, against DEME-TRIVS the Sonne of ANTICONVS.

S the presence or necrones of Antigonus gave life to his affaires in the lower Asia, and Greece; so the designes of his enemies, taking advantage of his absence, ruined the very foundations of those great works in the Easterne parts, wherewith in the yeere preceding he had oner. topped them. The Isle of Cyprus, whose Princes wanered betweene contrarie affections, inclining one while to Antigonus, another while faintly regarding their couenant with Ptolomie, was visited by an Agyptian fleet, wherewith Ptolomie, in his owne person, casily reduced them to a more settled order, putting fome to death, carrying others away prisoners, and leaving a Lieutenant of his own 20 appointment, Gouernour of the whole Countrie. With the same fleet he ranne alongst the Sea-coasts, wasting a great part of Caria and Cilicia, with the spoiles of which he enriched his followers, and returned loden to Cyprus. Demetrius the fonne of Antigonus, hearing frequent reports of the miseries, wherewith his Fathers subjects were oppressed, made all haste out of Syria to the rescue, taking only his Horse and light-armed foot with him, because the businesse required expedition. But in vaine did he tire himselse and his followers, in hastic feeking of one, that by lanching out into the deepe, could in a few minutes delude the labour of fo many daies. if neede had so required. Answerable to the vanitie of this expedition was the successe. For Ptolomie was gone, before Demetrius came into Cilvia. Neither was it cer-20 taine, whether having lightened his ships of their burthen in Cyprus, hee would returne vpon those maritime Countries; or make toward Spria, where his comming was expected. Hee was indeede gone into Egypt, and there with Seleneus was describing a royall Armie, which he levied with all convenient speed, for the recoveric of Syria. This was more than Demetrius knew. Therfore hee was faine to choose out of vncertainties the most likelihood, and returne the way that hee came, with all his companies, which were fitter for feruice in the open field, than to be bestowed in Garrifons among the Cilicians. He had scarce refreshed his Men and Horses in Syria, when the newes arrived of Ptolomies comming with a puilfant Armic, to give him battaile. Hereupon he called to counfaile his principall friends, who aduised 40 him to give way to the time, & expect fome better opportunity in the future: being a yong man, and weakely furnished with meanes to relist such ancient and famous Generals, as Ptolomie and Seleucus. This counsaile seemed rather to proceede from the cold temper of those aged menthat gaueit, than from any necessity growing out of the present businesse. For Demetrius considering himselfe to be the sonne of Antigonus, and now Generall of his Fathers Armie, thought his owne title waightie cnough to bee laid in ballance against the bare names of those two great Commanders. Neither found he much reason that should move him to distrust his forces, as insufficient. His men were better exercised than the enemies, and promised as much as could be required. Therefore perswading himselfe, that such oddes of number, 50 and of great fame, would rather ferue to adorne his victorie, than hinder him in obtaining it, he resolved to put the matter to triall, without expecting the advantage of more help. So animating his Soldiers with hope of spoile and rewards, he abode the comming of the Enemies at Gaza, with purpole to encounter them, as soone as they had finished their wearisome journie over the Desarts of Arabia.

Ptolomie

Ptolomie and Sciencus issuing out of sorich a Province, as Agypt, came so well

prouided of all necessaries, that their Armie felt not any great grievance of the euill way, when battaile was presented them, which confidently they undertooke. In all things else they had the ods of Demetrius; of Elephants they were vtterly vnorouided. But how to deale with those beasts they were not ignorant. They had pred. VII.

How SELEVCVS recovered Babylon, and made himselfe Lord of many Countries in the highest Asia. The ÆR A of the Kingdome of the Greckes, which beganne with the Dominion of SELEVEVS.

Hile Ptolomie followed his businesse with such prosperitie, Seleucus tooke leave of him, and went up to Babylon, to trie his owne fortune; which hee found to fauourable, that recouring first his owne Prouince, hee became at length mafter of the better part of Alexanders

This expedition of Selencus was very strange, and full of vnlikelihoods. Histraine confished of no more then eight hundred foote, and two hundred horse, a number too small to have been placed as Garrison, in some one of those maine great Cities. against which he carried it into the higher Asia. But little force is needfull, to make way into strong places, for him that alreadic stands possessed of their hearts which dwell within the walls. The name of Selencus was enough; whom the Babylonians had found so good a Gouernour; that none of them would finde courage to relist 20 him; but left that worke to Antigonus his owne men, withing them ill to speede. Some of the Macedonians that were in those Countries, had the like affection; others made a countenance of warre, which by easie compulsion they left off, and followed new Enfignes. This added courage to the people, who came in apace, and fubmitted themselves ioyfully to Seleucus. In a defection so generall, it was not a safe course for the Antigonians, to thrust themselves into the Townes of most importance: for every man of them should have been troubled with daily enemies, in his owne lodging. It remained that they should iffue forth into the field, and trie the matter by fight. But the treason of one principall man, who revolted to the enemie, with more then a thousand Souldiers following him, so dismaied the rest, that 30 they did no more than seeke to make good one strong place, wherein were kept the Hostages and Prisoners, that Antigonus held for his securitie in those quarters. This Callle, belike, they had not fortified in times of leifure, against dangers, that were not then apparent. Seleucus quickly tooke it; and so got the entire possession of Me-Sopotamia and Babylon.

Antigonus had bestowed in Media and Persia, forces convenient for defence of those Prouinces, that were the vtmost of his Dominion. In the Countries about Euphrates he had not done the like: for his owne great Armie lay betweene them and all enemies. Therefore when the victorie at Gaza had opened vnto Seleucus the way into those parts; hee found little impediment in the rest of his businesse. 49 Hauing now gotten what he fought, it behoused him to feeke how he might keepe his gettings: for his owne forces were too fmall, and his friends were ill able to lend him any more. That which his friends could not doe for him; his enemies did. Nicanor, to whom Antigonus had committed his Armie in Media, joyning vnto himselfe, out of Persia and other Countries, all needfull helpe came with ten thousand foote, and seuen thousand horse, either to sauc all from being lost, or to drive Seleuces out of that which he had wonne. Against this power, Seleucus had only foure hundred horse, and somewhat aboue three thousand foot, where with to oppose himselfe: his large conquest of vnwarlike Nations having yeelded him many louing subjects, but few souldiers. There-To fore when his enemies were neere to the River of Tigris, hee withdrew himselfe from the place where his refistance was expected, into certaine marishes not farre off; where he lay secretly waiting for some advantage. Nicanor thought that hee had beene fled, and was the leffe carefull in fortifying his campe. In recompence of this vaine securitie, his campe was taken by surprise, the first night of his arrivall; pared a kinde of Palisado, fastened together with chaines, and sharpened in such manner, that the Elephants could not feeke to breake vpon it, without receiving much hurt. The rest of their forces, which (besides that they had advantage in multitude) were heartened with many fortunate services, by them performed that veere, whilest the enemies had wearied themselves, either with vaine iournies, or 10 long and dulling expectation, they disposed in such order, as best answered to the forme, wherein Demetrius was embattailed. The fight beganne, and was maintained with equall courage, for a long time, each part firining more to winne honour. than to satisfic any other passion, as having little cause of hatred, or revenge. But after some continuance, the greater number holding better out, the error of Demetrius, who vpon no necessitie would needs fight a battaile with disaduantage, beganne to appeare by his losses. Hee had committed himselfe to Fortune, having more to lose by her then he could get: but in this fight shee was idle, and left all to be decided by frong hands; vnleffe it may be faid, that the terror brought voon his men, by the losse of his Elephants, was bad luck. Those beasts were in that kinde 20 of warre hardly to be relisted on plaine ground, and therefore at the first they made great spoile amongst Ptolomies men. Afterward seeking to breake through the Palisado, they were forely hurt, and curry one of them taken. This disaster caused the Horsemen of Demetrius to faint. They had laboured hard, and prevailed little. till now perceiuing that all must lie vpon their hands, who were ill able to make their owne places good, they beganne to shrinke, and many of them to prouide for their fasctie by timely flight, which example the rest quickly followed. When Demetrius had stroucn so long in vaine to make his men abide, that hee himselse was likely to be loft; he was faine to give place to the stronger, making a violent retrait as farre as to Azotus, which was about thirtie miles from the place of battaile. A great part of 20 his carriages was in Gaza, whither some of his company turned aside, hoping to faue such goods, as in haste they could pack vp. This foolish couetousnes was their destruction, and the losse of the Towne. For whilest they forgetfull of the danger, had filled the streets with sumpter Horses, & cloied vp the gates, thronging, some to get in and fetch, others, to carrie out what they had alreadie loden, Ptolomies Armie brake in without relistance, taking them with their goods and the Citie altogether.

This victorie restored vnto Ptolomie the best part of Syria, a Prouince more easie in those times to get, than to keepe; and opened the way vnto all the greatnesse of Selencus. For betweene Gaza and Phanicia no place offered resistance. In Calosyria 40 and Phanisia, some townes held out a while, but were soone taken in by Ptolomie. Among these were the great Cities of Tyrus and Sidon; of which Sidon was given up by the Inhabitants; Tyrus by the Garrison, falling to mutinie against their Captaine; who trufting to the firength of it, had made great vaunts, but was pardoned by Ptolomie, and honourably entertained, in respect of his fidelitie.

the Satrapa, or Licutenant of Persia, together with sundry of the Captaines, were flaine, he himselfe was driven to fice for his life into the Desarts; and the whole Armic yeelded vnto Seleucus: whose gentle demeanour, after the victorie, drew all Media, Sustana, and the Neighbour Provinces, to acknowledge him their Lord without any further stroke stricken.

This victorie of Seleucus gaue beginning vnto the new stile, of The Kinedome of the Greekes, an accompt much vsed by the Iewes, Chaldeans, Syrians, and other Nations in those parts. I will not make any long disputation about the first yeere of this Æra. The authoritie of that great Astrologer Ptolomie, from which there is Ptol. Almag List no appeale, makes it plaine, that the fine hundred and nineteenth yeere of NABON AS. SAR, was the fourescore and two yeere of this accompt. Other inference hereupon is L. Gauric, in an needleffe, than that note of the learned GAVRICUS, That the first of these reeres notal ad locum was reckoned compleat, at Babylon, together with the end of four e hundred thirsic and eight veeres after NABONASSAR. With the observation of the Saturne, recorded by Ptolomie, agrees (as it ought) the calculation of Bunting; finding the same Planet to have beene so placed in the signe of Virgo, as the Chaldaans had observed it, in the same veere; which was from Nabonassar the fine hundred and nineteenth; from Seleucus the fourescore and two yeere; and the last of the hundred thirtie and seuenth Olympiad. These observations of the Celestial bodies, are the surest markes of time: from which he that wilfully varies, is inexcusable. As for such occurrences 20 in Historic, and the yeeres of succeeding Princes (that are not seldome ambiguous, by reason of vnremembred fractions) if they seem to be here-against, it is not greatly materiall. Yet thus much is worthy of note; that these yeeres of the Greekes were not reckoned in all Countries from one beginning; as plainely appeares in the difference of one yeere, that is found betweene actions, related by the seucrall Authors of the two Bookes of the Machabees, who follow divers accompts. Hee that shall adhere to the time defined by Ptolomie, may apply the other supputations thereunto as being no farther from it, than a yeeres distance.

How PTOLOMIE lost all that he had wonne in Syria. What the causes were of the quiet obedience, performed unto the Macedonians, by thefe that had beene Subject unto the Persian Empire. Of divers pettie enterprizes, taken in hand by ANTIGON V S and DEMETRIVS. with ill successe.

N a happy houre did Seleueus aduenture, to goe vp to Babylon, with fo few men as his friend could then well fpare: for had he staied longer 40 vpon hope of getting more Soldiers, Ptolomie could haue spared him noneat all. Demetrius the sonne of Antigonus, having lost the battaile at Gaza, received from Ptolomie all his ownegoods, his Pages, and

Servants, in free gift, and there with all a courteous message, to this effect: That no personall hatred was the ground of this Warre, which hee and his Confederates held with Antigonia; but onely termes of honour, wherein they would feeke to right themselves after such manner, that other friendly Offices, without reference to the quarrell, should not be forgotten.

This Noble dealing of Ptolomie, did kindle in Demetrius an earnest desire of requiting him, with some as braue liberalitie. Which to effect, he gathered together so the remainder of his broken troups; drew as many as could be spared, out of the Garrisons in Cilicia, or other Provinces thereabouts, and advertising his Father of his misfortune, befought him to fend a new fupply, wherewith he might redeeme his honour loft. Antigonus, vpon the first newes of this ouerthrow, had said,

That the victory which Ptolomic wanne vpon a beardlesse Boy, should bee taken from him by bearded men: yet vpon defire that his sonne, whom hee tenderly loued, should amend his owne reputation. He was content to make a stand in Phrygia, Ptolome hearing of Demetrius his preparations, did neuerthelette follow his owne businesse in Calofyrus, thinking it enough, to send part of his Armie under Cilles his Lieutenant, against the commant of those, that had beene alreadic vanquished, when their forces were entire. This peraduenture would have beene sufficient : had not Cilles too much undervalued the power of fuch an Enemie. Hee thought that this yong Gallant, having lately faued his life by flight, would now be more carefull of to having a faire way at his back, than adventurous in fetting further forward, then vrgent reason should prouoke him. In this confidence he passed on without al feares as one that were already Master of the field, and should meete with none, that would iffue out of their places of strength, to make relistance. When Demetrius was informed of this careleffe march; he tooke the lightest of his Armie, and made his iournie with such diligence, one whole night, that early in the morning, hee came vpon Cilles vnexpected, and was on the fuddaine, without any battaile, Master of his Campe: taking him aline, with his Souldiers, and their carriages all at once. This exploit served not onely to repaire the credit of Demetring, which his loffeat

Gaza had almost ruined: but further it enabled him, to recompence the bountie of 20 Ptolomie, with equal fauor, in restoring to him Cilles, with many other of his friends, accompanied with rich prefents. But neither was Ptolomie to weakned by this loffe, nor Demetrius fo emboldened by his victorie, that any matter of confequence their voon ensued. For Demetrius feared the comming of Ptolomie; and therefore hee fortified himselfe in places of advantage: Ptolomie on the other side was loth to engage himselfe in an enterprise, wherein he might perceive, that if the comming of Antigonus found him entangled, he should either bee driven to make a shamefull retrait, ora dangerous adventure of his whole chate, in hope of not much more than alreadie he possessed.

Antigonies, indeede, was nothing flow in his way towards Syria; whither hee 30 made all hafte, not so much to relieue his sonne, as to embrace him. For hee rejoyced exceedingly, that the yong man had fo well acquitted himselfe, and being left to his owne aduice, performed the office of a good Commander. Wherefore to increase the reputation of this late victorie, he brought such forces, as might serve to re-conquer all Syria: meaning, that the honour of all, should be referred vnto the good foundation, layed by his fonne; whom from this time forwards, he imploied in matters of greatest importance.

Ptolomie had now leffe reason, to encounter with Antigonus, than before his comming to have affailed the Campe of Demetrius. Yet he made it a matter of confultation; as if he had dared more than he meant. But all his Captaines aduited him 40 to retire into £gypt; alleaging many good arguments, to that purpose: which they might well perceive to be agreeable to his owne intent, by his propounding that course; not without remembrance of the good successe against Perdice as, in the like defentine warre. So he departed out of Syria, preserving his honour; as being rather led by mature deliberation, than any fuddaine passion of seare; and hee departed at faire leifure, not onely carrying his treafures along with him, but flaying to difmantle some principall Cities, that he thought most likely to trouble him in the future. All the Countrie that hee left at his back, fell prefently to Antigonia, without putting him to the trouble of winning it by pieces: fo easie was it in those times, for the Captaine of a strong Armie, to make himselfe Lord of a great

We may jully wonder, that these Kingdomes of Syria, Media, Babylon, and manyother Nations, (which the victoric of Alexander had ouer-runne, with so hastie a course, as gaue him not leisure to take any good view of them) were so easily held not onely by himselfe, but by the Captaines of his Armie after him. The hot contentions for superioritie betweene the King of Israel, and those of Damaseus; betweene Agypt, and Babylon; Babylon, and Nineue; the Persians, and many Countries; argue a more manly temper, to have once beene in those people; which are now so patient of a forraigne yoke, that like Sheepe or Oxen, they suffer themselues to be distributed, sought for, wonne, lost, and againe recovered, by contentious Matters; as if they had no title to their owne heads, but were borne to follow the fortune of the Macedonians. This will appeare the more strange, if wee shall confider, how the scuerall States of Greece (many of which had never possessed so large Dominion, as might cause their Spirits to swell beyond their abilitie) did greedily embrace all occasions of libertic; and how these proud Conquerours were to glad to offer it, desiring to have them rather friends than servants, for seare of surther inconvenience.

The fourth Booke of the first part CHAP.5. S.S.

It must therefore be noted, that most of these Countries had alwaies beene subica vnto the rule of Kings, or pettic Lords, whom the Babylonians and Persians long fince had root ed out. & held them in such bodage, that few of them knew any other Law, than the command of forraigne Masters. This had vtterly taken from them al remembrance of home-borne Princes, & incorporated them into the great body of the Perlian Empire: fo that wanting within themselves all soveraignepower, or high authoritie, the life & spirit of enery Estate; they lay as dead, and were bereaued of motion, when that Kingdome fell, whereof they lately had beene members.

Why the Persian Satrapa, or Princes of that Empire, did not when Dariss was taken from them, as the Macedonian Captaines, after the death of Alexander, flive to lay hold vpon those Provinces, which had many ages beene subject vnto them, and scarce foure yeeres in quiet possession of their enemies; or why at least they contended not (when the terrible name of that great Conquerour did cease to affright them) to get their shares among his followers, if not wholly to dispossess them of their new purchases: it is a question, wherein, who is not satisfied, may find no lesse reason to suspect the Historie, than authoritie to confirme it. For we seldome reade, that any small Kingdome, prevailing against a farre greater, hath made so entire a conquest, in the compasse of ten yeeres, as left vnto the vanquished no hope of rc- 30 concrie, nor meanes to rebell; especially when such disorders, or rather vtter confusion hath ensued, by the suric of civill warre among the Victors.

The cause why the Macedonians held so quietly the Persian Empire, is well set downe by Machianell; and concernes all other Kingdomes, that are subject vinto the like forme of Gouernement: the fumme whereof is this. Wherefocuer the Prince doth hold all his Subjects under the condition of flaues; there is the conquest easie, and soone assured: Where ancient Nobilitie is had in due regard, there is it hard to winne all, and harder to keepe that which is wonne. Examples of this are the Turkish Empire, and the Kingdome of France. If any Inuader should preuaile fo farre vpon Turkie, that the great Sultan and his Children (for brethren hee 40 vieth not to suffer aliue) were taken or saine: the whole Empire would quickly bee wonne, and easily kept, without any danger of rebellion. For the Bassass, how great focuer they may feeme, are meere flaues; neither is there in all that large Dominion, any one man, whose personall regard could get the people to follow him in such an attempt, where in hope of private gaine, should not countervaile all apparent matter of feare. Contrariwise, in France, it were not enough for him that would make a conquest, to get into his hands the King and his Children; though hee further got the better part of the Countrie, and were by farre the strongest in the field. For, besides the Princes of the Royall bloud, there are in that Kingdome store of great men; who are mightie in their feuerall Countries, and having certaine Roy- 50 altics and Principalities of their owne; are able to raise Warre, in all quarters of the Realme; whereunto the remembrance of their owne ancient Families, and long continued Nobilitic, will alwaics stirre vp and inflame them, so that untill eucry one piece were wonne, and enery one (an endlesse work) of the chiefe Nobilitic, brought under or deltroyed, the victoric were not compleat, nor well affured. It is true, that such power of the Nobilitie, doth often-times make way for an Inuader: to whom the discontentments of a few can callly make a faire entrance. But such affiliants are not fo eafily kept, as they are gotten: for they looke to bee fatisfied at full in all their demands; and having what they would, they foone returne to their old ailegeance, vpon condition to keepe what they have, vnleffe they be daily hired with new rewards; wherein it is hard to pleafe one man, without offending another as good as himfelfe. The Turke, on the other fide, needes not to fear any perill, that might arise from the discontented spirits of his principal men. The greato tell mischiefe that any of them could worke against him, were the betraying of fome frontier Towne, or the wilfull loffe of a battaile; which done, the Traitor hath fpent his sting, and must either flie to the enemie, whereby he loseth all that he formerly did hold, or elfe, in hope of doing fome further harme, he must aduenture to excuse himselfe vnto his Master, who seldome forgives the Captaine, that hath not thriven by desperate valour against missortune. As for making head, or arming their followers against the great Sultan, and so ioyning themselves vnto any Inuader; it is a matter not to be doubted: for none of them have any followers or dependants at all, other than such, as are subject vnto them, by vertue of their Offices and Commissions. Now as this base condition of the principall men, doth 20 leave vnto them no mean, whereby to oppose themselves against the flourishing estate of their Prince; so would it weaken both their power and their courage in giuing him assistance, if aductitie should make him stand in neede of them. For there is scarce any one among the Turkes Bassies, or prouncial! Governours, that knowes either from whence hee was brought, or from whom descended, nor any one among them, that by the loffe and vtter ruine of the Turkish Empire, can lose any foot of his proper inheritance, and it is the proper inheritance of the subiect, which is also a Kingdome vnto him, which makes him fight with an armed heart against the Conquerer, who hath no other denice painted on his Ensigne, than the picture

As is the Turkish Empire, so was the Persian, voide of libertie in the Subjects, 30 and vererly destitute of other Nobilitie, than such as depended upon meere fauour of the Prince. Some indeede there were of the Royall bloud, and others, descended from the Princes that iouned with Darius, the Sonne of Hystaspes, in oppresfing the Magi: these were men of reputation in Persia; but their reputation consisted only in their Pedigree, and their safetie in not medling with affaires of State, which made them little esteemed. In what small account these Persian Princes were held, it may appeare by this, that the Kings Vncles, Coufin Germans, and Brethren, were called by the Kings, Their Slaves, and so did stile themselves, in speaking vnto these great Monarchs. That vpon every light occasion of displeasure they were handled as Slaues; it is easie to be discerned, in that example of crueltie, prachiled by Xerxes upon his owne brother M fiftes, which hath beene formerly noted, in place more convenient. As for the Satrapa, or Governours of the Provinces, it is needleffe to cite examples, proping them to have beene meere flaves: it may fuffice, that their heads were taken from them at the Kings will; that is, at the will of those Women and Eunuches, by whom the King was gouerned.

To this want of Nobilitie in Persia, may be added the generall want of libertie convenient among the people: a matter no lesse available, in making easie and fure the conquest of a Nation, then is the cause assigned by Machiauel. For as Afope his Asse did not care to runne from the enemies, because it was not possible, 50 that they should loade him with heavier burthens, then his Master caused him daily to beare: so the Nations, that endure the worst under their owne Princes, are not greatly fearefull of a forraigne yoke; Nor will be hastie to shake it off, if by experience they finde it more light, then was that whereunto they had bee nelog

accultomed. This was it that made the Gaseoignes beare such faithfull affection to the Kings of England; for that they governed more mildly than the French: this enlarged the Fenetian iurisdiction in Lumbardie; for the Townes that they wanne, they wanne out of the hands of Tyrannous oppressors: and this side cause the Macedonians, with other Nations, that had beene subject vnto the posterice of Alexanders followers, to serve the Romans patiently, it not willingly; for that by them they were cased of many burthens, which had beene imposed upon them by their owne Kings.

So that of this tamenesse, which we finde in those that had beene subjects of the Persian Kings, the reasons are apparent. Yet some of these there were, that could 10 not so callly be contained in good order by the Macedonians: for they had not indeede beene absolutely conquered by the Persian. Such were the Sogdians, Ba-Grians, and other Nations about the Caspian Sea. Such also were the Arabians bordering vpon Syria: against whom Antigonus sent part of his Armie; thinking therwith to bring them under; or rather to get a rich bootie. The Captaine that hee fent, fell vpon the Nabathaans, at such time as they were busied in a great Mart, wherein they traded with the more remote Arabians, for Myrrhe, Frankinsenfe. and other fuch commodities. All or most of these rich wares, together with fine hundred talents of filuer, and many prisoners, the Macedonians laid hold vpon: for their comming was suddaine, and vnexpected. But ere they could recouer Syria, 20 the Nabatheans ouertooke them, and finding them wearie with long marches, made Jucha flaughter, that of foure thousand foote, and sixe hundred horse, onely fiftie horseestaped. To revenge this losse, Demetrius was set out with a greater power: yet all in vaine; for he was not relifted by any Armic, but by the naturall defence of a vast Wildernesse, lacke of water, and of all things necessarie. Therefore he was glad to make peace with them; wherein he loft not much honour; for they craved it, and gaue him presents. Returning from the Nabathaans, hee viewed the Lake As Chalittes, whence he conceined hope of great profit that might be raifed, by gathering the Sulphure. With this good husbandrie of his lonne, Antigonus was well pleased; and appointed mento the worke: but they were slaine by the Arabians, 20 and fo that hope vanished.

These pettie enterprises, with the ill successe accompanying them, had much impaired the good aduantage against Foloraie: when the newes of Seleucus his victories in the high Conntries, marred all together. For neither was the losse of those great and wealthy Provinces, a matter to be neglected, neither was it sale to transfort the warre into the parts beyond Euphrates, whereby Syria and the lower Asia should have beene exposed, to the danger of ill-affected Neighbours. A middle course was thought the best; and Demetrius, with sifteene thousand foot and three thousand horse, was sent against Seleucus. These forces being sent away, Anusonus did nothing, and his sonne did lesse. For Seleucus was then in Media; his Licutenants about Bubylon withdrew themselves from necessitie of sight; some places 40 they fortisted and kept; Demetrius could hold nothing that he got, without setting in Garrison more men then he could spare; neither did he get much; and therefore was faine to set out the brauerie of his expedicion, by burning and spoiling the Countrie; which he did thereby the more alienate, and as it were acknowledge to belong vnto his enemic, who thenceforth held it as his owne assured.

Antigorus had laid vpon his sonne a peremptorie commandement, to returne vnto him at a time prefixed: reasonably thinking (as may seeme) that in such an vnsettled state of things, either the Warre might bee ended, by the surie of the sirst brunt; or else it would bee vaine to strive against all difficulties likely to arise, where want of necessaries should frustrate the valour, that so by length of time was like to become less terrible to the Enemie. Demetrius therefore leaving behind him sive thousand foote, and a thousand horse, rather to make shew of continuing the warre, than to effect much, where himselfe, with greater forces could doe little more then nothing, for sooke the enterprise, and went backe to his Father.

ð. IX.

A generall peace made and broken. How all the honse of ALEXANDER was destroyed.

Hese ambitious heads, having thus wearied themselnes with vnesses stuall travaile, in seeking to get more then any one of them could hold; were contented at length to come to an agreement: wherein it was concluded, that each of them should hold quietly, that which at the present he had in possession. As no private hatred, but meere desire of Empire had moved them to enter into the warre; so was it no friendly reconciliation, but onely a dulnessegrowing vpon the slow advancement of their several hopes, that made them willing to breathe a while, till occasion might better

Besides that maine point, Of retaining the Proninces which enery one held, there were two Articles of the peace, that gaue a faire, but a salse colour, to the businesse: That the some of Alexander to peace, that gaue a faire, but a salse colour, to the businesse: That the some of Alexander by Roxane, some heef at libertie. The advancement of yong Alexander to his Fathers Kingdome, seemes to have been a matter, forceably extorted from Antigonus; in whom was discovered a purpose, to make himselfe Lord of all. But this, indeede, more neerely touched Cassander. For in his custodic was the yong Prince and his Mother: neither did he keepe them in fortanswirely to their degree; but as close prisoners, taken in that warre, wherein they had seen the old Queene olympias taken and murdered, that sought to have put them in possession of the Empire. The mutuall hatred and scare betweene them, rooted in these grounds, of iniuries done, and reuenge expected; vpon this conclusion of peace, grew vp faster than any time before, in the heart of Cassander: who saw the Macedonians turne their fauourable expectation, towards the sonne of their later roowned King.

All this, either little concerned Antigonus; or tended greatly to his good. The yong Prince must first haue possession of Macedon: whereby Cassarder should be reduced to his poore office, of Cassarde euer a thous and men, it not left in worse case. As for them that held Provinces abroad, they might either doe as they had done vnder Arideus; or better, as being better acquainted with their owne strength. He in the meane time, by his readinesses to acknowledge the true Heire, had freed himself from that ill-sauoured imputation, of seeking to make himselfe Lord of all that

The like aduantage had he in that Article, of restoring the Greekes to their libertie. This libertie had hitherto beene the subject of much idle discourse: but it neuer tooke effect. Antigonus held scarse any Towne of theirs, Cassader occupied most of the Countrie: which if hee should set free; hee must be a poore Prince; if not, there was matter enough of quarrell against him, as against a Disturber of the common peace.

In the meane feason, the Countries lying betweene Euphrates and the Greeke seas, so together with agreat Armie, and monie enough to entertaine a greater, might serue to hold up the credit of Antigonus, and to raise his hopes, as high as ever they had beene.

With much disaduantage doe many men contend, against one that is equal to Zzzz 2 them

them all in puissance, Cassanders friends had left him in an ill case; but he could not doe withall: for where every one mans helpe is necessarie to the warre, there may any one make his owne peace; but no one can stand out alone, when all the rest are wearie. The belt was, that hee knew all their affections: which tended to no such end as the becomming Subjects vnto any man; much leffe to the sonne of an Astatique woman, of whom they had long since refused to heare mention. Therefore he tooke a short course, and caused both the child & his Mother to be slaine : freeing thereby himselfe in a trice, from the dangerous necessitie of yeelding vp his gouernement, which he must have done when the child had come to age, Roxane was a Ladie of fingular beautie, which was perhaps the cause, why Perdiceas delited to 10 have her fonne, being as yet vnborne, proclaimed Heire to the great Alexander. Immediatly vpon the death of Alexander, the had vsed the fauour (if it were not loue) of Perdicess, to the fatisfying of her own bloudy malice, vpon Statire, the Daughter of King Darius; whom Alexander had likewise married according to the custome of those Countries, wherein pluralitie of wines is held no crime. For having by a counterfait letter, in Alexanders name, gotten this poore Lady into her hands, thee did, by affistance of Perdiceas, murder her and her Sister, and threw their bodies into a Well, causing it to be filled vp with earth. But now, by Gods iust vengeance, were she and her sonne made away, in the like secret fashion; even at such time, as the necre approaching hope of a great Empire had made her life, aftera 29 wearisome imprisonment, grow dearer vnto her than it was before.

The fact of Cassander was not so much detested in outward shew; as inwardly it was pleasing vnto all the rest of the Princes. For now they held themselves free Lords, of all that they had vnder them; fearing none other change of their estates, than such as might arise by chance of warre; wherein every one perswaded himselfe of successe, that had worke enough at home) beganne to rowze themselves; as if now the time were come, for each man to improve his owne stock. Antigonus his Lieutenants were buse in Peloponness, and about Hellespont: while their Master was carefull in sollowing other, and some greater matters that were more secretly 30 to be handled. He pretended the libertie of Greece: yet did the same argument minister vnto Ptolomie, matter of quarrell, against both him and Cassander; Ptolomie complaining (as if he had taken the matter deeply to heart) that Antigonus had put Garrisons into some Townes, which ought, in faire dealing to be set at libertie. Vndercolour of redressing this enormitie, he sent an Armie into Cilicia, where he wan soure Townes, and soone after lost them, without much labour of his owne or his

After this, putting to Sea with a firong Fleet, hee ranne along the coast of Asia, winning many places: and in that voiage allured vnto him a nephew of Antigorius (a good Commander, but discontented with the ill requitall of his services) whom finding shortly, as false to himselfe as he had beene to his owne Vnele, he was saine to put to death. But in doing these things, his desire to set the Greekes at libertic, appeared not so plaine, as he wished that it should: for their case was no way bettered, by his molesting Antigorius in Asia. Therefore to get the love of that valiant Nation, He made at the last an expedition into Greece it selse: where having set free some little slands, and landed in Peloponnessus, he raised so great an expectation of finishing the long desired worke, that Cratesspolis, the Widdow of Alexander, Polysserhous sonne, gave up into his hands the Townes of Sieyon and Corinih.

Prolomie had conceiued a vaine beliefe, that the Greekes emboldened by his countenance and affiftance, would all of them take heart, and rife vp in armes: where 50 by with little labour, their libertie might be gotten; and hee be acknowledged as Author of this immortall benefit. But long feruitude had wel-neere extingnished the ancient valour of that Nation: and their ill fortune, in many likely attempts to recourt recouer freedome, had fo tired their spirits, that they would no more stirre in purfuit thereof; but sate idly still, as withing it to fall into their mouthes.

The Lacedemonians, about these times, beganne to fortific their Towne with walls; truiting no longer in their vertue (for both it, and the discipline that vpheld it were too much impaired) that had been a wall to their Towne and Territorie.

The Athenians were become as humble feruants, as they had been, in times past, insolent Masters: crecting as many statuaes in honor of Demetrius Phalereus, as there were daies in the yeere. This Demetrius was now their Gouernour; and hee gouerned them with much moderation: but in spight of their hearts, as being set on uer them by Cassander. By this base temper of the principall Cities, it is casse to gather, how the rest of the Countrie stood affected. Ptolomie could not get them, to set their helping hands, to their owne good; and to surnish him with the promised supplies of mome and victualls. Credible it is, that he had a true meaning to deliver them from thrasdome; as sudging the commoditie that would arise by annexing them to his partie, a matter of mote weight, than the losse that Cassander should receive thereby, who could hardly retaine them, if once Antigenus tooke the worke in hand. But when he found such difficultie in the businesse, hee changed his purpose; and renewing his former friendship with Cassander, he retained Sieyon, and Corinthin his owne possession.

Before the comming of Ptolomie into Greece, Cassader bad beene held occupied with very much worke. For (besides his paines taken in warres among barbarous Princes) hee found meanes to allure vnto himselfe, the Lieutenants of Antigonus, that were in Peloponness, and about Hellespont: making his own aduantage, of their discontentments. By the like skilfull practice, Hee freed himselfe from a greater danger: and made those murders which he had committed sceme the lesse odious, by traching his enemies to doe the like. Old Possperchon, that had made so great a stirre in the raigne of Aridaus, did after the death of Roxane and her Child, enteragaine vpon the Stage: leading in his hand another some of the great Alexander, and meaning to place him in his Fathers Throne.

The name of this yong Prince was Hercules: hee was begotten on Barline, the Daughter of Artabazus a Persian; but had beene lesse esteemed than the sonne of Roxane, either for that his Mother was helde no better than a Concubine, or elfe perhaps, in regard of the fauour which Perdicers, and after him Olympias, did beare vnto Roxane. At this time, the death of his brother had moved such compassion. and regard of his being Alexanders only living child, had procured vnto him fuch good will, that the demand which Polyperchon made in his befalle, was deemed veryinft and honourable. There were indeede more hearts then hands, that joyned with this yong Prince: yet wanted he not sufficient strength of hands, if the heart of him that least ought, had not beene most false. Cassander had raised an Armie, to 40 withstand his entrie into Mucedon : but little trust could hee repose in that Armie. whose wishes he perceived to be with Hercucles. Therefore hee assaied Polysperchon himselfe with gifts and promises; wherewith at length he preuailed so farre, that the old Vilaine was contented to murder his Pupill, choosing rather with many curses, and foule dishonour, to take the offered Lordship of Peloponnes and Commander of an Armie; than to purchase a Noble same with dangerous trauaile, in maintaining his faith, vnto both his dead and living Soveraignes.

Antigonia had not all this while beene afteepe; though his losses were hitherto the chiefe witnesses, of his having beene a stirrer in these commotions. He thought it enough for him at the present, to retaine his owne: and therefore tooke order for 50 the recoverie of those places, which Ptolomie had taken paines to winne. As for the rest, it no way grieued him, to see Cassader incurre the generall hatred of men by committing those murders, of which the profit was like to redound vnto him that was the most powerfull: or to see Polysperehon and Ptolomie sweat, in a busine warre again & Ciffand r. If they would have continued their quarrels, he could well have affoorded them leifure, and have thought the time well spent, in beholding their contentions. For hee was throughly perswaded, that when the rest had wearied themselues in vaine with long strife, his armies and treasures, wherein he exceeded them all, would bring all vnder. According to these haughtie conceipts, he demeaned himselfe among his followers; looking big vpon them, and like a King before his time. This was it that caused so many of them, to renolt from him : but it was no great loffe to be for faken by those that looked with enuious eyes vpon that fortune whereon their owne should have depended. Against this enuie of his owne men, and the malice of others, Antigonus builty fought a remedie, such as was like to to giuchim a goodly title to the whole Empire.

Cleapstra, Sifter unto the great Alexander, lay for the most part in Sardes; whom he had a great defire to take to wife. This his defire was not without good hope: for howlocuer thee discouered much willingnesse thereunto, yet was shee in his power and might therefore be entreated, were it onely for feare of being enforced. But it was not his purpole, to get her by compulsive meanes: either because his fancie being an old man, was not ouer-violent; or rather because his ambition, wherevnto all his affections had reference, could have made finall vsc of her, by doing such apparent wrong. Shee had beene married vnto Alexander King of Epirus, atter whose death shee came to her brother in Asia; hoping, belike, to finde a new 20 husband in his Campe. But neither any of those braue Captaines, that were, in times following, so hot in love with her, durft then a spire vnto her mariage: nor did her brother, full of other cares, trouble himselfe with providing her of an husband. Shee therefore, being a luftic widow, suffered her bloud, so farre to preuaile against her honour, that shee supplied the want of an husband by entertainment of Parramours. Alex ander hearing of this, turned it to a ieft: faying, that shee was his sifter, and muft be allowed this libertie, as her portion of the Empire. When by his death, the Empirelay in a manner, voide, and the portion due to her therein, grew, in mens opinion, greater than it had beene: then did many fecke to obtaine her, while she her selfe desired only a proper man, with whom she might lead a merric 30 life. To this purpose did shee inuite Leonatus vnto her; who made great haste; but was cut off by death, ere he came to her presence. Now at the last, after long tarrying, shee had her choise of all the great Commanders : Antigones, Prolomie, Lysimachus, and Cassander, being all her carnest woocrs. All these (Antigonus excepted) had wives already, Ptolomic had many wives, and many Concubines, whom he respected as much as his wives, being noted of too much dotage in that kinde. This hindred not his fute peraduenture it advanced it, by giving to Cleopatra, some hope of mutuall toleration. To him therefore she bequeathed her selfe, and was taking her iournic from Sardes towards him; when Antigonus his Deputie in that Citic, made her to stay, vntill his Masters further pleasure should be knowne. Anti-40 gonus had now a Wolfe by the cares: he neither could well hold her, nor durft let her goe. Shee would not be his wife; he had none honest pretence to force her; and to keepe her prisoner, had beene the way by which he might have incurred agenerall hatred, lasting perhaps beyond her life; as the course taken by Cassarder against Roxane (a Ladie leffe respected than Alexanders owne fifter) did well testifie. Therefore he thought it the wifest way to procure her death: for to let any other enjoy the commoditie of so faire a title to the Kingdome, it was no part of his meaning. To this purpose he sent instructions to the Gouernour of Sardes; willing him in any case to doe it secretly. So the fact was committed, and certaine women about her put in trust with the murder; which women afterwards were put to death, as 50 mischieuous conspirers against the life of that good Ladie. So was Antigonus freed from blame, at the least, in his owne opinion: but the world was lesse foolish, than to be so deluded. How the murther was detected, wee need not aske: for seldome is that bloudie crime vnreuealed; and neuer foill (mothered, as when great perfons

Thus was the whole race of Philip and Alexander the Great extinguished, and it was extinguished by the hands of such as thought upon nothing lesse than the execution of Gods justice, due vnto the crueltie of these powerfull, but mercilesse Princes. Wherefore the ambitious frames, erected by these Tyrants, youn so wicked toundations of innocent bloud, were foone after call downe, ouer whelming themselves or their children, with the ruines, as the sequele will declare.

How. DEMETRIVS, the sonne of ANTIGONVS, gaue libertie to Athens. expelling the Garrisons of CASSANDER out of those parts. The immoderate honors decreed by the Athenians to ANTIGONVS and DEMETRIVS.

CHAP.5. S.10.

One being left alive, that had any title to the Kingdome; it flood with good reason, that they which were Lords of the Provinces, acknowledging no Superior, should freely protesse themselues Kings in name, as they were alreadie in substance. Yet had this name ill beseemed the weaker, while the strongest of all did for beare it: neither feemed it convenient in the judgement of Antigonus, to crowne his last action with such a title, as if he had attained vnto greatnesse by that foule murder, the infamie whereof he was carefull how to discharge from his owne head. He purposed therefore to undertake a plaufible enterprise, even the libertie of Greece: whereby it was apparent, that he might get fuch honour as would not onely drowne all bad reports, but make him be thought equall to any name of royaltic, whereof in feeming modeftic, hee was not couctous. To this purpose, hee delivered a strong Ar-30 mic, with a Nauic of two hundred and fiftic faile, and five thousand talents of filuer, vnto Demetrius his sonne: willing him to beginne at Athens, and thence to proceed, in fetting all the Countrie free.

Demetrius came to Athens before he was expected: fo that without relissance he entred the Hauen; it being thought that a fleet of Ptolomie, Coffanders good friend, had beene arrived. But when it was knowne, both who he was, and what was the cause of his comming; the joy of the Citizens brake out into loud acclamations; Demetrius Phalereus forfooke the Towne, and withdrew himselfe to Thebes, vnder fafe conduct; onely the Garrison in Munychia strone to make good that piece, which after a while was wonne vpon them by force. During the fiege of Atunychia, Deme-49 trius went to Megara; whence he expelled the Garrison of Cassander, and so restored the Citie to libertie. I thinke it not impertinent, fometimes to relate such accidents, as may seeme no better than meere trifles: for euen by trifles, are the qualities of great Persons as well disclosed, as by their great actions; because in matters of importance, they commonly straine themselves, to the observance of general commended rules, in leffer things they follow the current of their owne Natures. The Ladie Cratefipolis lay in Patras, and had a great defire to fee Demetrius; hoping, belike, that the might, by his meanes, better her estate, and recouer her Townes of Sycion and Corinth, detained by Ptolomie, to whose Lieutenant, in those places, Demetrius before his de-50 Parture out of Greece, offered monic for the furrender of them. Yet the onely buffnesse pretended was loue. He being aduertised hereof, lest his forces in the Countrie of Megara, and taking a companie of his lightest armed, for guard of his per-

great way from his Tent, that none might fee her when she came. As closely as the bufinesse was carried, some of his enemies had gotten knowledge of it; whereby they conceived good hope, that the diligence of a very few men, might overthrow all the great preparations of Antigonie; and bring him to any termes of reason, by taking his deare some prisoner. I heir project fell but a little short of the effect. For they came fo fuddainly upon him, that hee had no better shift, than to muffle himfelte in an old cloake, and creepe away disguised; leaving them to ransack his Tent. There was in this Prince a strange medly of conditions; especially an extreme difsolutenesse in wanton pleasures, and a painefull industrie in matter of warre. He was of a most amiable countenance, a gentle nature, and a good wir; excellent in deui- 10 fing Engines of warre, and curious in working them with his own hands. He knew better how to reforme his bad fortune, then how to rule his good. For advertitie made his valour more active: prosperitie stupissed him with an overweening, wherin he thought, that he might doe what he lifted. His fortune was as changeable, as were his qualities: turning often round, like the picture of her wheele, till shee had wound vp the threed of his life, in such manner as followeth to be shewed.

Returning to his Campe, and finishing his businesse at Megara; hee resolved no longer to attend the iffue of a fiege, to affaile Munychia by force, that fo hee might accomplish the libertie of Athens: which, vntill it was fully wrought out, he refused to enter into the Citie. Munychia was strongly fortified: yet by continuance of the 20 affault, the multitude without, through help of their Engines that scoured the wals. premailed vpon the resolution of those that lay within it, and wanne the place in two daies. The walls, and all the defences of that piece against the Citic, were levelled with the ground, & so was it freely put into the Citizens hands, to whom withall was given their libertie, with promife to aide them in maintaining it.

The fame of this action was lowder, than of any other victory, gotten by Demetrius with greater skill and industrie. For the Athenians, having forgotten how to employ their hands, laboured to make up that defect with their tongues : converting to base flatterie, that eloquence of theirs, which the vertues of their Ancestors had futed vnto more manly arguments.

They decreed, vnto Antigonus and Demetrius, the name of Kings; they confecrated the place, in which Demetrius leaped from his Chariot, when he entred their Citie, and built there an Altar, calling it of DEMETRIV sthe a-lighter; they called them by the Na nes of the gods their fautours, ordaining that every yeere, there should be chosen a Priest of these gods; and further, that such as were employed by their State, in dealing with either of these two Princes, should not be called Embasfadors, but Theori, or Consulters with the gods; like 23 were they, whom they fent vnto the Oracle of Iupiter or Apollo.

It were a friuolous diligence, to rehearse all their flatteries; these being so grosse. Hereby they not onely corrupted the yong Prince; but made that acclamation, 40 which best would have pleased the old man, to bee of no vie. For hee could not handsomely take vpon him the name of King, as imposed by the Athenians; vnlesse hee would seeme to approve their vanitie, in loading him with more than humane honors. Yet was hee fo tickled, with this their fine handling him, that when their Theori, or Consulters came shortly after, desiring him to relieve them with Corne, and Timber to build ships; he gaue them almost a hundred thousand quarters of wheat, and matter sufficient to make a hundred Gallies. So gracious was his first Oracle: or rather, so weake is great power in resisting the assaults of flatterie.

The great victorie of DEMETRIVS against PTOLOMIE in Cyprus. How An-TIGONYS and DEMETRIVS tooke upon them the file of Kings; wherein others followed their example.

R om this glorious worke, Antigonus called away Demetrius, vnto a businesse of greater difficultie: meaning to imploy his service against Ptolomie in Cyprus. Before his departure out of Greece, he was willed to establish a generall Counsaile, that should treat of matters, concerning the common good of the Countrie. About the same time, An-ticonus withdrew his owne Garrison out of Imbros, committing their liberty entire, into the peoples hands: whereby it might appeare, that as he would not permit any other to oppresse the Greekes, so would he be farre from doing it himselfe. This was enough, to hold his reputation high, among these new purchased friends: it followed, that hee should convert his forces, to the winning of ground vpon his

A pittifull Tragedic had lately hapned in Cyprus; through the indifcretion of Menelaus, Ptolomies brother, and his Lieutenant in that Isle. Nicocles, King of Pa-20 phos, was entred into some practice with Antigonus : yet not so farre that he thought himselfe past excuse; by which considence, hee was perhaps, the more easily detected. To cut off this negotiation, & the fulfe-hearted King of Paphos at one blow, Menelaus was fent thither: who furrounding Nicocles his house with Souldiers, required in Ptolomies name, to have him yelded to the death. Nicocles offered to cleere himselfe; but Menelaus told him, that die he must, and bade him come forth quietly. This desperate necessitie caused the vnhappie King to rid himselfe of life; and his death strooke such an impression into his wife, that she not onely slew her selfe. but perswaded the wines of her husbands brethren, to doe the like. Also those brethren of Nicocles, vnto whom Ptolomie had intended no ill, being amazed with the 30 suddainenesse of this calamitie, did shut up the Palace, and setting it on fire, consumed it, with all that was in it, and themselves together.

What soeuer the crime objected was; Nicooles perished as a man innocent, because he was not suffered to make his answere. Of this sad accident, though Menelaus deserved the blame, for his rigorous proceeding: yet is it to be thought, that much dislike fell also vpon Ptolomie: as men that are grieued, cast an ill affection, euen vpon those, that gaue the farthest removed occasion.

Not long after this, Demetrius came into Cyprus, with a power sufficient, against any opposition that Ptolomie was like to make. The Cypriots did little or nothing against him: either because they had small strength, or for that they held it a matter 40 indifferent, whom they acknowledged as their Lord, being fure that they should northemselues haue the rule of their owne Countrie. Menelans therefore, out of his Garrisons, drew forth an Ar nie, and fought with Demetrius. But hee was beaten, and driven to faue himfelfe within the walls of Salamis; where he was so hardly belieged, that without firong fuccour hee had no likelihood to make good the place, much lesse to retaine possession of the whole Iland. His greatest helpe at the present, was the fidelitie of his Souldiers; whom no rewards could winne from him, norgood vsage (when any of them were taken prisoners, and inrolled in the enemies bands) keepe from returning to him, with the first opportunitie. Most of them were Mercinaries: but all their goods were in £gypt, which was enough to se keepe them faithfull. Yet could not this their resolution have stood long, against theods of number, which Demetrius had of men as resolute, and again a his terrible Engines of batterie, if Prolomie had not halted to the rescue.

Ptolomie brought with him, a hundred and fortie Gallies, besides two hundred (hips of burden, for transporting his Armie and Carriages. This fleet made a terrible shew, when it was descried a farre; though more than halfe of it, was vnfit for service, in fight at Sea. Wherfore to make the opinion of his forces the more dreadfull, Ptolomie sent vnto Demetrius, a threatning message: willing him to be gone, vnlesse he would bee ouer whelmed with multitudes, and transpled to death in a throng. But this yong Gallant repaied him with words of as much brauerie, promising to let him escape, vpon condition, that hee should withdraw his Garrisons out of Siegon and Corinth.

The fourth Booke of the first part CHAP.5. S.II.

Demetrius had no more then one hundred and eighteene Gallies; but they were, for the most part, greater than those of Ptolomie; better stored, with weapons sit for 10 that service; and very well furnished with Engines in the prowes, to beat vpon the Enemie. Neuerthelesse he stood in great doubt of threescore Gallies that lay in the Hauen of Salamis. I less Menelaus with them should set vpon his back: in which case, it was likely that all should goe very ill with him. Against this mischiete, hee bestowed ten of his owne Gallies in the mouth of that Hauen, to keepe Menelaus from issuing forth, and setting his horse-men on the shore, to give what assistance they could, he with the rest of his fleet, puts to Scaagainst Ptolomie.

The fight began early in the morning, and continued long, with de ubtfull fuecesses. The Generals were not ranged opposite one to the other; but held each of them the left wing of his ownesseet. Each of them prevailed against the squadron wherewith hee encountred; but the successe of Demetrius was to better purpose. For his victorie in one part was such, as caused others to fall out of order, and finally draue all to betake themselves wito speedic slight. As for Ptolomie, he was saine to leave his advancage upon the enemic in one part of the sight, that hee might relieve and animate those of his owne which needed him in another. Wherein hee found his losse over each of the such as a single street of that day; and therefore he laboured only to save himselfe, in hope of better event, that might follow some other time.

There fell out in this battaile no vnufuall accident; yet was the victoric greater then could have beene expected. The occasions whereof were, parily the great 30 skill in Sea-services, which the Greekes and Phenicians, that were with Demetrius, had, about those which followed Ptolomie: partly the good furniture of the Sbips, wherin consisted no lesse, than in the qualitie of those with whom they were manned. Further, were may reasonably judge, that the two hundred ships of burthen, carying the strength of Ptolomies Armie, did not more encourage his owne men, and terrifie his enemies the day before the fight; than breede in each part the contrary affections, when in the beginning of the fight, they fell off, and stood aloofe. For though it were fitting, that they should so doe; yet a multitude, prepossessed with vaine conceipts, will commonly apprehend very slight occasions, to thinke themselves abandoned. Besides all this, the expectation, that Aevelaus issuing with his sleet out of Salamis, should charge the enemies in sterne, was viterly frustrate. Hee was kept in perforce, by the ten ships appointed to barre up the mouth of the Hauen: which they manfully performed, as great necessitie required.

Such disappointment of expectation, doth much abate the courage of men in fight; especially of the affailants: whereas on the contrarie, they that finde some part of their searcs vaine, doe easily gather hopefull spirits, and conceine an opinion of their owne abilitie to doe more than they had thought upon, out of their not fuffering the harmethat they had imagined.

What source the causes of this victoric were, the fruit was very ereat. For Ptolomie had no more than eight Gallies that accompanied him in his flight: all the rest 50 of his fleet was either taken, or sunk. Neither did Menelaus any longer striue against the violence of Fortune; but yeelded vp all that hee held in Cyprus, together with his Armie, consisting of twelue thousand soote, and a thousand and two hundred horse, and those Gallies in the Hauen of Salamis. The same desection of Spirit was found in the common Souldier, as well that was taken at Sea, as that had serued the Egyptian by Land: none of them reposing any more confidence in Ptolomic, but willingly becomming followers of a new Lord, whose Armie they now increased.

It was generally believed, that much more depended on the event of this fight, than the lile of Cyprus; for which they contended. Wherefore the common expe-Elation was great; especially Antigonus, whom it most concerned, was deeply perplexed with cares, thinking every day a veere, till hee were advertised of the islue. In this moode Aristodemus found him, a notable flatterer, whom Demetrius had honoured, with the Meffage of these good newes. Aristodemus had bethought himfelfe of a trick, whereby to double the welcome of his joyfull errand: He caused his ships to ride at Anchor, a good distance from the shore; hee himselfe landed in a Cock-boat, which he fent immediately backe to the ship; and so all alone, he went forward, looking very fadly that no part of his tidings might appeare in his countenance. Report of his arrivall (for it was not knowne where he had been) came prefently to Antigonia, who fent Messenger after Messenger, to meet him on the way, and bring speedie word how all went. But neither any answere, nor so much of a looke, as might intimate the purport of his errand, could bee wonne from this de-20 mure Gentleman. Thus marched he faire and foftly forward, with a great throng at his heeles (that ferued well to fet out his Pageant) vntill he came in fight of Antigones; who could not containe himselfe, but went downe to meet him at the Gate, and heare the newes. Then did Aristodemus, vpon the suddaine, with a high voice falure Artigonus by the name of King; vetering the greatnesse of the victorie (with as much pompe, as before he had covered it with filence) in the hearing of all the people; who with loud acclamations, gaue that name of King, both to antigonus, and to his sonne Demetrius. Intigonus, in requitall of the long suspence, wherein Aristodemus had held him, said that it should also be long ere hee received his reward. But the title of King, together with the Diademe, which his friends did fet 30 on his head, he could not with a fairer occasion to assume: wherefore he readily accepted them, and sent the like to his sonne.

When it was once noised abroad, that Antigonus and Demetrius called themselues Kings; it was not long cretheir sellowes were readicto sollow the good example. Provinsie his friends would by no meanes endure, that their Lord should be thought a man deiected for the losse of a fleet: therefore they saluted him also King. Lystamachus in Thrace had boldnesse enough, to put the Diademe about his owne head. Seleucus had, before this time, among the Barbarous people, taken upon him as King: but now he vsed the stile indifferently, as wellamong the Greekes and Macedonians, as in dealing with others. Onely Cassander held himselfe contented with hisowne name: whereby howsocuer he might shaddow his pride, he no way lesse to med the same of his crueltie, against his Masters house. But the name which he for bore, his sonnes, after him, were bold to vsurpe, though with ill successe, as wil appeare, when they shallenter upon the Stage; whereon these old Tragedians, under new habits, as no longer now the same persons, beginne to play their parts, with bigger lookes, and more boisterous actions, not with greater grace and indgement, than in the Scenes alreadic paft.

Of the warres betweene the Kings of Ægypt, Asia, Macedon, I brace, and others: untill all ALEXAN-DER'S Princes were consumed.

The Expedition of ANTIGONVS against Agypt, with ill successe.

LL the rest of these Kings had taken that name vpon them, an imitation of Antigonus himselfe, as befeeming his greatnesse: which was such as gaue him hope to swallow them vp, together with their new titles. Being not ignorant of his owne firength, hee resolued to single out Ptolomie, aud make him an example to others: who should hardly be able to stand, 20 when the greatest of them was fallen. To this purpose hee prepared an Armie of eighteene thousand foot, and eight thousand horse, with foure-score and three Elephants: as likewise a fleet of a hundred and fiftie Gallies, and a hundred thips of burden. The Land-forces hee commanded in person: of the Name Demetreus was Admirall.

When all was readie for the journey, the Sea-men adulfed him to stay yet eight dayes longer, and expect the fetting of the Pleiades. But his hastie desire to preuent all preparations for relistance that Ptolomie should make, rejected this counsaile; imputing it rather to their feare than skill: wherefore he departed from Antigonia 30 (a Towne which he had built in Syria, and called after his owne name, that was foone changed into Sclencia, by his mortall Enemie) and came to Gaza; where hee met with his fleet. The neerer that he drew to £gypt, the more haste hee made: thinking by celeritie to prevaile more then by his great power. He caused his Souldiers to carrie ten daies provision of victuals; and had many Camels loaden with all necessaries for passing the D. sarts, ouer which he marched with no small toile, though he met with no relissance. At Mount Cassus, which is neere adioyning to Wiles, he saw his Fleet, riding at Anchor, not farre from the shore; in ill case, and many thips wanting. It had beene forely beaten with foule weather, wherein some were loft, others driven back to G 1224, or scattered elsewhere into such creeks as they 40 could recouer. Demetrius himselfe, with the best and strongest vessels, did so long beat it vp against the winde, that all his fresh water was spent; in which extremitie, he and all his must have perished, had not the tempest ceased when it did, and Antigonus appeared in fight, from whom these ouer-wearied, thirsty and Sea-beaten Souldiers received reliefe; After these painefull travailes there followed a Warre no lesse painefull than to little purpose; for Ptolomie had so fortified all the passages vponthe River of Nelus, as he affured himselfe either to ende the warrethere, or if his guards should happen to be forst, yet could it not be done, but so much to the weakning of the Assailants, as he should afterward, with a second Armie (which he held entire) entertaine the Inuader vpon advantage enough. All that Antigonus 50 fought, was to come to blowes speedily: Ptolomie on the contrarie, to beat Antigonus by the belly. It is true that Wiles gave him water enough, but wood hee had none to warme it, and while Antigonus affaulted the Rampiers raised vpon the River in vaine, Ptolomie affaied the faith of his Souldiers with good successe, for with great gifts, and greater promises, he ferried them ouer so fast, as had not Antigonus thrust some assured Regiments, vpon the passages next the enemie, and in the meane while taken a resolution to returne, Ptolomie had turned him out of Agypt, ill at-

Some of them indeede he laid hands on, in the way of their escape, and those hee put to death with extreme torments; but in all likelihood with the same ill successe that Perdiccas had formerly done, when he inuaded Egypt: had he not readily remoued his Armie further off, from the noise of their entertainement, that had al-10 readie beene wonne from him. To preuent therefore as well the prefent danger of his stay, as the shame following a forst retrait, hee secretly practized the aduice of his Councell, vpon whom the burden must be laid of his entrance, and leaving

It is indeede lesse predudiciall in such like cases, that errours, dishonours, and losses, be laid on Councellours and Captaines, than on Kings, on the Directed, than on the Director: for the honour and reputation of a Prince is farre more precious. than that of a Vassall. Charles the fift, as many other Princes have done, laide the losse and dishonour hereceiued in the invasion of France, by the way of Province, to Antonie de Leua, whether iustly or no, I know not; but how soeuer all the Hi-20 storians of that time agree, that the forrow therof cost that braue Captaine his life. Certainely to give any violent aduice in doubtfull enterprises, is rather a testimonic of loue, than of wisedome, in the giver; for the ill successe is alwaies cast upon the Councell, the good neuer wants a Father, though a false one, to acknowledge it. Yet I have sometime knowne it, that great commanders, who are for the present in place of Kings, haue not only beene diffwaded, but held in a kinde by strong hand. from hazarding their owne persons, and yet have those kinde of Mutiners never beene called to a Marshalls Court.

How the Citie of Rhodes was befreged by DEMETRIVS.

His departure of Antigonus left behinde it many dead carcasses, and a great deale of ioy in £gypt. Ptolomie held a solemne feast, and sent Messengers abroad, loaden with glad newes, to Seleucus, Lysimachus, and Cassander, his Confederates: strongly encouraging all that side with the report of this his late selicitie, though it appeared but in a 40 defendine warre. Antigonus on the contrarie flattered himselfe with another interpretation, calling the loyes of his enemies for witnesses of his owne greatnesse, seeing they arose but from so litle things: his enemies being but bare sauers by the last bargaine, and himselfe, as he supposed, having lost but a little time, and no part of his honour in the late retrait. How soeuer it were, yet he meant to follow his affaires henceforth in another fashion, for that which he could not cleaue a-funder by great blowes, he purposed by little & little to pare off, by cutting off the branches first; to fell the Tree it selfe with the more facilitie. To effect which, hee resolued (leauing the great ones to grow awhile) to roote vp the Dependants of his Enemies: Dependants, whom the forenamed Confederates should be forst, either to relieves 50 or to loofe; and hereby he doubted not, to draw them into the field, where the aduantage of power, and of all other warlike prouisions, promised him victorie.

At this time the Cities of Rhodes was very mightie, being well gouerned, and having long held it selfe in good Neutralitie, it drew the better part of all the trade of those parts, and thereby a great deale of riches to it selfe, to maintaine which, and to increase it, it furnished and kept on the Seas a Fleet of well armed ships, by which it not only beat off all Pyrates and pettic Theeues, but the reputation of their strength was thereby so much increased, as all the neighbour Princes sought their alliance and confederacie. In this so dangerous a time (in which they must either resuse all that sought them, and foliand friendleffe and apart, or joyne themselues to some one; and thereby forgoe the peace, by which their greatnesse had growne) their affections carried them to the Agyptian: both because the greatest part of their trade lay that way, as also for that Antigonus his disposition, greatnes, & neighbourhood was sear- 10 full vnto them. This affection of theirs, with some other pallages, more apparent; gaue argument of quarrel to Antigonus, who began to declare himselfe against them by pettic iniuries, of taking some of their ships, with such other grieuances, while he made a more waightie preparation, to purfue the warre against them, openly & strongly. All things soone after ordered according to the greatnesse of the enterprise, hee employed his sonne Demetrius against them in their owne Iland, who brought fuch terrour vpon the Citizens, that laying aside all respect of friendship and honour, they offered him their affiltance, and service against whom socuer. Demetries, who knew from whence this change came, and that the alteration was perfwaded by feare, and not by loue, raifed his demands to an intolerable height, re- 20 quiring a hundred Hostages to be deliucred him, and libertie to lodge in their Port as many ships of warre as himselfe pleased. These conditions more properly to be imposed vpon a State alreadie conquered, then on those who as yet had heard of nothing but a constrained affistance, restored vnto the Rhodians their lost courage, and made them resolue to desend their libertie to the last man: this taught them to infranchise all their able bond-men, and wisely rather to make them their fellow-Citizens, than to make themselues fellow-slaues with them.

Demetrius having refused the faire conditions offered, (as the Rhodians the fearefull ones propounded vnto them) makes preparation for a long siege, and sinding no appearance to carrie the place in furie, he fet in hand with his Engines of batte-30 rie; in the inuention and vie of which, he neuer shewed himselfe a greater Artisan, than in this warre. But in conclusion, after the Citizens had sustained all the affaults given them for a whole yeere, after many brave fallies out of the Towne, and the famine which they endured within the Towne, which had proved farre more extreme, if Ptolomie had not with many hazards relieued them, Demetrius by mediation of the Grecian Embassadors, gaue ouer the siege; a hundred Hostages they gaue him for performance of the peace made, but with exception of all the Magi-

Hercunto Demetrius was brought by the vsuall policie of warre, and state: for while with the flowre of all his fathers forces, he lay before Rhodes, Caffander reco- 40 uered many of those places in Greece, which Demetrius had formerly taken from him, neither did Cassander make the warre as in former times, by practice and surprise, but by a strong and well compounded armie, which hee himselfeled as farre as into Attica, and therewith greatly distressed and indangered Athens it selfe. On the other fide (though with leffe successe) did Polysperchon inuade Peloponnesus. These dangerous undertakings upon Greece, aduised the Athenians and Atolians to dispatch their Embassadours towards Demetrius, and aduised Demetrius, rather to abandon the enterprise of Rhodes, than to abandon the great honour which he had formerly gotten, by fetting all Greece at libertie.

Demetrius was no sooner out of the Iland, then that the Rodians creeked statues 50 in honour of Lysimachus, & Cassander, but for Ptolomie, whom they most affected, and from whom they received their most reliefe, they co sulted with the Oracle of Iupiter, whether it were not lawfull to call him a God. The Priests which attended in the Temple

Temple of Hammon, gaue the same faire answere for Ptolomie, which they had formerly done for Alexander his Master, for as Alexander consulted the Oracle with an Armie at his heeles; fo was Ptelomie at this time Lord of the foile; and yet was this a farre more cleanly creation, than that done by the Athenians, who Deified Antigonus and Demetrius, by decree of the people. A madage it was, when so many of Alexanders Captaines could not content themselves with the stile of Kings, but that they would needes be called gods.

How DEMETRIVS prevailed in Greece. C ASSANDER desires peace of ANTIGONVS, and cannot obtaine it. Great preparations of warre against ANTIGONVS.

EMETRIVS comming with a strong Fleet and Armie into Greece: quickly draue Cassander out of Attica; and pursuing his fortune, chaled him beyond the straits of Thermopyla. Herein his reputation did much auaile him; which was fo great, that fixe thousand of his enemies Souldiers revolted vnto him. So partly by the greatnesse of his name, partly by force, he recovered in thort space all that Cassander held in those straits, and giving libertievnto the people, he bestowed upon the Athenians those peeces, which had beene fortified against them, to blocke them up. Then went he into Peloponnesus, where he found the like, or more casie successe: for hee suddainely tooke Argos, Corinth, Sicyon, and the most of the Countrie, bestowing libertie vpon such as needed it. The Towne of Sugar hee translated by consent of the Citizens, from the old feat into another place, and called it after his own name Demetrias. This done, he betook himselse to his pleasure: At the Ishmian games, he caused himselfe to be proclaimed Captaine Generall of Greece, as Philip and A-20 lexander had been in former times: whereupon (as if he were now become as great as Alexander) he despised all others, making it a matter of iest, that any, sauchimfelle or his father, should vsurpe the name of King. But in his behauiour hee was so farre vnlike to a King, that in all the time of his leisure, hee deserued none other name then of a drunken Palliard. Yet were the Athenians as readic as ever to devile new honours for him: among which they made one decree, that what focuer King Demetrius should command, ought to bee held facred with the gods, and just with

All Greece being now at the disposition of Antigonus, Cassander stood in great feare, left the warre should fall heavily vpon him in Macedon: which to avoide, he 40 knew no better way, then to make peace with his enemies betimes. And to that purpose hee sent Embassadors; but had no better answere from Antigonus, then that he should sub nit his whole estate to his discretion. This proud demand made him looke about him, and labour hard in folliciting his friends, both to affift him, and take heede to themselves; neither found hee them slow in apprehending the common Danger: for Lysimachus knew, that if once Cassander had lost Macedon; Denetrius would soone be Master of Thrace. Neither were Piolomie and Seleucus ignorant of that, which was like to befall them, if Antigenus were suffered to put himselfe in quiet possession of those Provinces in Europe. Wherefore it was agreed, that with joynt forces they should all together set upon the common E-70 nemie.

Hereof Antigonus had notice: but scorned all their preparations, saving, That hee would as easily scatter them, as a flocke of Birds are driven away with a stone. With these conceipts hee pleased himselfe, and no way hindred the proceedings of his Enemies. He lay at that time in his Towne of Antigonia (a name Aaaaa 2 that it must shortly loose) where he was carefully providing to set out some stately game and Pageants, in ostentation of his glorie. But thither was brought vnto him the tumultuous newes of Lysimachus his victories about Hellespont. For Cassander had committed vnto Lysimachus part of his forces, where with to passe our into A-sia, while himself with the rest should oppose Demetrius on Europe lide. So Lysimachus passing the Hellespont, beganne to make hot warre vpon the subicess of Antigonus; getting some of the Cities in those parts, to some with him, by faire meanes; winning others by force, and wasting the Countrier ound about.

To represse this vnexpected boldnesse, Antigonus made hastie iournies, and came soone enough to recouer his losses, but not strong enough to drive Lysimachus 10 home, or compell him to come to battaile. Lysimachus waited for the comming of seleucus, keeping himselse the whilest from necessitie of fighting. But Babylon was farre off; and seleucus his preparations were too great to be soone in a readinesse. The Winter also did hinder his iourney: which inforced them on both sides to rest in some quiet, without performing any matter of importance. This delay of debating the quarrellin open field, held all those Nations in a great suspence, and bred much expectation. Yet might all have come to nothing, had not Antigonus beene so froward, that hee resuled to yeelde vnto any peaceable conditions. At length Seleucus drew neere with a mighty Armie of his owne (for hee had gathered strength in that long time of leisure, which Antigonus had given him) and with great 20 aide from Ptolomie, that was ioyned with his forces.

To helpe in this needfull case, Demetrius was called ouer into Asia by his Fathers letters: which he readily obeied Before his departrue out of Greece, he made peace with Cassander, upon reasonable termes to the end he might not be driven to leave any part of his Armie for defence of the Countrie; and that his iournie might bee without any such blemish of reputation, as if he had abandoned his Dependants: for one Article of the peace was, That all the Cities of Greece should be at libertie. Cassander was glad to be so rid of an Enemy, that was too strong for him. Yet would this league have done him little good, if things had fallen out contrariwise then they did in Asia; seeing the ratification thereof was referred unto Antigonus. It 30 sufficed, that for the present, every one found meanes to cleare himselfe of all incumbrances elsewhere, to the end that each might freely apply himselfe to the triall of the maine controversie in Asia.

d. IIII.

How Antigonvs was flaine in a great battaile at Ipfus, neere unto Ephefus; wherein his whole estate was lost.

pounded a great Armie, which was (all confidered) not inferiour to that of the Enemie. In greatnesse of name (that helpeth much in all warres, but especially in the Ciuill) they were rather vnanswerable, than equall to their aduersaries: for Antigonus had of long time kept them with a massering spirit, and had beene reputed a King indeede, when the rest were held but Vsurpers of the title. Likewise Demetrius was generally acknowledged a brane Commander, hauing given proofe of his worth in many great services of all kinds, and inriched the Art of war with many inventions, which even his enemies, & particularly Lyssmathus, did much admire. Seleucus, who had sometimes flattered Antigonus, and fearfully stolen away from him to save his life; with yong Antiechus, a Prince not heard of before this iournie; and Lyssmathus, that had lived long in a corner, hardly keeping his owne from the wilde Thracians; wanted much in reputation, of that which was yeelded to their opposites: yet so, that as ancient Captaines under Philip and Alexander, two of them were held worthee enough, to receive any benefit that fortune might give, and the third a Prince of great hope, whereof he now came to make experience.

The Souldiers, on both sides, were for themost part hardie and well exercised: many of them having served vnder **lexander*; though of those old Companies; the long space of two and twentie yeeres had consumed the greatest number. But concerning their affections; the followers of *Selencus* were easily perswaded, that in this battaile they must either get the vpper hand, or put in extreme danger all that belonged vnto the Consederate Princes: whereas *Antigonus* his men could discorne no other necessitie of sighting, than the obstinate qualitie of their Lord, that needes would be Master of all. *Antigonus* had about three-score and ten thousand foot, ten thousand horse, and three-score and fifteen Elephants. His enemies were fixe thousand short of him in number of their foot; in horse they had the ods of sine hundred; of Elephants they had foure hundred, and a hundred and twentie armed Chariots of warre; which helps, though they little had availed the *Persans*; yet were they not to be despised, in the hands of a good Captaine.

Antigonus himselfe, either troubled with the vnexpested greatnesse of his enemies forces, or presaging little good like to ensue, grew very pensue, communing much in private with his sonne whom he commended to the Armie as his Successes for whereas in former times he had never been so iocund; as towards the houre of battaile, nor had been accustomed to make his sonne, or any other, privie to his counsaile, before it required execution. Other tokens of bad lucke, either foregoing the fight, or afterwards devised, I hold it needlesses to recount: Diana of Ephesus dwelt neere to the place of battaile, a busic Goddesse in many great fights, and therefore likely to have been thrust into the sable, if any matter, neerly resembling a miracle, had chanced.

It is easie to be lecue, that the set wo so gallant Armies, containing well-neere all the strength of Alexanders whole Empire, performed a notable sight, being led by such worthic Commanders, and whom the issue thereof did highly concerne. Yet are sew of the particulars recorded: an easie losse in regard of the much variety, where with enery storie aboundeth in this kinde. The most memorable things in the battaile, were these: Demetrius with his best force of horse, charged valiantly vono yong Antiochus; whom when hee had broken, and put to slight, hee was so transported with the heat of his good successe, that he neuer gaue ouer his pussifit, but less his Father naked, and lost thereby both him, and the victoric. For when Seleucus; perceived this advantage, he enterposed his Elephants, between Demetrius and the Phalanx of Antigonus: and with many troups of horse offering to breake vponthe enemies battaile, wheresoeuer it lay most open, he did so terrisie the Antigonians, that a great part of them rather chose to revolt from their Lord, whilst they were fairely invited, than to sustaine the furic of so dangerous an impression. This cowardize or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all in the same streams.

cowardize or rather treason of some, discouraged others; and finally, cast them all into slight; exposing their Generall to the last end of his destinies. Antisonus was then soure-score yeeres old, very fat and vnweildy, so that he was vnapt for slight, if his high spirit could haue entertained any thought thereof. Hee had about him some of his most trustie followers, and as many others as hee could hold together. When one that perceived a great troupe making towards his person told him, Sir King, yonder companie meanes to charge you; he answered, Well may they; for who defends me? but anon DEMETRIVS will relieve vs. Thus expecting, to the very last, to that his some should come to the rescue, he received so many Darts into his body, 30 astooke away his lately ambitious, but then searcfull hopes, together with his trouble some life.

His great abilitic in matter of Armes, together with his vnsatiable desire of Empire, have sufficiently appeared in the whole Volume of his action. Hee was more teared by his enemies, than loued by his friends; as one that could not moderate his fortune, but vsed insolence towards all alike, as if it had beene some vertue neerestrepresenting a Kingly Maiestie. This was the cause that so many of his followers revolted to his enemies; and finally, that a great part of his Armie for soke him in his last necessitie. For those Kings and Princes that call all the carefull indenours of their Vassalls, onely dutie and debt; and are more apt to punish the least offences, than to reward the greatest services: shall finde themselves upon the first change of fortune, (seeing it is loue only that staies by adversitie) not only the most friendlesse, but euen the most contemptible, and despised of all other. This Antique nus found true in part, while he lived; in part he left it to be verified vpon his fon.

How DEMETRIVS for Jaken by the Athenians after his overthrow, was reconciled to SELEVCUS and PTOLOMIE, beginning a new fortune, and shortly entring into new quarrells.

Or Demetrius, at his returne, from the idle pursuit of yong Antiochus. finding all quite loft, was glad to faue himselfe, with foure thousand horse and flue thousand soot, by a speedy retrait vnto Ephesus, whence 20 here made great haste towards Athens, as to the place, that for his sake would suffer any extremity. But whiles he was in the middest of his would suffer any extremity. But whilest he was in the middest of his course thither, the Athenian Embassadours met him with a decree of the people, which was, that none of the Kings should be admitted into their Citic. These were Embassadours, not Theori, or Consulters with the Oracle. It was a shamelesse ingratitude in the Athenians, to reward their Benefactor, in his miscrie, with such a decree : neither did any part of his calamitie more afflict the vnfortunate Prince, than to see his adversitie despised by those whom he had thought his surest friends. Yet was he faine to give good words. For he had left many of his ships in their Hauen, of which he now flood in great neede, and therefore was faine to speake them faire, 30 that fometimes had grofly flattered him. But he shall live to teach them their old language, and speake vnto them in another tune. When he had gotten his ships, he failed to the 15thmus, where he found nothing but matter of discomfort. His Garrifons were every where broken vp; the Souldiers having betaken themselves to his enemies pay. So that he was King only of a small Armie and Fleet, without monie or meanes wherewith to sustaine him and his followers any long time. All the rest or the greatest part of his Fathers large Dominion, was now in dividing among the Conquerers, and those few places which as yet held for him (having not perchance heard the worst of what had happened) he no way knew how to relicue, for to put himselse into the field on that side of the Sea, he had no power, and to inclose him- 40 selfe in any of them, how strong soeuer, were but to imprison his fortune, and his hopes, or therein indeede to buric himselfe and his estate: Hee therefore creeping thorow those bushes that had fewest briers, fell vpon a corner of Lysimachus his Kingdome, whereof he gaue all the spoile, that was gotten, to his Souldiers, his owne losses having beene too great to be repaied againe by small prizes.

In the meane while the Gonfederate Princes had where withall to busie themfelues, in the partition of those Prouinces, of which their late victoric had made them Lords, wherein Seleucus had a notable advantage by being present, and Master of the field, for neither Ptolomie, nor Cassander were at the ouerthrow given, having only sent certaine troupes to re-inforce the Armie which Seleucus led, who so tooke hold of a part of Asia the lesse and all Syria, being no otherwise denided from his owne Territorie, than by the River of Euphrates. For there had not any order beene taken by the Confederates, for the division of all those Lands: because they did not expect fo prosperous an issue of that warre, which they made onely in their owne common defence. It was therefore lawfull for Seleuens, to make the best benefit that he could of the victory, at which, neuertheleffe others did repine, and though they neither could nor durst accuse him of ill dealing for the present, yet feeing the ouer-greatnesse of Seleneus brought no lesse danger to the rest of the new Kings, than that of Antigonus had done, they consulted upon the same reason of flate as before, how to oppole it in time. Neither was Seleucus ignorant of what they had determined, for he read it in the Law vniuerfall of Kingdoms and States, needing no other intelligence. Hereupon they forget friendship on all sides, and cure themselues of all unprofitable passion, the hatred of each to other, and their loues 10 being laid on the one side, against their profits on the other, were found so farre too light, as Seleucus, who had to day flaine Antigonus the father, and driven Demetrius the sonne out of Asia, sought to morrow how to match himselfe with Stratonica, Demetrius his daughter, and so by Demetrius to serue his turne against Lysimachus.

The storie of this Stratonica, with whom young Antiochus, the sonne of Selencus fell so passionately in love, and so distempered, as Seleucus his father, to save his fonnes life, gaue her (though the were his wife) vnto him, and how his paffion was discoucred by his pulse, is generally noted by all Writers. But neither did this aliance betweene Seleucus and Demetrius; betweene Ptolomie and Lysimachus; betweene Demetrius and Cassander; betweene Demetrius and Piolomie; though for the 20 present it brought him againe into the rancke of Kings; otherwise tye any of them to each other, than the marriages betweene Christian Kings have done in later times namely betweene the Austrians, the Aragonians, the French, and other Princes; neither have the Leagues of those elder times beene found more faithfull then those of the same later times have beene; as in the stories of Charles the eighth of France, and of Charles the Emperour, of Francis the first, and of the Kings of Naples, Dukes of Millan and others, the Reader may observe: betweene whom from the yeere of our Lord, One thousand, foure hundred, ninetie and fine, when Charles the eighth vndertooke the Conquest of Naples, to the yeere one thousand fine hundred filtic and eight, when Henrie the second died, the Histories of those times tell vs, 20 that all the bonds, either by the bed or by the booke, either by weddings, or Sacramentall Oathes, had neither faithfull purpose nor performance. Yet did Demetrius reape this profit by giving his daughter to his enemie Seleveus, that he recovered Cilicia from Plistarchus, the brother of Cassander; who had gotten it as his share in the division of Antigonus his possessions: for the Intruder was not strong enough to holde it by his proper forces from him, that entred vpon it as a lawfull Heire, neither would Seleucus lend him any helpe, as by the rule of Confederacie he should have done against the common enemie. So Plistarchus with very angry complaint. as well against Seleucus as Demetrius, went vnto Caffander; whither Phila, their fister, followed him shortly, to pacifie them both, and keepe all quiet; being sent for that 40 purpose by Demetrius her husband, that was not strong enough to deale with Case fander, and therefore glad to make vse of that bond of aliance betwixt them, whereof in his owne prosperitie, he neuer tooke notice to the others good. About the fame time he tooke to wife a daughter of Ptolomie (pluralitie of wines being familiar with these Macedonians, that had learned it in their Easterne conquests) and so was he by two marriages rather freed from two enemies, then strengthened with two friends, for neither of them wished him any good, otherwise then might seeme to aduance their owne ambitious desires.

Seleucus and Ptolomie could both of them have beene contented better, that Demetrius, with helpe of their countenance, should seeke his fortune som what farther 50 off, than settle his estate under their noses. Particularly, Selevens thought that Cilicia lay very fitly for himselfe; and Ptolomie had a great appetite (which yet he concealed a while) to the Isle of Cyprus. Now whether it were so, that Seleucus would faine haue fet his new father in law vpon the neck of Lysimachus; or whether hee were indeede greedie of the bargaine, he offered to buy of Demetrius for ready monie, his late purchase of Cilicia. Hercunto Demetrius would not harken, but meant to keepe as much Land as hee could, having already found in Cilicia twelve thousand talents of his fathers treasure, that would serue him to make sport a while. This refusall so displeased Seleucus, that in angrie termes he demanded the Citic of Tyre and Sidon, to bee furrendred vnto him; which were the only places in Syria, that had not followed the fortune of the late great battaile. In flead of giving them vp. Demetrius tooke present order to have them better manned; and spake it stoutly, That were hee ouer-come a thousand times, yet would hee not hire Seleucus to become his fonne in law. In this quarrell Seleucus was generally reprehended, as one of a malignant disposition, that would breake friendship with his father-in-law for 10 two Townes, from whom he had already taken more then well hee knew how to governe. But the fire confumed it felfe in words, which had it falined vpon armes, like it is that the weaker should have found friends out of envie to the stronger.

d. VI.

How DEMETRIVS wanne the Citie of Athens, and prevailed in Greece, but lost in Alia. Of troubles in Macedon following the death of CASSANDER.

ON the meane while, the Athenians not knowing how to vie the liber-Tie, which Demetrius had bestowed on them, were fallen by sedition, vnder the tyrannie of Lachares. Through which alteration their distribution of the flempered Citic was so weakned, that it seemed ill able to keepe off the punishment due to their lateingratitude. This advantage hastened him, whom they had once called their God and Sautour, to prefent himselfe vnto them, in the habit of a revenging furic. Hee brought against them all the force that he could wel spare from other emploiments, which were at that time perhaps the more, because his doubtfull Easterne friends, were vnwilling to giue impedi- 30 ment to any businesse, that might entangle him in Greece. His first enterprise in Athens had ill successe; a great part of his fleet perishing in a tempest. But he soone repaired the losse; and (after some victories in Peloponnesus, where hee wanne diuers Townes that had fallen from him) returning to the enterprize, wasted the Countrie of Attica, and cut offall reliefe from the Citic, both by Land and Sea.

Athens was not able to feede the great multitude within it, any long time; for it stood in a barren soile, and wanted now the command of those Hands, and places abroad, from whence it was wont to be stored with victualls; being also destitute of meanes to keepe such a Nauie, as might bring in supply, or dare to doe any thing at Sca, against that of Demetrius. Yet was there some hope of succour from Ptolomie, 40 who (trusting thereby to winne the loue of Greece) had loaden a hundred and fiftie fhips with corne, and fent them to relecue the hungrie Citie. But these hundred and fiftie were vnable to deale with three hundred good fighting ships, which Demetrius had; rather they feared to become a prey to him, and therefore halted them away betimes, as having done enough, in adventuring to come so necre, that they might be discried. This brake the heart of the people; among whom the famine was so extreme, that a Father and his Sonne did fight for a dead Moule, which dropped downe betweene them from the house top. Wherefore they sent Embasfadours to yeeld up the Towne, and craue pardon, having so farre offended, that out of desperation, they made it a capitall offence, to propose any motion of peace. 50 Yet were they faine to abolish this decree: rather because they knew not what else to doe, then because they hoped to be forgiuen.

Demetrius, contented with the honour of the victoric, did not only forbeare to take away the lives of these vnthankefull men; which they had submitted vnto his mercie; but out of his liberalitie gaue them foode, and placed in Office among it them such as were most acceptable to the people. Neuerthelesse hee was growne wifer then to trust them so farre as he had done in times past. And therefore, when Camong other flattering acclamations) they bade him take their Hauens, and difpose of them at his pleasure; he was ready to lay hold upon the word, and leave a fore Garrison within their walls, to keepe them honest perforce. After this he went into Peloponnesus, vanquished the Lacedemonians in two battailes, and was in very faire possibilitie to take their citie: when the dangerous news called him in all haste. of Lylimachus and Piolomie; that prevailed faster vpon him elsewhere, than himselfe 10 did voon his enemies in Greece. Lysimachus had wonne many Townes in Asia; Ptolomie had gotten all the Isle of Cyprus, except the Citie of Salamis, wherein Demetrius had left his Children & Mother, that were straightly besieged. Whilest he was bethinking bimselfe which way to turne his forces, a notable piece of businesse offered it selfe, which thrust all other cares out of his head.

Callander was lately dead in Macedon, and soone after him, Philip his eldest sonne; whose two yonger brethren, Antipater and Alexander, sought for the Kingdome. In this quarrell The flatonica the Daughter of King Philip, whom Caffander had married, seemed better affected to Alexander, then to her elder sonne: who thereupon grew so enraged, that most barbarously he slew his owne Mother. The odiousnesse 20 of this fact gaue a faire lustre to Alexanders cause: drawing the generalitie of the Matedons to take his part, as in reuenge of the Queenes death, vpon that wicked parricide Antipater. But Antipater was so strongly backed by Lysimachus, whose Daughter he had married; that Alexander could not hope to make his party good withour some forraigne aide. For which cause he called in both Pyrrhus and Demetrius; who how they dealt with him, it will foone appeare, in the following Tragedie, of him and his brother. Their Father Cassander had beene one that shifted well for himfelte, at such time as every man sought how to get somewhat, in the ill ordered diuision of the Empire. Hee was cunning in practize, and a good Souldier: one of more open dealing then were his Companions, but with all more impudent, rudely 30 killing those, whom others would more wisely have made away. He deeply hated the memorie of Alexander, that had knocked his head against a wall, vpon some opinion of contempt. With Olympias he had an hereditarie quarrell, derived from his Father, whom thee could not abide. Her feminine malice did so exasperate him, by crueltie, that shee vsed against his friends, both alive and dead; as it made him adventure vpon shedding the Royall bloud; wherewith, when once hee had stained his hands, he did not care how farre he proceeded in that course of murder. Hiscarefulnesse to destroy those women and children, whose lives hindred his purpose, argues him to have beene rather skilfull in matters of Armes, than a valiant man: fuch crueltie being a true marke of cowardize, which feares a farre off the dan-40 gers, that may quietly passe away: and seekes to avoide them by base and wicked meanes, as neuer thinking it selfe safe enough, untill there be nothing left, that carries likelihood of danger. Of Olympias and Roxane it may bee faid, that they had well descrued the bloudy end which over tookethem; yet ill beseemed it Cassander to doe the office of a Hang-man. But Alexanders children had by no law of men deserued, to die for the tyrannie of their Father. Wherefore, though Cassander died in his bed, yet the divine Iustice brought swords upon his wife and children, that well reuenged the crueltie of this bloudy man, by deftroying his whole houle, as he had done his Mafters.

O/PYRRHUS and his doings in Macedon. The death of CASSANDERS children. DEMETRIVS gets the Kingdome of Macedon; prenailes in warres against the Greeks: Loofethreputation in his warre against PYRRHVs, and in his Citill Couerne. ment, and prepares to win Afia. How all conspire against DEMETRIVS. PYRRHVS and LYSIMACHVS inuade him, his Armie yeelds to PYRRHVS, who shares the Kingdome of Macedon with LYSIMACHVS.

YRRHVS, the Sonne of that vnfortunate Prince £acides, which perished in warre against Cassander, was hardly preserved, being a sucking Insant, from the surie of his Fathers enemies. When his Fosterers had conveighed him to Glaucias, King of Illyria; the deadly hattered of Cassander would have bought his life with the price of two hundred talents. But no man can kill him that shall be his Heire. Glaucias was so far from betraying Pyrrhus, that hee restored him by force to his Fathers Kingdome, when he was but twelue yeeres of age. Within the compasse of fixe yeeres, either the indifcretions of his youth, or the rebellious temper of his Subjects, draue him out of his Kingdome, and left him to trie the world anew. Then went hee to Demetrius (who married his fister) became his Page; followed him awhile in his wars; 29 was with him in the great battaile of Ipfus, whence hee fled with him to Ephelus; and was content to be hostage for him, in his reconciliation with Ptolomie. In Egypt he so behaued himselfe, that he got the fauour of Berenice, Ptelomies principall wife; so that he married her Daughter, and was thereupon sent home, with monie and men, into Epirus; more beholding now to Ptolomie, than to Demetrius. When he had fully recourred the Kingdome of Epirus, and was settled in it, then fell out that businesse betweene the children of Cassander, which drew both him and Demetrius into Macedon.

Antipater, the elder of Cassanders sonnes, was so farre too weake for Pyrrhus, that hee had no desire to attend the comming of Demetrius, but made an hastic agree- 30 ment, and divided the Kingdome with his yonger brother Alexander; who likewife felt the aide of Pyrrhus fo troublesome, that he was more willing to fend him away, than to call in such another helper. For Pyrrhus had the audacitie to request, or take as granted, by strong hand, Ambracia, Acarnania, and much more of the Countrie, as the reward of his paines: leaving the two brethren to agree as well as they could about the rest. Necessitie enforced the brethren to composition: but their composition would not satisfie Demetrius, who tooke the matter hainously, that he was sent for, and made a foole, to come so farre with an Armie, and finde no worke for it. This was a friuolous complaint; whereby it appeared, that Demetrius had a purpose to doe as Pyrrhus had done, and so much more, by how much he was stronger. Hereupon it seemed to Alexander a wise course, to remove this overdiligent friend, by murdering him vpon some advantage. Thus Demetrius reported the storie, and it might bee true; though the greatest part, and perhaps the wifest, beleeved it not. But the iffue was, that Alexander himselfe was seasted and slaine by Demetrius; who tooke his part of the Kingdome, as a reward of the murder; exculing the fact fo well, by telling his owne danger, and what a naughtie man Cassander had been, that all the Macedonians grew glad enough to acknowledge him their King. It fell out happily, that about the same time Lysimachus was busied in warre with a King of the wilde Thracians: for thereby he was compelled to seeke peace of co Demetrius, which to obtaine, he caused the remainder of Macedon to bee given vp; that is, the part belonging to Antipater, his sonne in law. At this ill bargaine Antipater grievously stormed, though he knew not how to amend it; yet stil he stormed; vntill his Father in law, to faue the labour of making many excuses, tooke away his troublesome life. Thus in haste, with a kinde of neglect, and as it were to avoide molestation, were slaine the children of Cassander: or Cassander that had slaine his owne Masters children, in a wife course of policie, with careful meditation (so much the more wicked as the more long) studying how to creet his owne house, that fell downe vpon his graue, ere the earth on it was throughly fetled.

It might be thought, that fuch an accesse of Dominion, added much to the greatnesse of Demetrius. But indeede it shewed his infirmitie; and thereby made him neglected by many, and at length hated by all. For he had no Art of civill Governement: but thought (or shewed by his actions that he thought) the vie and fruit of to a Kingdome, to be none other, than to doe what a King lifted. He gaue himfelfe ouer to Women and Wine, laughing openly at those that offered to trouble him with supplications, and the tedious discourse of doing justice. He had more skill in getting a Kingdome, than in ruling it: warre being his recreation, and luxuric his nature. By long rest (as fixe yeeres raigne is long to him, that knowes not how to raigne one yeere) he discouered so much of his worst condition, as made both the people wearie of his idlenesse; and the Souldiers, of his vanitie. He was freed from care of matters in Asia, by hearing that all was lost: though more especially, by hearing that Ptolomie had with great honor, entertained and dismissed his mother and children. This affoorded him the better leifure, of making warre in Greece : where 20 hevanquished the Thebans, and wonne their Citie twice in short space, but vsed his victorie with mercie. Against Lysimachus he would faine haue done somewhat (the peace betweene them notwithstanding) at such time as he was taken by the Thracians; but Lysimachus was freely dismissed, and in good case to make resistance ere Demetrius came; so as this iourney purchased nothing but enmitie. Another expedition he tooke in hand against Pyrrhus, with no better, or rather with worse cuent. Pyrhus held somewhat belonging to Macedon; which hee had indeede as honefly gotten, as Demetrius the whole Kingdome; he had also made excursions into Thef-Talie. But there needed not any hand some pretence of quarrell, seeing Demetrius thought himselfe strong enough, to ouer-runne his enemies Countrie, with two 20 great Armies. It is a common fault in men, to despise the vertue of those, whom they have knowne raw Nouices in that facultic, wherein themselves are noted as extraordinarie. Pyrrhus was a Captaine, whom later ages, and particularly the great Hannibal, placed higher in the ranke of Generalls, than either Demetrius, or any of Alexanders followers. At this time, he missed that part of the Armie, which Demetrius led, and fell vpon the other halfe: which he overthrew, not with more commendations of his good conduct, than of his private valour, thewed in fingle combat against Pantauchus, Demetrius his Lieutenant; who being a strong man of body, challenged this yong Prince to fight hand to hand, and was vtterly beaten. The loffe of this battaile did not so much offend the Macedonians, as the gallant be-40 hauiour of Pyrrhus delighted them. For in him they seemed to behold the lively figure of Alexander in his best qualitie. Other Kings did imitate, in a counterfeit manner, some of Alexanders graces, and had good skill in wearing Princely vestures: but (faid they) none, faue Pyrrhus, is like him indeede, in performing the office of a

These rumours were not more nourished by the vertue of the Epirot, than by diflike of their owne King; whom they began to difference, not so much in regard of his ynprofitable iourney into Epirus (for he had wasted much of the Countrie, and brought home his Armie in good case ) as of his insolence, that grew daily more and more intolerable. His apparell scemed, in the eyes of the Macedons, not 50 only too fumptuous and new-fangled, but very vnmanly; and feruing chiefly to be a daily witnesse, how much be contemned them and their good opinion. Of his

Souldiers lives he was rechleffe, and fuffered vnwisely this vn-princely sentence to escape out of his mouth; That the more of them died, the fewer he was to pay. Hee madea mockerie of inftice; and (asit were, to publish vnto all his Subjects, how little he esteemed it or them) having by a shew of popularitie invited Petitioners, and with a gracious countenance entertained their Supplications, he led the poore surers after him in great hope, till comming to a bridge, hee threw all their writings into the River; pleasing himselfe, in that hee could so easily and so boldly delude the cares of other men. By these courses he grew so odious, that Pyrrhus gathered audacitie, and invading Macedon, had almost wonne it all with little resistance. Demetrius lay then sicke in his bed: who recovering health, and taking the field, had such great oddes of strength, as made Pyrrhus glad to for sake his winnings and be gone.

At length he beganne to have some feeling of the generall hate; which to redresse, he did not (for he could not)alter his owne conditions; but purposed to alter their idle discourses of him, by setting them on worke in such an action, wherein his best qualities might appeare; that is, in a great warre. His intent was to invade

Assa, with a Royall Armic: wherein the fortune of one battaile might give him as much, as the fortune of another had taken from him. To this end, hee first made peace with Pyrrhus; that so hee might leave all safe and quiet at home. Then did he compose a mighty Armie, of almost a hundred thousand soot, and twelve thousand horse: with a Nauie of sine hundred saile, wherein were many ships, sarre exceeding the greatnesse of any that had beene seene before; yet so swift and vsefull withall, that the greatnesse was least part of their commendation.

The terrible fame of these preparations, made Seleucus and Ptolomie suspect their owne forces, and labour hard with Lysimachus and Pyrrhus, to joyne against this ambitious sonne of Antigonus; that was like to proue more dangerous to them all, than euer was his Father. It was easily discerned, that if Demetrius once preuailed in Asia, there could be no securitie for his friends in Europe; what league source were of old concluded. Therefore they resoluted to beginne with him betimes, and each to inuade that quarter of Macedon, that lay next his owne Kingdome. Lysimachus came first, and against him went Demetrius with a great part of his Armie: but whilst he was yet on the way, newes were brought into his Campe, that Pyrrhus had won Berrhaa. The matter was not ouer-great: were it not, that mindes prepared with 30 long discontent, are ready to lay hold vpon small occasions of dislike. All the camp was in vp-rore: some wept, others raged, sew or none did sorbeare to vtter seditious words, and many desired leaue of Demetrius, to goe to their owne houses, meaning indeede to have gone to Lysimachus.

When Demetrius perceived the bad affection of his Armie, hee thought it the wifest way, to lead the Macedonians further off from Lysimachus their owne Countrieman, against Pyrrbus that was a stranger: hoping by victorie against the Epirot, to recouer the loue of his followers, in such fort that hee might afterwards at leisure deale with the other. But herein his wisedome beguiled him. For the Souldiers were as hastie as he, to meet with Pyrrhus; not intending to hurt him, but longing 40 to fee that noble Prince, of whom they daily heard the honourable fame. Some spake of his valour; some enquired, others answered, of his person, his armor, and other tokens whereby hee might be knowne; as particularly, by a paire of Goats hornes, that he wore on his creft. It was not likely, that these men should hurt him. Divers of them stole away, and ranne ouer into Pyrrhus his campe; where the newes that they brought, were better welcome than their persons. For they said, and it was true, that if the Macedonians might once get fight of Pyrrhus, they would all falute him King. To trie this, Pyrrhus rode forth, and presented himselfe bareheadedin view of the camp, whither some were sent before to prepare his welcom. The newes of his arrivall found a generall applause, and every one began to looke 50 out, with desire to set eye on him. His face was not so well knowne as his helmet; therefore hee was admonished to put it on; which done, all came about him, and proffered their service; neither were there any that spake for Demetrius; only some (and they the most moderate of tongue) bade him be gone betimes; and shift for himselfe. So Demetrius threw aside his maskers habit, and attiring himselfe poorly, did searefully steale away out of his owne Campe: descruing well this calamitie, whether it were so, that he would not hearken to the good counsaile of his friends, or whether his behauiour depriued him of such friends, as would dare to let him heare the vnpleasant sound of necessaries truth.

Whilest Pyrrhus was making this triumphant entric into the Kingdome of Macedon; Lysimachus came vpon him very vnscasonably, and would needs have halter saying, that he had done as much as Pyrrhus in the warre, and therefore had reason to challenge his part of the gaines. The bargaine was quickly made, and the duito son agreed vpon: each of them being rather desirous to take his part quictly, than to sight for the whole; as hoping each of them, to worke his fellow quite out of all, ypon better oportunitie.

How DEMETRIVS gathering forces, enterprifed many things with ill fuccesse, in Greece and Asia. How he was driven upon SELEVCVS, and compelled to yeeld himselfe. His imprisonment and death.

as they had beene in former times. For they presently torsooke his friendship, and called Pyrrbus out of Accedon to be their Patron.

Demetrius, when he went against Lysimachus, had left a great part of his forces in Greece, vnder his sonne Antigonus. Therfore it is like, that he had soone gotten an Armie; though Phila his wife (who is highly commended for a wise and vertuous Ladie) did poison her selfe, vpon desperate griefe of his missorume. The first, vpon whom he attempted to shew his anger, were the Athenians, that had well deserved it. Hee beganne to lay siege to their Towne: but was pacified by Crates the Philosopher, whom they made their spokesman; and taking faire words instead of satisfaction, passed ouer into Asia, with eleven thousand Souldiers, meaning to trie his fortune against Lysimachus, for the Provinces of Lysia and Caria.

At his first comming into those parts, fortune seemed to smile vpon him. For many good Townes, willingly, or by compulsion, yeelded to his obedience. There were also some Captaines, that fell from Lysimachus to him, with their companies, and treasures. But it was not long, ere Agathoeles the sonne of Lysimachus, came vpon him, with an Armic so strong, that it was not for Demetrius his good, to hazard his last stocke against it. Wherefore, he resoluted, to passe through Phrygia and Armenia, into Media, and the Provinces of the higher Asia; trusting to finde a 40 Kingdome somewhere in those remote quarters. The execution of this counsaile was grieuously impeached by Agithoeles: who pursued him close, and cut offall his prouisions, driving him to take which waies he could, without following his intended course. In many skirmishes, Demetrius vanquished this troublesome enemie: neuerthelesse, hee could not be shaken off, but continued afflicting the poore titularie King, with extreme famine. At length, in passing the River Lycus, so many of Demetrius his men were loft, that the rest could no longer make resistance : but were driven to travaile with fuch speede, as might well be called a plaine flight. So that with famine, pestilent diseases following famine, and other accidents of warre, eight thousand of them were consumed: the rest, with their Captaine, escaped into 50 Cilicia. Seleucus had gotten possession of Cilicia, whilest Demetrius was occupied in Greece: yet was it no part of Demetrius his errand, to lay claime to the Countrie; but with vehement and humble letters he befought his fonne in law, to call to minde their alliance, and to pity him in his great misery. These letters at the first wrought wel with Seleucus, and he condescended to the request: yet considering further how Bbbbb

Many treaties were held betweene them; of which none tooke effect, through the jealoufie of Seleucus. Therefore, meere desperation enforced Demetrius, to fight like a mad man; and his furie got him some victories, though of small importance. At length sicknesse tooke and held him fortie dayes, in which time, a great number of his tew men, ranne to the enemie. This notwith standing heef still held out, and once had like to have taken Seleucus in his bed, had not his comming been discoursed by fugitives, that gave the alarme. Finally, when all his Armie had for saken him, and left him with a few of his friends to shift for himselfe, hee was compelled to by the last of those adherents (for even some of those few for sooke him) to yee:d ynto Seleucus.

Scleucus hearing this, was exceeding glad and fent him very comfortable meffages. But the approbation of his owne humanitie, by his followers, was such, as renewed his jealous thoughts; and hindred him from admitting Demetrius to his presence, though otherwise he vsed him with as much fauor, as any prisoner could wish. He was kept vnder surguard in a demie iland, wherein were goodly walks, Ochards, and Parks for hunting. He had all that he asked roially, and friends allowed to visit him, at his, and their pleasure. Only his libertie was reserved vnto the comming of yong Antiochus and Stratonica, out of the high Countries. In this 20 fort he spent three yeres, living merrily all the while (as one that now enjoyed the happinesse, which with so much travaile and bloud-shed, he had sought in vaine) and then died, leaving to his sonne Antigonus, the same which his father had lest vnto himselfe; that is, friends and hope. His asserted honourably buried in Corinth; his qualities have appeared in his actions, and the fortune of his house will shew it selfe hereafter, in times and places convenient.

Q. IX.

The death of P tolomie, of L ysimac Hvs, and of Selevevs, that was last of A lexanders Captaines: with other occurrences.

Bout the same time that Demetrius died, died also Ptolomie King of Ægypt; a vertuous Prince, warlike, gentle, bountifull, and (whichin those times was a rare commendation) regardfull of his word. Hee had, by many Wiues and Concubines, many children, out of whom he selected Ptolomie Philadelphus, and caused him to raigne together with himselfe, two or three yeares before he died, that so he might confirme him 40 in the inheritance of the Kingdome. At this, Ptolomie Ceraumus (for all of that house assumed the name of Ptolomie) was grieuously incensed. But no man cared for his anger. Therefore he went to Seleucus, who gaue him louing entertainment. There were now only two of Aexanders Captaines lest, Seleucus and Lysin achus. These two needes would fight for it, who should be the longest liver of that brave Companie. The true ground of their quarrell was, their near equalitie of strength, and want of one to part them. The pretence was the murders which Lysinachus had committed upon many of his Nobles, together with his poisoning Agathoeles his eldest sonne: whose wife and children fled unto Seleucus soraide.

The Muccdons after seuen Moneths pause, having spent their first heat of admiration, beganne to hearken so well to Lysimachus, their natural Countrie-man, that they for sooke Pyrrhus, upon none other ground than because hee was an Alien. This they had knowne well enough before: but they did him no great wrong in taking lightly from him, which they lightly gaue him. Lysimachus had raigned about fine yeares alone, when the Citie of Lysimachia (built by him, and called after his name) falling by an earthquake, appeared, by cuents, to have foreshewed the fall of his house. His owne icalousie, and the instigation of a mother in law, caused him to poison his Sonne Agatheeles, which drew upon him that warre, wherein (after the losse of all his fifteene children, that were taken away by divers accidents) he perished himselfe.

Seleucus was encountred by Lysimachus on Asia side, where one battaile concluded the warre, with Lysimachus his death. It pleased Seleucus more than the victorie. that he was the last of all the great Heroes which had followed Alexander. For now to be feemed to himselfe, as Lord and Heire of all the conquered world. So he passed ouer into Macedon, to take possession of Europe, where there was none to withstand him. But there he ended his daies, and within seuen moneths followed Lysimachus, and other of his fellows, by a bloudie death; being treacherously slaine by Ptolomie Ceraunus, whose friend and Patron he had beene. Seuentie and seuen yeare old he was, when hee fought with Lysimachus, and Lysimachus was seuentie and foure. With them ended the generation of old Captaines, that had scene the daies, as it were of another world vnder the Persian: yet was there left one equal to any of them in the Art of warre; even Pyrrhus the Epirot, of whom we fpake before that is now readie to enter into warre with the Romans, a more warlike people, than 20 Alexander himselfe euer did encounter. Of which warre, and of which people, it is needfull that we here make mention, as of a storic more important, than any likely to ensue in Greece, or in the great Kingdomes, that were held by Alexanders Succeffors, with leffe (and still decreasing) vertue, than was that, by which they were first purchased.

After the death of Tullus Hostslius (who when hee had raigned two and thirtie yeares, was burnt together with his house by lightning ) Ancus Martius, Grandchild to Numa Fompilius by his daughter, and not much valike him in disposition. fucceeded in the Kingdome of Rome. He walled the Citie about; enlarged it with the hill Auentine, which hee enclosed; built a bridge ouer Tybru, and the Citic of Ostia vpon the Sea, fixteene miles distant from Rome. Finally, having raigned foure and twentie yeares, he died, and by his last Will he left his children in charge with one Lucumon, the sonne of Damaratus a Corinthian, who avoiding Cypfelus King of Corinth his tyranny, had fled into Hetruria, and dwelt in Tarquing, by the name of which Towne hee was afterwards called Tarquinias. From that Citie in Hetruria 10 comming to Rome, and encouraged by some ominous occurents, together with his wife Tanaquils prophecie, hee grew a fauorite of Ancus Martius; by his Gracian wit humoring the factions of the Roman Court, in so much that after his Lecease, he became not only Protector to the children, but Gouernour to the Citie. He doubled the number of Senators, and enlarged the Centuries of Horse-men:neither was he leste eminent in warre, than in peace: for he prevailed often against the Tuscans, and from his victories, the chiefest ornaments of triumph tooke their originall. When this Lucius Tarquinius had raigned eight and thirtie yeares, he was slaine by the sonnes of Ancus Martius, to whom he had been left Guardian. But Tauaquil his wife, perceiping what was done, enformed the people, from out of an high Turret, 20 that her Husband was wounded, and sicke, but not dangerously. And withall signified vnto them, that in the interim of his ficknes, one Seruius Tullius, whom from his birth she alwaies prophecied to be borne to great hopes, (the sonne of P. Corniculanus and Ocrifia, a well descended, but captine woman) brought vp in her house, and hufband vnto her daughter, should supplie her husbands place, in gouerning the State, vntill his reconerie: which gouernment, being thus at first obtained by cunning, he afterwards vsurped as his right. He first ordained Ratements, Subsidies, and valuations of the peoples wealth; among whom, at that time, fourescore thousand were mustered, of which number consisted their whole corporation; and by distinction of Dignitics, Ages, Trades, and Offices, he managed the King- 30 dome in as good fort, as if it had beene a private household, Atlength, having two daughters of different natures, the one milde and gentle, the other fierce and outragious: and finding also that the two sonnes of Tarquinius Priscus, Sextus and Aruus. which had been committed to his tuition, were of different dispositions, proprotionably answering to his daughters; he (willing to adde water, not oile, to fire) gaue the milde daughter to Sextus the hot-headed sonne; and the violent, to Aruns, the gentle, in mariage. But whether by inteded courses, or by accident, it happened: the two milde ones being made away, the furious natures were readily ioyned in marriage: who foone concurring, and calling the Senate together, beganneto lay claime to the Kingdome. Vponthis tumult, Servius Tullius hasting to the Senate, 49 (where he thought by authoritic to have bridled infolencie) was throwne downe the staires, and going home fore bruised, was slain by the way, when he had raigned fortie and foure yeare. Then Tullia his daughter, first proclaiming her husband Tarquinius Superbus King; returning home, enforced her Coach-man to drive his Chariot ouer her fathers corpes; whereupon the street had the denomination of wicked street. This Tarquine, exercising crueltie without justice, and tyrannie without mercie, vpon the people and Senators; having tired himselfe and them at home, vied the same rage of treacherie vpon his borders. He tooke Ocriculum, Suessa Pometia, and the Gabij. The issue of besieging Ardea, a towne eighteene miles distant from Rome, was of bad successe. In the heate of which warre, his sonne Sextus Tar- 50 quinius violently rauished that chaste Ladie Lucretia, his kinsman Collatines wise: who in way of expiation for so vnchastea deed, thought good to wash out those spots of infamie with her owne bloud; so (having first bequeathed the renenge unto her father Sp. Lucretins Tricipitions, her husband Collatine, and Iunius Brutus)

the killed her felfe: whereupon (chiefly by Iunius Brutus his refolution) Tarquinius Superbus, with his wife and children, was depoted and banished; and fled to Porfenna King of Hetruria for succour, in the flue and twentieth years of his raigne, and the two hundred fortie and fourth from the building of their Citie: in which space Rome had scarce gotten full possession of fifteene miles round about her.

Iunius Brutus by the helpe of Collatine, having expelled Tarquine, and freed his Countrey from that heavie yoake of bondage, inforced the people by folemne oath neuer to admit any gouernment by Kings amongst them : whereupon they to ranfacked their Kings goods, confecrated their fields to Mars, and conferred the gouernment of the State vpon Brutus and Collatine. But because the name of King was odious in their eares, they changed the manner of their gouernment, from perpetualito annuall, and from a fingle gouernour to a double; lest perpetuali or sole dominion might be some motiue to vsurpation; and in stead of Kings they called them Confuls, fignifying, as it may be interpreted, Providers: that their titles might remember them of their place, which was to be alwaies mindefull of their Citizens welfare. And yet was it so hard setling of troubled waters, that the people, after this innovation of State, scarce daring to assure themselves of their owne securitie, enforced Tarquinius Collatine to refigne vp-his authoritie, fearing that tyrannie 20 would be hereditarie, and supposing that the very name & affinity with the house of Tarquin, fauoured alreadie of their condition. In his roome was substituted Valerius Publicola, who that he might (as his name reporteth) be gratious in the peoples cies, gaue liberty, in matters of controuersie, to appeale from the Consuls to the people; and that he might as well in goods as in person, auoyde occasion of suspition, caused his owne house to be pulled downe, because it was built in a place defenlible, as if it had beene a Citadell. Neither was Brutus any wayes deficient in matter of greater moment; which concerned as well the peoples fafetic, as their favour: for having got intelligence, that some greener wits, and in the first ranke his owne fonnes, were itching after innouations, hoping to restore the banished Kingse 30 he caused them, publikely in the Market-place, to be whipt, and then to be brought all vnpartially to the blocke.

Hithertothe Romanes, having by the vnblemished integritie of Brutus, well appealed all inbred quarrels at home, now hereaster imploy their militarie designements, against Forrainers; first, for their libertie; secondly, for inlarging of their possessions; and lastly, for desending their confederate Provinces, and extending their Empire. For Rome, situated as it were in the mid-way between exterian and the Tuscans, having as yet but narrow bounds, being in her minoritie, could not but give occasion of offence to her neighbours; vntill by maine opposition, having prevailed against her borderers, shee vsed them as instruments, whereby to obtaine 40 the rest.

Their first warre, in the first yeare of Confuls, was against Porsenna King of Heterra: who being ouer-perswaded by Tarquines lamentation, came to Rome, together with the banished King, and with great forces, to seate him agains in his Kingdome.

In the first conflict, Horatius Cocles, having long time borne the maine brunt of his enemies, on the bridge over Tibris; at length, feeling himselfe too faint to stand against so many, caused the bridge behinde him to be broken downe, and with his armour, leaping into the River, like a bunted Stagge, refreshed his hote spirits, and returned safe to his fellowes, with the like resolution to sustaine a new charge. Porsona, although by this he had well-nigh won the hill Inviculus, which is the verie entrance vnto the Citie, and found the victorie, in a manner, assuredly his own: yet admiring their valour, and terrified by the constant resolution of Mutius Secuolus (who having by errour slaine Porsenna his Secretarie, instead of the King himselfe, didins sorne of torments threatned, burne off his owne hand) bee thought it not Bbbb 3

any wait prejudiciall, either to his satetie, or credite, to enter league with them at the world hand. And yet the edge of Tarquenew his spleene, was not quite abated, though Aruns his sonne, and brutes his enemie, in single combat, had slaine each other. And here the Romans, although they lost Brutes, got the field; and their Ladies, whose Champion thee was, for their chattitie, not for beautic, mounted the losse of him one whole yeare. Into his place, for the residue of his yeare, was sub-rogated Sp. Lucreties Iriciptimus, sather to Lucretia: and in his roome (deceasing naturally before the yeare expired) Horatius Pulvillus.

Tarquine, vpon his ouerthrow, feeling the fates disaftrous, thought it no boot to firing against the streame, and spent the residue of his time; which was about four- 10 teene yeares, privately at Tusculum. Yet his sonne-in-law Mamilius Tusculanus, stomaching afreil at those old repulses, because Porfenna had made peace with the Romans and denied further fuccour vnto the Tarquines, mustered vp his Latines, and gaue battaile to the Romans, at the Lake Regidum; where the conflict was fierce, and the iffue vnccrtaine, vntill Aulus Post humins, the Roman Dictator, (for they had created this Magistracy greater than Consulls, purposely for this Warre, when first it was expected) to exaperate his Souldiers courage, threw their owne Enfignes amidft the Enemies; and Collus or Spurius Calsius (master of the Horse men, an assifrant Officer to the Dictator) commanded to take off their bridles, that they might runne with free violence, to recour againe their Enfignes. This fight was fo well 20 performed, that a report went current of Castor and Pollux, two Gods, who came on mi ke-white Steeds, to be eye-witnesses of their valour, and fellow helpers of their victorie; for the Generall confecrated a Temple to them, as a stipend for their paines. After this the Romans fierce spirits, having no object of valour abroad, reflected upon themselues at home; and the fixteenth yere after the Kings expulsion, vpon infligation of some desperate banekrouts, thinking themselves wrongfully oppressed by the Senate and Confulls, they made an vproare in the holy Mount, vntill by Meuenius Agrippa, his discreet allusion, of the inconvenience in the head and bellies discord, to that present occasion, they were reconciled to the Senate: with condition, that they might have some new Magistrates created, to whome 30 they might appeale in cases of variance, and make them Solicitors in their controuerlies, the Confuls authori ie notwithstanding. This was enacted; and they were called the Tribunes of the people. After this attonement among it themselves, they had continual Warre with the Latines, concerning their bounds and limits, and with other neighbouring States. A mongst these, the Volsai and Agus held them longest; who made warre, of themselves, vpon the Romans: whereby they lost the best Citie in their whole jurisdiction, Corioli.

In this conquest, T. Martius got the sirname of Coriolanus: a name honorable then, as deriued from a great victorie: although, by reason of the pouertie of the Towne, a Roman Generall, in after times, would have beene ashamed of that title. But yet 40 these graces had been eno occasion of disparagement, had hee not afterwards, in a great time of dearth, aduled to sell corne, which they procured from Sicil, at too high a rate, to the people: whereupon, Decius Mus, their Tribune, in their behalfe, accused him, and after judgement, banished him. Coriolanus flying to the Volci, whom lately beforehe had vanquished incensed them to renue their forces againe; which being committed vnto him, and to Attius Tullus, he prevailed in field, to farre forth, that he was come within foure or fine miles of the Citie. Incamping there hee made so sharpe warre, and was at such defiance, with his Countrie, that hee would not relent by any supplications of Embassadours, vntill his Mother Veturia, and Volumnia his wife, with a pittifull tune of deprecation, shewing themselves bet- 50 ter Subjects to their Countrie, than friends to their sonne and husband, were more availeable to Rome, then was any force of armes. Hereupon Coriolanus dismissing his Armie, was after put to death among the Volsei, as a Traitor, for neglecting such opportunitie: or (as others furmise) living with them vntill old age, hee died naturally.

Not long after this, the Veij in Hetruria, prouoked the Romans; against whom the Fabij, three hundred and fixe in number, all of one Familie, intreated and obtained, that they only might be imploied, as it had been in a private quarrell. These Fabij, after some good services, lying incomped at Cremera, were circumvented and all slaine: one only of that whole house, had beene lest, by reason of infancie, at home; from whom afterward sprang Fabius Maximus, who yanquished Hamibal.

In processe of time, the Romans were also troubled with the Volsa, at the hill Algidum, two miles from Rome; where Lucius Minucius their Consull, with his whole Armie, had beene discomsticed, had not L. Quintius Cincinatus chosen Dietator, and taken from the plough to the highest honour in Rome, with successe answerable to his expedition, dispersed his enemies, and freed his Countrie in the space of fixteen dayes. In the continuance of this Volsain warre it was, that Appins Claudius, one of the ten men, whom they had two yeares before chosen Governours of the State, and inactors of Solons lawes amongst them, procured from Athens (abrogating in the meane while the Consuls, and all other Magistrates) would have ranished Virginius, the daughter of T. Virginius, Captain of a Companic, and lying then in campe at Azidum. Hercupon the people, in an vproare, tooke the Hill Auentine, and after much variance, enforced the ten men, to resigne vp their authoritie againe, to new Consuls.

After this, either new quarrels, or defire to reuenge old losses, drew the Romans into a new warre, against the Vetentes, and their adherents, vpon whom having tried their forces, with diversitie of Captains, and varietie of event, they vanquished the Falger, and the Fidenates, and vtrerly subdued the Vetentes. In conquering the Falses, Fun ins Camillus showed no lesses in gritic then fortisude. For when a Schoolemaster, by trayning forth into the Roman campe, many children of the principall Gitizens, thought to betray the Towne, yeelding them all vp as Hostages: Camillus delivered this Traitor bound vnto his Schollers, willing them to whip him back into the Citie; which forthwith yeelded vnto him in reverence of his justice. The slege of Vey was tenne yeares, and so troublesome, that the Romans were there first on once to winter abroad vnder beasts skinnes (to which they were the more easily induced, because then first they received pay) and to make vowes never to returne without victoric.

At length winning the Citie by a Mine, they got so large spoiles, that they confecrated their tenths to Apollo Pythins: and the whole people in generall, were called to the ransacking of the Citie. But yet they were no lesse vnthankefull to Camillus for his service, then before they had beene to Corrolanus; For they banished him the Citie, vpon some occasion of inequalitie in dividing the spoiles: yet herequited their vnkindneffe with a new peece of feruice, against the furie of the Garles: who being a populous Countrie, and veric healthfull, the fathers (as sometimes 40 now) lived fo long, that the fonnes, deftitute of meanes, were enforced to roave abroad, feeking some place, where to set up their rest: and withall being a Nation vast in body, rude by nature, and barbarous in conditions, wandred as Rouers over many Countries. Some of them lighting on Italie, let vpon Clusium, a Towne in Hetruria: whereof Rome having information (and being carefull of her Confede rate Townes) sent Embassadours, warning them to desist from such injurious enterprises. But the barbarous people, not regarding the message, vpon some injurie offered by the Roman Embailadours, converted their forces from Clusium towards Rome; and giving a great overthrow to the Romans, by the River Allia, voon the fixteenth day before the Calends of Jugust (which day was after branded for vn-30 luckie, and called Alliensis in the Roman Kalendar) they hastened towards the Citie. Then was Rome the true map of miserie and desolation. For some leaving the citie: fome creeping into holes; Priefts hiding their reliques; and every one shifting for himselfe, ere the enemie came; Rome was abandoned, as indefensible. The Vestall Virgins, in this tumult, were fafely convaied away; the Ancients of the Citie, gathering boidnesse out of desperate feare, did put on their Robes, and taking their leave or the world, did seate themselves in Thrones, in their severall houses, hourely expecting the messengers of death, and meaning to die, as they had lived, in State. The younger fort, with M. Manlius their Captaine, tooke vpon them to make good the Capitoll.

By this, the Gaules were entred the Citie, who feeing all quiet, at first suspected some ambush; afterward finding all secure, they fell to the spoile, committing all to the fire and fword. As for the old Senators, that fate in their Majestie, with a grave resolution: having first renerenced them as Gods, anon they tryed whether they would die like men. When the Citie was throughly rifled, they attempted to the Capitoll: which held them worke for the space of seuen Moneths. Once they were like to have surprised it by night, but being descried by the gagling of Geefe, M. Manleus did awaken, and kept them from entrance. At length a composition was agreed upon: the Gaules being wearie, and the Romans hungrie. The bargaine was, that the Gaules should take a thousand pound waight in gold, to desist from their siege. Whilest the gold was in waighing, the Gaules, with open insolencie, made their waights too heavie: Brennus, their Captaine, casting his sword into the ballance, and, with a proud exprobration, faying, that the vanquished must bee patient perforce. But in the midst of this cauilling, came Furius Camillus, with an Armie, from Ardea, (where he had lived in his banishment) and fell vpon the Gaules, 20 with such violence, that hee dispersed their troups, quenched the fire of the Citie with their bloud, forcing them to restore the spoiles with aduantage, and forbeare the gold, in accepting which, they had lately beene so nice. Further, having rid the Citie of them, he so hotly pursued them, through a great part of Italie, that the remainder of their Armie, which cleaped from him, was very small. Other Armies of the Gaules, which followed this first, had the like ill successe. They were often beaten by the Romans; especially the victories of M. Torquatus, and of M. Valerius Cornenus (each of which in fingle fight, flew a Champion of the Gaules) abated their prefumption, and reftored courage to the Romans. Camillus, for his notable feruice, was afterwards accompted a second Romulus:

The people, after this dettruction of their Citie, were carneftly bent to goe to the Ven to inhabite; but Camillus dissiwaded them.

About the same time, somewhat before the siege of Veij, they changed their gopernment from Confulls to militarie Tribunes. The government of these also, after some yeares, was by civill diffension interrupted: so that one while Consulls ruled: another while there was an Anarchie: Then the Tribunes were restored and ru'ed againe, till after many yeares expired, the Consular authoritie was established; it being enacted, that one of the Consults should alwaies bee a Plebeian. This was after the building of the Citie, three hundred fixtie fine yeares. And now Rome by suppression of her neighbour Countries, creeping well forward out of her 40 Minoritie, dares fet forth against the warlike Samnites, who dwelt almost one hundred and thirtie miles off: fituated betweene Campania and Apulia. These did so firongly invade the Campanians their Neighbours, that they forced them to yeeld themselves subjects to Rome, and vindergoe any conditions of Tribute, or whatfocuer else to obtaine protection: which the Remans, although both Countries had beene their Confederates, yet not willing that the greater, like fish, should deuour the leffe, eafily allowed off; aiming themselves at the good situation of Campania, the aboundance of Corne and Wine, pleasant Cities and Townes, but especially Capua it selfe, the fairest Citie then in all Italie.

The Families of the Papyrii and Fabii were most imployed in the managing of 50 this warre, which indured the space of fiftic yeares. And in this scason were the Romans oftentimes dangerously encountred by the Samnites, as when T. Veturius, and Sp. Posthumius were Consulls, and discomfitted by Pontius at Caudium, with no small ignominie: and when Q. Fabius Gurges lost the field with three thousand men.

But for these losses, many great victories made large amends: The greatest whereof were gotten by L. Papyrius, and by Quintus Fabius Maximus.

The Samnites drew the Hetrurians into their quarrell. But the force of the Samnites was well broken, ere the Hetrurians (the greater and richer, but leffe warlike Nation) beganne to stirre. So the one and the other of these two Countries, becarre at length, tributarie to Rome.

In the continuance of this long warre it was, (though in time of truce betweene the Romans and Samnites) that the Latines beganne to challenge equal freedome in the Corporation of Rome, and right in bearing Office, so that they required to have 10 one of the Consuls yearely chosen out of them.

This demand, of the Latines, was not unreasonable. For the Romans themselves were a Latine Colonie; belides all which, they made offer, to change their name, and to be all called Romans. But the Romans were too proud, to admit any fuch capitulation. So a great battaile was fought betweene them: wherein the fortune of Rome prevailed, by the vertue of the Confulls.

Manlins Torquatus, and the elder Decius, were then Confulls, whom the Soothfavers advertised, that the side should be victorious, which lost the General in fight. Hereupon, Desius the Confull, exposed his life to the Enemie, and purchased victor rie (as was beleeued) by his death. In which kind of denoting himfelfe for his Ar-20 mie, the sonne of this Decius, being after Consull, did imitate his father, in the Hetrarian warre. But (as Tullie well notes) it was rather the desperate resolution of these Decij, that purchased victorie, by rushing into the midst of the enemies, wherin their Souldiers followed them, than any great commendation of fuch a religion, as required the lines of so worthic Citizens, to be sacrificed for their Countrie. The discipline of Manlius was no lesse resolute, than the valour of Decius. He forbad any one to for fake his place, and fight fingle with an enemie. For breach of which order, he caused his owne some to be put to death, who had slaine a Captaine of the Latings, being challenged in fingle fight.

When the Latines, the Aqui, Volsci, Hernici, Campani, Samnites, and Hetrurians, 3° with fome other people, were brought under obedience; it was a vaine labour for any people of Italie, to contend against the Romans.

Yet the Sabines adventured to trie their fortune; and found it bad. For Curius Dentatus, the Roman Confull, wasting all their Countrie with fire and sword, from the River Nar and Velia, to the Adriatique Sea, brought them into quiet subjection.

The last of the Italians, that made triall of the Roman Armes, were the Tarentines, and their adherents. These had interposed themselves as Mediatours, betweene the Romans and Samnites; with a peremptoric denunciation of warre, vnto that partie, which should dare to refuse the peace by them tendred. These threats, which discouered their bad affection to Rome, ended in words; but when the Sam-40 nites were veterly subdued, matter enough of quarrell was found, to examine their abilitie of performance.

The Romans complained, that certaine ships of theirs were robbed; and sent Emballadours vnto Tarentum, to require amends. Vpon some wrong done to these Embassadours, was laid the foundation of that Warre; wherein the Lucans, Messapians, Brutians, and Appulians, joyning with the Tarentines, procured the Samnites, and other Subjects of Rome, to rebell, and take their part. But some experience of the Roman firength, taught all these people to know their owne weaknesse. Wherefore they agreed to fend for Pyrrhus, by whose aide (being a Grecian, as the Tarentinesalfo were) great hope was conceived, that the Dominion of Rome should bee 50 confined, vnto more narrow bounds, than all Italie, which alreadie, in a manner it did ouer-spread.

How Pyrrhys warred upon the Romans, and vanquished them in two battailes.

YRRHVS, for faken by the Macedonians, and vnable to deale with Lysimachus, was compelied a while to line in rest: which he abhorred no lesse than a wifer Prince would have desired. He had a strong Armie, and a good Fleet, which in that vnsetled estate of things, was enough to purchase a Kingdome: but the fall of Demetrius had so encreased 10 the power of Lysimachus, that it was no point of wisedome, to make an offensiue warre vpon him, without farre greater forces. Antigonus, the sonne of Demetrius, held Corinth, at the same time, and some other Townes, with the remainder of his fathers Armie and treasures, left in his hand. V pon him it is like that Pyrrhus might have wonne; but it was better to let him alone, that hee might ferue to give some hinderance to Lysimachus.

In this want of imploiment, and couetous delire of finding it, the Tarentine Embassadours came very fitly to Pyrrhus: and they came with braue offers, as needing noncother aide then his good conduct, which to obtaine, they would cast themselues under his protection. They had in their companie, some of the Samnites, 20 Lucanians, Messapians, and others; which promised in behalfe of their seuerall Nations, as much as could be defired. This encouraged Pyrrhus, and filled him with hopes of goodly conquests; that he might enlarge his Empire to the West, as farre as Alexander had gotten Eastward; and still by one victorie open the gate vnto another. To which effect it is faid, that once he answered Cyneas his chiefe Counsailour, asking what he meant to doe after enery of the victories which hee hoped to get: that, hauing wonne Rome, he would soone be Master of all Italie; that, after Italie he would quickly get the Isle of Sicil; that, out of Sicil hee would passe ouer into Africk, and winne Carthage, with all the rest of the Countrie, & being strengthned with the force of all these Provinces, thee would be too hard, for any of those, 30 that were now so proud and troublesome. But Cyneas enquired yet further, what they should doe, when they were Lords of all : Whereunto Pyrrhus (finding his drift) answered pleasantly, that they would line merrily ; a thing (as Cyneas then told him) that they presently might doe, without any trouble, if he could be contented with his owne.

Neuerthelesse, this Italian expedition seemed vnto Pyrrhiu, a matter of such consequence, as was not to bee omitted, in regard of any scholasticall disputation. Wherefore he prepared his Armie; of almost thirtie thousand men, well forted; and well trained Souldiers: part of which he fent ouer before him vinder Cynews, with the rest he followed in person: At his coming, he found the Turentines very prompt 40 of tongue, but in matter of execution, vtterly carelesseto provide for the Watre. Wherefore he was faine to shut up their T heater, and other places of pleasure and refort; enforcing them to take Armes, and making such a strickt muster, as was to them very unpleasing, though greatly behoouing to their estate.

Whilest he was occupied with these cares, Laninus the Roman Consul drew near, and beganne to wast Lucania, a Province confederate with the Tarentines in this Warre.

The Lucanians were not readie to defend their owne Countrie; the Sammites were carelelle of the harme, that fell not (as yet) voon themselhes; the Tarentines were etter prepared than they would have beene, but their valour was little: all 50 of these had been accustomed to shrinke, for feare of the Roman fortifude and therefore it fell out happily, that Pyrrhus relied more vpon his owne forces, than the iffue of their vaunting promises. Hee was now driven, either to set forward, with those that himselfe had brought into Italy, and the affistance of the Tarentines, wherein wherein little was to be reposed; or else to weaken the reputation of his owne sutficiencie, which by all meanes he was carefull to vp-hold. In good time a great part of his forces, that had beene scattered by foule weather at Sea, were safely come to him: with which he resolued to assay the valour of the Romans, against whom hee proudly marched.

Leainus the Confull was not affrighted, with the terrible name of a great Kings but came on confidently to meet him, and give him battaile, ere all his adherents should be ready to joyne with him. This boldnesse of the Roman, and the slacknesse of the Messapians, Lucanians, Samnetes, and others, whom the danger most to concerned, caused Pyrrhus to offer a treatic of peace; requiring to have the quarrel. betweene the Romans and his Italian friends, referred to his arbitrement. Whether he did this to winne time, that the Samnites and their fellowes might arrive at his Campe; or whether, confidering better at neare distance, the weight of the builnesse, which he had taken in hand, he were desirous to quit it with his honour; the fhort answere, that was returned to his proposition, gaue him no meanes of either the one or the other: for the Romans fent him this word, that they had neither chosen

Hereupon, both Armies hastened their march vnto the River of Siris: Levinus intending to fight, before the arrival of the Samnites; Pyrrhus, to hinder him from 20 passing that River, vntill his owne Armic were full. V pon the first view of the Roman Campe, it was readily conceined by Pyrrhus, that he had not now to doe with barbarous people, but with men well trained in a braue discipline of warre: which caused him to set a strong Corps de garde, vpon the passage of the river, that he might not be compelled to fight, vntill he faw his best advantage. But he quickly found, that this new enemie was not only skilfull in the Art of war, but couragious in execution. For the Roman Armic entred the Foord, in face of his Corps de garde; and their horse, at the same time, beganne to passe the River, in sundrie places: which caused the Greekes to forsake the defence of their banke, and speedily retire vnto

This audacitie forced Pyrrhus to battaile; wherewith he thought it best to prefent them, ere their whole Armie had recoursed firme footing, and were in order. So directing his Captaines how to marshall his battailes; himselfe with the horse, charged upon the Romans: who stoutly received him, as men well exercised in sustaining furious impressions. In this fight, neither did his courage transport him beyond the dutie of a carefull Generallanor his providence in directing others, hinder the manifestation of his personall valour. It behooved him indeede to doe his best; for he neuer met with better opposers. Once, and shortly after the fight began, his horse was slaine under him : afterwards, he changed armour with a friend, but that friend paid his life for the vse of his Kings armour, which was torne from 40 his backe. This accident had almost lost him the battaile: but he perceiuing it, discovered his face, and thereby restored courage to his men, and tooke from the Romans their vaine iov. The fight was obstinate, and with the greater losse (at least of more eminent men) on Pyrrhus his side, as long as only speare and sword were vsed. But when the Elephants were brought into the wings, whose vnvsuall forme and terrible aspect, the horses of the Romans (vnaccustomed to the like) were not able to fustaine; then was the victorie quickly gotten. For the Roman battailes, perceiuing their horse putto rout, and driven out of the field; finding also themselues both charged in flanke, and ouer-borne, by the force, and huge bulke, of these strange beasts; gaue way to necessitie, and saued themselues, as well as they To could, by haftie flight in which consternation, they were so forgetfull of their difcipline, that they tarried not to defend their Campe, but ranne quite beyond it, leaving both it, and the honour of the day, entirely to Pyrrhus.

The fame of this victorie was soone spread ouer Italie; and the reputation was no lesse than the same. For it was a matter very rare to bee heard, that a Roman Confull, with a felect Armie, should loofe in plaine battaile, not only the field, but the Campe it selfe, being so notably fortified, as they alwaies were. And this honour was the more brauely wonne by Pyrrhus, for that hee had with him none of his Italian friends, saue the vnwarlike Tarentines. Neither could he well diffemble his content that he tooke, in having the glory of this action peculiarly his owne, at fuch time as he blamed the Lucans and Samnites, for comming (as we fay) a day after the faire. Neuerthelesse, he wisely considered the strength of the Romans, which was such as would better endure many such losses, than he could many such victo. ries. Therefore he thought it good to compound with them, whilest with his honour he might; and to that purpose hee sent vnto them Cyness his Embassadour; 10 demaunding only to have the Tarentines permitted to live at rest, and himselfe accepted as their especiall friend. This did Cyneas, with all his cunning, and with liberall gifts, labour to effect: but neither man nor woman could be found in Rome, that would take any bribe of him; neither did their defire of recourring their captiues, or their danger, by the rifing of many States in Italie against them, so incline them to peace, as the vehement exhortation of Appius Claudius, an old and blinde Senator, did stirre them vp to make good their honour by warre. So they returned answere, that whilest Pyrrhus abode in Italie, they would come to no agreement

Such was the report, that Cynews made, at his returne, of the Roman puissance 20 and vertue, as kindled in Pyrrhus, a great desire of confederacie, with that gallant Citie. Hereupon many kinde Offices passed betweene them: but still when hee vrged his motion of peace, the answere was, He must first depart out of Italie, and then treat of peace.

In the meane feafon, each part made provision for warre; the Romans leaving a more mightic armie than the former; and Pyrrhus being strengthned with accesse vnto his forces, of all the East parts of Itali. So they came to triall of a second battaile, wherein (though after long and cruell fight) the boifterous violence of the Elephants, gaue to Pyrrhus a second victorie. But this was not altogether so joyfull as the former had beene: rather it gaue him cause to say, that such another vi- 30 Goric would be his ytter undoing. For he had loft the flower of his Armic in this battaile: and though he draue the Romans into their Campe, yet he could not force them out of it, nor faw any likelihood of prevailing against them, that were like to be relieued with daily supplies, whilest he should be driven to spend upon his old Rock. Neither could hee expect, that his Elephants should alwaies stand him in stead. A little knowledge of their manner in fight, would soone teach the Romans, that were apt Scholers in such learning, how to make them unseruiceable. Wherefore hee defired nothing more, than how to carrie his honour fafe out of Italie: which to doe(seeing the Romans would not helpe him, by offering or accepting anie faire conditions of peace, or of truce) he tooke a flight occasion, presented by 40 fortune, that followeth to be related.

ò. III.

The great troubles in Macedon and Sicill. How PYRRHVS, being inuited into Sicill, for fooke Italie; wanne the most of the Isle; and lost it in short space. PYRRHV s returnes into Italy; where he is beaten by the Romans, and fo goes backe to his owne Kingdome.

Hen Ptolomie Ceraunus had traiteroully murdered his Benefactor and Patron Seleucus, he presently seized vpon all the Dominions of Lysimachus in Europe, as if they had beene the due reward, vnto him, that had flaine the Conquerour. The houses of Cassander and Lysimachus were then fallen to the ground : neither was there in Macedon any man of strengthand reputation enough, to advance himselfe against Ceraunes. The friends of Lysimachus were rather pleased to have him their King, that had (as hee professed) reuenged their Lords death; than any way offended with the odiousnes of his fact, by which they were freed from subjection, to one, against whom they had stood in opposition. Many there were, that vpon remembrance of his Fathers great vertue, gathered hope of finding the like in Ceraunus: perswading themselves that his raigne might proue good, though his entrance had beene wicked. These 20 affections of the Macedonians did serve to defeate Antigonus the sonne of Demetriu. that made an attempt vpon the Kingdome. As for Antigonus, the sonne of Selencus, he was farre off, and might be questioned about some part of Asia, ere he should be able to bring an Armie neare vnto Europe. Yet hee made great shew of meaning to reuenge his fathers death: but being stronger in monie then in armes, he was content, after a while, to take faire words, and make peace with the murtherer. While these three strone about the Kingdome, Pyrrhus, who thought his claime as good as any of theirs, made vse of their diffention: threatning warre, or promising his asfistance, to every one of them. By these meanes he strengthned himselfe, and greatly advantaged his Italian voiage, which he had then in hand: requesting monie of 30 Antiochus, ships of Antigonus, and souldiers of Ptolomie, who gave him his daughter in marriage, and lent him a strong power of Macedonian Souldiers, and of Elephants (couenanting to haue them restored at two yeeres end) more for seare than for loue: that so he might free himselfe from trouble, & quietly enjoy his Kingdom.

Thus Ptolomie grew mightie on the suddaine; and the power that by wicked meanes he had gotten, by meanes as wicked he increased. All Macedon and Thrace being his, the strong Citic of Cassandria was held by Ar-since his sister, the widow of Lysimachus, who lay therin with her yong children. Her hee circumuented by making loue to her, and (according to the falhion of those times, wherein Princes regarded no degree of confanguinitie) taking her to wife, 40 with promise to adopt her children: a promise that he meant not to performe; for it was not long, ere he flew them, and draue her into exile.

In the pride of this good successe, which his villanie found; vengeance came vpon him from a farre, by the furie of a Nation, that hee had never heard of. Belgius a Captaine of the Gaules, having forced his paffage through many Countries, vnto the confines of Masedon, sent a proud message to Ceraunus, commanding him to buy peace with monie, or otherwise, to looke for all the miseries of warre. These Gaules were the race of those, that issued out of their Countrie, to seeke new seates in that great expedition, wherein Brennus tooke and burnt the Citie of Rome. They had diuided themselues, at their setting forth, into two Companies; of which the one fell 50 vpon Italie; the other passing through the Countries that lie on the Northerne side of the Adriatick Sea, made long aboade in Pannonia, and the Regions adjoyning, where they forced all the neighbour Princes to redceme peace with tribute; as now they would have compelled Ceraums to doe, vnto whose borders they came about an hundred and eight yeares after fuch time as their fellowes had taken Rome.

When their Embassadors came to Ptolomie, asking what he would give: His answere was, that he would be contented to give them peace, but it must bee with condition, that they should put into their hands their Princes as hostages, and yeeld vp their armes; for otherwise, he would neither pardon their boldnesse, nor give any credit to their words. At this answere, when it was returned, the Gaules did laugh, faying that they would foone confute with deedes, the vanitie of fuch proud words. It may feeme frange, that he, who had given away part of his Armie vnto Pyrrhus, for very feare; should bee so consident in undertaking more mightic encmies. The King of the Dardanians offred to lend him twenty thousand men against the Gaules; but hee scorned the offer; saying, that hee had the children of those, to which under the conduct of Alexander, had subdued all the East. Thus hee issued forth against the barbarous people, with his famous Macedonians, as if the victoric must needs have followed the reputation of a great name. But he soone found his great errour, when it was too late. For the enemies were not only equal in strength of body, and ficrcenesse of courage, but so farre superiour to the Macedonians in numbers, that few or none escaped their furie, Ptolomie himselfe grieuously wounded, fell into their hands, whileft the battell continued; and they prefently strooke off his head, which they shewed to his men, on the top of a Lance, to their vtter

The report of this great ouer throw filled al Macedon with such desperation, that 20 the people sled into walled Townes, and abandoned the whole Countrie as lost. Only Sostienes, a valiant Captaine, animating as many as he could, gathered a small Armie, with which he many times got the vpper hand, and hindred Belgius from wing the victoric at his whole pleasure. In regard of this his vertue, the Souldiers would have made him King, which title he refused, & was content with the name of a Generall. But (as mischiefs doe seldome come alone) the good successe of Beigius, drew into Mesedon, Breanus, another Captaine of the Gaules, with an hundred and fitte thousand foot, and sifteen thousand horse, against which mightie Armie, when Sosthenes with his weake troups made opposition, he was casily beaten, and the Macedonians againe compelled to hide themselves within their walls, leaving all their Countrie to the spoile of the Barbarians.

Thus were the Macedonians destitute of a King, and troden downe by a Nation, that they had not heard of; in lesse then fiftie yeares after the death of Alexander, who sought to discouer and subdue vnknowne Countries, as if all Greece, and the Empire of Persia had beene too little for a King of Macedon.

Very seasonably had these newes been carried to Pyrrhus in Italie, who sought a faire pretext of relinquishing his warre with the Romans; had not other tidings out of Sicil distracted him, and carried him away in pursure of nearer hopes. For after the death of Agathoeles, who ragined ouer the whole lland, the Carlhaginians sent an Armie to conquer Sicil, out of which, by him, they had been expelled. This 40 Armie did so fast prevaile, that the Sicilians had no other hope to avoide slauerie, than in submitting themselves to the rule of Pyrrhus; whom, being a Grecian, and a noble Prince, they thought it more for their good to obey, then to line vnder the well knowne heavile yoake of Carthage. To him therefore, the Syracusans, Leontines, and Agragentines, principall Estates of the Isle, sent Embassadors, earnestly desiring him to take them into his protection.

It grieued Pyrrhus exceedingly, that two such notable occasions, of enlarging his Dominions, should fall out so valuekily, both at one time. Yet whether hee thought the businesse of Sieilmore important, or more full of likelihood for whether perhaps he believed (as came after to passe) that his advantage vpon Macedon would not so hastily passe away, but that he might finde some occasion to lay hold on it, at better leisure, ouer into Sieil he transported his Armie, leaving the Tarentines to shift for themselves; yet not leaving them free as he found them, but with a Gatrison in their Towne, to hold them in subjection.

As his departure out of Italie, was rather grounded on head-long passion, than mature aduice; so were his actions following, vntill his returne vnto Epirus, rather many and tumultuous, then well ordered, or note-worthie. The Armie which he carried into that Isle, consisted of thirtie thousand foot and two thousand fine hundred horse with which, soone after his descent in Sieil, he fore the Carthaginians, out of all, in effect, that they held therein. He also wonne the strong Citie of Eryx, and having beaten the Mamertines in battaile, hee beganne to change condition, and turne Tyrant. For he drane Sostratus (to whom his cruckie was suspect) out of the Iland, and put Thenno of Syracuse to death, being jealous of his greatnesses which two persons had saithfully served him, and delivered the great and rich Citie of Syracuse into his hands. After this, his fortunes declined so tast, as hee served himselfe, and salved the disreputation of his leaving Sicili, by an Embassage sent him from the Tarentines, and Samnites, imploring his present helpe against the Romans, who since his leaving Italie, had well-neare disposses them of all that they had.

Taking this faire occasion, hee imbarked for Italie; but was first beaten by the Carthaginian Gallies, in his passage, and secondly assailed in Italie it selfe, by eighteene hundred Mamertines, that attended him in the straits of the Countrie. Lastly, after he had recovered Tarentum, hee sought a third battaile with the Romans, 20 ledby M. Curius, who was victorious over him, and forc't him out of Italie, into his

A Prince he was farre more valiant then constant, and had hee been but a Generall of an Armie, for some other great King or State, and had been directed to have conquered any one Country or Kingdome, it is to be thought, that he would have purchased no less home than any man of warre, either preceding or succeeding him; for a greater Captaine, or a valianter man, hath beene no where sound. But he neuer shaid vpon any enterprise; which was, indeede, the disease hee had, whereof not long after he died in Argos.

How Antigonvs, the sonne of Demetrivs, delivered Macedon from the Gaules. How Pyrrhy's wonne the Kingdome of Macedon from . Antigonvs.

Hevertue of Sosthenes being too weake, to defend the Kingdome of Macedon; and the fortune which had accompanied him against Belgius, failing him in his attempts against Brennus: the Macedonians were no lesse glad to submit themselves vnto the governmet of Antigonus, than they had formerly beene desirous to free themselues from the impotent rule of his father Demetrius. His comming into the Countrie, with an Armie, Nauie, and treasure beseeming a King, did rather breed good hope in the people, than fill them with much confidence: for he was driven to vie against the Barbarians, only those forces, which he brought with him, having none other than good wishes of the Macedons, to take his part. Brennus, with the maine firength of his Armie, was gone to spoile the Temple of Apollo at Delphos, having left no more behinde him, than he thought necessarie to guard the borders of Macedon, and Pannonia; which were about fifteene thousand foot, and three thousand horse. These could not be idle, but thought to get somewhat for themselves, in the absence of 50 their fellowes: and therefore fent vnto Antigonus, offering to fel him peace, if hee would pay well for it; which by the example of Ceraunus, hee had learnt (as they thought) not to refuse. Antigonus was vinwilling to weaken his reputation by condescending to their proud demads: yet he judged it vnfit to exasperat their furious choler, by vncurteous words or vsage, as Ceraunus had ouer-fondly done. Wherfore Gcccc 2

he entertained their Embassadors in very louing and sumptuous maner, with a roiall feast: wherein he exposed to their view, such aboundance of masse gold and silper, that they were not so much delighted with the meat, as with sight of the veffells, wherein it was ferued. He thought hereby, to make them vnderstand, how great a Prince he was, and how able, if need required, to wage a mighty Armie.

To which end, he likewise did shew vnto them, his Camp and Nauie, but especially his Elephants. But all this braueric ferued only to kindle their greedie appetites; who feeing his ships heavy loaden, his Campe full of wealth, and ill fortified. himselfe (as it seemed) secure, and his men, both in strength and courage inferiour vnto the Gaules, thought all time loft, wherein they suffered the present possessions, to to spend the riches which they accompted assuredly their owne. They returned therefore to their Companions, with none other newes in their mouthes, than of spoile and purchase: which tale, carried the Gaules head-long, to Antigonus his camp, where they expected a greater bootie, then the victoric ouer Cerannus had given to Belgius. Their comming was terrible and suddaine; yet not so suddaine, but that Antigonus had notice of it, who distrusting the courage of his owne men, dislodged fomewhat before their arrival, and conveighed himfelfe, with his whole armie and carriage, into certaine woods adjoyning, where he lay close.

The Gaules, finding his Camp for faken, were not hastie to pursue him, but fell to ransacking the emptie Cabbines of the Souldiers; in hope of finding all that was 20 either lost or hidden. At length, when they had searched enery place in vaine, angrie at their loft labour, they marched with all speed toward the Sea-side; that they might fall vpon him, whilest he was busic in getting his men and carriages a Thip-board. But the successe was no way answerable to their expectation. For being proud of the terrour which they had brought vpon Antigonus, they were fo carelesse of the Sea-men, that without all order, they fell to the spoile of what they found on the shore, and in such ships as lay on ground.

Part of the Armie had left Antigonus, where he lay in couert; and had faued it felf by getting aboard the fleet:in which number were some well experienced men of warre: who discouering the much advantage offred vnto them, by the desperate 30 presumption of their enemies, tooke courage, and encouraged others, to lay manlie hold vpon the opportunitie. So the whole number, both of Souldiers and Mariners, landing together, with great resolution, gaue so braue a charge vpon the disordered Gaules, that their contemptuous boldnesse was thereby changed into suddaine feare, and they, after a great flaughter, driven to cast themselves into the sernice of Antigonus.

The fame of this victoric, caused all the barbarous Nations in those quarters, to re-entertaine their ancient beliefe of the Macedonian valour: by which, the terrible and reliftlesse oppressors of so many Countries, were overthrowne.

To speake more of the Gaules, in this place; and to shew how, about these times, 40 three Tribes of them passed ouer into Asia the lesse, with their warres and conquests there; I hold it needlesse: the victorious armes of the Romans, taming them hereafter, in the Countries which now they wanne, shall give better occasion, to rehearfe these matters briefly.

How soeuer the good successe of Antigonus got him reputation, among the barbarous people, yet his owne Souldiers, that without his leading, had wonne this victorie, could not thereupon be perswaded to thinke him a good man of warre: knowing that he had no interest in the honour of the service, wherein his conduct was no better, then creeping into a wood.

This (as presently will appeare) was greatly helpfull vnto Pyrrhus: though as 60 yet he knew not so much. For Pyrrhus, when his affaires in Italie stood upon hard termes, had sent vnto Antigonus for helpe: not without threats, in case it were denied. So was he fure to get, either a supply, wherewith to continue his war against the Romans, or some seeming honourable pretence, to forsake Italie, under colour of making his word good, in seeking reuenge. The threats which he had vsed in brauerie, meere necessitie forced him, at his returne into Epirus, to put in practife.

He brought home with him, eight thousand foot, and fine hundred horse: an armie too little to be employed, by his restlesse nature, in any action of importance; vet greater then he had meanes to keepe in pay: Therefore he fell vpon Macedon; intending to take what spoile he could get, and make Antigonus compound with him, to be freed from trouble. At his first entrance into this businesse, two thoufand of Antigonus his Soudiers, revolted vnto Pyrrbus; and many Cities, either willingly or perforce, received him. Such faire beginnings, easily perswaded the 10 courage of this daring Prince, to set upon Antigonus himselfe, and to hazardhis fortune, in triall of a battaile, for the whole Kingdome of Macedon.

It appeares, that Antigonus had no desire to fight with this hot warriour; but thought it the wisest way, by protracting of time, to wearie him out of the Countrie. For Pyrrhus ouertooke him in a straight passage, and charged him in the reare; wherein were the Gaules, and the Elephants, which were thought the best of his ftrength: a manifest proofe that he was in retrait. The Gaules very brauely sustayned Pyrrhus his impression; yet were broken at length (when most of them were slaine) after a sharpe fight: wherein it seemes, that Antigonus keeping his Macedonian Phalanx within the ftreight, and not advancing to their succour, tooke away 20 their courage, by deceiuing their expectation. The Captaines of the Elephants were taken soone after; who finding themselves exposed to the same violence that had confumed so many of the Gaules, yeelded themselves and the beasts. All this was done in full view of Antigonus, and his Macedonians, to their great discomfort: which emboldened Pyrrhus, to charge them where they lay in their strength. Where the Phalanx could be charged only in a front, it was a matter of extreme difficultie (if not impossible) to force it. But the Macedonians had seene so much, that they had no defire to fight against Pyrrhus; who discouered so well their affections, that hee adventured to draw nearein person, and exhort them to yeeld. Neither the common Souldier, nor any Leader, refused to become his follower. 30 All for fooke Antigonus, a few horse-men excepted, that fled along with him to Thessalonica; where he had some small forces left, and monie enough to entertaine a greater power, had he known where to leavie it. But whilest he was thinking how to allure a sufficient number of the Gaules into his service; whereby hee might repaire his losse: Ptolomie, the sonne of Pyrrhus, came vpon him, and easily defeating his weake forces, draue him to flie from the parts about Macedon, to those Townes a farre off in Peloponne sus, in which hee had formerly lurked, before such time as he looked abroad into the world, and made himselfe a King.

This good successe revived the spirits of the Epirot, and caused him to forget all forrow, of his late mil-fortunes in the Roman warre: fo that he fent for his fonne He-40 lenus (whom he had left with a Garrison, in the Castle of Tarentum) willing him to come ouer into Greece, where was more matter of conquest, and let the Italians

ð. V.

How PYRKHVS affailed Sparta without successe. His enterprise vpon Argos, and his death.

YYRRHYS had now conceived a great hope, that nothing should bee able to withstand him; seeing, that in open fight, he had vanquished the Gaules, beaten Antigonus, and won the Kingdome of Macedon; There was not in all Greece, nor, indeede, in all the Lands that Alexander had wonne, any Leader of such name and worth, as described to be set up against him: which filled him with the opinion that he might do what

be pleased. He raised therefore an Armie, consisting of fine and twenty thousand foot, two thousand horse, and foure and twentic Elephants; pretending warre against Aniegonus, and the giving libertie to those Towns in Peloponnesus, which the same Antigonus held in subjection; though it was easily discovered, that such great preparations were made, for accomplishment of some designe more important. then warre against a Prince alreadie vanquished, and almost vterly dejected. Especially the Lacedamonians feared this expedition, as made against their State. For Cleonymus, one of their Kings, being expelled out of his Countrie, had betaken himselte to Pyrrhus: who readily entertained him, and promised to restore him to his Kingdome. This promise was made in secret; neither would Pyrrhus make shew 10 of any displeasure that he bare unto Sparta; but contrariwise professed, that it was his intent, to haue two of his owne yonger sonnes trained vp in that Citie, as in a place of noble discipline. With such colours he deluded men, even till he entred vpon Laconia; where presently he demeaned himselfe as an open enemie: excusing himselfe and his former dissembling words, with a jeast , That he followed herein the Lacedamonian custome, of concealing what was truly purposed. It had been, indeed, the manner of the Lacedamonians, to deale in like fort with others, whom, in the time of their greatnesse, they sought to oppresse but now they complained of that, as falsehood, in Pyrrhus, which they alwaies practifed as wisdome, till it made them distrusted, for saken, and almost contemptible. Neuerthelesse, they were not wanting to 20 themselues in this dangerous extremitie. For the old men and women laboured in fortifying the Towne; cauling such as could beare armes, to reserve themselves fresh against the assault: which Pyrrhus had vnwisely deserred, vpon assurance of Sparta was neuer fortified, before this time, otherwise then with armed Citizens: foone after this (it being built vpon vneuen ground, and for the most part, hard to approach) the lower and more accessible places, were fenced with walls; at the prefent, only trenches were cast, and barricadoes made with Carts, where the entrance feemed most easy. Three daies together it was assailed by Pyrrhus, exceeding fiercely; and no lesse soutly defended. The desperate courage of the Citizens preserved 30 the Towne the first day, wherinto the violence of Pyrrhus had forced entrance the fecond day, but that his wounded horse threw him to the ground, which made his Souldiers more mindfull of fauing the person of their King, than of breaking into the Citie, though alreadic they had torne in funder the barricadoes. Presently after this, one of Antigonus his Captaines got into Sparta with a good firength of men; and Areus the King returned out of Crete (where he had been helping his friends in warre) with two thousand men, little knowing the danger, in which his owne countrie flood vntill he was almost at home. These succours did not more animate the Spartans, then kindle in Pyrrhus a delire to prevaile against all impediments. But the third daies worke shewed, how great his error had beene, in forbearing to assault 40 the Towneathis first comming. For he was so manfully repelled, that he saw no likelihood of getting the place, otherwise than by a long siege: in which tedious course he had no desire to spend his time.

Intigonus had now raised an Armie, though not strong enough to meet the enemie in plaine field, yet able to hinder all his purposes. This made Pyrrhus doubtfull what way to take; being diucrsly affected, by the difficultie of his enterprise in hand, and the shame of taking a repulse in his first attempt. Whilest hee was thus perplexed, letters came from Argos, inuiting him thither; with promise, to deliver that Citie into his hands.

Civill dissension raging then hotly in Argos, caused the heads of severall factions to call in Pyrrhus and Antigonus; but the comming of these two Princes, taught the Citizens wit, and made them desirous to rid their hand of such powerfull Assistants, as each of the two Kings pretended himselfe to be. Antigonus told the Argines, that he came to save them from the tyrannic of Pyrrhus; and that hee would be gone if they needed not his helpe. On the other side, Pyrrhus would needes perswade them, that he had none other errand, than to make them safe from Antigonus; offering in like manner, to depart if they so desired.

The Argines tooke small pleasure, in hearing the Foxe and Kite at strife, which of them should keepe the Chickins from his enemie: and therefore prayed them both, to divert their powers some other way. Hereunto Antigonus readily condefcended, and gaue Hollages to assure thought it enough to promise: Hostages he would give none, to his inferiours: especially, meaning deceipt. This made them suspects his purpose to be such, as, indeede, it was. Yet he lesse regarded their opinions, than to hold them worthie of assured:

breake ere the next morning.

It was concluded, that a Gate of the Citic should be opened by night vnto Pyrrhus, by his Complices within Argos: which was accordingly performed. So his Armie, without any tumult, entred the Citie: till the Elephants, with Towers on their backs, cloyed the way, being too high to passe the Gate. The taking off, and setting on againe, of those Towers, with the trouble thereto belonging, did both give alarme to the Citie, and some leisure to take order for defence, before so many were entred, as could fully master it. Argos was full of ditches, which greatly hindred the Gaules (that had the Vanigarde) being ignorant of the waies, in the darke night. The Citizens, on the other side, had much advantage, by their knowledge of every by-passe and setting upon the enemies on all sides, did put them to great losse, and more trouble.

Pyrrhus therefore, vnderstanding by the confused noise, and vnequall shoutings of his owne men, that they were in distresse, entred the Citie in person, to take order for their reliefe, and assure of the place. But the darkenesse, the throng, and many other impediments, kept him from doing any thing of moment, vntill breake olday. Then beganne he to make his passage by force, and so farre prevailed, that he got into the Market-place. It is said, that seeing in that place, the Image of a Wolfe and a Bull, in such posture as if they had been combattant, hee called to minde an Oracle, which threatned him with death, when he should behold a Bull fighting with a Wolfe: and that hereupon he made retrait.

Indeede, the comming of Antigonus to the rescue, the disorder and confusion of his owne men; with diuers ill accidents, gaue him reasonable cause to have retired out of the Citie, though the Wolfe and Bull had been away. The tumult was such, that no directions could be heard; but as some gaue back, so did others thrust forward, and the Argines pressing hard vpon him, forced Pyrrhus to make good his retrait, with his owne sword. The tops of the houses were covered with women, that stood looking on the fight. Among these was one, that saw her owne sone in dangerous case, sighting with Pyrrhus. Wherefore, shee tooke a tile-stone, or slate, and threw it so violently downe on the head of Pyrrhus, that hee fell to ground a-ftonished with the blow; and lying in that case, had his head cut off.

Thus ended the restlesse ambition of Pyrrhus, together with his life: and thus returned the Kingdome of Macedon to Antigonus; who forthwith possessed the armie, the bodie, and the children of his enemie. The bodie of Pyrrhus had honourable sunerall, and was given by Antigonus vnto Helenus his sonne; which yong Prince he graciously sent home, into his Fathers Kingdome of Epirus. From this time forwards, the race of Antigonus held the Kingdome of Macedon; the posterite of Seleucus raigned over Asia and Syria; and the house of Prolomie had quiet 50 possesses with the possesses of the possesses when the sun of Egypt: vntill such time, as the Citie of Rome, swallowing all vp, dige-fled these, among other Countries, into the bodie of her owne Empire.

INTREATING OF THE TIMES FROM the fetled rule of ALEXANDER'S Successors in the East, untill the ROMANS, preuailing ouer all, made Conquest of Asia and MACEDON.

THE FIFT BOOKE.

CHAP. I. Of the first Punicke Warres

A discussion of that probleme of LIVIE; Whether the Romans could have relisted the great ALEXANDER. That neither the Macedonian nor the Roman Souldier, was of equall valour to the English.

HAT question handled by LIVIE, Whether the great ALEXANDER could have prevailed against the Romans, if after his Easterne conquest, he had bent all his forces against them, hath beene, and is, the subject of much dispute; which (as it feemes to me) the arguments on both fides do not fo well explane, as doth the experience that Pyrrhus hathgiven, of the Roman power, in his daies. For, if he, a Commander (in Hannibals judgement) inferior to Alexander, though to none else, could with small strength of men, and little store of monie, or of other needfull helps in warre, vanquish them in two battailes, and endanger their estate, when it was well setled, and held the best part of Italie, vnder a confirmed obedience: what would Alexander have done, that was aboundantly provided of all which is need-full to a Conquerour, wanting only matter of emploiment, comming vpon them before their Dominion was halfe so well setled. It is easie to say, that Alexander had no more, than thirty thousand foot, and soure thousand horse (as indeede, at his sirst passage into Asia, he carried ouer, not many more) and that the rest of his followers were no better than base effeminate Asiatiques. But he that considers the Armies of Perdiccas, Antipater, Craterus, Eumenes, Ptolomie, Antigonus, & Lysimachus, with the action's by them performed, euery one of which (to omit others) commanded only some fragment of this dead Emperours power; shall casily finde, that such a reckning is farte short of the truth.

It were needlesse to speake of Treasure, Horses, Elephants, Engines of batterie, 10 and the like: of all which, the Macedonian had aboundance; the Roman having nought, save men and armes. As for Sea-forces; he that shall consider after what fort the Romans, in their first Punick warre, were trained, in the rudiments of Navigation; sitting upon the shoare, and beating the sand with poles, to practife the stroke of the Oare, as not daring to lanch their ill-built vessels into the Sea; will easily conceive, how farre too weake they would have proved in such services.

Now for helpers in warre; I doe not see, why all Greece and Macedon, being abfolutely commanded by Alexander, might not well deserve to be laid in ballance, against those parts of Italie, which the Romans held in ill-assured subjection. To omit therefore all benefit, that the Easterne world, more wealthie, indeede, than 20 valiant, could have affoorded vnto the Macedonian: let vs only conjecture, how the States of Sicill and Carthage, nearest neighbours to such a quarrell (had it happened) would have flood affected. The Sicilians were, for the most part, Gracians, neither is it to bee doubted, that they would readily have submitted themselves vnto him, that ruled all Greece besides them. In what termes they commonly stood, and how ill they were able to defend themselves, it shal appeare anon. Sure it is, that Alexanders comming into those parts, would have brought excelline joy, to them that were faine to get the helpe of Pyrrhus, by offering to become his subjects. As for the Carthaginians; if Agathocles, the Tyrant of Syracuse, hated of his people, and ill able to defend his owne besieged Citie, could, by aduenturing to faile into Africk, 30 put their Dominion, yea and Carthage it selfe, in extreme hazard; shall wee thinke that they would have beene able to withstand Alexander? But, why doe I question their abilitie, seeing that they sent Embassadours, with their submission, as farre as Babylon, ere the warre drew neare them? Wherefore it is manifest, that the Romans must, without other succour, than perhaps of some few Italian friends (of which yet there were none, that for sooke them not, at some time, both before and after this) haue opposed their valour, and good militarie discipline, against the power of all Countries, to them knowne, if they would have maderess fance. How they could have sped well, in vndertaking such a match; it is vneasie to finde in discourse of humane reason. It is true; that vertue and fortune worke wonders: but it is a- 40 gainst cowardly fooles, and the vnfortunate; for who soeuer contends with one too mightie for him; either must excell in these, as much as his enemie goes beyond him in power; or else must looke, both to be ouer-come, and to be cast downe so much the lower, by how much the opinion of his fortune and vertue renders him suspected, as likely to make head another time against the vanquisher. Whether the Roman, or the Macedonian, were in those daies the better Souldier, I will not take vpon me to determine: though I might, without partialitie, deliuer mine owne opinion, and preferre that Armie, which followed not onely Philip and Alexander, but also Alexanders Princes afrer him, in the greatest dangers of all sorts of warre; before any, that Rome either had, or in long time after did fend forth. Concerning 50 fortune; who can give a rule that shall alwaies hold? Alexander was victorious in euery battaile that he fought: and the Romans in the issue of euery warre. But forasmuch as Linie hath judged this a matter worthic of consideration : I thinke it a great part of Romes good fortune, that Alexander came not into Italie: where in three yeares after his death, the two Roman Confulls, together with all the power of that State, were furprized by the Samnites, and enforced to yeeld vp their armes. We may therefore permit Liuie to admire his owne Romans, and to compare with Alexander those Captaines of theirs, which were honoured sufficiently, in being thought equal to his followers: that the same conceit should blind our judgement, we cannot permit without much vanitie.

Now in deciding such a controuersie, me thinks it were not amisse, for an Englishman, to give such a sentence between the Macedonians and Romans, as the Remans oncedid (being chosen Arbitrators) between the Ardestes and Ariemi, that Linie Decas, light from about a piece of land; saying, that it belonged ynto neither of them, but yn-to the Romans themselues.

CHAP. I. S.1.

If therefore it be demanded, whether the Macedonian, or the Roman, were the best VVarriour? I will answere: The Englishmen. For it will soone appeare, to any that shall examine the noble acts of our Nation in warre, that they were performed by no aduantage of weapon; against no sauage or vinnanlie people; the enemie being sarre superiour vinto vs in numbers, and all needfull provisions, yea as well trained as we, or commonly better, in the exercise of warre.

In what fort Philip wanne his Dominion in Greece; what manner of men the Perfians and Indians were; whom Alexander vanquished; as likewise of what force the Macedonian Phalanx was, and how well appointed, against such armes as it commonly encountred: any man, that hath taken paines to reade the foregoing storic of them, doth sufficiently understand. Yet was this Phalanx neuer; or very seldome, able to it and, against the Roman Armies: which were embattailed in so excellent a forme, as I know not, whether any Nation besides them have vsed, either before or since. The Roman weapons likewise, both offensive and defensive, were of greater vse, than those with which any other Nation hath served, before the sierie instruments of Gunne-powder were knowne. As for the enemies, with which Rome had to doe: we finde, that they, which did ouer-match her in numbers, were as farre ouer-matched by her, in weapons; and that they, of whom she had little ad-30 uantage in armes, had as little aduantage of her in multitude. This also (as Plutarch well observed) was a part of her happinesse; that shee was never over-laied with

Hereby it came to passe, that having at first increased her strength, by accession of the Sabines; having wonne the State of Alba, against which shee adventured her owne selfe, as it were in wager, vpon the heads of three Champions: and having thereby made her selfe Princesse of Latium: shee did afterwards, by long warre, in many ages, extend her Dominion over all Italie. The Carthaginians had well-neare oppressed her: but their Souldiers were Mercinarie; so that for want of proper strength, they were easily beaten at their owne doores. The Etolians, and with 40 them all, or the most of Greece, affished her against Philip the Macedonian: hee being beaten, did lend her his helpe, to beat the same Etolians. The warres against Anisothus, and other Asiatiques, were such as gave to Rome small cause of booss, though much of joy: for those opposites were as base of courage, as the lands which they held were aboundant of riches. Sicil, Spaine, and all Greece, fell into her hands by ving her aide, to protect them against the Carthaginians and Macedonians.

I shall not neede to speake of her other conquests: it was easie to get more when thee had gotten all this. It is not my purpose to disgrace the Roman valour (which was very noble) or to blemish the reputation of so many samous victories: I am not so idle. This I say; that among all their warres, I finde not any, wherein their

50 valour hath appeared, comparable to the English. If my judgement seems ouerpartiall; our warres in France may helpe to make it good.

First, therefore it is wellknowne; that Rome (or perhaps all the world besides) had neuer any so braue a Commander in warre, as Iulius Casar: and that no Roman armie was comparable vnto that, which served vnder the same Casar. Likewise, it is apparent, that this gallant Armie, which had given faire proofe of the Roman courage, in good performance of the Heluetian warre, when it first entred into Gaule: was neverthelesse vtterly disheartned, when Casar ledit against the Germans. So that we may justly impute, all that was extraordinarie in the valour of Cafars men. to their long exercise, under so good a Leader, in so great a warre. Now let vs in generall, compare with the deeds done by these best of Roman Souldiers, in their principall service the things performed in the same Countrie, by our common English Souldiers, leavied in haste, from following the Cart, or sitting on the shop-stall: so shall we see the difference. Herein will we deale fairely, and beleeue Casar, in relating the acts of the Romans: but will call the French Historians to witnesse, what a- 10 Rions were performed by the English. In Casars time, France was inhabited by the Gaules, a stout people, but inferiour to the French, by whom they were subdued; euen when the Romans gaue them affistance. The Countrie of Gaule was rent in sunder (as Calar witnesseth) into many Lordships: some of which were gouerned by pettie Kings, others by the multitude, none ordered in fuch fort as might make it appliable to the nearest Neighbour. The factions were many, and violent: not only in generall through the whole Countrie, but betweene the pettie States, yea in euery Citie, and almost in euery house. What greater advantage could a Conquerour desire? Yet there was a greater. Arionistus, with his Germans, had ouer-runne the Countrie, and held much part of it in a subjection, little different from meere 29 flauerie: yea, so often had the Germans prevailed in warre vpon the Gaules, that the Gaules (who had sometimes beene the better Souldiers) did hold themselves no way equall to those daily Inuaders. Had France beene so prepared vnto our English Kings, Rome it selfe, by this time, and long ere this time, would have beene ours. But when King Edward the third beganne his warre vpon France, hee found the whole Countrie fetled in obedience to one mightie King; a King whose reputation abroade, was no leffe than his puissance at home; vnder whose Ensigne, the King of Bohemia did serue in person; at whose call, the Genowayes, and other Neighbour States, were readie to take armes: finally, a King, vnto whom one 2 Prince gaue away his Dominion, for loue; b another fold away a goodly Citie and Territorie 30 for monie. The Countrie lying so open to the Roman, and being so well fenced against the English; it is note-worthy, not who preuailed most therein (for it were meere vanitie, to match the English purchases, with the Roman conquest) but whether of the two gaue the greater proofe of militarie vertue. Cafar himselse doth witnesse, that the Gaules complained of their owne ignorance in the Artof warre, and that their owne hardinesse was ouer-mastered, by the skill of their encmies. Poore men, they admired the Roman Towers, and Engines of batterie, raifed and planted against their walls, as more than humane workes. What greater wonder is it, that fuch a people was beaten by the Roman; than that the Caribes, a naked people, but valiant, as any under the skie, are commonly put to the worse, 40 by small numbers of Spaniards? Besides all this, we are to have regard, of the great difficultie that was found, in drawing all the Gaules, or any great part of them, to one head, that with joynt forces they might oppose their assailants : as also the much more difficultie, of holding them long together. For hereby it came to passe, that they were neuer able to make vie of oportunitie: but sometimes compelled to flay for their fellowes; and fometimes driven, to give or take battaile, vpon extreme disaduantages, for feare, least their Companies should fall asunder: as indeede, vpon any little disaster, they were readie to breake, and returne every one to the defence of his owne. All this, and (which was little leffe than all this) great oddes in weapon, gaue to the Romans, the honour of many gallant victories. What 50 fuch helpe? or what other worldly help, than the golden metall of their Souldiers, had our English Kings against the French? Were not the French as well experienced in feats of VV arre? Yea, did they not thinke themselves therein our superiours? VVerethey not in armes, in horse, and in all prouision, exceedingly beyond vs?

Let vs heare, what a French writer faith, of the inequalitie that was betweene the Iohn de Serres. French and English, when their King John was readic to give the on-fer, upon the Blacke Prince, at the battaile of Poitiers. IOHN had all advantages over EDW ARD, IEAN avoit both of number, force, shew, Countrie, and conceit (the which is commonly a consideration pardessive EDOof no small importance in worldly affaires) and with all, the choise of all his horse-men (estee-VARD, le nummed then the best in Europe) with the greatest and wifest Captaines of his whole Realme. bre, laforce, le luxre, legars,

And what could he wish more? I thinke, it would trouble a Roman antiquarie, to finde the like example in their n'est pas commu-Histories; the example, I say, of a King, brought prisoner to Rome, by an Armie fideration de oeu 10 of eight thousand, which he had surrounded with fortie thousand, better appoin- d'importace aux ted, and no leffe expert warriours. This I am fure of that neither Syphax the Nu- affaires du monmidian, followed by a rabble of halfe Scullions, as Liuie rightly tearmes them, nor l'elite de sa cau those cowardly Kings Perfeus and Gentius, are worthie patternes. All that have "allerie, tors eread of Cresse and Agincourt, will beare me witnesse, that I doe not alleage the bat-leure de tout son taile of Poitiers, for lacke of other, as good examples of the English vertue: the proof Royaume, whereof hath left many a hundred better marks, in all quarters of France, than euer did the valour of the Romans. If any man impute these victories of ours to the long Bow, as carrying farther, piercing more strongly, and quicker of discharge than the French Croffe-bow: my answere is readie; that in all these respects, it is also (being 20 drawne with a strong arme) superiour to the Musket; yet is the Musket a weapon of more vse. The Gunne, and the Crosse-bow, are of like force, when discharged by a Boy or Woman, as when by a strong Man: weakenesse, or sickenesse, or a fore finger, makes the Long-Bow vnseruiceable. More particularly, I say, that it was the custome of our Ancestors, to shoot, for the most part, point blanck: and so shall he perceine, that will note the circumstances of almost any one battaile. This takes away all objection: for whent wo Armies are within the distance of a Butts length, one flight of arrowes, or two at the most can be deliuered before they close. Neither is it in generall true, that the long Bow reacheth farther, or that it pierceth more strongly than the Crosse-bow: But this is the rare effect of an extraordinarie 30 arme; whereupon can be grounded no common rule. If any man shall aske, How then came it to passe, that the English wanne so many great battailes, having no aduantage to helpe him? I may, with best commendation of modestic, referre him to the French Historian: who relating the victorie of our men at Creuant, where they passed a bridge, in face of the enemie, vieth these words; The English comes with a 10hn de Serres. conquering brauerie, as he, that was accustomed to gaine every where, without any stay: hee forceth our garde, placed upon the bridge, to keepe the passage. Or I may cite another place of the same Authour, where hee tells, how the Britons, being inuaded by Charles the eighth, King of France, thought it good policie, to apparel a thousand and two hundred of their owne men in English Cassocks; hoping that the very fight of 40 the English red Croffe, would be enough to terrifie the French. But I will not stand to borrow of the French Historians (all which, excepting De Serres, and Paulus Amylius; report wonders of our Nation) the proposition which first I undertooke to maintaine; That the militarie vertue of the English, preuailing against all manner of difficulties, ought to be preferred before that of Romans, which was assisted with all advantages that could be desired. If it be demanded; why then did not our Kings finish the conquest, as Cæsar had done? my answere may bee (I hope without offence) that our Kings were like to the race of the Lacida, of whom the old Poet Ennius gaue this note; Belli potentes sunt mage quam sapienti potentes; They were more warlike than politique. Who so notes their proceedings, may finde that none of them went to 50 worke like a Conquerour: saue only King Henrie the fift, the course of whose victories, it pleased God to interrupt by his death. But this question is the more easily answered, if another be sirst made. Why did not the Romans attempt the conquest of Gaule, before the time of Cefar? why not after the Macedonian warre? why not after the third Punick, or after the Numantian? At all these times they had good leifure : and then especially had they both leifure, and fit oportunitie, when under the conduct of Marius, they had newly vanquished the Cimbri, and Teutones, by whom the Countrie of Gaule had been epittiously wasted. Surely, the words of Tallie were true; that with other Nations, the Romans fought for Dominion; with the Gaules. for preservation of their owne safetie.

Therefore they attempted not the conquest of Gaule, untill they were Lords of al other Countries, to them knowne. We on the other side, held only the one halfe of our owne Iland; the other halfe being inhabited by a Nation (vnleffe perhaps in wealth and numbers of men fomewhat inferiour) euery way equal to our felues: a Nation anciently & strongly allied to our enemies the French, and in that regard, 10 enemie to vs. So that our danger lay both before and behinde vs : and the greater danger at our backs; where commonly we felt, alwaies we feared, a fronger invalion by land than we could make vpon France, transporting our forces over Sea

It is viual, with men, that have pleased themselves, in admiring the matters which they finde in ancient Histories; to hold it a great injurie done to their judgement if any take vpon him, by way of comparison, to extoll the things of later ages. But I. am well perswaded, that as the divided vertue of this our Iland, hath given more noble proofe of it felfe; than under fo worthie a Leader, that Roman Armie could doe, which afterwards could win Rome, and al her Empire, making Cafar a Monarch; fo hereafter, by Gods bleffing, who hath converted our greatest hindrance, into our 20 greatest helpe, the enemie that shall dare to trie our forces, will finde cause to wish, that avoiding vs, he had rather encountred as great a puissance, as was that of the Roman Empire. But it is now high time, that laying a-fide comparisons, we returne to the rehearfal of deeds done: wherein we shall finde, how Rome began, after Pyrrhus had left Italie, to ftriue with Carthage for Dominion, in the first Punick warre.

Q. II. The estate of Carthage, before it entred into warre with Rome.

He Citie of Carthage had stood aboue fixe hundred yeares, when first 20 it beganne to contend with Rome, for the mastrie of Sicil. It forewent Rome one hundred and fifty yeares in antiquity of foundation: but in the honour of great atchiuements, it excelled farre beyond this aduantage of time. For Carthage had extended her Dominion in Africa

it selfe, from the west part of Cyrene, to the streights of Hercules, about one thousand and five hundred miles in length, wherein flood three hundred Cities. It had subiested all Spaine, euen to the Pyrenean Mountaines, together with all the Ilands in the Mediterran Sea, to the west of Sicil; and of Sicil, the better part. It slourished about seuen hundred and thirtie yeare, before the destruction therof by Scipio: who besides other spoiles, and all that the Souldiers reserved, carried thence source hun-40 dred & seuentie thousand weight of silver, which make of our monie (if our pounds differ not) fourteene hundred and ten thousand pound sterling. So as this glorious Citie ranne the same fortune, which many other great ones have done, both before and fince. The ruine of the goodliest pieces of the world, fore-shewes the dissolution of the whole.

About one hundred yeares after such time as it was cast downe, the Senate of Rome caused it to be rebuilt: and by Gracchus it was called Junonia: it was againe and againe abandoned and repeopled, taken and retaken; by Genfericus the Vandal, by Bellisarius under Instinian, by the Persians, by the Agyptians, & by the Mahometans. It is now nothing. The feat therof was exceeding strong: and, while the Cartha- 50 ginians commanded the Sea, inuincible. For the Sea compassed it about, saving that it was tied to the maine by a necke of land; which passage had two mile and more of breadth (Appian faith, three mile, and one furlong) by which we may be induced, to beleeue the common report, that the Citie it selfe was aboue twentie mile in compasse;

compasse; if not that of Strabo, affirming the circuit to have beene twice as great. It had three walls, without the wall of the Citie; and betweene each of those, three or foure streets, with vaults under ground, of thirty foot deepe, in which they had place for three hundred Elephants, and all their food: ouer these they had stables for toure thousand horse, and Granaries for all their prouender. They had also lodging in these streets, betweene these out-walles for foure thousand horse-men and twentie thousand foot men, which (according to the discipline vsed now by a In Pol. Arif. 1,2 c.o. those of China) neuer pestered the Citic. It had towards the South part, the Castle day, doe also take the of Byr/a; to which Servius gives two and twentie furlongs in compasse, that make one half of the poore 10 two mile and a halfe. This was the same piece of ground, which Dido obtained of mans corne, that lathe Libjans, when shee got leave to buy only so much land of them, as shee could they take tribut bork compaffe with an Oxe hide. On the west side it had also the salt Sea, but in the na- of the bodies, and of ture of a standing poole; for a certaine arme of Land, fastned to the ground, on the soules of the Christian their Vassals, by which the Citie stood, stretched it selfe towards the west continent, and left but se bereauing them of uentie foot open for the Sea to enter. Ouer this standing Sea was built a most their ablest children, fumptuous Arfenall, having their ships and gallies riding under it. The forme of their Common weale resembled that of Sparta; for they had titu- ligion. The Irish take larie Kings, and the Ariflocraticall power of Senators. But (as Regius well obser-the fourth sheate; & were wont to cate up ueth) the people in later times vsurped too great authoritie in their Councells, with their horse, en, 20 This confusion in gouernement, together with the trust that they reposed in hi. footemen, and dog, red Souldiers, were helping causes of their destruction in the end. Two other more the other three parts forcible causes of their ruine, were their auarice and their crueltie. a Their auarice remaining. The hufwas shewed both in exacting from their Vassals (besides ordinarie tributes) the one bandman & the yeo-basse of the fruits of the earth; and in conferring of great Offices, not vpon gentle the frees of all the and mercifull persons, but vpon those who could best tyrannize ouer the people, to World: And reason augment their treasures. Their crueltie appeared, in putting them to death without have the bodies of mercie, that had offended through ignorance: the one of these rendred them odi. our victorious armies ous to their vailalls, whom it made readie, vpon all occasions, to reuolt from them:

And it is the free man. the other did breake the spirits of their Generalls, by presenting in the heat of their & not the slaue, that 30 actions abroade, the feare of a cruell death at home. Hereby it came to passe, that hath courage, & the actions abroade, the teare of a crue il death at nome. Hereby it came to pane, that fende of theme determined good Comanders of the Carthagnian forces, after some great losse received, and by cowardise. have desperally cast themselves with all that remained under their charge, into the How free the English throat of destruction; holding it necessaries, either to repaire their losses quickly, or yeomen haue beene, in times, not long to ruine all together: and fewe of them have dared, to manage their owne best pro- fince past, Fortestage jects, after that good forme, wherein they first conceived them, for searce less the hath shewed in his pets, after that good forme, wherein they irrit conceiled their not care left the praife of our Counmaner of their proceeding should be misinterpreted. It being the Carthaginian rule, tries lawes, But I may to crucifie, not only the vnhappie Captaine, but euen him, whose bad counsaile had say, that they are prosperous euent. The faults, wherewith, in generall, they of Carthage are taxed, more free now than by Roman Historians, I find to beethele; lust, crueltie, avarice, craft, vnfaithfulnesse, litie & Gentrie more 40 and periurie. Whether the Romans them selves were free from the same crimes, let servile. For since the the triall be referred unto their actions. The first league betweene Carthage and excessive brauerie Rome, was very ancient: having been made, the yeare following the expulsion of our Grandes, hath Tarquine. In that league, the Carthaginians had the superioritie, as imposing upon the taught them to raise their Rents, since by Romans, the more strict conditions. For it was agreed, that the Romans should not so Inclosures, and difmuch as haue trade, in some part of Africk, nor suffer any ship of theirs to passe be membring of Manyond the headland, or cape, then called the faire Promon ory, vnleffe it were by force nours, the Court Baoftempest: whereas on the other side, no Hauen in Italie was forbidden to the Car- Leet, the Principalithaginians. A fecond league was made long after, whi. h (how focuer it hath pleafed ties of the Gentrice of Angland, haue beene * Livie to fay, that the Romans granted it, at the Carthaginians intreatie) was more diffound, the Tenders of the Carthaginians intreaties when the control of the Carthaginians intreaties was more diffound to the Tenders of the Carthaginians intreaties. *Lime to lay, that the Komans granted it, at the Carrong rade in any part of Africa, names, having paied of Africa, names, having paied ynto their than the former: prohibiting the Romans to have trade in any part of Africa, names, having paied ynto their Lords their or in the Iland of Sardinia.

By the fetwo treaties it may appeare, that the Carthaginians had an intent not only now no fernice at all, to keep the Romans (as perhaps they did other people) from getting any knowledge and (perchance) as of the state of Africk; but to countenance & vphold them, in their troubling al Italie, * Livie Dec. 14.7. Ddddd 2 whereby they themselves might have the better meanes to occupie all Sicil, whill that Iland should be destitute of Italian succours. Hercupon we finde good cause. of the joy that was in Carthage, and of the Crowne of gold, weighing twenty & fine pound, sent from thence to Rome, when the Samnites were ouerthrowne. But the little state of Rome prenailed faster in Italie, than the great power of Carthage did in Sicill. For that mightie Armie, of three hundred thousand men, which Hannibal conducted out of Africk into Sicill, wanne only two Cities therein; many great fleets were deuoured by tempests; and how socuer the Carthaginians prevailed at one time, the Sicilians, either by their owne valour, or by affiftance of their good friends out of Greece, did at some other time repaire their owne losses, and take reuenge vp- 10 on these Inuadours. But neuer were the people of Carthage in better hope, of getting al Sicel, than when the death of Agathodes the Tyrant, had left the whole Iland in combustion; the estate of Greece being such, at the same time, that it seemed impossible, for any succour to be sent from thence. But whilest the Carthaginians were busie, in making their advantage, of this good opportunitie; Pyrrhus, invited by the Tarentines, and their fellowes, came into Italie, where hee made sharpe warre vpon the Romans. These newes were unpleasing to the Carthaginians, who, being a subtile Nation, easily foresaw, that the same busie disposition, which had brought this Prince, out of Greece into Italie, would as easily transport him ouer into Sicil, as soone as he could finish his Roman warre. To preuent this danger, they sent Mago Em- 20 bassadour to Rome; who declared in their name, that they were forry to heare, what miladuenture had befallen the Romans, their good friends, in this warre with Pyrrbus; and that the people of Carthage were very willing to affift the state of Rome, by sending an Armie into Italie; if their helpe were thought needfull, against the Epirots.
